LORD GODDARD C.J., stated the facts, and, dealing first with the alleged breach by the defendants of their statutory duty, after reading rule 9 of the rules of 1902, continued: The construction which Donovan J. put on this rule was that the two men when making an inspection for the purpose of relaying, to see what pieces of line required relaying, an operation which would save time the next day when the work was actually put in hand, were engaged on work for the purpose of relaying or repairing the permanent way. If the rule is read without reference to the Act of 1900 there is, no doubt, a great deal to be said for that view, because the men were walking along the line inspecting it for the reason that relaying was contemplated, and as a preliminary to the actual work of relaying, and therefore it was said that what they were doing was "for the purpose of relaying." When, however, reference is made to the Act, I think it is clear that that is not, and cannot be, the true construction. Under the Act, the Board of Trade may make such rules as they think fit with respect to any of the subjects mentioned in the Schedule to the Act, and when one turns to the Schedule, it is found that one of the subjects for which rules may be made is "Protection to per-"manent way men when relaying or repairing the permanent"way." I do not think that by any canon of construction I could hold that because two men were walking along a line to see what they would require when they came to relay or repair the line, they were then relaying or repairing the permanent way. They were preparing themselves for doing the work in the future by finding out what pieces of permanent way required to be relayed or repaired. When, once, either singly or in a gang, they began to do the actual work, then I think they would be engaged in relaying or repairing the permanent way; but I am not prepared to hold that what these men were doing on that day makes it possible to say that the defendants were in breach of the rule. The rule must be read together with the Act, and, therefore, the words "for the purpose of relaying or repairing" must mean "when repairing or relaying." That seems to me to be the obvious construction. Moreover, when one comes to consider the whole of the rules, I do not think that it is possible that it could be contemplated, that the operation on which these men were engaged at the time of the accident was one to which the rule applies, because the rules require a look-out man, equipped with a whistle or horn, to be appointed to give warning of an approaching train. Where is such a look-out man to stand? These men were walking along the track, and it would seem rather a strange thing for the look-out man to be following them up behind. The men could see what was coming, and it would not be possible for the look-out man, who would be on the move the whole time, to be in a better position than the men themselves to keep a look-out; therefore, it is abundantly clear that rule 9 does not apply to the work which these men were doing on that day, and for exactly the same reason I am prepared to hold that rule 234 (d) of the British Railway's rules must be construed in the same way.

The obvious meaning of rule 234 (d) is that when a gang of men is at work, actually taking up and putting down new lines or doing work on the ballast on the permanent way, and the like, then it is necessary to station a look-out man who has to stay in one position. The rule does not contemplate that where peripatetic workmen are walking along, perhaps a distance of half a mile, a look-out man is to be stationed. For these reasons I am of opinion that there was no breach by the Railway Executive, either of the statutory rule or of the domestic rule.

Another point which has been argued is that Varty, being the foreman, was negligent in that he did not see that the plaintiff stepped off to the right instead of to the left on to the down line. I cannot bring myself to say that Varty was appointed to see that the plaintiff was safe. The plaintiff knew the rules; he knew, and was accustomed to this class of work, and what he did when Varty was behind him, was to step off the up rail into the 6 ft. way instead of stepping to the right. Varty also did the same thing. The plaintiff was not directed by Varty to do what he did. He broke the rule of his own volition, and he put himself into a dangerous position without taking any notice of where he went. The most that can be said is that a situation arose which was somewhat like the situation in Stapley v. Gypsum Mines Ld.,[1] a case which I find very difficult to understand, but, at any rate, I think the present case differs from that case in one material respect. There two workmen had agreed together to do something which, and this I understand to be the root of the decision, the House of Lords thought was negligent. There was a great division of judicial opinion upon the matter. This court gave a unanimous judgment but the decision was reversed in the House of Lords by a majority of one. The facts were that two men had agreed to remain at work under a dangerous roof. Then one man removed himself from being under the roof and went to work elsewhere. The other stayed and was killed. The House of Lords decided that the negligence of the man who went away contributed to a certain extent to the misfortune of the man who stayed under the roof, and that the negligence of the two men was, as it was put, so inextricably mixed up that it could be said to contribute to the accident, and that the employers were vicariously liable.

I decline to come to any such decision in this case with regard to the position of Varty and the plaintiff. It is true that Varty was the ganger, but he was not a ganger for the purpose of seeing that the plaintiff walked in one place rather than in another; he did not give him orders to step out into the 6 ft. way, and it is not suggested that the plaintiff stepped out into the footway because Varty did. It was not a case of the plaintiff following Varty; as a matter of fact, the plaintiff stepped out first without looking what he was doing, and therefore it must be said that he was entirely the author of his own misfortune, and that the employers cannot possibly be made vicariously liable. The fact was that neither of these men looked where he was going, but instead, either for good or bad reasons, they neglected the rules which had been made for their safety. I cannot see, however, that anything that Varty did contributed to the accident to the plaintiff, and therefore, though for different reasons, I agree that the judgment below in favour of the defendants was right.

SINGLETON L.J. There are three matters for consideration upon this appeal. First, has it been shown that the defendants were guilty of breach of their statutory duty which brought about, or contributed to, the accident which the plaintiff sustained? Secondly, has it been shown that the defendants were guilty of a breach of the duty which they owed to their employee under the common law; and thirdly, was the plaintiff himself wholly to blame for the accident which befell him?

[His Lordship referred to the Railway Employment (Prevention of Accidents) Act, 1900, and the Prevention of Accidents Rules, 1902, r. 9, and continued:] It was held by Donovan J. that the two men, Varty and the plaintiff, were working on or near lines or rails used for traffic for the purpose of relaying or repairing the permanent way on such lines, and that there was danger. These two men had gone on a journey of inspection, to walk on a particular piece of line to form a view as to the number of portions of rail which would be necessary for the work that had to be done at some future time. They were not doing the work of relaying or repairing, but it is said that because they were inspecting, they were doing work "for the purpose of relaying or "repairing." When one looks at its terms rule 9 contemplates a case where one man is working on the line, or where a number of men are working in a gang. In such a case he or they must be given, in circumstances within the rule, protection of the kind mentioned. I do not think this case falls within it. Rule 234 (d) of the British Railways' Rules, 1950, appears to me to be the railways' means of performing their duty specified under rule 9.

Again, it appears to me that rule 234 (d) contemplates men working in a particular place upon a line, and not the case of an inspection by one or two men walking along the line to find out what may be necessary for the work of relaying or repairing which has to be done at another time. For these reasons I do not think it can be held that rule 9 applies to the circumstances of this case. It does not mean that whenever one man is going along to inspect the line a look-out man must be provided.

The second point is this: It is the duty of an employer to take reasonable care to prevent his men from meeting with unnecessary risks, and it is submitted by Mr. Beney that when it was seen that a train was coming from the direction of Newcastle, Varty ought to have seen that the plaintiff went from where he was to the right-hand side rather than across on to the other rail. The difficulty I have felt arises from the decision of the House of Lords in Stapley v. Gypsum Mines Ld.[2] In the present case Varty was the senior man; he and the plaintiff both stepped in the wrong direction when the train from Newcastle was approaching, and they ought to have gone off the railway line altogether. There is no doubt from the evidence which was given that from time to time the rules were read to the men so that they might know what they ought to do, and that from the answers given by the plaintiff himself, he knew that he ought to have gone off the railway line altogether.

The plaintiff admitted that he knew of rule 234 (a), but both Varty and he remained on or near the running line, and were, therefore, both in breach of that rule. I do not think that the negligence of one is mixed up with the negligence of the other, as was said to be the case in Stapley v. Gypsum Mines Ld.[2] Each, it is true, disregarded the provisions of the rule made for his own safety, and that was the cause of the accident. I do not think it would be right to say that employers who have made rules of that kind, and who have brought them to the notice of this particular plaintiff and the other men, have failed in the duty which they owe to their workmen under the common law.

The third point arises upon the plaintiff's own position; he knew what he ought to do; he knew the risk to which he subjected himself if he stepped on to another running line without knowing that that line was safe. He ought to have gone off the railway line altogether when the train from Newcastle was approaching, but he did not do so; he took another course, and upon that Donovan J. said: "We are dealing with "two men each of whom disobeyed a rule well known to him, "and it was that disobedience which, in my view, was the real "cause of this distressing accident."

I have been forced to the same conclusion. This man, knowing the risk—he was 42 at the date of the trial, and a man of experience upon the railway—stepped in a direction to which he ought not to have gone; he knew it was wrong; he knew he was exposing himself to a risk which the rule-book said he must avoid taking. In that sense he was the author of his own wrong, and I agree with my Lord that his appeal must be dismissed.

HODSON L.J. I am of the same opinion. Donovan J. came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was injured because he disobeyed a domestic rule of the defendants which was well known to him, in moving across the other line when a train was approaching on one line instead of moving clear of both sets of metals. If I had agreed with Donovan J. that the defendants were in breach of rule 9 of the Prevention of Accidents Rules, 1902, made pursuant to the Railway Employment (Prevention of Accidents) Act, 1900, I should have found it very difficult to resist the conclusion that the defendants would have been partly to blame; but, in my judgment, Donovan J. did not construe rule 9 correctly. I have very little to add to what has already been said, I think, taking rule 9 by itself, there was great force in the argument that the words "for the purpose of relaying or "repairing the permanent way" were wide enough to include the occupation in which the plaintiff and the ganger were engaged on the day in question. They were walking along the line, a decision having been taken to take up the rails, with a view to deciding where long and short lengths of rail were required, so that it might well be said that what they were doing was something for "the purpose of relaying or repairing the "permanent way." When, however, one looks at the Act under which the regulation was made, and the schedule to that Act, it appears that the words in paragraph 12 of the schedule "Pro-"tection to permanent way men when relaying or repairing perma-"nent way" have the effect of limiting the provisions which the Board of Trade may make. One, I think, is driven to this conclusion, that the words "for the purpose of" in rule 9 are to be treated as equivalent to "when," because if they are not so treated the rule in question would be in part ultra vires. Donovan J. did not have his attention drawn to the statute, and, no doubt, he reached his conclusion without considering the limits which it imposes.

I have nothing to add as to the common law position. I think the plaintiff failed to establish the breach of the statutory regulations which Donovan J. found in his favour, and that he is left in the position that he has to accept the judge's finding at common law that the accident was caused by his own fault.

Negligence—Child—Injury to—Trespasser—Demolition work—Child injured while interfering with partly demolished wall—Liability of contractors—Duty of care—Extent.

Trespass.

The plaintiff, a boy of twelve, was injured when, on a Sunday, in company with other boys, he went onto a site where demolition work was being carried out by the defendants under contract with the owners, and with a piece of gas piping loosened some bricks in a wall causing the wall to fall on him. The site was readily accessible from a neighbouring open space where children were in the habit of playing, but they were always ordered off the site of the demolition by the defendants' servants. Ormerod J. found that the defendants were negligent in leaving the wall in an unsafe condition, but that the plaintiff was a trespasser:—

Held that, in the circumstances, although the plaintiff was a trespasser, his presence on the site was so likely as to put him in the class of "neighbour" whom the defendants ought reasonably to have contemplated would be affected by their act in leaving the wall in an unsafe condition and, therefore, having failed to take the necessary precautions to prevent injury to him, they were liable to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, Terence David Davis, an infant, brought an action by his father and next friend for damages against the defendant, the St. Mary's Demolition and Excavation Co. Ld. for injuries received on October 1, 1950, by the falling of a wall which was part of a house which the defendants were in the process of demolishing.

The Corporation of the City of London were the owners of houses Nos. 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 Bittern Street which had suffered bomb damage during the war, but had been temporarily repaired. In 1950 the corporation entered into a contract with the defendants to demolish the houses. Before demolition began, there was at the back of these houses a wall which separated the site of the houses from an open site which had been cleared. On this site children were in the habit of playing. During the course of the demolition of the houses this wall was itself demolished and thereafter it became possible for anyone to step from the open site to the site of the houses in question.

By September 29, 1950, house No. 38 alone remained to be demolished and that house had already had the roof and brickwork down to the first floor ceiling removed. The rear wall of this house, which was some 100 years old, had been damaged by bombing, but the upper part of the wall had later been repaired by new brickwork.

On Sunday, October 1, the plaintiff, who was then 12 years old, in company with other boys went to the site where the demolition was taking place and with the aid of some gas piping started pulling away some loose bricks in the rear wall, when the wall fell and the plaintiff was injured.

The plaintiff claimed damages on the ground that he was a licensee and that the defendants were negligent in leaving the wall in an unsafe condition.

Dec. 21. ORMEROD J. delivered a judgment in which he stated the facts, held that the defendants were under no obligation to put a hoarding round the site, but that the wall was left in an unsafe condition which only a small amount of interference by boys would cause to fall, and continued: The next question is whether the defendants owed any duty to the plaintiff, and whether their action in leaving this wall in an unsafe condition was a breach of that duty? It is first necessary to consider whether or not the plaintiff was a trespasser on these premises or whether he was there by licence or invitation of the defendants or anybody else. The defendants were not the occupiers of the premises. The occupiers were admittedly the City of London throughout.

The plaintiff contended that children were allowed to play on the site of these demolished premises, and under those circumstances, it was said, they were licensed. The evidence is quite to the contrary so far as that is concerned. There is no doubt that children were allowed to play on the cleared site at the rear of the premises, but the evidence of the workmen engaged in the work of demolition was that whenever children came on the site they were ordered off. I found no evidence to show that at any time anybody in authority allowed any of these children to be or to remain on the site.

But that does not end the matter. If I follow the reasoning of Morris J. in Buckland v. Guildford Gas, Light & Coke Co.,[1] in the case of an accident occurring and an action being brought against the occupier of the land, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that he had a right to go on the land; but on the other hand if the person who is sued is somebody who has put or done something on the land, but who is not in occupation, the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that the plaintiff was a trespasser. The evidence here is that the persons engaged in demolition on all occasions drove the children away whenever they saw them on the site. The evidence of the only official of the corporation who was called, was that he never saw children on the site, although complaints had been made to him by the foreman about children. He agreed that they were a nuisance. I think the proper inference under the circumstances is that these children had no licence from the City Corporation or from anyone to go on the site, and that the plaintiff was in fact at the time of this accident a trespasser.

If the defendants were the occupiers of the site and the plaintiff was a trespasser, that clearly would be an end of the case, following the decision in Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ld. v. Dumbreck,[2] unless the case could be brought within the decision in Excelsior Wire Rope Co. v. Callan,[3] or Mourton v. Poulter,[4] in each of which cases the defendants were found liable despite the fact that the plaintiff was a trespasser because it was found that there was a reckless disregard of the presence of trespassing children. But the plaintiff here argues that the defendants not being the occupiers of the site, the duty as between plaintiff and defendant is different. The plaintiff bases his argument on the decision of the House of Lords in Donoghue v. Stevenson,[5] and submits here that the plaintiff although a trespasser was somebody whom the defendants should have had regard to when considering whether or not the premises were in a safe condition before leaving them, and whether or not the plaintiff was somebody who was likely to be injured by any act or default on their part.

In Buckland v. Guildford Gas, Light & Coke Co.[6] a girl, who was visiting a farm in company with some other girls, was walking along a footpath through a field when she was moved to climb a tree which was some 90 yards away from the footpath on which she was walking. Some high-power electric cables, the property of the defendants, passed immediately over the top of the tree, and when the girl climbed to the top of the tree she came into contact with the cables and was electrocuted. In an action against the defendants for negligence, Morris J. decided first, that the burden of proving that the girl was a trespasser was on the defendants and they had not discharged that burden. But secondly, the judge held that, whether she was a trespasser or not made little or no difference because the girl belonged to that class of persons who ought to have been in the contemplation of the defendants when they put their electric wires in the particular position in which they did. In his judgment Morris J. first dealt with the test which has to be applied and cited Lord Porter in his speech in Bourhill v. Young[7] who in turn quoted the statement of Lord Atkin in Donoghue v. Stevenson[8] as indicating the extent of the duty under which the defendant was. Lord Atkin said[9]: "You must take reasonable "care to avoid acts or omissions which you can reasonably foresee "would be likely to injure your neighbour. Who, then, in law "is my neighbour? The answer seems to be—persons who are "so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reason-"ably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when "I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are "called in question." In a later part of his judgment Morris J. said[10]: "Under most conditions the defendants would be "entitled to assume that persons would not go unlawfully on "land and would not be under obligation to provide against the "contingency of persons trespassing. Though not occupiers of "the land the defendants are in a position closely analogous. "The group of those who must be regarded as 'neighbours' "from the point of view of the defendants is, however, not of "rigid necessity the same as the group of those who must be "regarded as invitees or licensees from the point of view of the "occupier of the land. The test to be applied in considering "who is a neighbour is the test indicated by Lord Atkin. As "a general rule a trespasser on land would not be within the "group of neighbours, but whether some particular person is a "neighbour depends upon the circumstances of a particular "case."

St. Mary's

Ormerod J.

Applying that test, which appears to me to be the proper test to apply in the present circumstances, I have to ask myself whether the defendants are in the same position vis-à-vis the plaintiff as they would be if they were the occupiers of the land in question? Do they owe no other duty to the plaintiff than the occupier of the land would owe to a trespasser, or are the defendants in these particular circumstances in such a position in relation to the plaintiff that in spite of the fact that he is a trespasser they owe to him a duty to take care so far as this building is concerned? I think any decision which puts the defendants in a different position from the occupier of the land is one which must be considered with very great care. But the position here, as I see it, is that the defendants knew that children were in the habit of coming on to this land, so much so that the defendants' foreman had complained to the representative of the corporation of the nuisance that these children were on the site when they as contractors were getting on with their work. Under those circumstances, it appears to me that the foreman in considering whether the premises were safe and considering against whom the premises had to be made safe ought to ask himself the question—which does not seem to call for any great exercise of the imagination—Are children likely to come on this site, and if they do are they likely to interfere with the brickwork and the building generally? That they were likely to come on the site, I think, could admit of only one answer. The foreman would be bound to answer that question in the affirmative. He knew they were in the habit of coming on the site. Whether they would interfere with the building in such a way as small boys might interfere, again is a question which, in my view, would have to be answered in the affirmative. If small boys of 12 years of age go on to a building site where there are loose stones and bricks and where apparently in the wall in question there are loose bricks, and if there are about the place pieces of old gas pipe and other such implements, it seems one of the most likely things that in the course of an afternoon's play there will be some interference with some part of a building such as that in course of demolition which must offer a constant allurement and temptation to any child who is within sight of it.

In those circumstances, I have come to the conclusion here that, although the plaintiff was a trespasser, yet his presence and that of other children on this site was so likely as to put them in the class of "neighbours" as defined by Lord Atkin in Donoghue v. Stevenson,[11] so that the defendants should have taken the necessary precautions to prevent injury to them. Accordingly, it seems to me that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed.

[His Lordship held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence; considered the medical evidence and continued:] In all the circumstances, I think the proper sum to award as damages is the sum of £750, and I give judgment for the plaintiff for that amount.

Damages — Negligence — Remoteness — Damage to plaintiff's motor car through negligence of garage—Loan to plaintiff of another car during repair—Loss of second car through plaintiff's negligence—Hire of third car—Claim against garage for cost of hire. Mitigation —Impossible owing to plaintiff's negligence.

On December 27, 1951, the defendant orally agreed with the plaintiff to repair his Standard 12 h.p. motor car. Owing to the defendant's admitted negligence or breach of contract the Standard car was damaged by fire at the defendant's garage. Thereupon the defendant lent to the plaintiff a Morris 8 h.p. motor car until such time as the Standard car was repaired. On February 6, 1952, the plaintiff's servant or agent met with an accident while driving the Morris car which became a total wreck, and on October 23, 1953, judgment was entered against the plaintiff in favour of the defendant for the value of the car. From February 9, 1952, until April 9, 1952 (when the Standard car was returned) the plaintiff was obliged to hire another motor car at a total cost of £80 18s. In a claim by the plaintiff against the defendant for this sum:—

Held, that the plaintiff was compelled to hire another car as a result of the defendant's negligence or breach of contract and not as a result of his own negligence in respect of the Morris car; he had mitigated his loss by using the Morris car so long as it was available, and the reason for it ceasing to be available was irrelevant; accordingly, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Finlay Macrae, a veterinary surgeon, used for the purpose of his practice a Standard 12 h.p. saloon motor-car. On December 27, 1951, the defendant, a partner in a garage business known as West View Garage, Hatton Heath, Chester, agreed with the plaintiff to repair a leak in the petrol tank of his car. On the same date the car was damaged by fire in the defendant's garage owing to the admitted breach of contract or negligence of the defendant. The defendant lent to the plaintiff an old Morris 8 h.p. car until his own car was repaired, but, while being driven by the plaintiff's servant or agent the Morris car was involved in a collision and became a total wreck. In an action by the defendant against the plaintiff for the value of the Morris car, judgment was awarded in favour of the defendant on the ground of the negligence of the plaintiff's servant or agent. In the meantime, the plaintiff was compelled to hire another motor-car during the time that his own car was being repaired, at a total cost of £80 18s. The present action was for the recovery of this sum from the defendant.

The plaintiff contended that the loss incurred by reason of the hiring was attributable to the defendant's negligence or breach of contract when the plaintiff's car was damaged. The defendant maintained that it was directly caused by the negligence of the plaintiff's servant or agent in destroying the Morris car which would otherwise have remained available to the plaintiff during the whole period of hiring and, furthermore, that the plaintiff had failed properly to mitigate his loss by causing the destruction of the Morris car.

G. G. Lind-Smith for the plaintiff.
H. E. Hooson for the defendant.

Barry J. stated the facts, and continued: The present action is brought upon the admitted breach of contract or negligence on December 27, 1951. The defendant, however, contends that the damage arises from the plaintiff's own negligence or that of his servant or agent in destroying the car lent to him by the defendant which would otherwise have remained available to him until his own car had been repaired. I do not think that this contention is right. As a result of the breach by the defendant on December 27, 1951, the plaintiff lost the use of his Standard motor-car until such time as it could be repaired. It was not repaired till April 9, 1952. Prima facie, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to recover by way of damages compensation for the loss of use of this car between December 27, 1951, and April 9, 1952. He was, however, under an obligation to act reasonably and to take reasonable steps to mitigate his loss. On the assumption that the Morris 8 was adequate, old though it was, the plaintiff was under a duty to mitigate his damage by driving it while his own car was under repair. He did use the Morris car so long as it was available for use, but it ceased to be available when it was totally destroyed. The plaintiff has compensated the defendant to the full for his negligent conduct in reducing the Morris car to a total wreck.

There was no Morris car which could be used by the plaintiff after February 6, 1952. No other car was offered to him by the defendant and, therefore, no question of mitigation after that date can arise. It was as a result of the original negligent act or breach of contract that the plaintiff was compelled to hire another car. The fact that the Morris car ceased to be available as a result of the negligence of the plaintiff's servant or agent is wholly irrelevant. The mere lending of the Morris car did not put an end to the defendant's liability in respect of the plaintiff's loss on December 27, 1951. It is quite immaterial whether the Morris car was destroyed through the plaintiff's negligence or fell to pieces due to old age. What matters is that it ceased to be available. The defendant could have provided another car. He did not do so. The plaintiff had therefore to hire another car. The plaintiff is entitled to recover the cost of that hire and I therefore award him judgment in the sum of £80 18s.

Husband and Wife — Maintenance — Justices — Adultery by wife — Evidence—Variation of original order after adultery—Subsequent application to discharge—"Fresh evidence"—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), s. 7.

A wife was granted an order for maintenance in 1944 by justices on the ground of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance. In 1946 she committed an act of adultery which the husband condoned in 1947 during a brief reconciliation. In 1950 the wife successfully applied for a variation in the amount of maintenance ordered in 1944; no point was taken by the husband in regard to the adultery in 1946. In 1953 the husband applied for the discharge of the orders of 1944 and 1950 on the ground, inter alia, that the wife had committed adultery since 1944:—

Held, that although the husband might have been entitled to have the order of 1944 discharged when the wife applied for variation, once the order had been remade in 1950 there was no "fresh "evidence" within the meaning of section 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, on which the husband could rely, and there were, accordingly, no merits in his application.

APPEAL from the Colwyn Bay justices.

The parties were married in 1922 and there were five children. On February 9, 1944, the Colwyn Bay justices made an order in favour of the wife on the ground that the husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance and the husband was ordered to pay 25s. a week for the wife and maintenance for four of the children, of whom the custody was given to the wife.

The husband had gone to live in Birmingham, where he formed an adulterous association with another woman. He was the co-respondent in divorce proceedings brought by that woman's husband, and had had to pay the costs. Their association was said to have continued for several years from before 1947; and they were living under the same roof up to 1953. The wife continued to live in Colwyn Bay, and in or about the year 1946 she committed an act of adultery. There was a brief reconciliation in 1947, each then knowing of the other's adultery.

On April 19, 1950, the order of February 9, 1944, was varied on the wife's application to 35s. a week for the wife and 12s. 6d. for the one child still under 16. In April, 1953, the husband visited the wife in Colwyn Bay in an attempt (he said) to effect a reconciliation; and intercourse took place during a night which they spent together there. The husband then returned to Birmingham and later wrote to the wife a letter which purported to offer a reconciliation.

On November 6, 1953, the husband applied to the justices under section 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895,[1] for a revocation of the order of 1944, as varied in 1950, on the grounds (1) that since the making of the order of 1944 the wife had committed adultery; (2) that she had unreasonably and unjustifiably refused to resume cohabitation with him in 1953. He suggested also that in addition to the admitted adultery in 1946, the wife had committed adultery on other occasions; but the justices did not accept his contention. The justices dismissed the application, holding that the wife's adultery in 1946 had been condoned in 1947, and that the wife was justified in the circumstances in refusing the alleged offer of a reconciliation. The husband appealed.

This report is concerned solely with the issues raised by the wife's adultery in 1946.

LORD MERRIMAN P. referred to the history of the marriage and to the orders of 1944 and 1950, saying that when the present application was brought "to discharge the said order," as the form of complaint showed, "the said order" must mean the combination of the two orders of 1944 and 1950, because a discharge had to take effect on both orders, the original one and the second one together, and said that there was no doubt that the wife had committed an act of adultery in 1946, and that there had been a reconciliation in 1947, when it appeared that the wife had admitted her adultery. His Lordship continued: As the law stands (at any rate, we are bound so to hold by a decision of this court in Read v. Read [1]) had the husband brought a summons in 1947 for the discharge of the original order on the ground that the wife had committed the admitted act of adultery, he would have succeeded, because Read v. Read [2] decides that it is impossible to import into the provisions of section 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, the proviso which occurs in section 6 in connexion with the condonation of adultery. As the act of adultery had occurred since the making of the order in 1944 it would have been "cause shown upon fresh "evidence," and I think the court would have had at that time no option but to be satisfied that the order must be discharged. But no such application was made, and, what is not less important, when the fresh order was made on April 19, 1950, varying the amount of the original order, this act of adultery was not brought forward by way of defence or by way of objection to the making of the fresh order. It is unnecessary to decide how the matter would have stood then, but I will assume, perhaps too favourably to the husband, that it could then have been brought forward as cause shown upon fresh evidence. But we are considering the position as it stood in November, 1953, when this present application was made by the husband to discharge this order, or this combination of two orders, under section 7.

Natborny v. Natborny [3] is, in my opinion, of very great importance on this matter, for that case shows that in connexion with a charge of adultery put forward under section 7 as the ground of an application for the discharge of a subsisting order, the whole section must be read together, and one of the effects of reading the whole section together is that the time-limit of six months, which applies to making the substantive complaint of adultery as the basis of an order, is not imported into the allegation of an act of adultery having been committed since the making of the order. The reason for that is, that the earlier part of the section, which states that "cause" must be "shown upon fresh "evidence to the satisfaction of the court at any time," governs the whole section; and, although the power to alter, vary or discharge under that part of the section is discretionary, when there is proof of an act of adultery, or proof of a resumption of cohabitation, there is no discretion. That, I think, is plainly shown from the judgment of Romer L.J. in Natborny v. Natborny,[4] where he says: "If on fresh evidence an application "is made under the first part of section 7 of the Act of 1895 "asking the court to alter, vary or discharge an order, and such "fresh evidence shows that the wife has either voluntarily "resumed cohabitation, or has committed an act of adultery, the "court no longer has the wide discretion that it would have had "in other cases." From that it follows that provided the charge of adultery is brought upon what can be called fresh evidence within the meaning of section 7, it is not barred by the time-limit of six months.

Brammer v. Brammer.

Assuming, then, as I think one is right in assuming, that when the wife tried to get the order of 1944 varied in her favour as regards the amount in 1950, the husband would have been entitled to say: "I produce fresh evidence of her having committed "adultery since 1944. The evidence is fresh because she had not "committed the adultery in or before 1944, therefore it has "happened since 1944, and, therefore, the question whether I "could have reasonably put it before the court in 1944 does not "arise," (I am paraphrasing, without quoting, from Johnson v. Johnson,[5] a decision of this court in which the meaning of the words "upon fresh evidence" was interpreted), "and as I am "entitled to say that this is fresh evidence, the fact that the "adultery, of which I am now complaining as cause to resist this "application and to set the old order aside, is outside the six "months, does not matter": see Read v. Read,[6] or Ruther v. Ruther,[7] cited in Read v. Read.

But the question is whether the husband could say all that in November, 1953. In my opinion, it was quite hopeless for him to attempt to say it. There was nothing fresh about the evidence in 1953. He was not producing this allegation of adultery upon fresh evidence; he had it all available when the order was remade in 1950. And for that reason alone, in my opinion, that ground of his present application is hopeless.

It can be put in another way, which I merely indicate without attempting to decide. One of the elements of estoppel inter partes is that if there is the opportunity to put forward a particular defence which is an answer on an occasion in the past, and there has been deliberate abstention from putting forward that defence, the defendant ought to be estopped from putting it forward on a later occasion. It is not, however, necessary to develop or examine that aspect of the matter.

The magistrates have held that the one act of adultery in 1946 was condoned by the husband in February, 1947, when he cohabited with his wife. I have dealt with this matter, as we are entitled to do under the rules governing these appeals, on the basis that it is open to us to draw any inferences which should have been drawn, and it is true that the mere fact that that act was condoned is not by itself a sufficient reason for not taking it into consideration. But the justices go on to say: "There "is no proof of any other act of adultery on the part of the wife." It is said that there was proof. I do not intend to go behind the note in this matter, and so far as the note is concerned there is no suggestion whatever that it was part of the husband's case that the wife had committed some fresh adultery which would be available to him.

[His Lordship then considered the questions raised by the finding that the wife was justified in her refusal to return to the husband, and continued:] In my opinion this is a hopeless appeal, and should be dismissed.

SACHS J. One of the main issues argued before this court was whether such adultery had been established on the part of the wife as to make it obligatory on the court to discharge the maintenance order by virtue of the provisions of portion of section 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895. [His Lordship considered the husband's allegation of adultery on occasions other than in 1946, and said that he agreed with the rejection of that allegation by the justices, and continued:] The adultery of 1946 was fully known to the husband before the proceedings in 1950 resulted in a further maintenance order of an amount varied from that which had been previously ordered in 1944. On those proceedings, had the husband so chosen, he could have put in evidence the pre-1947 adultery, and in that case it may well have been that he would have succeeded in those 1950 proceedings in securing the discharge of the order. He did not do so.

In my opinion, the evidence which he then had available in 1950 cannot be said to be "fresh evidence" as regards proceedings in 1953. I take the view that "fresh evidence" must mean "fresh" in relation to whatever were the immediately preceding relevant proceedings—in this case the 1950 proceedings. Therefore, the 1946 incidents do not come within that definition of "fresh evidence" which has held the field since Johnson v. Johnson,[8] in that it could not be said that this evidence was not available to the husband at the date of the previous proceedings in 1950. In that respect I, too, desire to mention the judgment of Romer L.J. in the Court of Appeal to which my Lord has referred, and which, to my mind, makes it entirely clear, if it was not clear previously, that the words "fresh evidence" in the first portion of section 7 must relate also to the matters referred to in the second portion of that section.

On that, accordingly, I found my view, and, like my Lord,

Brammer v. Brammer.

Sachs J.

I will refrain from discussing the question of estoppel and from canvassing the fine distinction between allegations in the nature of a defence which are available as a traverse, and allegations which are available only by way of confession and avoidance. Between these two types of allegation there lies the important distinction referred to in Humphries v. Humphries.[9]

As regards the other issues which have been raised in this case I have nothing to add, and I agree with my Lord as to the dismissal of this appeal.

* IVORY v. IVORY.

Husband and Wife — Maintenance — Justices — National assistance — Husband in receipt of national assistance—Living with another woman—Wife not "member of the same household"—Discretion of court to order maintenance — Quantum — National Assistance Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 29), s. 7.

Although a deserted wife is not "a member of the same house-"hold" as the husband under section 7 of the National Assistance Act, 1948, the court still has a discretion to make an appropriate order for maintenance although the husband's sole income is from the National Assistance Board.

It is wrong in fixing the amount of a maintenance order to fix a figure which is too high for the husband to be able to pay and to order that part of that figure should accumulate as arrears.

Appeal from Gosport Justices.

Husband's appeal to the Divisional Court from an order of the justices for the Gosport Petty Sessional Division, dated August 18, 1953, upon a question of amount of maintenance.

On November 9, 1950, the justices had made an order on the ground of desertion whereby the husband, who was then earning £8 18s. a week, was ordered to pay the wife £3 a week. By March, 1953, arrears of £78 had accumulated, and an order was made for them to be paid off at 10s. a week. The amount of total arrears, however, increased during the summer, and in August, 1953, the husband applied for a variation. Part of the arrears had been remitted on the ground that the wife had been prepared to accept a transfer into her name of the former matrimonial home. The husband was then unemployed and in receipt of £4 16s. 6d. a week from the National Assistance Board, from which he had to provide for the woman with whom he was living and their child. He was also making instalment payments of 5s. a week in respect of a fine of £50 for a criminal offence which had been previously imposed. The justices decided that the husband should pay 30s. a week maintenance, but since they appreciated that this would be too large a sum for him to manage they decided that he should pay 15s. a week to the wife and that the balance should accumulate week by week as further arrears while he remained out of employment.

The husband appealed, and it appeared at the hearing of the appeal that the justices had made a material error of fact in respect of the wife's current earnings. It was also conceded that the justices had been wrong in fixing a figure too high for the husband to be able to pay, and to order part of that figure to accumulate as arrears. The court was accordingly asked to deal with the question of amount, and to fix a proper sum instead of incurring the further expense of a re-hearing by the justices.

A. H. Ormerod for the husband.
E. B. McLellan for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN P. stated the facts, and referring to the justices' decision to reduce the amount to 30s. continued: Having decided to reduce the amount to 30s., they realized that in his present situation the husband could not pay that sum. They decided, therefore, that he should pay 15s., and that the balance which, ex hypothesi, on their own finding, he is at present unable to pay, should accumulate week by week as arrears; in other words, that he should pay 15s., and so long as he is out of employment should pile up arrears at the rate of £39 a year. It has not been sought to defend that way of dealing with it, and, in my opinion, it is fundamentally wrong. I fully appreciate the view behind the magistrates' order that this husband has not shown any undue anxiety to support his wife, and that it is not a case in which they were prepared to consider the making of a purely nominal order merely because the wife was earning money and doing her best to keep herself, and, perhaps, put a little by. But, in my opinion, it is fundamentally wrong to fix a figure which is too high for a man to pay, and to order part of that figure to accumulate as arrears, for there is bound to come a moment when, if things remain as they are, the husband will be under an obligation to pay a weekly amount rather than pay which he will go to prison; whereas the proper thing is, if possible, to fix an amount which he will pay rather than go to prison. As it is clear, therefore, that the justices made a very material error of fact as regards the wife's own figures, and directed themselves on a wrong principle as to the amount to be awarded in the circumstances (and I merely observe parenthetically that it is a commonplace nowadays that variations may be made and re-made from time to time according to the actual ability of the husband to pay), and as it is conceded that in these two respects they have gone wrong, counsel united in inviting us to deal with the matter of figures ourselves, instead of incurring the expense of sending the case back to the justices, and we have accepted that burden.

The figures which we have to consider are stated in general terms:—The husband's income from the National Assistance Board is £4 16s. 6d., but of that a sum estimated at £1 7s. 6d. is in respect of the woman with whom he has been living for some time, and their child. That leaves him with £3 9s. out of which to satisfy what are called his "requirements." There are two periodical requirements. One is the sum of 30s. a week for the rent of the house, but the other is something different. Some years ago, apparently, for some criminal offence the precise details of which we do not know, he was fined £50, which he has been ordered to pay at the rate of 10s. a week. That 10s., we are told, is for the time being reduced to 5s. But that is a requirement which is quite outside his obligations to his wife. The net result is that, subtracting the 35s. from £3 9s. he is left with £1 14s. for himself, or, bringing back again into the calculation the £1 7s. 6d. in respect of the paramour and the child, a sum of £3 1s. 6d., rent free, for food and clothing. It goes without saying that that is not a large amount for the support of three persons. On the other hand, the wife, taking off her necessary expenses, is left in round figures with £3, plus the house, which, after allowing for the expenses in connexion with it, leaves her rent free.

The question, therefore, is whether this is a case in which, as is argued on behalf of the husband, the amount of the order in favour of his wife should be reduced to some purely nominal amount like 6d. or 1s. a week, or whether it should be something rather more substantial, but still comparatively small, having regard to his present means. We were at first faced with an argument based upon the wording of the National Assistance Act, 1948. The argument was that a statutory duty is put upon the National Assistance Board by the National Assistance Act, 1948, to assess the needs of the husband according to the terms of the Act, and in particular having regard to section 7,[1] which provides for the aggregation of what are called "requirements" and "resources" if the applicant (in this case the husband) "has to [1] National Assistance Act, 1948, s. 7: "(1) Where it appears to the "Board that an applicant for assist- "ance has to provide for requirements "of some other person being a mem- "ber of the same household, the "Board shall, subject to the provi- "sions of this Act, give assistance by "reference to the aggregate require- "ments and aggregate resources of "the applicant and the said other "person.

"(2) Where in the giving of assist- "ance to an applicant therefor the "requirements of another person are "taken into account, that person is in "this Act referred to as a dependant "of the applicant.

"(3) Where a husband and wife are "members of the same household, "their requirements and resources "shall in all cases be aggregated for "the purposes of this part of this "Act. . . ."

"provide for requirements of some other person being a member "of the same household." It is the paramour and the child who are members of the same household, and the wife, owing to the fact that he has deserted her for the other woman, is not a member of his household: but she is still his wife. The argument with which we were presented originally came to this, that the scheme of the Act prohibited ordering any support for the deserted wife out of the sum computed by the National Assistance Board for the aggregate requirements of the husband, the paramour and their child, for that which the husband in fact receives from the board must be presumed to be neither more nor less than that which is exactly required for the subsistence of those persons, to the exclusion of the wife. It would be a strange result if that was a necessary consequence. Incidentally, on the facts of this case, it is an argument which appears to have a flaw, because one of the deductions out of this sum provided by the National Assistance Board is for the satisfaction of a fine in respect of some wrong-doing of the husband in the not far distant past. I am bound to say that I was relieved to find that the argument was not pressed to its logical conclusion, and we were left, not with an absolute prohibition against making any order in favour of the wife, but with a discretion to be exercised as best we might, on the basis that the husband has been given what is a comparatively small sum for the maintenance of himself and his household.

Giving the best consideration I can to the matter I have come to the conclusion that it would be wrong to reduce the amount to some purely nominal figure, but I think that we ought to reduce it to the sum of 6s. a week, and to get rid, as far as possible, of any order that any part of what he pays should be regarded as a contribution to a fund composed of arrears. I think that that will be effected if we make this variation retroactive to the date of the hearing. We are in no position to deal with the arrears which actually remained at that moment; but that, I think, will get rid of the suggestion that those arrears should receive a weekly accretion of anything like 15s.

SACHS J. A brave attempt was made by Mr. Ormerod to argue that there was, in effect, always an absolute bar to the courts making an order for more than a nominal sum to be paid by way of maintenance when the husband's sole source of income is derived from funds provided under the National Assistance Act, 1948. He was, however, faced with the position that he could cite no provision in that Act which set up such a bar, or which would disable the court from making such an order, however small, as might be just in respect of the man's legal obligations. Nor was he able to point to any provision in the Act which laid upon the husband any obligation not to pay from the funds so provided to him any part of what he received for such objects as beer and tobacco, for instance; nor was he able to tell us how the "requirements" referred to in section 5 (2)[2] of the Act are computed. So in the end he was constrained to concede that the fact that the husband's income derives solely from funds provided under the Act is simply one factor which must be taken into account when assessing what it is proper to pay. With that statement I respectfully agree.

Ivory v. Ivory.

Taking now the facts of the case, I agree with every word which has been spoken by my Lord, and, in particular, with what he has said as to the mischief of making an order with the deliberate intention of ensuring that arrears accrue. Any such order can only be based on a wrong approach to the principles upon which amounts should be awarded. I agree with the figure of 6s. which my Lord has stated as a proper order.

* In the Estate of COPE, decd.

Administrator—Revocation of grant—Alleged failure to disclose certain assets—Revocation refused.

Probate.

It was alleged that certain assets of the deceased had not been disclosed by the administration of the deceased's estate and application was made to the court on motion for a revocation of the grant and for a grant of letters of administration de bonis non to an independent person. There was no suggestion of any defect in title of the grantees nor of a supervening incapacity:—

Held, that although there might upon the allegations made be a prima facie case for an inventory and account, this was not a case where the court could order a revocation of the grant.

Motion.

The following statement of facts is taken from the case on motion: "[The deceased] died on May 25, 1953, at Boscombe "hospital, Bournemouth, intestate, leaving him surviving two "brothers Bernard and Alfred Cope, one sister Dora Stein, and "having been pre-deceased by two sisters who left issue, such "issue now being of full age. On July 22, 1953, there was "granted out of the Principal Probate Registry to the said "Alfred Cope and to Dora Stein letters of administration of the "estate of the deceased which was sworn at £8,704 14s. 7d. gross "and £3,986 15s. 7d. net, the liabilities being said to include a "debt of £2,475 to the said Alfred Cope which liability is "disputed.

"It is alleged by the said Bernard Cope that certain assets "of the deceased have not been disclosed and that the said sum "of £8,704 14s. 7d. is a considerable understatement, such under-"statement being made deliberately by the said Alfred Cope. "It is submitted that by reason of special circumstances in "relation to the administration of the estate, the grant of July "22, 1953, should be revoked and that a grant of letters of "administration de bonis non should be made to some "independent person."

The court was moved by counsel for Bernard Cope for an order accordingly.

The motion was opposed, Dora Stein (whose surname had been changed by re-marriage to Morris) submitting in an affidavit that "in the circumstances no caveat having been entered to "the application for the grant, no valid reason is set forth in "[Bernard Cope's affidavit in support of the case on motion] to "justify the revocation of the grant, and there is no reason "why my brother Alfred and I should not proceed with the "administration of the estate."

Matters raised in the supporting affidavit had been the subject of correspondence and were in dispute.

Geoffrey Crispin for the applicant.

Stanislaus Seuffert, for the respondents, submitted that there were no special circumstances in the present case to justify an application to revoke the grants.

The cases cited are referred to in the judgment.

COLLINGWOOD J. This is a motion for the revocation of letters of administration which were granted on July 22, 1953, to Alfred Cope and Dora Stein. The applicant also asks that letters of administration de bonis non should be granted to a named chartered accountant.

It was conceded by Mr. Crispin that the facts of this case were not directly covered by any of the grounds for revocation set out in Tristram & Coote, 19th ed., at p. 336 and the following pages, but he submitted that those grounds were not exhaustive and were only examples, and that other cases could be found, of which the present is one, in which it would be proper, in the special circumstances, to revoke the letters of administration already granted and make a new grant in substitution.

In support of that contention I was referred to a number of cases, the first being In the Goods of Bradshaw.[1] The headnote to that case reads: "A grant of administration of the estate of "an intestate was made to a creditor, who, after his debt had "been fully satisfied, absconded, and could not be found. A "personal representative of the estate being required in an "action in the Chancery Division, the court revoked the grant "to the creditor without citing him, and made a new grant to "the sole next-of-kin of the deceased."

I was next referred to In the Goods of Covell[2] in which an administrator, who was also one of the residuary legatees, having partly administered the estate, left his home, and though several years had elapsed no trace of him could be discovered. The court there revoked the grant made to him, and made a fresh grant de bonis non to another of the residuary legatees. That again was a case of an administrator, though this time a residuary legatee, having absconded.

In In the Goods of William Loveday,[3] once again the administrator had disappeared. The headnote reads: "The "practice by which a grant of administration may be revoked "and a fresh grant made in the absence of the holder of the "outstanding grant, is not confined to cases where administra-"tion has been taken by creditors. Where an intestate died "leaving a widow and six children by a former marriage, and the "widow, who obtained administration, could not be found, the "court, upon the application of the children, revoked the grant "and directed administration de bonis non in favour of one of "their number." In his judgment Sir Francis Jeune P. said[4]: "Of course it may be said that creditors who apply for grants "stand in a somewhat different position from residuary legatees "or next of kin, because, inasmuch as they are specially "appointed by the court, the court might substitute another "administrator in their place upon their failure to carry out the "administration. But, in my opinion, the fact of the first "administrator being a creditor ought not really to make any "difference in regard to revocation. After all, the real object "which the court must always keep in view is the due and "proper administration of the estate and the interests of the "parties beneficially entitled thereto; and I can see no good "reason why the court should not take fresh action in regard "to an estate where it is made clear that its previous grant has "turned out abortive or inefficient. If the court has in certain "circumstances made a grant in the belief and hope that the "person appointed will properly and fully administer the estate, "and if it turns out that the person so appointed will not or "cannot administer, I do not see why the court should not "revoke an inoperative grant and make a fresh grant. There-"fore I accede to the present application." The words in that judgment must be read having regard to the facts of that case and when Sir Francis Jeune P. speaks of the previous grant having turned out to be abortive or inefficient he was dealing with a case of an administrator disappearing for a time, as in In the Goods of Bradshaw.[5]

The next case to which I was referred was Birch v. Birch[6] (which was reversed on the facts on appeal in view of fresh evidence). There the ground for revocation was the fraud in putting forward the document for probate in the very beginning. The headnote reads: "If any person who is interested, directly or "indirectly, in the establishment of a testamentary document is "guilty of a fraud in putting forward that document for probate, "this fraud affects the whole litigation. Where, therefore, the "plaintiff, in an action against executors, claimed, on the ground "of fraud, to revoke a probate granted in solemn form, and the "defendants moved to dismiss the action as res judicata, the "court refused to stay the proceedings, although it was not "suggested that the executors, to whom probate had been "granted, were cognizant of the alleged fraud, and although the "person, against whom the plaintiff now made the charges, was "not a party to the former suit."

In In the Goods of Galbraith[7] the headnote reads: "The "court has power to revoke probate granted to executors and "to make instead a grant of letters of administration de bonis "non to another person. The two surviving executors of the "will and codicil of the deceased had become unable properly "to carry out their duties by reason of their infirmities. "Accordingly, application was made on motion to the court for "probate to be revoked and for a grant to the applicant of "letters of administration de bonis non." Karminski J. in a short judgment said[8]: "I propose to make an order in the "terms of the motion, namely, to revoke the probate of the will "with its three codicils, which was granted to the two surviving "executors named in the will, and to grant letters of administra-"tion de bonis non together with the will and codicils to the "applicant, Peter Musson, a great-nephew of the deceased. The "application is a novel one only to this extent: there appears "to have been no reported case in which both executors have "been relieved of their duties in this way; but in the present "case there is the clearest possible evidence that both the sur-"viving executors are men of very advanced age and suffering "from such a degree of physical and mental infirmity as makes a "continuance of their duties impossible. For reasons due to "conditions in the Argentine the estate has not yet been wound "up, and I have to consider the objects of the court in looking "after the estate, in looking after the proper representation, and,

"not least, in looking after the interest of the parties beneficially "interested."

That, of course, correctly states the duty of the court. But here again, one must take that statement of the duty and object of the court having regard to the circumstances of that case. The circumstances there were that both the executors were men of very advanced age and suffering from such a degree of physical and mental infirmity as to make a continuation of their duty impossible. No such suggestion is made in the present case.

The last case to which I was referred was In the Goods of Edwards-Taylor, decd.[9] That was not a case of revocation. The proposed grantee of letters of administration was alleged to be under-developed both mentally and physically, but the court refused in those circumstances to make a grant to a stranger in order to protect the interests of the residuary legatee who was a daughter of the deceased.

In my opinion, none of those cases really covers the present one. There is no suggestion here that there is any defect in the title of the grantee of the letters of administration, or any supervening incapacity. There may be, upon the evidence that has been put forward, a prima facie case for an inventory and an account under section 25, but in my opinion it is not a case in which the court can order revocation of the grant.

Motion dismissed with costs.

Husband and Wife — Maintenance — High Court — Committal order — Duration—No longer limited to one year—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5—Matrimonial Causes (Judgment Summons) Rules, 1952 (S.I. 1952, No. 2209/L. 21)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1952 (S.I. 1952, No. 2113/L. 14), r. 383.

A committal order made in the Divorce Division under the Matrimonial Causes (Judgment Summons) Rules, 1952, continues in operation until the debt in respect of which it was made has been fully paid.

Application to extend committal order.

On March 23, 1953, an order had been made committing the respondent to prison for non-payment of maintenance, the committal order being suspended so long as payments of 2s. 6d. per week were made. At that rate it would have taken almost 10 years to pay off the debt. The respondent had fully complied with the order, having paid 2s. 6d. per week in addition to the current maintenance. The committal order was now almost one year old and the question arose whether it had to be extended.

Bruce Campbell for the applicant. The Divorce Division was given jurisdiction in 1932 under the Debtors Act, 1869, but its practice and procedure was then governed by the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915 (rule 379) and therefore by the County Court Rules, 1936. The County Court Rules are no longer applicable to committal orders made in a matrimonial cause: see the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, r. 383.[1] Having regard to the provisions of rule 6 of the Matrimonial Causes (Judgment Summons) Rules, 1952,[2] which provide that after a committal order has been made and suspended all payments made by the debtor are to be applied first in payment of current maintenance, the reduction of the judgment debt would necessarily be by small instalments and in most cases it would take much longer than one year to pay off the judgment debt. In the present case it would take nearly 10 years. It could not have been intended that the judgment creditor in such cases should have to come back to the court every year to have the committal order extended, and the Matrimonial Causes (Judgment Summons) Rules, 1952, which were in themselves complete and comprehensive, contained no such requirement. Latey on Divorce, 14th ed. (1951), at p. 1023, said that an order for commitment, unless issued, was effective for one year only from the date when made; but that textbook was published before the new rules were made. Rayden on Divorce, 6th ed., at p. 360, and the 1954 Annual Practice, at p. 743, also stated that commitment orders expired at the end of a year. It is submitted that these statements are now incorrect. This application, which is in form an application to extend the committal order, is unnecessary and should be dismissed.

WILLMER J. This application is in form an application to extend the period of time in respect of a committal order made on March 23, 1953. In practice, however, the purpose is to obtain a decision that the application is unnecessary. Having heard the argument I am satisfied that the application was unnecessary, except insofar as it was desirable to clarify the position which was far from clear.

Sichel v. Sichel.

It is an unfortunate fact, as was pointed out by Mr. Campbell, that the two leading textbooks on the work of this Division, as well as the most recent edition of the Annual Practice, state without qualification that it is necessary to apply for the renewal of a committal order after the expiration of one year. The authority for that proposition which is given is Order 25, r. 56, of the County Court Rules, 1936.

Until recently the County Court Rules applied in all cases brought in the High Court under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, by reason of rule 379 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, the jurisdiction under section 5 of the Debtors Act having been assigned many years ago by the Lord Chancellor to the judge sitting in bankruptcy. But new bankruptcy rules were made in 1952, and a different set of rules was, for the first time, applied to proceedings under the Debtors Act arising in this Division. By rule 383 of the Bankruptcy Rules, dated December 5, 1952, cases where the High Court is exercising jurisdiction in respect of an order or judgment made or given in a matrimonial cause were specifically excepted. Within a few days of the publication of those rules, namely on December 18, 1952, the Matrimonial Causes (Judgment Summons) Rules, 1952, were published.

Those are the rules which now govern the procedure of this court when exercising its jurisdiction under the Debtors Act, 1869. The Matrimonial Causes (Judgment Summons) Rules, 1952, are silent with regard to the necessity for renewal of a committal order after the expiration of one year. As has been pointed out by Mr. Campbell, and I think rightly pointed out, there is very good reason for that, having regard to the form of order which it is competent for a judge of this division to make. It would be in many cases almost an absurdity if year by year application had to be made to renew a committal order made on a judgment summons in this division. I say "year by year" advisedly, because it is common knowledge that many cases arise in this division in which it is necessary to suspend the operation of a committal order for what must on any view be a very long period. In those circumstances it is contended, and I think rightly contended, that it really would be quite absurd if a creditor had to come back here once a year to go through the formality of having the committal order renewed. I can only infer, from consideration of the rules themselves, that the omission of any reference to the necessity of renewing a committal order after the duration of one year was deliberate having regard to the nature of order which it is competent to make under the rules.

In my judgment, so far as committal orders made in this division are concerned, there is now no limitation as to the period of time for which they exist, other than the period during which any part of the debt remains due. A committal order made in this division under the new rules continues in operation until the debt in respect of which it was made has been fully paid. In those circumstances, it is no longer necessary, as it has been in the past, to make application to this court at the end of the year to renew the committal order. For those reasons I hold that Mr. Campbell's application was unnecessary.

Sale of Goods—Warranty—Collateral warranty—Sale of second-hand motor-bicycle — False statement in registration book as to year bicycle put on market—String contracts—No fraudulent misrepresentation by seller in question—Whether any warranty given.
Revenue—Stamp duty—Unstamped document admitted in evidence in court below—Duty of Court of Appeal—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 14. Court of Appeal.
Fraud—Who may sue—Sale of goods—Motor-vehicle—False statement in registration book—String contracts.

The owner of a 1930 Douglas motor-bicycle reconditioned it and thereafter it was sold with a registration book showing that the motor-bicycle was a late 1941 or 1942 model. The motor-bicycle was sold to the fifth party who sold it to the fourth party. On this sale the terms of the agreement for sale were set out in a memorandum in writing. The memorandum contained no mention of the date of manufacture of the motor-bicycle. It was subsequently sold by the fourth party to the third party who sold it to the defendant, who sold it to the plaintiff. The plaintiff having found out that the motor-bicycle was not a 1941 model, but a 1930 model, sued the defendant who brought in the third party, who brought in the fourth party, who brought in the fifth party. The Statute of Limitations prevented the fifth party from bringing in as sixth party the person who sold the motor-bicycle to him. Fraudulent misrepresentation was not alleged. At the hearing it appeared to have been assumed as between the plaintiff and the defendant, the defendant and the third party and the third party and the fourth party that the express statement as to the age of the motor-bicycle constituted a warranty. The county court judge held that there had been a breach of warranty and gave judgment for the fourth party against the fifth party. The fifth party appealed.

The fifth party had relied on the written memorandum of his agreement with the fourth party. That memorandum, which was admitted in evidence by the county court judge, was not stamped and the question was raised on the appeal whether it was the duty of the Court of Appeal to take notice, in accordance with the requirements of section 14 of the Stamp Act, 1891, of the omission to stamp:—

Held, (1) that the Court of Appeal could not assume merely because an unstamped document had been admitted in evidence below that there had been a decision that it did not require stamping. It was the duty of the Court of Appeal to take notice of the omission to stamp. On the true construction of the document in question, it did not require stamping being exempt under exemption (3) to the heading "agreement" in the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, as an agreement relating to the sale of goods;

(2) that the evidence did not establish the existence of any collateral contract by which a warranty was given by the fifth defendant that the motor-bicycle was a 1941 model and accordingly the appeal would be allowed.

The dictum of Lord Moulton in Heilbut, Symons & Co. v. Buckleton [1913] A.C. 30, 47 considered and applied.

Per Denning L.J. Where a motor-car or motor-bicycle is sold second hand from one person to another in succession, one seller in the chain may tell a purchaser what year's model it is, basing his information on the statement in the registration book. If that statement is false, because some remote seller has falsified the number, the answer to the question whether each seller is responsible to each buyer in damages must depend upon a proper application of the law as to innocent misrepresentation and warranty. The seller, unless he is the first owner, is not the originator of the statement about the year in the registration book. In the ordinary way the statement is only a representation and not a warranty. If the entry in the registration book should turn out to be false, the eventual buyer could sue the original wrongdoer in fraud, but he could not sue innocent people in between who merely passed on a statement which was in the registration book.

Appeal from Judge Fraser Harrison sitting at Liverpool County Court.

The plaintiff, Joseph Routledge, in these proceedings claimed damages from the defendant Charles McKay in respect of the sale of a Douglas motor-bicycle, which the plaintiff had purchased from the defendant believing it to be a 1941 model, when it was in fact a 1930 model. The defendant brought in as third party D. Nugent, from whom he had bought the motor-bicycle. The third party in his turn brought in the fourth party, Philip Ashgrove, who had sold the motor-bicycle to him. The fourth party brought in the fifth party, J. Mawson, who had sold to the fourth party. The fifth party's claim against his vendor was statute barred. No allegations of any fraudulent misrepresentations were made. The claims were based on allegations that in each case the vendor had warranted the age of the motor-bicycle. The sales had been made orally, except that, in the case of the sale by the fifth party to the fourth party, a memorandum of the agreed terms had been drawn up and signed. The facts and the terms of the memorandum are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Evershed M.R.

The county court judge gave judgment for the fourth party against the fifth party for the sum of £80.

The fifth party appealed. In the court below the fifth party relied on the written memorandum of the terms on which he had sold the bicycle to the fourth party. This memorandum was not stamped but it had been admitted in evidence. On the appeal, the court raised the question whether it was bound by section 14 of the Stamp Act, 1891,[1] to take the objection that the memorandum was not stamped.

J. S. Watson for the fifth party.
F. D. Paterson for the fourth party.

The following cases were cited in argument: Warrington v. Furbor[2]; Heilbut, Symons & Co. v. Buckleton[3]; Gilchester Properties Ld. v. Gomm[4]; Bishopsgate Motor Finance Corporation v. Transport Brakes Ld.[5]; Miller v. Cannon Hill Estates Ld.[6]; Walker Property Investments (Brighton) Ld. v. Walker[7]; Webster v. Higgin[8]; Couchman v. Hill[9]; Henderson v. Arthur.[10]

EVERSHED M.R. I think it desirable that I should say that in my judgment it is the duty of the Court of Appeal to pay regard to what Parliament provides in section 14 of the Stamp Act, 1891. The court cannot assume that there has been some decision by the court below merely because in the court below the document has been admitted in evidence. On the other hand, on the facts of this case, I think that the exemption—exemption (3), which on the authorities should be, as I understand it, liberally interpreted—does cover this case, and therefore I think that there has been no infringement of section 14 of the Act; and we need say nothing more about it.

DENNING L.J. I agree.

ROMER L.J. I agree.

The court then heard argument on the question raised by the appeal.

McKay.

Evershed M.R. This appeal involves a question which has found many illustrations in the books, namely, whether upon a sale—in this case a sale or exchange of a motor-bicycle with a sidecar combination—there was a warranty as regards the date when the motor-cycle was originally put upon the market. The classic exposition of the law in regard to warranties is to be found in the speech of Lord Moulton in Heilbut, Symons & Co. v. Buckleton.[1] Although it has been many times cited I may perhaps be forgiven for citing once again some of the language which the noble Lord used. "It is evident," he said,[2] "both on "principle and on authority, that there may be a contract the "consideration for which is the making of some other contract. "'If you will make such and such a contract I will give you "'one hundred pounds,' is in every sense of the word a complete "legal contract. It is collateral to the main contract, but each "has an independent existence, and they do not differ in respect "of their possessing to the full the character and status of a "contract. But such collateral contracts must from their very "nature be rare. . . . Such collateral contracts . . . must be "proved strictly. Not only the terms of such contracts but "the existence of an animus contrahendi on the part of all the "parties to them must be clearly shown. Any laxity on these "points would enable parties to escape from the full performance "of the obligations of contracts unquestionably entered into by "them and more especially would have the effect of lessening "the authority of written contracts by making it possible to vary "them by suggesting the existence of verbal collateral agree-"ments relating to the same subject-matter."

Then, after dealing with the particular facts in the Heilbut, Symons case and after referring to certain cases on the Chancery side, Lord Moulton said[3]: "On the common law side of the "court the attempts to make a person liable for an innocent "misrepresentation have usually taken the form of attempts to "extend the doctrine of warranty beyond its just limits and to "find that a warranty existed in cases where there was nothing "more than an innocent misrepresentation. . . . But in respect "of the question of the existence of a warranty the courts have "had the advantage of an admirable enunciation of the true "principle of law which was made in very early days by Holt "C.J. with respect to the contract of sale. He says: 'An "'affirmation at the time of the sale is a warranty, provided it "'appear on evidence to be so intended.'" Then he says, a little later, "One often sees quoted the dictum of Bayley J. in "Cave v. Coleman[4] where, in respect of a representation made "verbally during the sale of a horse, he says that 'being made "'in the course of dealing, and before the bargain was complete,

[1] [1913] A.C. 30.
[2] Ibid. 47.
[3] Ibid. 49.
[4] (1828) 3 Man. & Ry. 2.

"'it amounted to a warranty'—a proposition that is far too "sweeping and cannot be supported."

Finally, after reference to and disapproval of the language of this court in De Lassalle v. Guildford,[5] Lord Moulton says[6]: "It is, my Lords, of the greatest importance, in my opinion, "that this House should maintain in its full integrity the "principle that a person is not liable in damages for an innocent "misrepresentation, no matter in what way or under what form "the attack is made."

The subject-matter of the sale, with which we are concerned, was a motor-bicycle of somewhat ancient vintage. The appellant here is the fifth party in proceedings which were begun in the form of an action by the plaintiff who had bought this motor-bicycle from the defendant. The defendant himself introduced a third party; the third party introduced a fourth party; and the fourth a fifth. The matter stopped there, not because there had not been other previous sales, but, as I understand it, because, upon the footing that a warranty was the question, and the only question, involved, the Statute of Limitations would have stood in the way of the fifth party bringing in a sixth and so on.

For reasons which will later appear, I confess that the result leaves an uneasy feeling in my mind that in the end some injustice may be done. Apparently by the display of a certain amount of mechanical ingenuity an earlier possessor of this machine (which first left the works of the makers in the month of October, 1930) proceeded to recondition it and (in a measure) remake it so that, although substantially it remained the old 1930 model, it had acquired certain characteristics which this ingenious mechanic thought justified him in attributing to it a somewhat later origin.

The registration books or log books (which were renewed from time to time) eventually showed on their face that this Douglas motor-cycle combination was what is called "a late "1941 or 1942 model." In the one before us, and against the item "Date of original registration under the Roads Act, 1920" it has "9.9.1941," and then the words "forty-one" written afterwards. In the court below it seems reasonably clear that, in the case of the final sale and in those which immediately preceded it, the alleged warranty amounted to a statement to the effect found in the log book. I assume that in each case there was an express affirmation of what there appeared; but it does not seem that there was anything more; yet (again so far as I can judge from the material before us) the parties or their representatives seem to have been content to let the matter proceed on the footing that such an express statement, without more, did amount to a warranty.

When, following the chain down, the matter came to be determined finally between the fourth and fifth parties, counsel for the latter for the first time raised the question in clear terms whether, as between him and the fourth party, there ever was a warranty at all; and he particularly relied upon the circumstance that in the sale (or exchange; for it was substantially an exchange) which took place between the fourth and fifth parties a written memorandum of agreement was entered into at the time when the transaction took effect.

I shall have to refer presently in a little more detail to the evidence and to that agreement; but, bearing in mind the passages which I have read from Lord Moulton's speech, in approaching this matter it is important to observe that, if there was a warranty, then there was a contract between the two parties to the effect that the seller, for good consideration, undertook to indemnify the buyer against any loss the buyer might suffer, if, in truth, the origin of this motor-cycle was not 1941 or 1942 but some much earlier date. Such a contractual obligation could be part of the contract of sale itself or it might be collateral to it. In the present case, if there was a warranty, it must have been collateral to the actual contract of sale or exchange, though I do not think that that matter is necessarily conclusive of the question before us.

I have mentioned these anterior questions partly because of the feeling of regret which I have about this case and which I have already mentioned, but also because (in fairness to the judge) it seems clear to me that his attention was not directed, at any rate during the earlier stages, to the essential requirements of a warranty; and particularly he did not have the advantage of refreshing his memory by looking again at Lord Moulton's speech: so that when the matter came to be determined as between the fourth and fifth parties the reference to what was stated in the log book had come to be treated (as far as I can see) as prima facie constituting a warranty; with the result that the judge's judgment was confined, in effect, to this: was that prima facie effect of the reference displaced by the written contract? I found that conclusion on this passage from the notes of the judgment: "I then dealt in some detail with "the transaction between the fourth party and the fifth party. "I accepted the evidence of Mr. Philip Ashgrove, the fourth "party, and I rejected any evidence given by Mr. John Mawson, "the fifth party, which conflicted with that given by Mr. Ash-"grove. I found as a fact that before the purchase in question "in October, 1949, the fifth party gave a warranty to the fourth "party that the Douglas motor-cycle combination was a 1942 "model. There was no dispute that this"—videlicet, that it was a 1942 model—"was incorrect. That, in so far as it is a "question of fact, I found and in so far as it is a question of "construction I held, that the written agreement signed on "October 30, 1949, by the fourth party and the fifth party and "having therein the words 'That when the £30 is paid over "'that this transaction is closed' was not intended to exclude "any warranty."

Now Mr. Paterson has very properly pressed upon us that, in so far as that is a matter of fact, then a finding by the county court judge, who heard the witnesses, would be conclusive in this court; provided that there was some evidence upon which it could be founded. But I think (and I must state this at the beginning of my observations) that the judge did not really direct his mind to the question whether there was, in the reference to the date of origin as it emerged from the evidence, a real intention to contract, in the sense I have already described and in the sense which must be found to be present if what otherwise would be a misrepresentation is to be translated into a warranty. I think that he did not apply his mind to that, because the parties had not really during the earlier stages of the battle raised the matter and were content to assume that such a statement did constitute a warranty. I therefore do not feel that Mr. Paterson's submission can be (in this case) an answer to the fifth party's appeal.

[His Lordship considered the evidence and continued:] On the oral evidence, all there is and all the judge found, or I think intended to find, was that on the first meeting of the fourth and fifth parties (and before, be it noted, the bargain was eventually made), and in answer to a question, the fifth party specifically stated that it was a 1942 model, and pointed to the corroboration of that statement found in the book.

I now turn to the written memorandum or contract which the fourth party had caused to be prepared and which was signed by the two contracting parties on the second or later occasion. "It is agreed between the parties Mr. Ashgrove . . . and Mr. "Mawson . . . that a 250 c.c. B.S.A. solo motor-cycle No." so and so "now by"—"owned by," I suppose that means—"Mr. Ashgrove to be exchanged for a Douglas flat twin 600 c.c. "combination . . . owned by Mr. Mawson and further Mr. Ash-"grove will pay the sum of £30 to complete the transaction. It "is understood that when the £30 is paid over that this "transaction is closed."

Now the point is made (and it is a significant one) that the Douglas motor-cycle is expressly referred to as being of the capacity of 600 cubic centimetres, when on this registration book it is stated as having only 500 cubic centimetres capacity. The true cubic capacity according to the fifth party was 600; that fact was deliberately and carefully pointed out by the fifth party, who showed the discrepancy in that respect in the registration book, and the agreement (and this is significant) expressly refers to that matter.

This document represents prima facie the record of what the parties intended to agree when the actual transaction took place. Mr. Watson has contended that the terms of it necessarily exclude any warranty—that is to say, any collateral bargain, either contemporary or earlier in date. I am not sure that I would go as far with Mr. Watson in that respect. But I think that, as a matter of construction, it would be extremely difficult to say that such an agreement was consistent with a warranty being given at the same time and so as to be intended to form a part of the bargain then made. I think, with Mr. Watson, that the last words "It is understood that when the £30 is paid "... this transaction is closed" would make such a contention exceedingly difficult. But I will assume that the warranty here was not a warranty given when this bargain was struck, but was a warranty which had been given on the earlier date, on which date alone, according to the evidence, any representation about the date of the Douglas was made at all.

C. A.

Evershed M.R.

Now if the earlier representation is to be a warranty, then it has got to be contractual in form. In other words, so far as I can see, once the existence of a warranty as part of the actual bargain is excluded, it must be a separate contract; and the difficulty, and I think the overwhelming difficulty, which faces the fourth party here is that when the representation was made there was then no bargain, and it is therefore, in my view, impossible to say that it could have been collateral to some other contract. But even apart from that, it seems to me that, on the evidence, there is nothing to support the conclusion, as a matter of law and bearing in mind Lord Moulton's observations, that in answering the question posed about the date of this Douglas there was anything more intended than a mere representation.

If that is the right analysis, then the problem which the judge below felt he had to consider really never arose, because it was not a question whether on its construction this agreement negatived or excluded the possibility of an earlier warranty. On the view I take there really was no evidence before the judge capable of supporting the existence of any earlier warranty at all, and I prefer to base my conclusion on that ground than upon the view that the agreement, according to its language, necessarily excluded a warranty. I have felt compelled to the conclusion that the judge here had not before him any evidence which entitled him to conclude that there was given, and intended to be given, a warranty (in the proper sense of that word) when the reference to the date of origin of the motor-cycle was made by Mr. Mawson; and I only add that the written agreement tends to support that view rather than to controvert it.

I conclude (as I began) by a reference to my anxiety in the case, because I am bound to say that I feel grave doubt whether on this evidence there ever was a warranty given by anybody to anybody else among those who were parties to these proceedings. Whether any earlier owner or fifth party or anyone else might have been held liable upon a fraudulent misrepresentation does not now arise; but my sympathies certainly are with all these parties who were all undoubtedly misled by the circumstances that there appeared in a registration book a false date as a result of what I have called (and I am using the phrase so as to avoid any opprobrious significance) the mechanical ingenuity of an earlier proprietor.

In my judgment, this appeal must be allowed and, taking that view, I do not say anything more upon Mr. Watson's second point, that in any case the sum of damages awarded, £80, ought not to stand. Upon that matter it is sufficient to say that, if that question had to be determined, as at present advised I am not satisfied that there is any ground upon which this court could interfere with the award; but I need not express any concluded view upon it.

DENNING L.J. When a motor-car or a motor-cycle is sold second hand from one person to another in succession down a line of persons, it often happens that each seller in the chain tells each buyer what year it is, basing his information on the statement in the registration book. Suppose that, unknown to either party, the statement in the registration book is false, because some remote seller falsified either the number plate or the book; what is the legal position? Has each seller in the chain warranted the correctness of the entry in the registration book so that each seller is responsible to his buyer in damages; or has he merely made an innocent representation for which he is not liable in damages at all?

The answer must depend, of course, upon a proper application of the law about innocent misrepresentation and warranty as laid down by the House of Lords in Heilbut, Symons & Co. v. Buckleton.[7] But in considering this question it is important to remember that the seller, unless he is the first owner, is not the originator of the statement about the year. He does not know for himself, of his own knowledge, what year the car or cycle is. He has to accept it from the book, and he cannot be expected to warrant its accuracy, unless he in express terms makes himself responsible for it. In the ordinary way, therefore, the statement is only a representation and not a warranty. If the entry in the registration book should turn out to be false, the eventual buyer can sue the original wrongdoer in fraud without any trouble incidentally about the Statute of Limitations; but he cannot sue the innocent people in between who merely passed on a statement which was in the registration book.

Then I ask myself: is there anything to take this case out of the ordinary? It seems to me that as between the fourth and fifth parties, for the reasons which my Lord has given, this was only a representation and not a collateral contract at all. Mr. Paterson relied on the fact that the seller did correct one statement in the registration book in that he corrected 500 c.c. to 600 c.c. No doubt any seller ought to correct any statement in the book which he knows or has reason to suppose is inaccurate; but that does not turn the representation about the year into a warranty. I cannot see that there was any evidence in this case (any more than in Heilbut, Symons & Co. v. Buckleton[7]) on which a warranty could be found. It is unfortunate that none of the counsel in the case (and there were five of them) referred the judge to Heilbut, Symons & Co. v. Buckleton[7]; because it means that Mr. Ashgrove, an entirely innocent party, is left to bear the whole burden when he ought not to have been.

I agree with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed.

Romer L.J. I also agree. Having regard to the law as laid down in Heilbut, Symons & Co. v. Buckleton,[7] and especially in the speech of Lord Moulton, it seems to me impossible to arrive at the view that the statement which the fifth party made to the fourth party amounted to a warranty. I confess that I have come to this conclusion with some reluctance, because not only did the fifth party think proper to give evidence before the judge that was untrue, but it is plain that he knew perfectly well himself that when he told the fourth party (as he did tell him) that this motor-cycle was a 1941 model, he had already been informed by the makers that it was earlier than that by some years. Indeed, apparently as a result of what he was told by the manufacturers, he seems to have pondered for a time as to whether he would not sue the man who had sold it to him, but eventually he decided not to do so. Therefore, as I say, it is with some regret that I have come to the conclusion that the fourth party (who was perfectly innocent in the matter) should lose this appeal; but, having regard to the law, that is the result at which one must arrive, for no charge of fraudulent misrepresentation was made against the fifth party.

Husband and Wife — Property — Matrimonial home — Desertion by husband—Right of wife to remain enforceable against husband's successor in title with notice—Right not lost by incomplete agreement to accept alternative accommodation—Right not superseded by express licence.

A deserted wife has an irrevocable licence to remain in occupation of the matrimonial home, which is enforceable not only against her husband, but also against his successor in title with notice, even against a purchaser for value if he buys with knowledge of the facts. While this right may be lost by the wife entering into a concluded agreement to accept specific alternative accommodation, an agreement which does not deal with the question of the beneficial ownership of the proposed alternative accommodation is not sufficient. Moreover, the husband cannot, by expressly allowing his deserted wife to remain in the matrimonial home upon terms, cut down the irrevocable quality of the licence which the law allows her, for there is no consideration to support the terms.

ACTION.

The plaintiff claimed possession of premises at 58, St. Michael's Grove, Fareham, of which she claimed to be the owner by virtue of a conveyance to her by the defendant's husband in 1952. In 1937 the premises were conveyed to the husband, a deposit of £25 being paid and the balance of the purchase being raised by a building society mortgage, executed by the husband. The defendant alleged that she had provided the whole of the deposit, but it was found to have been contributed, as to £20, by the husband's grandmother and, as to the remainder, by the husband himself. The defendant, the husband, their two children and the grandmother all lived in the premises until December, 1942, when the husband deserted the defendant and went to live with the plaintiff, with whom he had lived ever since.

In 1943 the defendant obtained a house in Portsmouth and was about to move into it with the children and the grandmother when the husband, fearing for their safety owing to air-raids, told the defendant that she could continue to live at St. Michael's Grove until she found somewhere safe to go and so long as she had the children and the grandmother with her.

By May, 1949, both children had left the premises and only the defendant and the grandmother remained. The following month the husband's solicitors wrote to the defendant asking her to vacate the premises, but nothing further happened until in September, 1950, the husband took the defendant to see a house in Henrietta Street, Portsmouth, with a view to her moving there from St. Michael's Grove. The defendant expressed her willingness to do this on condition that certain alterations and improvements were effected. These were carried out and arrangements made for her to move in, but at the last moment she decided, on the advice of her solicitors, to hold back until the question of the beneficial ownership of the new house should be decided. Negotiations followed but these proved abortive and the defendant remained at St. Michael's Grove, but no longer with the grandmother, whom she now refused to have with her. Meanwhile the husband and the plaintiff resided at Henrietta Street.

Street
Denham.

Throughout the whole of this time the defendant had kept up the payments on the mortgage and had discharged the rates and the insurance premiums out of moneys which she alleged were her own but which were found to have been supplied by the husband. On December 20, 1950, the husband himself paid off the remaining money due under the mortgage, and on January 14, 1952, he conveyed 58, St. Michael's Grove to the plaintiff for the sum of £1,500.

The plaintiff now sued for possession, contending that the defendant was in possession by permission of the husband, which permission had been withdrawn prior to the conveyance to the plaintiff. The defendant denied the plaintiff's right to possession and alleged that, the purchase-money having been found in whole or in part by the defendant, the premises belonged in equity to her or to her and the husband jointly. In the alternative the defendant claimed that the premises were the matrimonial home of herself and the husband, that the husband had deserted her, and that she had an irrevocable licence to remain in the premises, valid not only against the husband, but also against the plaintiff who had acquired the premises with full knowledge of the facts. The plaintiff, in reply, denied the defendant's allegations, and alleged in the alternative that, if the defendant had any licence from the husband to remain in the premises, it was a contractual licence the terms of which the defendant had broken, or that the licence had been rescinded by an agreement by the defendant to accept alternative accommodation.

December 21. building society contributions. On the facts as I have found them, I am satisfied that although the moneys paid to the building society, apart from the final payment, were made by the defendant, such payments were made out of moneys provided by the husband, and the defendant's claim that the husband and, therefore, the plaintiff was a trustee for her fails.

The next question is whether as a deserted wife, living in a matrimonial home, the defendant has an irrevocable claim to remain in those premises not only as against the husband but also as against the plaintiff. If I were not bound by authorities I should have taken the same view as Roxburgh J. expressed in Thompson v. Earthy,[1] that the deserted wife's right is a personal right against her husband and does not give her any legal or equitable or other interest in the premises so as to bind them in the hands of the purchaser. Since that decision there have been the cases of Errington v. Errington,[2] Bendall v. McWhirter[3] and Ferris v. Weaven.[4] As a result of these cases it seems to me to be now established that where a wife has been deserted by her husband and left by him in the matrimonial home, she must be held to be not a tenant of the husband-owner nor a bare licensee, but to be in the special position of a licensee with a right under which the husband cannot turn her out except by order of the court.

This is the view of Romer L.J. in Bendall v. McWhirter,[5] adopting an earlier judgment of Denning L.J. in Errington v. Errington.[6] In Bendall v. McWhirter Denning L.J. said[7]: "I "must say, however, that even if a successor cannot compel the "husband to apply under section 17 [of the Married Women's "Property Act, 1882], but has himself to bring an action at "law, nevertheless I should have thought the court would have "a discretion whether to order possession or not, for that "is the only way in which effect can be given to the wife's right "as now established. Any other view would lead to great injus-"tice. It would mean that a guilty husband could transfer the "house into the name of his new mistress and then get her to "evict his innocent lawful wife from the matrimonial home. No "civilized community could tolerate such a cynical disregard of "the married state. Equity demands that the successor in title "should be in no better position than the husband." In that statement Denning L.J. has visualized the facts of the present case. In the later case of Ferris v. Weaven[8] Jones J. held that a purchaser with the notice of the wife's right and position could not recover possession of the house against her. In the present case the husband in evidence admitted that the plaintiff had full knowledge of all the facts and every step taken by the husband in relation to the defendant had been discussed by him with the plaintiff. In these circumstances I feel bound to hold that the defendant's irrevocable right is enforceable against the plaintiff, subject of course, to the remaining questions which I have to decide.

The next question is whether the defendant's irrevocable right is lost on account of her actions in September and October, 1950, when she was offered alternative accommodation. The case for the plaintiff is that there was a concluded agreement by the defendant to leave St. Michael's Grove and remove to Henrietta Street. I am satisfied that she expressed her willingness so to do and that, in reliance on that, the husband entered into a contract to purchase the premises and expended moneys in decorations and alterations. The defendant, however, changed her mind at the last moment. The question I have to ask myself is whether or not there was a concluded legal agreement, or did the husband act prematurely. In my view, until the terms on which the defendant was to occupy the new house had been agreed, an essential element in the concluded contract was missing. It seems clear from the correspondence that the Henrietta Street premises were being purchased in the name of the husband. According to the husband's solicitors' letter of October 25, 1950, the question of the beneficial ownership of the new house had not then been finally decided. In view of this statement, I am not surprised that the solicitors for the defendant advised her to remain at St. Michael's Grove for the time being. When the offer to give her the freehold was made later, she did not accept it. The result is, in my view, that the plaintiff has failed to establish any concluded agreement between the defendant and the husband for her to give up her right to remain in possession of the house in St. Michael's Grove.

The other point I shall have to consider is whether the defendant was there under a contractual licence made when the husband said she could remain there until she found somewhere safe to go, and so long as the two children and the grandmother resided with her. It is clear that by December 7, 1950, the defendant was saying that she would no longer have the grandmother residing with her, and if this was a contractual licence this would have been a breach of its terms. The difficulty, I feel, following Denning L.J., is that the defendant, although she may not have known it, had a right to remain in these premises as the deserted wife in the matrimonial home, and the fact that the husband said she could remain on certain other terms does not give any further right to her. There was no consideration for her agreeing to allow the children and the grandmother to remain in the house. So the plaintiff cannot take advantage of the breach of what is alleged to be a contractual licence, which was an attempt to limit the existing right of the wife to remain in the matrimonial home. In the result, the plaintiff's claim fails.

1954 Mar. 10, 11.

Evershed M.R., Denning and Romer L.JJ.

[Plaint No. J. 532.]

Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction—Sublease—Subtenancy with right of sharing living accommodation granted by statutory tenant—Statutory tenant's surrender of possession—Rights of subtenant determined—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 17), s. 15.

Landlord and Tenant—Sublease—Surrender of head tenancy—Effect on sublease. Rent Restriction—Statutory tenant—Nature of rights.

A statutory tenant sublet three rooms in a dwelling-house together with a right to share the use of the kitchen with the statutory tenant. In 1952 the statutory tenant gave up possession of the part of the premises she occupied to the landlord, who in these proceedings sought to recover possession of the remainder of the premises from the subtenant:—

Held, that when a statutory tenant sublets part of a dwelling-house, he does not confer any estate or interest in the premises on the subtenant. The subtenant, like the statutory tenant, has only a personal right or privilege, and when the statutory tenancy comes to an end, the subtenancy automatically comes to an end also, unless there is some statutory protection afforded to the subtenant. A subtenant who has been sharing with the statutory tenant is not protected by section 15 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. Accordingly, the statutory tenancy having come to an end, the sharing subtenancy also came to an end and the landlord was entitled to possession.

APPEAL from Judge Granville Smith sitting at Barnet County Court.

The whole of No. 51 Jackson Road, East Barnet, premises within the protection of the Rent Acts, had originally been let by the plaintiff, Miss Ada Mary Solomon, to a Mrs. Houghton. That contractual tenancy having determined, the tenant continued in occupation as a statutory tenant at a rent which, with permitted increases, amounted to 15s. 3d. a week. During the subsistence of her statutory tenancy the tenant sublet three rooms with a right to share the kitchen and scullery to the defendant Mrs. Nellie Orwell at a rent of 18s. a week which included certain services. In September, 1952, the tenant gave up her statutory right of occupation to the landlord. In these proceedings the landlord claimed possession from the subtenant. The landlord had not given the subtenant any notice to quit.

The county court judge made an order for possession and an order for payment of mesne profits at the rate of 15s. per week.

The subtenant appealed.

J. Lloyd Eley for the subtenant.
John Gower for the landlord.

The following cases were cited in argument: Shackleton v. Greenhalgh[1]; Doe d. Beadon v. Pyke[2]; Mellor v. Watkins[3]; Parker v. Jones[4]; Cow v. Casey[5]; Moyes v. Caldwell[6]; Lockwood v. Lowe[7]; Stanley v. Compton[8]; Brock v. Wollams[9]; Lowe v. Russell[10]; Pike v. Eyre.[11]

Evershed M.R. This appeal has raised a point of interest, and I do not say that it is free from difficulty. We have had great assistance from the clear arguments which Mr. Eley on the one side and Mr. Gower on the other have put before us; but for my part I think that the answer to the appeal rests upon one relatively short conclusion of fact. The subtenant was granted some few years ago a so-called subtenancy of three rooms on the first floor of premises known as 51 Jackson Street in East Barnet, together with a right to share with the tenant (that is to say, the subtenant's landlord) a further room which was essential to the accommodation as a dwelling-house—namely, the kitchen or scullery.

The effect of a contract of that nature, before the passing of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, was not to give to the so-called subtenant any right to the protection of the Rent Restrictions legislation. In the Act of 1949 a distinction was drawn between cases in which the so-called "sharing" was a sharing by the tenant with the landlord, on the one hand, and cases where the "sharing" was a sharing with other tenants, on the other. In the latter case it was provided by the Act of 1949 that the tenant who was given this sharing right with other tenants had a "dwelling-house" let to him (or her) so as to invoke the protection of the Acts; but where the grant of the right of sharing was by a landlord, so that the right was shared with the landlord, then the Act of 1949 did not say that a "dwelling-house" had been let: in other words, in such a case the tenant did not get the protection of the Rent Acts but he did get the considerably more limited right to invoke certain of the provisions of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946.

I have made that preliminary statement because, so far as I can see, this much is clear: the rights which the subtenant acquired as a result of her contract with the tenant were rights which would not give to the subtenant the statutory protection of section 15 (3) of the Rent (Restrictions) Act of 1920.. If (in other words) the subtenant can now resist the landlord's claim for possession she must do so, not in reliance upon anything in the special rent restrictions legislation, but by virtue of some common law right; and that is the basis of her appeal in this court. She says that, by the general law of the land, she has a right to persist in occupation at least of the three rooms on the first floor until, by an appropriate notice to quit, that common law right is terminated; and I add that there is this lying behind that argument that, if she is right, since no notice to quit has been given, it will at least give her time to invoke such remedies as the Act of 1946 may give her, and she will therefore be able to gain some advantage as against the landlord, though not, of course, anything like the full advantage to which she would be entitled, if she could claim to be a protected or statutory tenant.

It is, I think, abundantly clear that in order that there should be some common law right in the subtenant there must have been a corresponding common law right in the tenant when the contract of subtenancy was made. The facts appearing from the pleadings indicate that many years ago the whole dwelling-house was let to the tenant by the landlord; and it is alleged in paragraph 2 of the particulars of claim that that tenancy—that is, the original contractual tenancy—was terminated by the service on the tenant of a statutory notice of increase of rent, with the result that the tenant became a statutory tenant and remained in occupation as such until a date in September, 1952, when she gave up her rights of occupation to the landlord.

If those allegations are correct it follows that, at any rate when she gave up her right of occupation (and I think also, if I understand the pleading aright, when she granted the so-called subtenancy to the subtenant) she was a statutory tenant, a person of whom it has been said time and time again that she had no estate or interest in the land of the kind understood by the common law. Her right was one which was exclusively derived from the statute and was one to remain (subject to conditions) in occupation.

Mr. Eley in opening this case observed that if a tenant has his interest determined as upon forfeiture, then it follows that (subject to any special statutory rights there may be under the Law of Property Act, 1925, or otherwise) an interest derived out of the tenant's estate will fall with the tenancy. But there is (Mr. Eley says) a well-established exception to that principle, namely, the case of voluntary surrender. The matter is stated in Foa on Landlord and Tenant, 7th ed., p. 627, quite plainly, and (as far as I can see from looking at the cases) perfectly accurately, as follows: "Hence, where the lessee underlets a "portion of the demised premises, and afterwards surrenders his "lease to the lessor, the latter cannot dispossess the underlessee "without determining his interest in a regular manner, notwith-"standing that the underlessee has notice of the surrender, or "that the lease itself was at the time of surrender liable to "forfeiture." Mr. Eley's first argument was that that passage applies even though the transaction was not a surrender of an estate by a lessee but was a surrender (so called) by a statutory tenant of his statutory right—that is to say, a giving up voluntarily of the statutory right of occupation. I am unable to accept that argument. A reference to the cases seems to me to indicate quite plainly that the proposition which I have cited from Foa rests upon the existence of an estate and upon a surrender in the true sense of the term—that is, a voluntary giving up of an estate so as to permit it to merge in the superior estate—and further upon the proposition that, for the protection of a subtenant who has himself been granted a subsidiary interest, the estate which otherwise would be surrendered and disappear persists so as to permit the continued existence, until proper determination, of the subsidiary interest.

The matter is stated quite clearly by Lord Coke in Co.Litt. 338b in a passage cited by Lord Ellenborough C.J. in Doe d. Beadon v. Pyke.[1] Lord Coke's observation is quoted as follows: "Lord Coke, after noticing, that as between the parties to a "surrender the estate is absolutely drowned, says 'But having "'regard to strangers who were not parties or privies there-"'unto'"—that is, to the surrender—"'(lest by a voluntary "'surrender they may receive prejudice touching any right or "'interest they had before the surrender), the estate surrendered "'hath, in consideration of law, a continuance'."

Unless it can be said that, notwithstanding the allegation that I have read from the particulars of claim, the tenant had (either at the time of the grant of the said tenancy or of the surrender, or both), some interest capable of existing in law as an estate out of which interest was carved or created the subtenant's interest, then the proposition which I have cited from Foa and on which the appeal really rests falls altogether to the ground.

The answer to this appeal seems to me to be that the essential premise in fact does not exist; for I am satisfied not only that Mr. Eley cannot now claim in this court that the tenant had anything other than a statutory tenancy at any relevant date, but also, I think, it is reasonably clear that she had not as a fact.

It is to be noted that the defence does not put in issue the allegations in paragraph 2 of the particulars of claim; the defendant merely says that she has no knowledge of those facts save as to the original letting (which inferentially she concedes); and

[1] (1816) 5 M. & S. 146, 154.

I think it is quite clear that in the county court the matter proceeded without there being any attention directed to what, in the end of all, was an essential matter of fact. I have no doubt at all that the county court judge proceeded on the view that the tenant was at all relevant dates a statutory tenant; and I think that that is clearly the right inference, even apart from what I think was in effect conceded on the pleadings. The tenant eventually retired from the premises at the age of 80, having been there a very long time. The amount of the rent seems to have been altered—for example, in paragraph 2 of the particulars of claim it is stated as 14s. 9d.; Mr. Gower says that in his recollection that figure was altered at the hearing to 15s. 2d.; and I see that the notice of appeal puts it at 15s. 3d.

On general principles, and paying due regard to common sense (as my brother Denning has pointed out in Brock v. Wollams [2] in this court), the inevitable inference is that the tenant at all material dates was a statutory tenant. That being so, I think that the basis for Mr. Eley's very attractive and forceful argument is removed, for it is significant at once that, although you may talk of a surrender, what happened was not a surrender as properly understood by the law; it was not an attempt to drown an estate; it was a mere voluntary giving up of a statutory right of occupation; and, therefore, the premise upon which the proposition in Foa is rested is found in this case to be absent.

I add this only. Mr. Eley did intimate a second point, that, assuming he was wrong (as I think he is) upon his first point, the court ought to interfere with the award as to damages (that is, mesne profits) which the judge fixed at 15s. per week. I follow that, in all the circumstances of the case, a less figure might well have been adopted. It was a figure which was less than the rent the subtenant had been paying, although it was substantially the same, apparently, as the rent for the whole house. Still, mesne profits are damages; and, as Denning L.J. has observed, there are other considerations which may fairly be taken into account when you are considering damages than the relation of the number of rooms sublet to the total number of rooms in the house. In short, I am not satisfied (within the scope of the well-known principles applicable to awards of damages) that the Court of Appeal can properly interfere in this case with the award made, namely, the figure fixed by the judge, 15s. a week.

I therefore think that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

DENNING L.J. When a statutory tenant sublets a part of the premises, he does not thereby confer any estate or interest on the subtenant. A statutory tenant has no estate or interest himself, and he cannot carve something out of nothing. The subtenant, like the statutory tenant, has only a personal right or privilege. The question in this case is, What is the position of the subtenant when the statutory tenancy comes to an end? A statutory tenancy may, of course, come to an end without a notice to quit. It may come to an end, for instance, by death (if there are no entitled relatives) or by the delivery up of the premises to the landlord. When the statutory tenancy comes to an end, the subtenant's right automatically comes to an end, unless there is some statutory protection afforded to him. In the case of an ordinary subtenant he is protected under section 15 (3) of the Act of 1920. He becomes the direct tenant of the head landlord, on the same terms as those on which he would have held from the previous tenant. But a subtenant who has been sharing with the tenant is not protected. That is shown by Shackleton v. Greenhalgh[3] and Stanley v. Compton.[4] In this case the subtenant was a sharing subtenant and her right came to an end as soon as the statutory tenant surrendered the premises to the landlord.

v.

I would only add this: It was suggested that the sharing subtenancy might have been created during the contractual tenancy. But even so, when the contractual tenancy came to an end by notice of increase or notice to quit, the contractual subtenancy also came to an end. Thereafter the position was the same as if the subtenancy had been created during the statutory tenancy. On the statutory tenancy coming to an end, the sharing subtenancy also came to an end. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Romer L.J. I also agree. Mr. Eley's very attractive and (if I may say so) able argument was founded upon the conception that the tenant was a contractual tenant at all material times, and he relied, therefore, on the principle that a subtenancy, which is created out of a contractual tenancy, survives the destruction of the tenancy if the tenancy comes to an end by surrender. But once he found himself (as he did find himself) driven from the basis that the tenancy was a contractual tenancy, he was, as I venture to think, in an impossible position, because it is quite plain that a statutory tenant has no legal or equitable estate whatever which can be the subject of a surrender to the reversioner or out of which a subsidiary estate may be taken by a subtenant. All he has is a personal right of occupation which he can bring to an end by relinquishing possession. But that is a very different thing from surrendering an estate which will merge in the superior estate of the reversioner, because, as I say, there is no interest or estate vested in the statutory tenant which can be the subject of such a merger.

I accordingly agree that the appeal fails.

Solicitor—Authority. Mortgage.

Property subject to a mortgage dated November 10, 1928, was destroyed by enemy action in September, 1940. The principal sum and interest under the mortgage having remained unpaid for over 12 years, the mortgagees took out a summons asking for an order for possession.

The mortgagor by her defence claimed that as there had been no payment of interest or acknowledgment of the mortgage for over 12 years, time under the Limitation Act, 1939, had now run, and the mortgagees' claim was statute-barred. The mortgagees contended that the existence of the mortgage had been acknowledged in letters from the mortgagor's solicitor to the mortgagees' solicitors. The mortgagor denied that the letters constituted an acknowledgment, but contended that if they did constitute an acknowledgment, the solicitor had no authority to make them.

The letters chiefly relied on by the mortgagees were letters from their solicitors, respectively dated October 19, 1949, stating: "as "mortgagees' solicitors, we shall be glad if you will advise us fully "on the present position of the matter. . . ," and February 2, 1950: "From our clients' point of view as mortgagees, they would "wish to have their mortgage paid off, . . . " and a letter in reply of August 4, 1950, from the mortgagor's solicitor to the mortgagees' solicitors (which was said to constitute an acknowledgment of the mortgage debt), stating: " . . . I understand that Mrs. P. [the "mortgagor] will shortly be making an appointment to see you "with regard to her accounts with you for some time past. She "has several questions which she wishes to raise. Steps are being "taken to rebuild 101 Mountview Road [the mortgaged property]. "Plans have been prepared and submitted to the local authority, "and as soon as the work is in hand I will let you know, when "Mrs. P.'s position can again be reviewed":—

Held, (1) that an acknowledgment of the existence of a debt was sufficient to take the case out of the statute, and that the letter of August 4, 1950, in the light of the claims made by the mortgagees constituted such an acknowledgment.

By a mortgage dated November 10, 1928, the defendant, Mrs. Gertrude Minna Pepin, mortgaged a property known as 101, Mountview Road, Hornsey, comprised in a lease for a term of 99 years from June 24, 1879, to one Frederick Adlard Wright, to secure £600 with interest to be payable on the first day respectively of August, November, February and May. The mortgage, which contained an attornment clause, was in the common form.

The mortgagee died on September 5, 1933; by a transfer dated January 17, 1935, his executors transferred the benefit of the mortgage to Mrs. Alice Pilley. A firm of solicitors called Pilley & Mitchell acted for both the mortgagee and the mortgagor, and they also acted as solicitors for the transferee of the mortgage, Mrs. Pilley. She died on July 15, 1939, having appointed the plaintiffs and one Mitchell, a partner in the firm of Pilley & Mitchell, as her executors.

The interest on the mortgage continued to be paid by the defendant, the mortgagor, until August 1, 1940. Pilley & Mitchell collected rents for her of this and other properties and generally looked after her affairs.

In September, 1940, the house was almost entirely destroyed by enemy action. No interest was paid in November, 1940, and none had been paid since. In a claim made in 1941 by Pilley & Mitchell, as solicitors for the mortgagor, for compensation under the War Damage Act, 1941, the existence of the mortgage was mentioned. In 1944 the War Damage Commission wrote to Mrs. Pepin and also to the mortgagees, Mrs. Pilley's executors, saying that a value payment of £930 would be made. In the next year, however, the War Damage Commission stated that, subject to the consent of all parties interested, a cost of works payment would be made instead of a value payment, that letter being sent to Pilley & Mitchell on behalf of both the mortgagor and the mortgagee. Although there was no evidence of the fact, it appeared that the necessary consents were given as the property was repaired on a cost of works basis.

In 1946 Mitchell died, and his business was taken over by the solicitors acting now for the plaintiffs under the style of Elliot & Macvie. Mrs. Pepin consulted a new solicitor, and on December 31, 1947, that solicitor, Miss Wyatt, wrote to Elliot & Macvie (but writing to them as Pilley & Mitchell) asking for accounts in respect of four properties, one of them being 101 Mountview Road. In that letter she said: "I understand from "my client that you have dealt with these properties and "collected rents from some of them at various times. She also "states that you hold mortgages but she has not received any "accounts for many years past, and I shall be obliged if you will "let me know how much is owing in respect of each property, "what amounts have been received and payments made. I must "request this information from you as my client wishes to know "the full extent of her liability." That letter was sent to Elliot & Macvie as the former solicitors of Mrs. Pepin, and not as agents for the mortgagee. Harman J. held that that letter could not be an acknowledgment, being merely a demand by Mrs. Pepin for proper accounts from her former solicitors who had been managing her affairs.

No answer was made to that letter, and Miss Wyatt on April 2, 1948, wrote a similar letter. Accounts eventually were furnished by the firm in April, 1948, and nothing further happened until October 19, 1949, when Elliot & Macvie wrote to Miss Wyatt a letter headed: "Re 101 Mountview Road. Executors "of Alice Pilley decd." which continued: "The above was the "subject of air raid damage. As mortgagees' solicitors, we shall "be glad if you will advise us fully on the present position of the "matter whether the property is to be rebuilt or not, and if so "what stage has the matter reached." There was a reminder letter dated October 25, 1949, and some telephonic communications with Miss Wyatt in November, but no communication written by her.

On January 27, 1950, Elliot & Macvie wrote again: "The "Hornsey Borough Council are continually communicating with "us with regard to the disposal of this site or the leasing thereof. "Will you please let us hear from you as to what has transpired?" Miss Wyatt replied on February 1, 1950, to the effect that an architect had been instructed to make plans for rebuilding the property, and complained that the inquiries of the borough council had not been passed on sooner.

In their next letter dated February 2, 1950, Elliot & Macvie wrote: "From our clients' point of view as mortgagees, they "would wish to have their mortgage paid off as this is the "only item holding up completion and winding up of the estate "of the late Mrs. Alice Pilley. Can anything be done in the "matter, please?" They obtained no satisfaction, and wrote again on March 23, 1950: "Our clients wish their mortgages dis-"charged," (mortgages being in the plural because there was another house in Mountview Road as well as No. 101 with which they were concerned). On July 8, 1950, they wrote: "We shall "be glad to know what is transpiring with regard to both these "properties, and whether there is any possibility of our clients' "mortgage being discharged in the near future, as we have "instructions to take proceedings." On July 31 there was another letter to the same effect. On August 4, 1950, Miss Wyatt wrote the following letter: "Re 101 and 50 Mountview Road. "I thank you for your letter of the 31st ultimo. I understand "that Mrs. Pepin will shortly be making an appointment to see "you with regard to her accounts with you for some time past. "She has several questions which she wishes to raise. Steps are "being taken to rebuild 101 Mountview Road. Plans have been "prepared and submitted to the local authority and as soon as "the work is in hand I will let you know, when Mrs. Pepin's "position can again be reviewed." There was no further correspondence after August, 1950.

Nothing further was done so far as Elliot & Macvie were concerned from 1950 to 1952. The interest on the mortgage had remained unpaid for over 12 years.

This summons was taken out on June 4, 1953, by the plaintiffs as executors of the mortgagee, Mrs. Pilley, asking for an order for possession. The defendant resisted the order on the ground that 12 years having elapsed since the last payment of interest the mortgagees' claim was now barred by statute.[1]

Harman J., having stated the facts: The first question is whether there has been any acknowledgment which would prevent the Limitation Act, 1939, from running as it would otherwise have done. The Act is that of 1939, because the relevant period begins in 1940.

[His Lordship referred to sections 4 (3), 18 (4), 23 (1) and 24 (1), (2), of the Limitation Act, 1939, and continued:] Section 4 of the Act of 1939 seems at first sight unsuitable to apply to an action by a mortgagee for possession, because the mortgagee always has the right to go into possession at any moment, and in a sense, therefore, that right first accrued when the mortgage was made. So long, however, as the mortgagor paid the interest that prevented the statute from running, and the right of action would be deemed to have accrued when payment was due, but was not made, that was November 1, 1940. As there has been no payment for 12 years from that time, unless there has been an acknowledgment in the meanwhile, section 4 applies after the expiration of the 12 years from the date on which the right of action accrued.

The question is, therefore, has there been an acknowledgment? An acknowledgment is to some extent defined by section 24, which is in these terms: "(1) Every such acknowledgment as aforesaid shall be in writing and signed by the person making the acknowledgment. (2) Any such acknowledgment . . . as aforesaid may be made by the agent of the person by whom it is required to be made under the last foregoing section, and shall be made to the person, or to an agent of the person, whose title or claim is being acknowledged . . ." Here the principals have made no acknowledgment. If there be an acknowledgment it must be in one of the letters to which I have referred. The dealings with and by the War Damage Commission are, in my judgment, irrelevant for this purpose. If any acknowledgment were made by Pilley & Mitchell, it was not made by them on behalf of either party, since they acted as solicitors for both sides.

It is a different matter, however, when Miss Wyatt was instructed by Mrs. Pepin, because the latter did not know her position vis-à-vis her creditors, and wished to have accounts from Pilley & Mitchell, the solicitors who had been managing her affairs and collecting rent on her behalf. So long as Miss Wyatt was merely asking Pilley & Mitchell, or the successors of that firm, for an account as her client's solicitors, I think that there was no acknowledgment.

The position changes again in 1949, when a claim to have information is made for the first time on behalf of the executors of Mrs. Pilley in their capacity as mortgagees.

It is clear from October 19, 1949, and onwards, that Elliot & Macvie are writing as the mortgagees' solicitors. Their position as such is impliedly acknowledged in Miss Wyatt's letter of February 1, 1950. It is true that that is a letter in which Miss Wyatt complains that documents had not been sent on to her, but it seems clear that she would not have dealt with strangers on that footing, and it would not have been anything to do with her client's former solicitors. There is, however, no acknowledgment there of the existence of the mortgage.

Wright v. Pepin.

By her last letter, dated August 4, 1950, Miss Wyatt, in my judgment, there recognizes a position as between her client and the mortgagees' solicitors, Elliot & Macvie, in which her client is or may be a debtor in respect of 101 Mountview Road. Mrs. Pepin admits, by her solicitor, that there is a charge on 101 Mountview Road, her solicitor writing: "Mrs. Pepin's "position can again be reviewed when the property has been "rebuilt."

All that is necessary for an acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute is that the debtor should recognize the existence of the debt, or that the creditor should recognize a similar position. A good example for that proposition was cited to me in Stansfield v. Hobson.[1] That case has been disapproved for one purpose. It purports to decide that an acknowledgment after the statute has run was, at any rate under the old law, sufficient to revive the claim. That was disapproved by the Court of Appeal in Sanders v. Sanders.[2] But that is not the purpose for which I cite the former case. The judgments of the Lords Justices, in Stansfield v. Hobson[3] show that they decided the case (apart from the question of date) on one ground. It was an action to redeem against the mortgagee in possession, and he, in response to a letter by the agents for the mortgagor, wrote this letter[4]: "Sir,—I received yours of the 2nd instant. I do not "see the use of meeting either here or at Manchester, unless "some party is ready with the money to pay me off." That is a most casual reference to his position as mortgagee, but, of course, unless it was such a reference, the words "money to pay me off" were not sensible, and the Lords Justices concluded that that was a sufficient acknowledgment. So in the present case, examination of the letter written by Miss Wyatt on August 4, 1950, when looked at in the light of the claims being made against her client by the plaintiffs' solicitors, who described themselves as the mortgagees' solicitors, is an acknowledgment of the existence of the mortgage. In consequence that letter written within 12 years of November, 1940, takes the case out of the Limitation Act of 1939, subject only to one point, namely, was there authority in Miss Wyatt to bind her client by such an acknowledgment? There is nothing in this statute in the shape of the phrase "signa-"ture by an agent thereunto lawfully authorized," as there is in section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and in section 13 of the Mercantile Law (Amendment) Act, 1856, which relates to acknowledgments by agents. Nevertheless, a person is not an agent for the purpose of making an acknowledgment unless he is duly authorized to make it. It seems clear that it is not necessary that the agent should have authority to acknowledge, as in this case, the existence of the mortgage; it seems to be enough that the agent should have authority to write the letter which she did in fact write, and that what she said in the letter is within the scope of her authority.

There is a long line of cases on this subject, beginning with Smith v. Webster.[5] There the solicitors who had instructions to settle a formal contract wrote to the solicitors on the other side enclosing a draft and mentioning in the covering letter that their client had told them that he had made an arrangement of a certain character. It was held that that was not within the scope of their authority, and therefore a memorandum could not be spelt out of such letter. It would have made for one thing a contract which the parties had never authorized. All that had been authorized was a formal written contract between the parties, and to make an open contract in a letter written by solicitors, whose only authority was to negotiate a different contract, was quite out of the question. It seems that that case has been taken to mean rather more than it does. A good illustration of that is found in John Griffiths Cycle Corporation Ld. v. Humber & Co. Ld.[6] The headnote is this: "A letter "written by an agent within the scope of his authority, "which refers to and recognizes an unsigned document as con- "taining the terms of a contract made by his principal, is a "sufficient memorandum of the contract within the fourth "section of the Statute of Frauds, and it is not necessary, in "order to satisfy the statute, that the principal should have "authorized the agent to sign the letter as a record of the "contract." A. L. Smith L.J. said this[7]: "It is undoubted "law that the party to the contract himself may, by signing a "document subsequent to that containing the terms of the con- "tract, recognize the contract in the way required by the fourth "section of the Statute of Frauds. It is also undoubted law that "a signature to a document which contains the terms of a "contract is available for the purpose of satisfying section 4 of "the statute, though put alio intuitu and not in order to attest "or verify the contract." Then in considering Smith v. Webster[8] he said this[9]: ". . . all that is decided by Smith v. Webster[10] is "that, if reliance is placed on the signature of an agent, as "satisfying the fourth section of the Statute of Frauds, you "must, whether the document signed be a record of the terms "or a document referring to and recognizing the document con- "taining the record of the terms, show that the agent signing "was an agent 'thereunto lawfully authorized,' but that is all "that is necessary. In Smith v. Webster[10] the person said to be "the agent thereunto lawfully authorized was a solicitor. He "was not expressly authorized to sign any document recognizing "the document which in fact contained the proposed terms, and

"the court held that it was not within the scope of his authority "so to do." He held, therefore, in the case before him, that the document was within the scope of the solicitors' authority. An acknowledgment can therefore be made or a memorandum signed by an agent, although he does not realize that he is signing a memorandum or producing any such effect.

The most surprising example of that principle is Grindell v. Bass,[11] where counsel signing a defence pleaded that a defendant could not fulfil a contract with the plaintiff because she had agreed to sell the property to someone else. The last thing that counsel thought was that in signing that pleading he was committing his client to a bargain with a third party. Nevertheless, the third party in question, who was also made a defendant, counterclaimed on the verbal agreement of which the only written evidence was the pleading, and that was held to be a memorandum signed by a person duly thereunto authorized, because counsel was authorized to sign the pleading and to put into it presumably anything which he in his discretion thought necessary as a defence for his client in the action then in suit.

I should not have had much difficulty on this question of authority but for the observations of Lord Greene M.R. in Bowring-Hanbury's Trustee v. Bowring-Hanbury.[12] That case came first before Bennett J.,[13] who decided that there was a good defence under the Statute of Limitations. It was said that there was an acknowledgment there, first, in the Inland Revenue affidavit signed by the executor for probate, but that was held to be no acknowledgment because it was not made to the creditor. Secondly, the executor's solicitors had sent an estimate to his trustee in bankruptcy on which there was a note at the bottom saying that one of the assets in the bankruptcy might be a debt due to the bankrupt by his wife's estate, of which he was executor. On that the trustee in bankruptcy sued the executor for the debt said to be thus acknowledged. Bennett J. rejected that claim, not on the question of the solicitors' authority but on the facts. He said [14]: "The document was sent by the solicitors for the executor "to the trustee in bankruptcy, solely to inform the trustee of the "position of the estate of the testatrix and it is plain from the "words used that, when the note was appended to the foot of "the statement, there was no intention of acknowledging the "existence of a debt." Whether that was right or not, it was not the ratio decidendi in the Court of Appeal,[15] who held "that "in the absence of evidence of authority in the solicitors to "acknowledge the debt the note to the estimate did not con-"stitute such an acknowledgment. . . ." This was not a point taken by counsel but it was taken by the court. Lord Greene, in the course of the argument said this [16]: "Has a solicitor any "authority to bind his client in this way?" And the answer was that the solicitor had a general authority. Lord Greene then referred to section 13 of the Mercantile Law (Amendment) Act, 1856, to which I have already made reference.

The judgment of the court was read by Lord Clauson, who said [17]: "As regards the note written to the trustee in bankruptcy "by the executor's solicitors, Bennett J. held that the document "disclosed no intention of acknowledging the existence of the "debt. However this may be (and we express no opinion on "the point), it is a complete answer to the plaintiff's plea based "on this note that there was no evidence of any authority given "to the solicitors by the executor to make any acknowledgment "of the debt on his behalf."

It is said here that there is no evidence of Mrs. Pepin authorizing Miss Wyatt to make any acknowledgment of the debt on her behalf. It is admitted that there need not be express authority nor need there be evidence aliunde: it can be inferred, and in my judgment it is not difficult here to infer that Mrs. Pepin had instructed Miss Wyatt to clear up her affairs; part of which was 101 Mountview Road, which was being rebuilt to her order and constituted an important part of her property. She wanted her affairs cleared up, and she instructed her solicitor accordingly. Her solicitor is approached by the mortgagees' solicitors, the time not having then run, and under pressure from them the solicitor of Mrs. Pepin, as she was well authorized to do, said: "Please hold your hand until the property has been rebuilt, "and then Mrs. Pepin's position can be reviewed." What is that but an acknowledgment that there is an obligation to the mortgagees in respect of the property and a request for forbearance? A solicitor instructed to clear up the defendant's affairs had implied authority to make such a plea. Miss Wyatt was, in my judgment, an agent duly authorized to make the acknowledgment which she did make—in other words, to write the letter which she wrote on August 4, 1950, and that letter, as a matter of construction, amounted to an acknowledgment.

The consequence is that the plea under the Limitation Act fails and there must be an order for possession in the usual form.

Mortgage. Banking. Limitation of action.

By a legal charge dated September 16, 1936, and being subject to a first mortgage, A charged a farm with repayment to the bank of moneys due on his overdraft. By clause 1 of the charge he covenanted with the bank "to pay to them on demand all money "and liabilities which now are or at any time hereafter may be "due or owing or incurred from or by the mortgagor to the bank "or for which the mortgagor may be or become liable to them on "any current account or in any manner whatever . . . together "with interest to date of repayment (such interest being computed "both before and after such demand. . .)." By clause 2 (1), A as beneficial owner charged the property by way of legal mortgage "with payment to the bank of the principal money, liabilities and "interest hereby covenanted to be paid by the mortgagor." On September 19, 1936, the legal charge was registered pursuant to the Land Charges Act, 1925. On June 24, 1938, B contracted with A to buy the farm free from incumbrances. On December 13, 1938, B took action to prevent the first mortgagees from selling the property. On December 19 the bank by notice in writing demanded from A repayment of the moneys due on his banking account and, as the purchase price could not discharge that amount and the amount due on the first mortgage, A could not complete. On December 23, 1938, B took a transfer of the first mortgage and in May, 1939, obtained an order for specific performance against A, who did not comply with it. In 1944 B obtained an order vesting the property in him and in March, 1950, contracted to sell it to C, to whom it was conveyed subject to the bank's legal charge.

By this summons, issued on November 29, 1950, against B, C and A, the bank, having taken no step for nearly 12 years, claimed to enforce the legal charge. The bank contended that time ran from the date of the demand, i.e., from December 19, 1938: the defendants B and C (A not appearing) claimed that it ran, in the case of advances made before the date of the legal charge, from the date of that charge and, in the case of subsequent advances, from the dates of the advances; and that, as the bank did not claim any advance made after October 14, 1938, when it received notice of the contract between B and A, all those advances were barred by section 4 (3) of the Limitation Act, 1939, and there was no debt in respect of which to bring a foreclosure action:—

Held, in ordering enforcement of the legal charge, (1) that, as clause 1 of the legal charge was, on its true construction, a covenant to pay on demand, it was a condition precedent to the issue of a writ that there should be a demand; (2) that also it was conclusive in favour of the bank that the legal charge, being a charge in the ordinary form between banker and customer, was a collateral security and so came within the rule, stated by Chitty J. in In re Brown's

Estate [1893] 2 Ch. 300, at p. 305, that ". . . where there is a "present debt and a promise to pay on demand, the demand is not "considered to be a condition precedent to the bringing of the action. "But . . . on a promise to pay a collateral sum on request . . . the "request ought to be made before action brought."

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The plaintiffs, Lloyds Bank Ld., took out a summons to enforce by foreclosure or sale a legal charge dated September 16, 1936, between the third defendant, George John Lyster and the bank, whereby a farm known as Winterslow Farm was charged with repayment of the sums due on the third defendant's overdraft with the bank.

The legal charge was registered on September 19, 1936, pursuant to the Land Charges Act, 1925. It was a second mortgage, being subject to a mortgage to the Agricultural Mortgage Corporation to secure £7,200. On June 24, 1938—the first defendant, one Morris Margolis, contracted with the third defendant to purchase the mortgaged premises for £10,000 free from incumbrances. There was doubt whether the contract excluded some 7½ acres from the whole premises, which, however, the court ignored. The farm was very large, comprising some 950 acres, and substantially the contract extended to the whole of it. The date fixed for completion was September 29, 1938, but completion did not take place on that day. On October 14, 1938, the contract between the first defendant and the third defendant was registered pursuant to the Land Charges Act as an estate contract. On December 19, 1938, the bank by notice in writing to the third defendant, demanded repayment of the moneys due on his banking account, being £3,188 14s. 7d., together with interest from June 30, 1938, amounting to £93 17s. 11d. There was still £7,200 due to the Agricultural Mortgage Corporation and over £3,000 due to the bank. Thus, the purchase-money was insufficient by some £700 to discharge those two mortgages and the third defendant could not complete the sale. On December 13, 1938, the first defendant took action against the Agricultural Mortgage Corporation to prevent them from selling the property, as they were threatening to do, in exercise of their powers as mortgagees. In the result, on December 23, 1938, the first defendant took a transfer to himself of that first mortgage on payment to the Agricultural Mortgage Corporation of £7,211 7s. 5d.

The first defendant instituted proceedings for specific performance against the third defendant and on May 2, 1939, obtained an order for specific performance. The accounts and inquiries duly proceeded in the absence of the third defendant who was not heard of after 1939. On December 19, 1944, the first defendant obtained an order in the action vesting the farm in him expressly subject to the two mortgages, namely, the former Agricultural Mortgage Corporation mortgage then vested in the first defendant and the legal charge in favour of the bank, it being recited that the amount due thereunder was in excess of the purchase price; and the first defendant, by the order, undertook to indemnify the third defendant against any liabilities under the incumbrances, but only to the extent of the amount of the purchase-money and interest payable after deducting costs.

On March 2, 1950, the first defendant contracted to sell Winterslow Farm to the second defendant, one Reginald George King; and on September 27, 1950, the farm was duly conveyed to the second defendant, discharged from the first mortgage but expressly subject to the bank's legal charge. Thus, the second defendant became the beneficial owner in possession subject to the bank's legal charge. As between the first and second defendants, however, the first agreed to indemnify the second defendant against the bank's legal charge if it remained enforceable.

On November 29, 1950, the bank issued this summons against all three defendants, of whom only the first two appeared, claiming to enforce their mortgage. The amount due by that time was very substantial; the sum due for principal being £2,684, that due for interest £1,954. The defendants contended that the legal charge was no longer enforceable against them or any of them, because the remedy was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939.[1]

Clause 1 of the legal charge provided: "The mortgagor hereby "covenants with the bank to pay to them on demand all money "and liabilities which now are or at any time hereafter may be "due owing or incurred from or by the mortgagor to the bank or "for which the mortgagor may be or become liable to them on "any current or other account or in any manner whatever "(whether alone or jointly with any other person and in whatever "name, style or firm) together with interest to date of repay-"ment commission banking charges law and other costs charges "and expenses (such interest being computed both before and "after any such demand according to the usual mode of the bank "with current accounts and that notwithstanding any account "hereby secured may from any cause cease to be carried on as an "ordinary banking account and so that interest shall be payable "at the rate so provided as well after as before any judgment "obtained hereunder)."

[1] Limitation Act, 1939, s. 4 (3): "No action shall be brought by any "other person"—i.e., other than the Crown (see subs. (1)) or than a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation (see subs. (2))—"to recover any land "after the expiration of twelve years "from the date on which the right of "action accrued to him or, if it "first accrued to some person through "whom he claims, to that person. ". . ."

S. 18 (4): "Nothing in this section "shall apply to a foreclosure action "in respect of mortgaged land, but "the provisions of this Act relating "to actions to recover land shall "apply to such an action."

Clause 2 provided: "(i) The mortgagor as beneficial owner "hereby charges by way of legal mortgage all and singular the "property mentioned or described in the first schedule hereto with "the payment to the bank of the principal money liabilities "interest and other money hereby covenanted to be paid by the "mortgagor subject to a prior charge particulars of which are set "out in the second schedule hereto; (ii) In favour of a purchaser "the principal money hereby secured shall be deemed to have "become due on the day on which demand for payment thereof "is made by the bank and the statutory power of sale as hereby "extended shall be exercisable from and after that date which "date (without prejudice to the equitable right to redeem) shall "be the redemption date." Clause 8 provided that the total amount recoverable should not exceed £4,000 exclusive of interest at the current rate from six months prior to the date of demand for repayment of the moneys and liabilities thereby secured.

Sir Lynn Ungoed-Thomas Q.C., H. A. Rose and O.M. Swingland for the bank.

W. S. Wigglesworth for the first and second defendants.

The third defendant did not appear.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

UPJOHN J., after stating the facts: I have to determine on what date the right to bring a foreclosure action first accrued to the bank. The rival contentions are these. The bank contends that the time runs for 12 years from demand, i.e., from December 19, 1938, and that therefore they are just in time. The defendants, however, say that the time runs, in the case of advances made before the date of the legal charge, from the date of that charge; that, in the case of subsequent advances, it runs from the dates of the subsequent advances; and that, as no claim is made to any advance made after October 14, 1938, when the bank received notice of the contract between the first defendant and the third defendant, all those sums have become irrecoverable, so that there is no debt in respect of which an action to foreclose can be brought.

To return to clause 1 of the legal charge; it seems to me that the construction of it, quite apart from authority, is too plain to admit of argument. It expressly provides that the covenant between the mortgagor and the bank is to pay to the bank "on "demand" all money and liabilities which were then or at any time thereafter might be due. Purely as a matter of construction, I do not see how that can be construed otherwise than as a covenant to pay on demand; and, therefore, prima facie, it seems to me that the bank's claim is well founded.

It is argued, however, by Mr. Wigglesworth (who has said everything that can possibly be said for the defendants) that where there is a covenant to pay on demand, it is not, on the authorities, necessary or a condition precedent to the issue of a writ that there should be a demand, but that in fact time runs from the date of each advance. He referred to In re Brown's Estate.[1] In that case the mortgagee agreed to lend and did lend to the mortgagor, Alfred Brown, a sum of £3,000 on the security of certain property. In the mortgage deed Alfred Brown and his father, John Brown, entered into a joint and several covenant that they would, on demand, pay to the mortgagee, his executors, administrators and assigns, £3,000. That was in 1867. John Brown having died, no demand was made against the father's estate until July, 1889; and it was held that the mortgagee could come in and prove his claim against the father's estate without, of course, disturbing dividends already distributed. It was contended that a demand need not be made and that time therefore ran from the execution of the mortgage.

Chitty J. said[2]: "Now, for those interested in the testator's "estate it is said that the meaning of the words 'on demand' "is the same as that which has been attributed to them in "promissory notes and the like. The law is quite settled that, "with regard to a promissory note payable on demand, no "demand is necessary before bringing an action; and indeed the "Statute of Limitations begins to run from the making of the "note."

He then refers to certain cases and considers whether the fact that the time runs from the date of the promissory note is part of the law merchant or of the general law. After considering Brighty v. Norton[3] and Norton v. Ellam[4] he continues his judgment as follows, beginning with a quotation from the judgment of Parke B. in Norton v. Ellam[5]: "'I entertain no doubt at all "'on this point'"—i.e., about the Statute of Limitations running from the date of the note. "'It is the same as the case "'of money lent payable upon request, with interest, where no "'demand is necessary before bringing the action.' That is a "general proposition and not one based upon the law merchant; "and, without going through the whole of the cases to which I "have referred in the course of the argument, it is plain that a "distinction has been taken and maintained in law, the result of "which is, that where there is a present debt and a promise to "pay on demand, the demand is not considered to be a condition "precedent to the bringing of the action. But it is otherwise on "a promise to pay a collateral sum on request, for then the "request ought to be made before action brought. I think the "distinction which I have mentioned, is sufficiently pointed out "in Saunders' argument in Birks v. Trippet,[6] which was accepted "by the whole of the court, the judges having been apparently "somewhat impatient at the learned counsel labouring his argu-"ment to the extent he did." He then considers the construction of the instrument and concludes that on its true construction it meant what it said: it was a payment on demand; and therefore, no demand having been made against the father's estate until 1889, time did not run until that date. I find the judgment a little difficult to follow, for this reason: the judge put a construction on the joint and several covenant in the case of John Brown. If the passages which I have read meant that the judge, had it been necessary to determine the matter, would have given a different construction to those very same words in the case of the same covenant by Alfred Brown, I would respectfully disagree with him. As he pointed out, it is always a question of construction in each case.

In my judgment, at all events where there is the relationship of banker and customer and the banker permits his customer to overdraw on the terms of entering into a legal charge, which provides that the money then due or thereafter to become due is to be paid on demand, that means what it says. As between the customer and banker, who are dealing on a running account, it seems to me impossible to assume that the bank were to be entitled to sue on the deed the very day after it was executed without making a demand and giving the customer a reasonable time to pay. It is indeed a nearly correlative case to that decided in Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corporation,[7] where the headnote is: "Where money is standing to the credit of a customer on "current account with a banker, in the absence of a special agree-"ment a demand by the customer is a necessary ingredient in the "cause of action against the banker for money lent." In this case the agreement has provided quite clearly what is to be done before the bank can sue: they must demand the money.

Sir Lynn Ungoed-Thomas also submits, and rightly, that if necessary the case is concluded in his favour on the ground that this legal charge is a collateral security, and therefore falls within the rule stated by Chitty J. in In re Brown's Estate.[8] I agree with that submission. I think that it is clear that where there is a banker's charge, a charge in the ordinary form as between a banker and a customer to secure a running account, that must be treated as a collateral security .

I need refer only to the judgment of Denning L.J. in Barclays Bank Ld. v. Beck.[9] The question there was whether by executing a charge under the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, there was a merger of the simple contract between the bank and its customer. It was held that there was no merger. Denning L.J. said[10]: "The distinction is clearly shown by considering the difference "between a mortgage debt to a building society, and a charge to a "bank to secure a running account. The mortgage debt to a "building society is created under and by virtue of a deed, and is "a specialty debt from its commencement; but a future debt on "a running account is a debt created by parol, and it remains a "simple contract debt, even though the customer has previously "given a charge to secure it, which includes a covenant under "seal. The future debt on running account is not created under "the deed. It may be that it would never have been created but "for the deed, but that is a different matter. It only means that "the deed is collateral security for its repayment."

I think that on that ground, too, the plaintiff succeeds; but I prefer to rest my judgment on the broad ground which I have already discussed. Accordingly, there must be an order to enforce the security.

Order accordingly.

* ALMA SHIPPING CO., S.A. v. V. M. SALGAONCAR E IRMAOS LTDA.

Shipping—Charterparty—Demurrage—"Average"—Despatch money—Calculation—"Charterers to have right to average days allowed for "loading and discharging."

Judicial Precedent — Decision at first instance — Whether binding on other judge at first instance—Construction of commercial document.

Where a charterparty gives the charterers a right to "average" the days allowed for loading and discharging, the time on demurrage at the port of loading is set against the time saved at the port of discharge, or vice versa, and the payment of demurrage or despatch money will depend on the net result.

Watson Brothers Shipping Co. Ld. v. Mysore Manganese Co. Ld. (1910) 26 T.L.R. 221; 15 Com.Cas. 159 applied.

Action.

The plaintiffs were at all material times the owners of the s.s. Alma. By a charterparty dated December 17, 1952, between Faros Shipping Co. Ld., on behalf of the owners, and William Shyvers Ld., on behalf of the charterers, the charterers chartered the Alma to load a full and complete cargo of iron ore, say 7,000 tons, 10 per cent. more or less at captain's option, at Mormugao and to deliver the same at Rotterdam.

Loading began at Mormugao on January 16, 1953, and finished on February 10, 1953, and discharge at Rotterdam began on March 25 and was completed on March 26. There were no holidays or non-working days (apart from periods from noon on Saturdays to 8 a.m. on Mondays) and no interruptions due to excepted perils during either loading or discharge.

The quantity of cargo loaded at Mormugao was 7,475 tons, and in accordance with clause 5 of the charterparty the time allowable for the separate operations of loading and discharging, without prejudice to the parties' contentions as to the effect of clause 9 of the charter, was

(a) for loading ... $\frac{7,475}{500}$ = 14 days 22 hours 48 minutes

(b) for discharging ... $\frac{7,475}{1,500}$ = 4 days 23 hours 36 minutes

By clause 9 of the charter it was provided "Charterers to "have the right to average the days allowed for loading and "discharging." The charterers exercised that right and claimed that they were entitled to be paid despatch money under the charter amounting to £431 3s. 3d. (calculated according to method "B" below).

The owners denied that the charterers were entitled to be paid dispatch money and claimed that they (the owners) were entitled to be paid demurrage under the charter amounting to £54 6s. 9d. (calculated according to method "A" below).

It was agreed between the parties that an alternative method of calculation to "A" and "B" was method "C" (below) whereby the charterers would be entitled to despatch money amounting to £201 19s. 11d.

Subject to the charterers' right to set off against the agreed balance any such amount as the court might hold to be due to the charterers as dispatch money, it was agreed that there was due from the charterers to the owners as the balance of the freight the sum of £316 10s. 5d.

The question for the decision of the court was which of the three methods of calculation was, on the true construction of the charter, the correct method.

T. G. Roche for the owners.
Basil Eckersley for the charterers.

All cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Devlin J. This case turns entirely upon the construction of clause 9 in a charterparty, which provides: "Charterers to have "the right to average the days allowed for loading and dis-"charging." "The days allowed," of course, refers to the lay days for loading and discharging. There is no difficulty about computing the lay days because the computation is agreed. Computed according to the method which is described in the charter-party (that is by rates of loading per day) they are agreed at almost 15 days for loading and almost 5 days for discharging—I will call them, for the sake of simplicity, 15 and 5. The reason why they are different is because the charterers are expected under the lay day clause to discharge three times as fast as they are expected to load; it may be because of better facilities at the discharge port, Rotterdam, as compared with the loading port, Mormugao, but at any rate so it is.

The differences that have arisen between the parties as to whether demurrage is payable, and, if so, what amount, and whether dispatch money is payable, relate therefore not to the calculation of lay days but to the way in which the time used is to be related to the lay days; and what has given rise to divergence is the clause which I have read.

It is clear that, unless there is some clause of this sort, the operations of loading and discharging have to be considered quite separately. The lay days have to be calculated separately, and the time used has to be considered against each separately and demurrage and dispatch money arrived at accordingly. The object of a clause of this kind is to prevent the two from being considered separately and to allow the charterer in this part of the clause, since the option is with him, to avail himself, if he wants to, of days saved in loading so as to advantage himself in the discharging, or vice versa. These clauses, the authorities show, adopt various forms. The use of the word "average" is very common; the use of the word "reversible" is also common; and sometimes there is a clause which simply provides, quite clearly and simply, for the addition of the two lots of lay days together.

Three methods of operating the clauses have been advanced. The simplest of them is the one that is advanced by the charterers and is called method "B." That simply means that one adds the two lots of lay days together, making approximately 20 days, and one takes the total time used, and the difference between them one way or the other produces the results. That is not, in any strict sense of the term, "averaging"; it is aggregating, or pooling the two lots of periods and pooling the results. One can get at the same result by averaging if, say, instead of taking 20 days for the whole one took 20 days divided by two, the average for loading and discharging would be 10 and one gives oneself 10 days at each place. At first sight, one would think that it could not matter which way one set about it, but in fact it does. The reason why it matters, and the reason why all three methods of calculation produce different results, is because the time used does not flow smoothly and uninterruptedly; it is interrupted by Sundays, half holidays and other non-working days, and it is, so to speak, the interjection of these into the period which is actually used that causes different results to be produced by these different methods of calculation. What might be regarded as the stricter way of doing it by averaging (that is dividing the aggregate by two) would, I am told, produce quite a different result and is not in fact a method that is advised by either side in this case.

Alma Shipping Co., S.A. v. V. M. Salgaoncar E Irmaos Ltda.

The principal method upon which the owners rely is method "A." Upon that basis one takes the time by which the time used exceeded the lay days at the port of loading—it might, of course, be less, but on the particular facts of this case it happens to have exceeded it, and exceeded it by something over four days —and one deducts that excess from the lay days fixed at the port of discharge. The result of that, of course, is to diminish the lay days for discharging and one then puts the time actually used at discharging against that diminished amount of lay days. If time is saved on loading, then that is added to the lay days allowed for discharging in the same way.

The third method (which has been called method "C") is one which is advanced in the alternative by the owners and accepted, though with considerable reluctance, by the charterers as an alternative method if their method "B" is not allowed. There the two calculations are kept entirely separate until the very end when a balance is struck. If time is saved on discharge that is set against the excess time of loading, or vice versa, and in that way a net result is arrived at.

The matter is not free from authority, because clauses of this type are not uncommon. The first authority to which I have been referred in which a clause providing for "averaging" was considered by a court is Moliere Steamship Co. Ld. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co.[1] That was a judgment of Kennedy J. The material words in the charterparty were: "Charterers to be at liberty to "average the days for loading and discharging in order to avoid "demurrage." It is sufficient to say about the judgment that it supports the charterers' view in the present case; it supports method "B" if the position is rightly summarized in the headnote. The headnote reads: "Where a charterparty gives "liberty to the charterers 'to average the days for loading and "'discharging in order to avoid demurrage,' the charterers may "add together at the port of loading the days allowed for the "two operations of loading and discharging, and the ship does "not come on demurrage till the days so added together are "exhausted." But when one examines the judgment, as Mr. Roche has done, it is plain that Kennedy J. was influenced by considerations other than the mere construction of the words. The report says that evidence was called in respect of the defendants' system of calculation, and Kennedy J. said[2]: "From the evidence called on behalf of the defendants it appears "that during a period of ten years the clause has been in common "use, and that during that time it has had an accepted meaning, "on the basis of which settlements have been made without "objection—that meaning being the one now put forward by the "defendants. It seems to me that I ought to act upon that "evidence. Apart from that understood meaning, the words "'to average the days' appear to me to be not very apt and to "be open to argument. I do not say that without the evidence "called by the defendants their construction of the words would "be an impossible one, but it would certainly be doubtful "whether it was correct."

So what the judge is saying there is that he doubts very much whether the construction which he put on the words is the correct one if he had been looking simply at the words themselves, but he felt it better in that case, because he thought the clause was ambiguous, to be guided by the evidence which he had heard. In those circumstances the headnote I feel is a little misleading because it gives the impression, or might give the impression, that the judge had arrived at his conclusion as a matter of construction, which is not the case.

The next authority is a decision of Hamilton J. in Watson Brothers Shipping Co. Ld. v. Mysore Manganese Co. Ld.[3] There the wording was a little different. It was a charterparty which apparently provided for a number of voyages though in fact only one voyage took place under it, and the words used in clause 5 of the charterparty were: "Days to be averaged over all voyages "performed under and during the entire currency of this charter "to avoid demurrage." The decision of Kennedy J. to which I have just referred was not, so far as appears from the report, discussed in the argument or in the judgment. Hamilton J. said[4]: "The defendants then contend that they are entitled to "take 10 days for the loading, and add to that 10 days for dis-"charging, and interpret them as 20 clear working days of 24 "hours as they would be interpreted under the circumstances of "the port of Marmagoa, and they say this is the meaning of the "provision 'days to be averaged over all voyages performed "'under and during the entire currency of this charter to avoid "'demurrage'"—that is method "B" in the present case. "There are other provisions with regard to demurrage in this "charterparty which throw a little light upon it, but I think the "real question turns on what is meant by the word 'average.'" Then he considers some of the other provisions of the charterparty, and he then says: "All these provisions show that the "business men who entered into this charterparty contemplated "that at the time the vessel was loaded at Marmagoa it would "be possible then to know whether she was on demurrage or "not, so that they would be able to exercise a lien for that "demurrage or pay the commissions mentioned. It is, perhaps, "technically a sufficient answer to say that some application "might be given to those words in the event of the vessel being "more than 20 days on demurrage at the port of loading, so that "in no possible event, and in no kind of averaging, could there "fail to be demurrage due and payable, but, still, it does show "that the shipper is trying to get a good deal out of the words "'days to be averaged over all voyages,' when he claims that he "is entitled to say his ship is not on demurrage at Marmagoa "until more than 20 of the charterparty days have expired, and "yet she is not loaded. I think the words 'days to be averaged "'over all voyages' will not bear this interpretation. Parties "often stipulate, and the parties could have stipulated, that so "many days are to be allowed for loading and discharging. The "other form of averaging days over the voyage or voyages to "avoid demurrage carries a different meaning. In my opinion "the meaning of the average clause is that a number of days for "shipment having been stipulated, and then a number of like "days for discharge having been stipulated, the vessel's right to "demurrage must be determined upon the events which happen "at the port of loading and according to the number of days "allowed for loading there, though subsequent events at the "port of discharge may entitle the charterers to abate the "amount of demurrage incurred at the port of loading by taking "credit for the number of days saved, if any, at the port of "discharge. The plaintiffs admit that two days were saved at "the port of discharge, the defendants claim three, but my view "is that, as a matter of construction at the end of ten charter-"party days for loading at Marmagoa, the vessel was on "demurrage." There he adopts method "C."

Mr. Eckersley put forward the view that the decision of Hamilton J. in that case is distinguishable, on the terms of the charterparty, from that which I have to decide today. I do not think it is. I observe that Hamilton J. puts the real question which he has to determine as turning on what is meant by the word "average." It is plain that he has chosen between method "B," which the defendants there were advancing, and the method which he pronounces in favour of, which is method "C." He says particularly in referring to method "B": "I think the "words will not bear this interpretation," and then he adopts method "C." Once one has ascertained the number of days for shipment and the number of like days for discharge they become just as if they were days stipulated in the charterparty, so his reasoning exactly applies.

One other authority which was cited to me was Rederiaktiebolaget Transatlantic v. La Compagnie Française des Phosphates de L'Oceanie.[5] There the clause which the Court of Appeal had to construe was a straightforward one providing in terms: "At "the charterers' option any days or parts of days not consumed "in loading might be added to the average for discharging, and "any extra time consumed in loading might be deducted from "the time for discharging." I do not think that the judgment of Scrutton L.J., which was referred to by Mr. Eckersley—although it has some helpful observations about the general way in which these clauses should be approached—really touches the clause in the present case and the meaning of the word "average" which I have to determine.

Mr. Eckersley quite rightly drew my attention to, and adopted as part of his argument, the references to this point in two of the leading textbooks, Scrutton on Charterparties and Carver on Carriage by Sea. In Scrutton, 15th ed., p. 344, the editors sum up what they conceived to be the effect of the decisions in these words: "The clause 'to average the days "'for loading and discharging in order to avoid demurrage' "allows the charterer to add together the days agreed for both "operations, not being liable for demurrage till the total days "are exhausted." In Carver, 9th ed., p. 896, the author said: "Charterers sometimes stipulate for 'liberty to average the days "'for loading and discharging.' This was held in Moliere S.S. "Co. Ld. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co.[6] to entitle them to add together "the time allowed for loading and the time allowed for discharging "and to exhaust the whole before demurrage could begin to run." It is, therefore, fair to say that in those words no distinction is drawn between the different forms of clause. No particular weight is put upon the use of the word "average," and they are all conceived as having the effect which the charterers in the present case urge that they should be given. But in neither of those books is the decision of Hamilton J. referred to, and in both of them the decision in the Moliere Steamship Co. case[7] of Kennedy J. is treated as if it were an authority upon construction, whereas in fact I adopt Mr. Roche's submission that it cannot be so regarded.

In those circumstances I am left with the one authority which I think is clearly applicable, namely the decision of Hamilton J. in the Watson Brothers Shipping Co. case,[8] and I can only decide in favour of the charterers by adopting their method "B" if I disagree with that decision. I am bound to say that if the matter were res integra a lot might be said for treating all these types of clauses as if they were intended to achieve the same thing, whether the words used were "averaging," "adding" or "reversible," but in the face of that decision, which clearly distinguishes between the clauses which use the word "average" and clauses which use the word "adding" or have a similar effect to using the word "adding," I do not conceive that I can do so. If it were a decision given by a judge speaking with no greater authority than my own, I should still in the circumstances of the present case think it right to follow it, because nothing can be more unfortunate in my judgment than that different shadows of meaning in clauses of this type should be introduced by different judges thus leading to a multiplicity of authorities; but coming as it does from Hamilton J., one speaking with great authority, it gives such added weight to it that in my judgment it would be wrong for me to disregard it.

In those circumstances, therefore, I reject method "B" and I reach the conclusion that a distinction must be drawn when the word "average" is used in a clause of this type from a clause which, though no doubt with similar intent, is phrased so as to use other terms which are quite as commonly used.

I am left therefore to distinguish between method "A" and method "C." There is, as I have said, no authority in favour of method "A." There is nothing to show that it was actually considered by Hamilton J., but there is no doubt that he pronounces in favour of method "C" or that that was the one which he adopted.

Mr. Roche has argued that that can be distinguished having regard to the words in the present clause, "days allowed." He submits that method "A" gives effect to those words, whereas method "C" is really only an accounting operation at the end of the whole thing; it does not operate on the days allowed either at one place or the other place, but merely balances the results of the two calculations at the end. I do not think that distinction is one which ought to operate upon my mind. I attach great importance to there being, not physically more authorities, but the reverse in matters of this kind. If it were possible to give one common meaning to all these clauses I feel there would be a great deal of advantage in so doing. For the reasons I have given I cannot go as far as that, but I certainly do not think that I ought to allow slight differences of wording to give rise to somewhat subtle reasoning so as to produce different results according to only slightly different formations of words. I therefore adopt the judgment of Hamilton J. in its entirety as governing this case, and accordingly I adopt method "C" as being the method that is produced by the right construction of this clause. The consequence of that is agreed between the parties. There is a balance of credit which has to be taken into account. The result is that it is agreed that there should be judgment for the owners for £114 10s. 6d., and I give judgment accordingly.

Trust and Trustee—Uncertainty, trust void for—Imperative trust to distribute income among specified class—Specified class unascertainable at any given time—Charities members of class—Payment of income to charities—Claim for exemption from income tax—Income not income of charities—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), s. 37 (b).

Revenue—Income tax—Charity.

An imperative trust for the distribution of a fund (whether capital or income) among a class or such members thereof as the selector may select depends for its validity on the answer to the question: Is the class capable of ascertainment? If the answer is in the affirmative, the trust is valid. If the answer is in the negative, it is void for uncertainty.

By a settlement dated July 14, 1950, the settlor settled a sum of £80,000 upon trust to apply the income of the trust fund during a period within the perpetuity period for the benefit of all or any of a class of beneficiaries specified in the schedule to the deed, in such shares, proportions and manner as the trustees in their absolute discretion thought fit. The specified class was admittedly unascertainable at any given time. Two charitable bodies, members of the specified class, claimed exemption from income tax in respect of sums of money which they had received from the trustees of the settlement under the provisions relating to the trust of the income of the trust fund:—

Held, that the trust being an imperative trust for the distribution of income among a class of beneficiaries which was incapable of ascertainment, it was void for uncertainty; so that the sums of money received by the charities from the trustees were not the income of the charities, which were accordingly not entitled to exemption from income tax under section 37 (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

APPEALS by the Crown from decisions of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, heard together.

The stated cases set out the following facts: On October 22, 1952, the respondent, Broadway Cottages Trust, and the respondent, the Sunnylands Trust, both of which were trusts established for charitable purposes only, appealed against decisions of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, disallowing claims made for exemption from income tax in respect of the years 1950–51, 1951–52, in the case of the Broadway Cottages Trust, and the year 1950–51 in the case of the Sunnylands Trust, in relation to certain sums of money alleged to be the income of the respondents and received by them from the trustees of a settlement dated July 14, 1950 (hereinafter called "the trustees"). The settlement was made between Alan Geoffrey Timpson (hereinafter called "the settlor") of the one part and the trustees of the other part. The subject of the settlement was £80,000, which was to be held by the trustees on trust for the wife of the settlor, Ethel Beatrice Timpson, and the other persons specified in the schedule. The settlement provided, inter alia: "(1) In this "settlement the following expressions shall where the context "so admits have the following respective meanings and shall be "construed in the following manner, viz.:—(c) 'The appointed "'period' means a period beginning on the date hereof and con-"tinuing until terminated under the power hereinafter contained "or if not so terminated until twenty years after the death of "the last survivor now living of the issue of his late Majesty "King George V. (d) 'The beneficiaries' mean the persons "specified in the schedule hereto and 'beneficiary' means one "of the beneficiaries.

"(4) The trustees shall hold all such investments as afore-"said and the varied investments and property and interests in "property (if any) from time to time subject to the trusts hereof "(all of which are hereinafter included in the expression 'the "'trust fund') upon trust for such of the beneficiaries as shall "be living or (being a charitable trust) existing at the termination "of the appointed period and if more than one in equal shares.

"(5) The interest to be taken under the last preceding clause "hereof by any beneficiary at the termination of the appointed "period shall be absolute interest.

"(6) Provided always that the trustees at any time or times "not being less than six years after the said day of declaration ". . . if in their discretion they think fit so to do may by deed "declare the appointed period to be terminated either as to the "whole of the trust fund or as to any aliquot or specific part "thereof to the intent that the trust fund or (as the case may "be) the part thereof to which such declaration relates and the "income of the same may be held upon the trusts and subject "to the powers and provisions upon and subject to which the "same would at the date of such declaration be held if the "appointed period had then been terminated by effluxion of time "and such declaration should be effectual.

"(7) And if all the beneficial trusts hereinbefore declared "shall fail . . . then the trust fund and the income thereof shall "be held upon charitable trusts to be declared by the trustees ". . . to the intent that neither the donor or any wife or widow "of his shall in any event whatsoever take any interest by way "of resulting trust or otherwise in the trust fund or the income "thereof or any accretions thereto or in any part of the same.

"(8) During the appointed period the trustees shall hold the "income of the trust fund from the date or respective dates from "which the trustees shall become entitled to such income upon "trust to apply the same for the benefit of all or any one or more "of the donor's said wife and the beneficiaries in such shares "proportions and manner as the trustees in their discretion from "time to time think fit (and so that such moneys as the trustees "may from time to time think fit to apply for the benefit of any "of the beneficiaries who shall have attained the age of twenty-"one years be paid to him or to her on his or her receipt which "shall be a completed discharge to the trustees).

"(9) PROVIDED ALWAYS that the trustees shall have the power "from time to time at their discretion to capitalize the said "income or any part thereof either by investing the same and "treating such investments as part of the capital of the trust "fund or in any other mode of capitalization which may appear "to the trustees to be expedient and pending such application "as aforesaid of such income the trustees may temporarily invest "or place on deposit the same and all income thereby produced "shall be treated as the income of the trust fund.

"(10) The trustees shall also have power during the appointed "period to apply the whole or any part of the capital of the trust "fund in their discretion for the benefit of all or any one or more "of the beneficiaries either by way of advancement on account "of his or her or their share or shares or not as the trustees may "in their discretion think fit and notwithstanding in the case of "any beneficiary that the total amount so applied for the benefit "of such beneficiary may exceed the share to which he or she is "contingently entitled to any share in the capital of the trust "fund."

["(15) Every discretion hereby conferred on the trustees shall "be an absolute and uncontrolled discretion and may (if and so "far as circumstances permit) be exercised from time to time."]

"THE SCHEDULE.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (a) That in order to construe this deed the whole deed must be looked at, both the clauses relating to the capital of the settled fund and those dealing with the income; (b) that a complete and exhaustive list of all the beneficiaries entitled to participate in a distribution of the capital could not be provided; (c) that the deed was void for uncertainty; (d) that, accordingly, the sums of money received by the respondents from the trustees were not the income of the respondents and that the respondents were not entitled to exemption from income tax under section 37 (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents: (a) That the validity of the trusts affecting the income of the settled fund was not affected by the validity or otherwise of the trusts relating to the capital of the settled fund; (b) that the trustees had been given a power of selection by cl. 8 of the settlement in regard to the income of the settled fund among the beneficiaries, and the proper test of the validity of such a power was whether the qualification of the class was such that it could be determined whether any given person did or did not possess the qualification; (c) that the qualifications required under the terms of this settlement were neither mental nor moral, but were in the nature of facts which could be determined by the court; (d) that the power to appoint the income was valid; (e) that the money received by the respondents from the trustees was income of the respondents in respect of which the respondents were entitled to repayment of income tax under the exemption granted to any body of persons established for charitable purposes only by section 37 (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The Special Commissioners allowed the appeal of the respondents and held that the trusts of the settlement in so far as they related to the income of the trust fund were not void for uncertainty, and that the trustees under the provisions of cl. 8 of the settlement had a power of selection and that it was a valid and effective trust of the income of the trust fund, and that, accordingly, the sums of money received by the respondents from the trustees were the income of the respondents and thus entitled to the exemption claimed.

The Crown now appealed from this decision.

Cur. adv. vult.

WYNN-PARRY J. These two cases are indistinguishable; they were heard together, and I propose to give one judgment covering both.

I propose first to construe, so far as necessary, the settlement of July 14, 1950, which has given rise to the dispute. Clause 1, which is a definition clause, contains a definition as beneficiaries of those who are to be regarded as objects of the powers and trusts established by the document. The definition is by way of reference to the schedule. I need not refer to that schedule, because it is common ground that the class there defined is a class, the members of which are unascertainable at any given moment. The subject of the settlement is the sum of £80,000 mentioned in the recital and in cll. 2 and 3.

Clause 4 declares the trusts relating to the capital of the trust fund, namely, "for such of the beneficiaries as shall be living "or (being a charitable trust) existing at the termination of the "appointed period" which is within the perpetuity period "and "if more than one in equal shares." By cl. 5 the interests of the beneficiaries under cl. 4 are declared to be absolute interests. It is agreed that, as the class of beneficiaries is one the members of which are unascertainable at any given moment, cl. 4 is void for uncertainty. I need not and do not decide what in those circumstances is the destination of the trust funds.

The critical clause for the purpose of this appeal is cl. 8. I read this clause as containing an imperative direction to the trustees to distribute the whole of the income from the trust funds, subject to the provisions of cl. 9, which do not affect the question before me, among such of the members of an unascertainable class as they may in their discretion from time to time think fit; a discretion which having regard to cl. 15 is an absolute and uncontrolled discretion.

Upon this view of the clause these two cases would appear prima facie to be covered by the judgments of Lord Tomlin in In re Ogden [1] and Harman J. in In re Gestetner Settlement. [2]

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Broadway Cottages Trust. Same v. Sunnylands Trust.

Wynn-Parry J.

In In re Ogden[1] the relevant bequest was in the following language: "4 per cent. of his residuary estate 'to the Right "'Honourable Sir Herbert Samuel to be by him distributed "'amongst such political federations or associations or bodies "'in the United Kingdom having as their objects or one of their "'objects the promotion of Liberal principles in politics as he "'shall in his absolute discretion select, and in such shares and "'proportions as he shall in the like discretion think fit.'"

Now I agree with Harman J. (see In re Gestetner Settlement[3]) that the direction in that bequest was imperative, and it is clear that the judgment of Lord Tomlin in In re Ogden[4] proceeded on this basis. He says: "Now, applying these prin-"ciples to this case, and leaving out of account the question "whether there is an illegal trust, all that I have to consider "is, whether there is such uncertainty in the field of selection "that it is impossible for the selector to determine from which "institutions he is to select. If so, the bequest is bad on the "ground of uncertainty. The question is one of degree in each "case, whether, having regard to the language of the will, and "the circumstances of the case, there is such uncertainty as to "justify the court in coming to the conclusion that the gift is "bad. Now, it is to be observed that in the present case the "field of selection is: 'Political federations or associations or "'bodies in the United Kingdom, having as their objects or one "'of their objects the promotion of Liberal principles.'"

In other words, Lord Tomlin is saying, if the selector can draw up a complete list of the objects from whom he is to select, then there is certainty and the trust is good; if he cannot do so, the trust is void for uncertainty.

It is upon the basis of this test that he proceeds: "I have "the evidence of Sir Herbert Samuel, who has referred to a "number of bodies which come within the description, and who "states that, in fact, he can ascertain by inquiry all the bodies "that can come within that description, and I take the view "that upon that evidence, and the language of the will, and "having regard to the principles laid down from time to time, "there is certainty here in the field of selection. It comes within "the words of Lord Atkinson in Houston v. Burns[5]: 'I do not "'think that this case has the slightest resemblance to those "'in which property is vested in trustees to be applied for the "'support or benefit of such institutions of a particular class as "'may be in existence, or in the course of creation, in any given "'town or area at the time of which the will speaks. There is "'no vagueness or uncertainty in such cases at all.'

"Now, it seems to me that here you have a class capable "of ascertainment, and in a specified area, and in my view the "bequest is not void on the ground that the field is too vague. "I hold that the gift is not void for uncertainty."

[5] [1918] A.C. 337, 345.

It is argued that the words, "If so, the bequest is bad on the "ground of uncertainty,"[6] are mere obiter dicta. I cannot so regard them. It is true that in fact there was evidence before the court which enabled Lord Tomlin to conclude that there was no uncertainty, but it was because and only because of that circumstance that he was able to reach that conclusion. The statement of principle which, in my opinion, emerges from the judgment is that an imperative trust for the distribution of a fund (whether capital or income appears to me to be immaterial) among a class or such members thereof as the selector may select depends for its validity on the answer to the question: Is the class capable of ascertainment? If the answer is yes, the trust is valid; if the answer is no, it is void for uncertainty.

This is the view of the matter which was taken by Harman J. in In re Gestetner Settlement.[7] In his judgment he says: "In "other words, that decision" (that is, In re Ogden[8]) "turned "on the fact that Lord Tomlin accepted Sir Herbert Samuel's "evidence that the number of objects was ascertainable; failing "that, he would have held the power bad. It was clear that "Sir Herbert Samuel had an absolute duty. There was no gift "over. This was a share of a residue. He had an absolute duty "to distribute it. He merely had the right to say to whom, "among a number of persons, he should distribute. If, there-"fore, all those persons had joined together and had agreed to "take in agreed shares, they could have put an end to Sir "Herbert's discretion, and come to the court and had the fund "distributed between them. That being so, it was in effect a "gift to all of them in such proportions as Sir Herbert should "select. One can see, therefore, that certainty among the objects "was a necessity."

This passage shows clearly the reason why the rule has emerged that in cases of an imperative trust to distribute there must be certainty as to the objects.

Harman J. in In re Gestetner Settlement[9] was able to distinguish the case before him from In re Ogden[10] because he found as a matter of construction that the document in question conferred a bare power as opposed to a duty to distribute. He says[11]: ". . . there is in this case an express power in the trustees to "exclude members from the specified class, but so that the "specified class be not reduced to none; in other words, they "are not entitled entirely to release the power. That means that "they are bound, as I see it, to consider at all times during which "the trust is to continue whether or no they are to distribute any "and if so what part of the fund and, if so, to whom they should "distribute it. To that extent, I have no doubt that there is a "duty on these trustees: a member of the specified class might, "if he could show that the trustees had deliberately refused to "consider any question at all as to the want or suitability of any "member of the class, procure their removal; but there is not, "as in Sir Herbert Samuel's case, In re Ogden,[12] any duty, as "I see it, on the trustees to distribute the whole of either income "or capital among the members of the specified class; and if the "whole of those members could join together, they could still, "as I understand it, not divide the fund between them; because "there is a class in default of appointment, and the document "on its face shows that there is no obligation on the trustees to "do more than consider—from time to time, I suppose—the "merits of such persons of the specified class as are known to "them and, if they think fit, to give them something. The "settlor had good reason, I have no doubt, to trust the persons "whom he appointed trustees; but I cannot see here that there "is such a duty as makes it essential for these trustees, before "parting with any income or capital, to survey the whole field, "and to consider whether A is more deserving of bounty than B. "That is a task which was and which must have been known to "the settlor to be impossible, having regard to the ramifications "of the persons who might become members of this class. If, "therefore, there be no duty to distribute, but only a duty to "consider, it does not seem to me that there is any authority "binding on me to say that this whole trust is bad."

On the view which I take of the case of In re Ogden[13] and the fact that the same view of it is taken by Harman J. in In re Gestetner Settlement,[14] I say again that prima facie, these two cases would appear to be covered by In re Ogden.[15]

It is said, however, by Mr. Pennycuick on behalf of the respondents, first, that so far as the points raised in the present appeals are concerned, the judgments of Lord Tomlin in In re Ogden[16] and the remarks thereon of Harman J. in In re Gestetner Settlement[17] are obiter dicta, and that if the line of cases, conveniently called "the relations cases," had been cited to Lord Tomlin he would not have said, as according to Mr. Pennycuick he need not have said: "If so, the bequest is bad on the "ground of uncertainty."

In In re Deakin[18] Stirling J. said of this line of cases, "The "law on that point is certainly in a peculiar state, and I do not "express any opinion as to whether it is entirely satisfactory or "not; I simply have to administer it as I find it." That is a plain indication that in the view of that learned judge the cases embody a principle, which, though useful, should not be extended, certainly not more than is necessary, to effect the limited purpose for which the principle was introduced.

It appears to me that Mr. Cross is right when he submits that when examined all these cases are found to be examples of a mere power to distribute and not of an imperative direction as in this case. Grant v. Lynam,[19] Salusbury v. Denton,[20] In re Deakin,[21] In re Scarisbrick,[22] and In re Jones[23] are all examples of mere powers of distribution.

Upon this view of the matter it becomes impossible, in my view, to place any qualification upon the principle upon which, as it appears to me, the judgment in In re Ogden[24] proceeded: and if it be remarked as it was in argument that the relations cases were not cited in that case, the short answer can be given that that omission can be justified upon the best of all grounds: they were irrelevant.

If a reason be asked for the existence of the principle stated in In re Ogden[24] it is to be found, I think, in a sentence from the judgment of Harman J. in In re Gestetner Settlement.[25] "It may often be uncertain what objects are in existence; but, "in an ordinary family settlement, the fact that a father did "not know whether one of his sons had married and had children "or no could not possibly invalidate the exercise by him of a "power of appointment in favour of those grandchildren of whom "he did know. On the other hand, if it is the trustee's duty to "distribute the fund among a number of people, his task being to "select which of those people shall be the objects of his bounty, "then it seems to me there is much to be said for the view that "he must be able to review the whole field in order to exercise "his judgment properly."

For these reasons I come to the conclusion that these two appeals are covered by In re Ogden,[26] by which I am bound, but with the judgment in which and the observations thereon of Harman J. in In re Gestetner Settlement[27] I respectfully agree.

It follows that I must treat the trust of income in cl. 8 of the deed as void.

On this view of the matter it becomes unnecessary to consider the second point put forward by Mr. Cross on behalf of the appellant. The appeal of the Crown in these two cases will be allowed.

Appeals allowed.

* INNES (Inspector of Taxes) v. HARRISON.

Perpetuities, Rule against—Discretionary trust—No limit of time—Imperative trust to distribute trust fund among objects of fund at such time or times as trustees thought fit—Objects of fund unascertainable—Invalidity of trust—Claim for repayment of tax—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), s. 27 (5).

Trust and Trustee—Uncertainty, trust void for. Revenue—Income tax—Repayment.

By a settlement dated May 1, 1949, the settlor covenanted to pay to the trustees thereof for a period of ten years from the date of the settlement or until the death of the settlor (whichever should be the earlier date) ("the appointed period") the sum of £2,000 per annum payable monthly without any deduction except for income tax, which constituted the trust fund.

Clause 3 of the settlement provided that the trustees should pay or apply the trust fund to or for the benefit of such one or more of the objects of the trust in such shares (if more than one) at "such "time or times" and in such manner as the trustees in their absolute discretion should from time to time think fit.

The objects of the fund comprised relatives of the settlor, including in particular the lawful children of the settlor's three daughters, persons who had at any time been or were or should at any time during the appointed period be in the employment of any company of which the settlor was at the date of the deed a director, relatives of such employees, and such other persons as the settlor should from time to time name by a deed expressed to be supplemental to the deed of settlement, but so as to exclude the settlor or any wife of his from being included in any of the objects of the trust.

J. S. H. as parent and on behalf of G. J. C. H., a grandson of the settlor and an object of the trust, appealed under the provisions of section 27 (5) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, against an objection of the inspector of taxes to a claim for repayment of tax for the years 1949–50 and 1950–51 in respect of payments made to the grandson under the terms of the settlement:—

Held, (1) that the settlement created an imperative trust to distribute the trust fund among a class of objects which was unascertainable, and that accordingly, on the principle of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Broadway Cottages Trust; Same v. Sunnylands Trust, ante, p. 659, the trust was void for uncertainty;

(2) that in any event the trust was void as offending the rule against perpetuities, in that the application of the fund might be made "at such time or times" as the trustees thought fit, and that there was no ground for implying into the terms of the trust a provision that the trustees were under a duty to distribute within a reasonable period, which period could not extend to 21 years;

(3) that, accordingly, there was a resulting trust of income for the settlor; that the trust property reverted to the settlor and the income paid to the beneficiary was income of the settlor; and, accordingly, there was no right to claim reliefs.

Appeal by the Crown from a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

[Reported by J. A. Griffiths, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

The case stated set out the following facts: On February 26, 1952, John Savory Harrison as parent and on behalf of Giles John Chalmers Harrison [an infant] appealed under the provisions of section 27 (5) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, against an objection by the inspector of taxes to a claim for repayment of tax for the years 1949/50 and 1950/51 in respect of payments made to Giles John Chalmers Harrison under the terms of a deed of settlement dated May 1, 1949.

The settlement was made between Henry Rupert Hood Barrs, company director (hereinafter called "the settlor") of the one part and trustees therein named of the other part. The settlement provided, inter alia:—

"1. In this deed the following expressions shall have the "following respective meanings:—

"(a) 'The trustees' means and includes the first trustees "and the survivor of them and the trustees or trustee for the "time being of this deed.

"(b) 'The appointed period' means a period beginning on "April 6, 1949, and terminating on March 31, 1959, on the death "of the settlor (whichever shall be the earlier date).

"(c) 'Relatives of the settlor' means and includes all the "descendants of the settlor's grandparents (other than the settlor "himself) and the wives and husbands of such descendants (other "than any wife of the settlor).

"(d) 'Relatives' in relation to any person other than the "settlor means and includes all the descendants of such person's "grandparents (other than such person himself or herself) and "the wives and husbands of all such descendants (including any "wife or husband of such person himself or herself).

"(e) 'The objects of the trust' means and includes such of "the following individuals as shall from time to time during the "appointed period be living (that is to say):—

"(i) Relatives of the settlor (including in particular the lawful "children of the settlor's three daughters each child to receive not "less than £50 per annum): Stella Margaret Bickel, Christine "Mary Angela Harrison, and Heather Pauline Collings.

"(ii) Individuals who have at any time been or are at the date "of this deed or shall at any time during the appointed period be "in the employment of any company of which the settlor is at the "date of this deed or shall at any time during the appointed "period be a director (whether a managing director or otherwise).

"(iii) Relatives of the individuals mentioned in the last "preceding sub-paragraph.

"(iv) Such other individuals as the settlor shall from time to "time name by a deed expressed to be supplemental to these "presents PROVIDED ALWAYS that neither the settlor nor any wife "of his shall in any event be included in any of the objects of "the trust.

"(f) 'The trust fund' means the sums received by the "trustees under the covenant by the settlor hereinafter contained

"and all other moneys and property (if any) from time to time "subject to the trusts hereof.

"(g) 'Benefit' includes future benefit whether contingent or "not.

"2. The settlor hereby covenants with the trustees that during "the appointed period he the settlor will pay to the trustees the "monthly sum of £166 13s. 4d. [£2,000 per annum] without any "deduction except for income tax by equal monthly payments on "the last day of each calendar month the first of such payments "to be deemed to have become due on April 30, 1949, and to be "made on the execution hereof.

"3. The trustees shall pay or apply the trust fund to or for "the benefit of such one or more of the objects of the trust in such "shares (if more than one) at such time or times and in such "manner as the trustees in their discretion shall from time to "time think fit.

"4. The discretion hereby conferred on the trustees shall be an "absolute and uncontrolled discretion and may (if and so far as "circumstances permit) be exercised from time to time. . . ."

On March 28, 1950, in exercise of their powers under the deed the trustees paid to Giles John Chalmers Harrison, who was a grandchild of the settlor, the sum of £700 less tax at 9s. in the £ amounting to £315 resulting in a net sum paid of £385.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent: (i) That the deed was a settlement within the meaning of section 41 (4) (b) of the Finance Act, 1938; (ii) that the objects of the trust were sufficiently certain to enable it to be enforced, and that, accordingly, the respondent as parent of Giles John Chalmers Harrison was entitled to claim personal allowances.

It was contended on behalf of the inspector of taxes: (i) That the deed of May 1, 1949, was void for uncertainty; (ii) that the objection to the repayment claim made on behalf of the infant beneficiary Giles John Chalmers Harrison was properly made, as the deed being void for uncertainty there was a resulting trust of income in favour of the settlor; (iii) that the appeal failed, and that accordingly the trust property must revert to the settlor and that the income paid to the minor was income of the settlor and, accordingly, there was no right to claim reliefs.

The Special Commissioners, allowing the appeal, held that they did not consider themselves required or competent to decide whether the deed was void for uncertainty, that the deed for the purposes of the Finance Acts, 1936 and 1938, provided for payment of sums of money by the settlor to trustees and that the deed was a settlement as defined by those Acts and the recipients of those moneys from the trustees were entitled to claim repayment of personal allowances.

The Crown now appealed from this decision.

WYNN-PARRY J. The judgment in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Broadway Cottages Trust and Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Sunnylands Trust [1] covers this case also, but perhaps I ought shortly to state my views on the further point taken by the appellant in this case, namely that the trust in cl. 3 of the deed of May, 1949, offends against the rule against perpetuities because that clause provides that the application of the fund may be made "at such time or times" as the trustees may think fit: the trustees it is said cannot be compelled as to when they distribute; and further the objects of the power are not necessarily lives in being and there is nothing in the trust to confine the period to the lives of objects. If this is well taken, it is clear that the clause offends against the rule against perpetuities.

Mr. Wolfe in an endeavour to avoid this consequence submitted that I should read cl. 3 as carrying an implication that the trustees must distribute within a reasonable time, and that such a reasonable time could not extend to 21 years. I cannot accept this. Apart from the consequences of the application of the rule, there is no ground for implying any such qualification, and the fact that unless that implication is implied, the rule will apply, is no ground for making the implication.

Mr. Wolfe also contended that the case falls within the last example given by Parker J. in In re De Sommery,[2] where he said: "Lastly, where the settlor has used language from which "the court may fairly infer that he contemplated the creation, "not of a single power, but of two distinct powers, one of which "only is open to objection because of the rule against perpetuities, "the court will avoid the latter only and will give effect to the "power which is not open to this objection. Thus, although a "power vested in the trustees for the time being of a settlement "has, so far as I can discover, been uniformly looked on as a "single and indivisible power, it may be otherwise if the power "be limited to A and B or other the trustees of the settlement "for the time being. In this case the court may treat the "settlor as having created one power vested in A and B while "trustees, and a distinct power vested in their successors, in "which case the power vested in A and B would be open to "no objection on the ground of remoteness: Attenborough v. "Attenborough." [3]

Innes v. Harrison.

Wynn-Parry J.

I cannot see any room for the application of that last example in this case. It is true that the settlor defines Messrs. Wells and Stone as "the trustees" in the statement of the parties, but in cl. 1 (a) he enlarges the definition of "the trustees" and directs not only that it shall "include" but shall "mean" the two named persons to whom the draftsman is now constrained to refer as "the first trustees" and the survivor of and, not or, the trustees or trustee for the time being of the deed. It appears to me that the effect of that language is to create a single and indivisible trust and not two trusts, one in the first trustees and a second in future trustees.

I am therefore of the view that cl. 3 of the deed is void as offending against the rule against perpetuities.

In this case also, therefore, the appeal will be allowed.

* BUSHFORD v. FALCO.

[Plaint No. J. 716.]

Landlord and Tenant—Rent Restriction—Personal occupation—Shop and dwelling-house let together—Dwelling-house made uninhabitable owing to war damage and failure to repair—Occupation of dwelling-house abandoned—Shop still occupied—Whether any animus possidendi on part of tenant.

In 1943 a ground floor shop with living accommodation on the two floors above which had suffered war damage was relet to the original tenant at a reduced rent upon the terms that the top floor should not be used. The tenancy agreement imposed no obligation on either party to do repairs. The tenant and his wife lived on the first floor of the premises and carried on business in the shop. No repairs were done to the premises and they steadily deteriorated. In 1948 the tenant and his wife, without informing the landlord, ceased to live on the premises but the tenant continued to carry on his business in the shop. The landlord having determined the tenancy by notice to quit, in these proceedings claimed possession:—

Held, that the fact that the tenant left the premises owing to their condition was not of itself sufficient to entitle him to continue to claim the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts; that having left the residential part of the premises without informing the landlord or making any protest as to their unfitness for habitation, he must be deemed to have abandoned occupation; that he had not shown any animus possidendi; and that the landlord was accordingly entitled to possession.

Appeal from Judge Pugh sitting at Bloomsbury County Court.

In 1943 No. 3 Camden High Street, which consisted of a ground floor shop with residential accommodation on the first and second floor, suffered war damage. The plaintiff, Ernest Charles Bushford, the owner of the premises, by an agreement contained in a letter of June 24, 1943, agreed to let the premises to the defendant, Lewis Falco (who had previously been the tenant of the premises), at the reduced rent of £75, subject to the tenant not making use of the rooms on the top floor. No obligation was imposed on the landlord or on the tenant to repair. The tenant and his wife lived on the premises, carrying on business in the shop. In 1948 the premises having deteriorated owing to the fact that no repairs had been done, the tenant, without informing his landlord, ceased to live on the premises and went to live with his wife and family elsewhere in the neighbourhood. He continued to carry on his business in the shop. By notice to quit dated September 23, 1952, the landlord determined the tenancy on or before March 31, 1953. The tenant failed to give up possession and the landlord claimed possession. The tenant claimed to be entitled to the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts. The county court judge dismissed the proceedings holding that the tenant was entitled to the protection of the Acts.

The landlord appealed. The facts are more fully stated in the judgment of Evershed M.R.

EVERSHED M.R. This was an action for possession of certain premises known as No. 3 Camden High Street, in London. The premises at the time of the relevant letting consisted of dwelling accommodation above the ground floor and a shop on the ground floor. It appears that the tenant had carried on a greengrocer's business in the shop for (as he said) as much as 30 years past. There was before us a written agreement dated February 27, 1937, for letting these premises by the landlord to the tenant for three years at a rent of £205 per annum, and containing an obligation on the tenant's part to repair. In the early part of the war the premises were damaged by enemy action and a new letting then supervened, the terms of which were contained in a letter dated June 24, 1943, written on behalf of the landlord to the tenant in these terms: "3, Camden High Street. With reference to our "recent interview with Mrs. Falco and our subsequent conver-"sation with your solicitor, Mr. Emmanuel, we confirm that your "landlord, Mr. E. C. Bushford, is prepared to accept the sum "of £75 per annum for the rent of the above premises, exclusive "of rates and subject to your not making use of the rooms on "the top floor, the rent to be payable by monthly instalments "of £6 5s. 0d. on the first day of every month. When these "rooms have been renovated and made fit for occupation and "use, the rent will be increased to £104 per annum (exclusive). "These terms are on the understanding that the rent from April 1 "last, amounting to £18 15s. 0d. is paid by Monday next, the 29th "instant. We understand from Mr. Emmanuel that you will "agree to do this on hearing from us with the terms."

As is apparent from that letter no obligation was imposed on either side to do repairs. It was also apparent that the top floor of the premises was then uninhabitable, and the tenant agreed that he would not occupy that floor, though the letter obviously contained an intimation that, in the mind of the writers, it would be restored or renovated in due course, in which event the rent would increase from £75 to £104.

The tenant and his wife proceeded to enter and live upon the first floor of the premises (which were, I gather, already dilapidated); and the condition of that first floor became progressively worse and worse until some date in or about 1948 or 1949, when the tenant and his wife departed. I say "in or about 1948 or "1949" because it is a striking and significant feature of the case that they left without apparently making any intimation, protest or other communication to or with the landlord.

The judge came to the conclusion, in the circumstances, that the landlord was not entitled to an order for possession: that the tenant, having "involuntarily" left, had not lost his rights under the Rent Restrictions legislation.

As I read his judgment, the county court judge thought that because the tenant had left the premises "involuntarily," that circumstance was, in effect, conclusive in his favour. According to the brief note of his judgment: "Tenant did not go out volun-"tarily either in fact or in law—he was forced out by circum-"stances, i.e., by the condition of [the] premises—I must hold "that the tenants retain protection, otherwise landlords could "let premises fall into a bad state of repair and thereby deprive "tenants of the protection of the Acts. . . ." Taking that view, the judge did not find as a fact that ever since his removal from

No. 3 Camden High Street, the tenant intended to return; had, that is to say, an animus revertendi or animus possidendi.

With all respect to the judge, I think his view was an over-simplification of the matter. No doubt, if a tenant is forced to leave his home by some sudden calamity, he will prima facie be regarded as doing so as a temporary expedient, meaning and intending to return as soon as possible. This will be, for example, the natural conclusion if he is compelled to leave because he is sent to prison for three months or because his house is invaded by the waters of a flood. But even so, if the absence is long, the conclusion is not inevitable. The tenant may change his mind and come to prefer a new abode. If the absence from the original home be long, the onus, according to the classic judgment of Asquith L.J. in Brown v. Brash,[1] is upon the tenant; though the circumstances may make the onus easy for him to discharge.

Moreover, in the present case the departure of the tenant was not occasioned by any sudden catastrophe. The premises were from 1943 (when the tenancy must be taken to have begun) till 1948 or 1949 (when the tenant left) in a greatly dilapidated condition. I asssume that they progressively deteriorated until the time came when the tenant and his wife, having found alternative accommodation, concluded that continued residence at No. 3 Camden High Street was no longer to be borne. At least there is no evidence to rebut what would appear, inevitably, to have been the natural course of events; and for that the tenant must be taken to be to blame; for not only did he not give any such evidence at the trial but (as the judge emphasized) he and his wife left without any communication, by way of protest or affirmation of intention to return, to the landlord. If, then, the word "involuntary" is appropriately used at all, it must be, at least, subject to qualification.

In my judgment, therefore, the fact that the tenant's departure from No. 3 Camden High Street, was attributable to the condition of the premises is not of itself sufficient to support a conclusion in his favour. As I have said, the judge did not find a continuing intention to resume occupation when the premises had been rendered fit. It is therefore necessary to look at the evidence so far as recorded in the judge's notes; and although it may well be in such cases as the present that the court should not be slow to find the onus discharged, I am unable to find or infer that the tenant here discharged it. It is true that length of absence of itself will not by any means be fatal to the tenant; and it is true also that in this case the tenant continued to pay, and the landlord to receive, the full rent— although it is plain that the tenant's main concern was and is with the business which he has for very many years carried on upon the ground floor. But the oral evidence on the tenant's side consisted of these answers on his part and that of his wife. The tenant in cross-examination said: "We took over accommodation a few yards round the corner. "When shop was offered to me"—and that refers to the offer of a shop in Mornington Crescent—"I was content to go on living "where I was. I was quite comfortable where I was living." In re-examination, he said: "I am living round the corner. Very "convenient. I have two lodgers. It would be more convenient "if I lived over the shop."

The tenant's wife said in chief: "We offered him a little bit "more if he would do up the place. He said that was not "enough." In cross-examination, she said: "We wanted to "stay on until new premises built. We have been in present "place five/six years with family. It is comfortable. Rather "be on top of shop. Easier for me. He promised to put a "shop window at house in Mornington Crescent. I did not want "to go on living there"—that is, at 3 Camden High Street—"in the unfit state it is at present. I should like shop and "premises to be remodelled and then go back and live over "the shop." In re-examination, she said: "If the premises "had not deteriorated I would not have left."

In my judgment the inevitable inference from these answers is that the tenant is perfectly contented and established where he is now living and has no more than the idea or belief in his mind that if and when, if ever, No. 3 Camden High Street were sufficiently repaired or renovated he would find it more convenient for his business to live there (over the shop) than where he now is. In my judgment this is plainly not enough. If it were otherwise, then, so far as I can see, a state of permanent stalemate (as Denning L.J. observed) would in this case be achieved. The landlord is under no obligation and does not intend to repair: the tenant, likewise under no obligation, appears to have no expectation that the landlord will repair and has shown no sense of urgency or grievance. I attach, as did the judge, considerable significance to the fact that the tenant departed without any communication then or thereafter (until the present proceedings were imminent) with the landlord—a circumstance all the more remarkable having regard to the natural inference (as I think) of the terms of the letter of June 24, 1943.

In my judgment, therefore, the appeal must succeed and the landlord should have obtained an order for possession on the ground that the tenant had not explained what must, on the facts, be otherwise taken as an abandonment of occupation; that he had not shown any animus possidendi, even if the few items of furniture and clothing could otherwise constitute a corpus possessionis.

For my part I have some sympathy with the tenant who will lose the place in which he has for so long carried on his business. And I desire to add—having regard to the fears expressed by the judge—that my conclusion on the special facts of this case should in no circumstances be regarded as an authoritative encouragement to landlords to achieve an escape from the Rent Acts by the simple expedient of inactivity in the matter of repairs. As I have said, where a tenant is for practical purposes forced to leave his home by reason of lack of repairs, he should have little difficulty, if such be the fact, in proving that his departure is regarded by him as an unwelcome and temporary removal; and to that end will normally so inform his landlord in no uncertain terms on the occasion of his going. In such a case, even if the landlord is under no contractual obligation to repair and cannot be compelled by statute to do so, he should be left with the realization that he cannot hope to make his passivity the means of getting an order for possession.

DENNING L.J. It would be strange if the tenant here were held to be protected; because it would mean that the dwelling-house would be rendered forever sterile. The tenant cannot live in it because it is not fit for human habitation. The landlord cannot pull it down and rebuild because he cannot get possession. The only people who could end the stalemate would be the local authority by exercising their powers under sections 9 and 12 of the Housing Act, 1936. They could do one of two things: they could either direct the landlord to make the place fit: or they could make a closing order. But there is no sign of their doing either.

In my opinion, however, there is no such stalemate, because in the special circumstances of this case the tenant is not protected. He left the dwelling-house without a word to the landlord. He never protested to anyone about its unfitness. He has been gone so long that he can no longer be credited with an intention to make it his home. He is therefore not protected by the Acts. It would have been very different if he had complained of its unfitness and shown some desire to go back once it was made fit.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER L.J. I agree so fully with the judgments which my brethren have delivered that there is nothing I myself can usefully add.

Appeal allowed.

Lord Goddard C.J., Hilbery and Pearce JJ.

* REGINA v. SEYMOUR.

Criminal Law—Larceny—Receiving—Alternative counts—Indictment—Evidence consistent with either—Both counts to be included in indictment—Jury to be discharged from giving verdict on alternative count—Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (7 Edw. 7, c. 23), s. 5 (2).

In cases where the evidence is as consistent with stealing as with receiving, the indictment ought to contain a count both for stealing and receiving. The jury should then be directed that it is for them to come to the conclusion whether the accused was the thief or whether he received the property from the thief and they should be reminded that a man cannot receive from himself. Having found the accused guilty of one offence, they should then be discharged from giving a verdict on the alternative count.

Appeal against conviction.

The appellant, Alfred James Seymour, was charged at Reading Quarter Sessions on January 19, 1954, on an indictment containing one count of receiving a single-barrel shotgun knowing it to have been stolen. He was convicted and sentenced to three years' imprisonment.

The ground of appeal was that the evidence against the appellant was only consistent with his having stolen the gun and, there being no count charging him with stealing, he was entitled to be acquitted.

Leo Clark for the appellant.
K. G. I. Jones for the Crown.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment, the following case was cited in argument: Regina v. *Langmead.

Lord Goddard C.J. There is a tendency nowadays where there is no positive evidence that a man stole goods, that is to say, no evidence of seeing him go into a shop or of running away or of finding his fingerprints, but he is found in possession of stolen property shortly after it was stolen so that it can be fairly said that he is in recent possession, to think that that only justifies a verdict of receiving and not of stealing. We tried to correct that view in Rex v. Loughlin,[1] the headnote to which reads: "Where it is proved that premises have been broken into and "property stolen therefrom, and that very soon after the breaking "the prisoner has been found in possession of that property, it is "open to the jury to find the prisoner guilty of breaking and "entering, and the jury should be so directed." The jury in that case had been directed that they should only find the accused guilty of receiving, and so we quashed the conviction. Similarly, where it is proved that property has been stolen and that very soon after the stealing the accused has been found in possession of the property, it is open to the jury to find the accused guilty of stealing, and the jury should be so directed.

It is necessary in these receiving cases that it should be explained to the jury that, if the charge against a man is one of receiving, they must be satisfied that he received the property from somebody else. It may very likely be that it cannot be said who the other person was because the thief is not known. For instance, supposing some stolen property is found in the possession of a shopkeeper who deals in that particular property, the jury are entitled to say, "He did not steal the property himself; "but we think he is a 'fence'; he deals in that type of pro-"perty": perhaps he is a jeweller of not unimpeachable character; he is in possession of the property and the jury are entitled to think he has bought the property from the thief. But there are a great many cases where I do not think anybody could have any doubt that the person found in possession of the property was the thief; but if he is the thief he cannot be found guilty of receiving because a man cannot receive from himself.

In the present case, for some reason or another the indictment only charged the appellant with receiving. The evidence was that on November 7 or 8, 1953, a Belgian folding gun was stolen from a hut on an allotment. The next thing known about that gun was that it was in the possession of the appellant a few days after the theft, within such a time that the doctrine of recent possession could be applied to it. The evidence was overwhelming that the gun stolen was the one found in the appellant's possession. Mr. Clark, in his address to the jury, suggested that they might come to the conclusion that the appellant was the thief; but that if he was the thief they could not find him Guilty on this indictment, which charged him only with receiving.

In my opinion the right verdict in this case would have been one of larceny, but the recorder, having put Mr. Clark's case to the jury, said: "Well, members of the jury, there is no evidence "before you that he stole the gun, except, maybe, that it was in "his possession. He was not seen near the premises, and what is "more, of course, you are entitled to take at its face value the "statement that he made to Mr. Green, that his stepson had "received it"—the statement he had made to Mr. Green was that his stepson had received another gun altogether, not the folding gun. Then he went on: "As there has been no explana-"tion by the prisoner of how he came by that stolen gun, you "will probably have little difficulty in drawing the inference that "he knew, when that gun came into his possession, that it was "stolen property." That is simply a direction and a quite proper direction, as far as it goes on receiving and not stealing at all.

The court desires to lay this down: In cases where the evidence is as consistent with stealing as with receiving, the indictment ought to contain a count both for stealing and for receiving. The jury should then be directed that it is for them to come to the conclusion whether the accused was the thief or whether he received the property from the thief, and they should be reminded that a man cannot receive from himself. Then, to prevent other difficulties which have sometimes arisen, if the jury come to the conclusion that it is a case of receiving, they should be discharged from giving a verdict on the stealing count. Equally, if they come to the conclusion that it is stealing, they should be discharged from giving a verdict on the receiving count. Sometimes we have had to quash a conviction, say, for receiving because the court has come to the conclusion that the evidence showed that the offence committed was stealing and not receiving. If a verdict has been returned on the stealing count, this court cannot substitute for the verdict of receiving a verdict of stealing, as it can under section 5 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, if the jury have been discharged from giving a verdict on the stealing count. In the present case we cannot alter the verdict from receiving to stealing because there was no charge of stealing in the indictment.

This question came before this court, in addition to Loughlin's case,[2] in Rex v. Christ.[3] It is much better as a rule to put into these indictments both counts, although as the case develops, it may become one either of stealing or receiving. In Regina v. Eden and Melvin[4] this court was put into a grave difficulty. In that case there had been a serious burglary, and the appellants were caught with a lorry in which was the stolen property. For some reason or another, the jury found them Not Guilty of stealing, but Guilty of receiving. The evidence was that the prisoners stole the property, but we could not alter the verdict because of the verdict on the stealing count. In the present case, although it is a pity that a guilty man should escape the consequences of his crime, the conviction must be quashed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE WEST AFRICAN COURT OF APPEAL.

West Africa (Nigeria)—Company—Winding up—Voluntary—Proposed reconstruction—One-man company—Nominee liquidator—Order for compulsory winding up—Evidence of creditors shut out—Discretion not properly exercised—Companies Ordinance (Laws of Nigeria, 1948, c. 38), ss. 132 (2), 140.

Company—Winding up.

A limited company incorporated under the laws of Nigeria resolved that it should be wound up voluntarily (with a view to reconstruction), and appointed as liquidator the appellant, who thereafter filed a motion for an order that he might be at liberty to convene meetings of creditors for the purpose of discussing and approving a scheme for reconstruction. Before that motion was disposed of the Official Receiver, the respondent, presented a petition praying that the company should be wound up by the court under section 132 (2) of the Companies Ordinance, c. 38 of the Laws of Nigeria, 1948. The appellant had in the meantime applied for subpoenas on a number of persons whom he wished to call as witnesses and filed a number of affidavits of creditors who were prepared to give evidence. On the hearing of the petition it was stated by the judge that the company was virtually a one-man company and that the appellant was the nominee of the shareholder who had complete control of the company; that no fraud was alleged by the Official Receiver, but that it would be contrary to public interest and against the interest of creditors generally to allow a company to continue a voluntary winding up in those circumstances; and that he saw no reason to call evidence. He accordingly ordered the company to be compulsorily wound up. On appeal by the liquidator:—

Held, that it did not necessarily follow that, because a company was controlled by one shareholder of whom a liquidator in a voluntary liquidation might be regarded as the nominee, a voluntary winding up could not be continued with due regard to the interests of the creditors. In the light of sections 132 (2) and 140 of the Companies Ordinance and in the circumstances of the present case the wishes of the creditors were relevant matter for consideration, and the liquidator should have been allowed to lead the evidence which he desired to call and, he having been refused that opportunity, it could not be said that the trial judge was in a position properly to exercise a discretion to order a compulsory winding up, and there would be a re-trial of the petition.

In re Medical Battery Company [1894] 1 Ch. 444 distinguished on the ground that the liquidator in that case was clearly not in a position to act impartially in the interests of unsecured creditors.

Adebayo
v.
Official Receiver

Appeal (No. 35 of 1953) from a judgment of the West African Court of Appeal, sitting at Lagos (May 18, 1953), affirming in part a judgment of the Supreme Court of Nigeria (Lagos Judicial Division) (February 6, 1953).

The following facts are taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee: This appeal arose out of the liquidation of a company under the Companies Ordinance, chapter 38 of the Laws of Nigeria, 1948. The Nigerian Farmers and Commercial Bank Ld. was a limited liability company incorporated under the laws of Nigeria and having its registered office in Lagos. By extraordinary resolutions passed at an extraordinary general meeting held on December 12, 1952, it was resolved: "(1) That the "Nigerian Farmers and Commercial Bank Ld. cannot, by reason "of its liabilities and other difficulties, continue its business and "that it is advisable to wind up the same and that the company "be wound up voluntarily accordingly. (2) That Mr. John "Adebayo, English accountant of No. 4, Coates Street, Ebute "Metta, Nigeria, and Mr. Charles D. Gairdner, chartered account-"ant, of No. 23, Lawrence Lane, London, W.C.2, be and they "are hereby appointed liquidators of the company to conduct the "winding up."

Mr. Adebayo was appointed to act in respect of the assets of the company in Nigeria, and Mr. Gairdner, in respect of the assets in the United Kingdom.

At the statutory meeting of creditors held on December 29, a Mr. Akintola Williams, chartered accountant, was appointed as joint liquidator in place of Mr. Gairdner. Mr. Williams subsequently declined to act. At the same meeting a further resolution was passed that "Whereas it is the opinion of the majority of the "creditors that the said bank should be reconstructed and that it "should resume normal business and that a compromise be "arrived at for the benefit of creditors. Be it resolved therefore "that the aforesaid Nigerian Farmers and Commercial Bank Ld. "in liquidation be reconstructed and that Mr. John Adebayo of "4, Coates Street, Ebutte Metta, and Akintola Williams, char-"tered accountant, liquidators are hereby instructed to convene "special meeting according to law for the purpose of discussing "and approving the scheme of reconstruction and compromise."

A protest was recorded by a Mr. A. M. Ferguson, who represented a number of creditors who had forwarded bills for collection by the bank, on the ground that the minute did not accord with the provisions of section 181 (2) of the Ordinance and was ultra vires, and that the vote was not properly conducted in that creditors by number and value were not identified.

On December 31, 1952, the appellant (hereafter referred to as the liquidator) filed a motion for an order that he might be at liberty to convene meetings of creditors for the purpose of discussing and approving a scheme or schemes of arrangement (reconstruction) and compromise to be drawn up, and that directions be given as to the method of convening the meeting and for any further order or orders.

Before that motion was disposed of the Official Receiver (the respondent in this appeal) presented a petition to the court praying that for reasons set out therein the bank should be wound up by the court under section 132 (2) of the Companies Ordinance, that the petitioner be appointed liquidator and that Mr. Adebayo be ordered to hand over all books, papers and other documents in his possession relating to the affairs of the company, together with an account of his dealings with the affairs of the company since the date of his appointment. That petition was accompanied by an affidavit of the Official Receiver and various annexures, including a letter dated January 9, 1953, received by the Official Receiver from Mr. Ferguson.

After sundry procedure the motion of the liquidator of December 31, 1952, and the petition of the Official Receiver came up for further hearing on February 4, 1953. In the meantime the liquidator had filed a counter-affidavit and had applied for subpoenas on 36 persons whom he wished to call as witnesses, and filed a number of affidavits of creditors who were prepared to give evidence.

At the hearing on February 4 before Gregg J. counsel for the liquidator asked for an adjournment to hear witnesses, and stated that the whole purpose of the voluntary liquidation was reconstruction. He also stated that he wished Mr. Ferguson to be called. Counsel for the Official Receiver supported his petition and opposed an adjournment. Gregg J. adjourned the petition to February 6, stating that he would give his decision on whether evidence would be taken in this matter or whether the Official Receiver's petition would be granted forthwith on that date.

A motion for the liquidator for leave to appeal against that order was made and refused on February 6. On the same date the judge gave his decision on the adjourned petition. He stated in his judgment that there was no denial of three important averments made by the Official Receiver in his petition. Those were (1) That the directors of the company were Mr. Adebayo Shobayo Olumuyiwa Coker and Mr. Tijani Afolabi Adeosun; (2) that the issued capital of the company was £25,194 made up of 500 preference shares and 24,694 ordinary shares; (3) that Mr. Coker held the whole of the 500 issued preference shares and 24,455 of the 24,694 ordinary shares.

That last averment meant, he said, that the company was virtually a one-man company and that the liquidator was the nominee of Mr. Coker who had complete control of the company. "On these facts," he added, "which are in themselves sufficient, "in my opinion, to justify a winding up by the court, I see no "reason to call evidence; and that being so I do not think it "necessary to allow evidence to be called in relation to other "matters. . . . No fraud is alleged by the Official Receiver;

"but in my opinion it would be contrary to public interest and "against the interest of creditors generally to allow a company "to continue a voluntary winding up under the circumstances "mentioned." He accordingly ordered the company to be wound up by the court.

Against that judgment an appeal was taken by the liquidator to the West African Court of Appeal (Foster Sutton P., Verity C.J. (Nigeria) and Coussey J.A.). The judgment of the court was given on May 18, 1953, dismissing the appeal on the only point with which the present appeal was concerned, viz., the order for a compulsory winding up. Foster Sutton P., who delivered the judgment of the court, said that it was a well-settled principle that the court would not interfere with an exercise of discretion, as this was, by a lower court unless it had proceeded upon a manifestly wrong ground. In his view the grounds stated by the trial judge were sufficient to entitle him to exercise his discretion in favour of making a compulsory order. He referred to In re Medical Battery Co.[1] as illustrating an order made by Vaughan Williams J. on similar grounds. From that judgment the present appeal was taken.

April 6. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord Keith of Avonholm, who stated the facts set out above, and continued: The proper procedure was for an application to be made to the court for the appointment of Mr. Williams as joint liquidator, but as he subsequently declined to act, and as this matter does not enter into the appeal, their Lordships make no further reference to it.

Their Lordships have arrived at the conclusion, looking to the procedure followed before the trial judge, that the judgments of the Court of Appeal and of the trial judge cannot stand. In their Lordships' opinion the liquidator should have been allowed to lead the evidence which he desired to call and, he having been refused that opportunity, it cannot be said that the trial judge was in a position properly to exercise a discretion to order a compulsory winding up.

Section 132 (2) of the Companies Ordinance is as follows: "Where a company is being wound up voluntarily or subject to "supervision, a petition may be presented by the Official Receiver "attached to the court, as well as by any other person authorized "in that behalf under the other provisions of this section, but "the court shall not make a winding-up order on the petition "unless it is satisfied that the voluntary winding up or winding "up subject to supervision cannot be continued with due regard "to the interests of the creditors or contributories." Reference should also be made to section 140 which reads: "The court may, "as to all matters relating to a winding up, have regard to the "wishes of the creditors or contributories as proved to it by any "sufficient evidence."

In the light of these sections and in the circumstances of the present case it appears to their Lordships that the wishes of the creditors were relevant matter for consideration. It was said that the evidence was intended only to prove a desire by the creditors for reconstruction of the company. Even if this be so, it seems to their Lordships to be immaterial, as the creditors may still prefer reconstruction to be carried out under a voluntary winding up. There may also be other matters arising out of the affidavit and counter-affidavit on which the Official Receiver or the liquidator may wish to lead evidence, including the position of Mr. Ferguson. Their Lordships would leave this entirely open to the parties.

With regard to the ground of judgment on which both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal proceeded, their Lordships would point out that it does not necessarily follow that, because a company is controlled by one shareholder and a liquidator in a voluntary liquidation may be regarded as a nominee of that shareholder, a voluntary winding up cannot be continued with due regard to the interests of the creditors. In In re Medical Battery Co.[1] there were circumstances clearly sufficient to disqualify the liquidator from acting as an independent party. The control of the company and of the debenture holders was in the hands of the managing director and his family, and the liquidator was also receiver for the debenture holders. In these circumstances he was not in a position to act impartially in the interests of the unsecured creditors. Their Lordships do not find it necessary to enter more fully into this aspect of the present case or to examine the other authorities cited on this point, as any question of prejudice to creditors will have to be considered anew in the light of all the evidence which may be made available at a new trial.

A question was raised whether the wishes of creditors should not be ascertained by meeting directed under section 209 of the Adebayo v. Official Receiver of Nigeria.

Ordinance. That is not, in their Lordships' opinion, a matter on which they should give any direction. The question will, if raised, have to be considered by the judge who takes the retrial.

In these circumstances their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to allow the appeal, to set aside the orders of the Court of Appeal and of Gregg J., and to order a retrial of the petition. The respondent must pay the costs of this appeal and of the hearing in the West African Court of Appeal. The costs of the hearing before Gregg J. shall abide the decision on the retrial.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Practice and Procedure—Medical report—Agreed report—Attempt to agree—Plaintiff's reports submitted to defendants at defendants' request—Implied understanding for defendants to reciprocate.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants to operate an electric mincing machine in one of the defendants' canteens. In April, 1950, she fell from a chair on which she was standing while operating the machine and sustained injuries. She sued her employers for damages for personal injuries, alleging negligence.

At the summons for directions under R.S.C., Ord. 30, the usual order was made that unless a medical report be agreed between the parties medical evidence be limited to two witnesses on each side. The report was not agreed.

F. W. Beney Q.C. and L. I. Stranger-Jones for the plaintiff. In response to requests by the defendants' solicitors, and in an attempt to obtain an agreed report, the plaintiff's solicitors made their medical reports available to the defendants' solicitors, but the defendants' solicitors refused to show the plaintiff's solicitors copies of the medical reports obtained by the defendants.

R. Marven Everett Q.C. and H. Tudor Evans for the defendants. The sending of a medical report does not imply an obligation upon the recipient to exchange his own report. It is sent in the hope that it will be agreed and so the party on whose behalf it is sent will be allowed to discharge the onus of proof upon him without calling medical witnesses. Parties should not be penalized because their advisers have bona fide refused to discuss the medical evidence because they consider medical evidence should be called.

DENNING L.J. A question has arisen as to what should happen when one party gives the other a copy of his medical report. Is there any obligation on the other to reciprocate and also show his report? That must depend on the arrangements made at the time, but in the ordinary case where one party, usually the defendant, intimates that he would like to see the plaintiff's medical reports for the sake of attempting to agree them, I am clearly of the opinion that there is an implied understanding that the defendants shall in their turn duly show the plaintiff their medical reports. It would be most unfair that one side should disclose his medical reports and that the other side should not.

There is no suggestion of any intention to act improperly in this case; quite the reverse. Indeed, the solicitor for the defendants, when he refused to disclose his own medical reports, added an undertaking of his own that the defendants would not make use of the information that they had received from the plaintiff. That was done in a praiseworthy endeavour to act quite fairly; but there was nothing to compel the defendants to give such an undertaking and it does not affect the position. The proper course to adopt, if one side produces his medical reports for inspection, is for the other side to reciprocate and do the same. If the reports are agreed, they can be used by the court at the trial and the medical witnesses need not be called. If the reports are not agreed then the medical witnesses must be called. Sometimes the medical reports contain matters which go outside the strict medical issues, such as introductory matters, or a history of the case. When the parties make an attempt to agree, there is no need to include such matters. The medical reports can be confined to the medical issues strictly so called.

I would add that there is no legal duty on the parties under this form of order to attempt to agree. It is a matter for the discretion of their legal advisers. It is to be hoped that in most cases they will attempt to agree for the sake of saving costs and the time of the doctors; but in a serious case it is often of great help to the court to see the medical men themselves.

In this case I think that the defendants ought to have produced their medical reports beforehand, but I will, in the course of the trial, make sure that no prejudice is suffered by the plaintiff by that omission.

Practice and Procedure—Consolidation of actions—Personal injuries—Order for consolidation on issue of liability—Right of plaintiffs to separate representation preserved—Order for costs for solicitors appearing without counsel—R.S.C. Ord. 49, r. 8.

Eight legally aided plaintiffs claiming damages arising from an accident in a pressure chamber during mining operations under the sea issued separate writs against three defendants, who were respectively the contractors employing the workmen killed or injured in the accident, a firm of technical consultants to the occupiers, and the occupiers, the National Coal Board. The defendants applied to the master in chambers for an order for consolidation and trial of all the actions together, and the master made that order, providing that one statement of claim should be delivered on behalf of one of the plaintiffs, to include the special damages of each of the other plaintiffs, with separate issues as to damages. On appeal from that order by one of the plaintiffs, the judge in chambers set it aside and ordered that the action of another plaintiff be tried first as a test action, all the other actions to be stayed meanwhile. On appeal by the technical consultants from that order:—

Ordered, with consent of all the parties, that all the actions should be consolidated until determination of liability, with liberty to each plaintiff to apply in the consolidated action for separate representation if any question arose which appeared to put him or her in a position different from the other plaintiffs; that particulars as to injuries and damage of each plaintiff should be delivered with the consolidated statement of claim; that if the plaintiff succeeded in the consolidated action against any or all of the defendants, the court should fix a date to determine the quantum of damages for each plaintiff, in respect of which each might be separately represented; and that the costs of the appeal should be costs in the cause, and should include special allowances for solicitors attending without counsel.

Order of Gerrard J. varied.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL from order of Gerrard J.

On July 4, 1952, eight workmen employed by contractors, A. Waddington & Sons Ld., the first defendants, were carrying out contract work at the Point of Ayr Colliery for the occupiers, the National Coal Board, the third defendants, to whom the second defendants, C. A. Allot & Son, were technical engineering consultants. The work, which consisted in pushing a seam out under the sea, was being done in a sealed pressure chamber, when an accident occurred, resulting in the death of six of the workmen and injuries to the other two. The widows of the six men killed and the two injured workmen issued separate writs against all three defendants, claiming damages in respect of the accident. Four of the plaintiffs were represented by one firm of solicitors, and the other four by four other firms of solicitors.

The defendants applied to Master Baker in chambers for an order that all the actions should be consolidated and tried together; and on January 12, 1954, the master made an order to that effect, providing "that there be one statement of claim "to be delivered by Messrs. Rhys Roberts & Co. on behalf of the "plaintiff (Dorothy May) Hill, to include the special damages of "each plaintiff; and that there be separate issues as to damages."

One of the plaintiffs, William Healey, appealed from that order to the judge in chambers, and on that hearing, on February 5, 1954, the other plaintiffs supported Healey in contending that it would be preferable not to have the actions consolidated. Gerrard J. thereupon ordered that one of the actions, that of the plaintiff Joyce Marion McPartland, in which all the possible issues on liability appeared to arise, should be tried first as a test action, and that all the other actions be stayed meanwhile. The judge gave leave to the defendants to appeal from that order.

The second defendants appealed. The National Coal Board was represented on the appeal and counsel for the second defendants stated that though the first defendants did not appear they supported his appeal.

Gilbert Paull Q.C. and Stephen Chapman for the second defendants. The master's order for consolidation was the correct order. There will be a lengthy trial on the issue of liability, with many facts in dispute, and a number of technical witnesses on the question of causation. There is nothing in the order of Gerrard J. requiring that the other plaintiffs shall be bound by the decision in the test action. The second defendants, who say that they are not liable, are in consequence much perturbed at the possibility of eight separate trials on the issue of liability, possibly at different times and in different places, with different judges trying the issue as to quantum. That might result in an enormous increase in costs. It is desirable if possible to avoid such a contingency, though it is conceded that the right of each plaintiff to be represented by counsel of his or her own choosing on the issue crucial to them, namely, that of damages, must be preserved. R.S.C. Ord. 49, r. 8, provides: "Causes or matters pending in the "same division may be consolidated by order of the court or "a judge in the manner in use immediately before November 1, "1875, in the Superior Courts of Common Law"; and the note in the Annual Practice (1954 ed. at p. 875) on "Con-"solidation of Actions for Personal Injuries" reads: "In Brady "v. McDonald [1] the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland consoli-"dated two actions for personal injuries by different plaintiffs "against the same defendant, directing that there should be "separate issues as to damages, and making a special order as "to costs." In that case the court said that it would be right and proper on the separate issue of damages for separate counsel to appear for each plaintiff; though, if the proper order in the present case is for consolidation, the plaintiffs might have to be

1954
Healey
v.
A. Waddington & Sons Ld.

content with one counsel putting forward the issues on liability for all of them.

The effect of the order and the note is that the actions should be tried as one action, with one set of pleadings and particulars, one setting down for trial, and one solicitor in charge; and if liability is found against the defendants or any of them, each plaintiff will then be entitled by separate counsel to call any evidence or to address the court on the quantum of damages. That will preserve the plaintiffs' rights, and also do justice to the defendants.

The procedure here asked for has frequently been followed in Admiralty actions on claims for damages for salvage, when everyone who can assist the plaintiff comes into court. That has been done without consent and indeed in the face of opposition. But in neither the Queen's Bench Division nor in the Chancery Division is any authority discoverable for a consolidation order being made or refused in similar circumstances. The matter is wrapped in mystery, though counsel has been informed that an order for consolidation is often made by masters against the wishes of plaintiffs.

[Singleton L.J. There has always been a division of opinion on the point. The general principle is that provided there is adequate protection for the plaintiff there should be consolidation.]

In a consolidated action costs follow the event, and the master has a discretion to allow reasonable costs. As a result of what this court might say, it may be considered reasonable to allow as part of the costs of the action any communication between the solicitors acting for the other seven plaintiffs and the solicitor who puts the figures on the record.

[Jenkins L.J. Compromise arrangements are sometimes made directing that all the actions shall appear in the list on the same day; they are all called on together; everyone hears what is said on liability; and then the individual cases are proceeded with.]

But that would not prevent eight sets of costs running at the same time, with eight counsel being briefed in the whole case, and eight sets of every document, whether necessary or not.

A further possibility arises that different obligations may be owed by the different defendants to different plaintiffs under various statutes, or that there might be a defence available against one plaintiff which is not available against another. That would not necessarily emerge in a test action, but would be brought out clearly in the one consolidated statement of claim. Although it is too early in the present proceedings to know whether that possibility will materialize, it should be a matter for consideration on this appeal.

[Singleton L.J. Unless it is known that the issues are the same, an order for consolidation should not be asked for.]

That was the position under the old order; but now, provided that there are common facts, orders for consolidation are made even if the issues are entirely different: see per Scrutton L.J. on joinder of parties and causes of action in Bailey v. Marchioness Curzon of Kedleston; Same v. Duggan,[2] where the causes of action were entirely different.

The appellants would be content to have the actions consolidated up to the point of trial. Before the judge in chambers the chief objection to the consolidation order was that there is no provision in the Legal Aid Act, 1949, and the regulations made thereunder, for such a course, and the plaintiffs are all now legally aided. It would be a strange result if legal aid required eight different actions and eight sets of costs. Moreover, the second defendants would have little chance of recovering costs from the plaintiffs if they were successful.

[JENKINS L.J. Is it not one of the rules that the court shall have no regard to legal aid on the question of costs?]

Yes.

The judge selected a particular action as the test action, because it appeared to be the strongest case on the issue of liability. There is no justification for such a choice, for it may do injustice to the defendants.

The present appellants ask for an order that the question of liability be determined first in an action consolidated for that purpose only; that particulars of damages as claimed by each plaintiff be delivered at the same time as the consolidated statement of claim; and that each separate issue of damages be determined by the trial judge one after the other.

Kenneth G. Jupp for the plaintiff Healey. Gerrard J. chose the particular test action not only because it appeared to raise every possible issue on liability but also because the solicitors for that plaintiff also represented three of the other plaintiffs. The result of consolidation, so far as costs are concerned, will be no different from that of a test action. Even on a consolidated action each plaintiff is entitled to be separately represented.

Counsel present for the plaintiffs before Gerrard J. understood his order as intending that all the other actions should be stayed meanwhile and that no costs would run in respect of them until the test action was decided; that if the plaintiff failed in the test action, the other plaintiffs would fail also unless the judge made an order that the test action had not been a proper trial of the other actions. That procedure might ultimately save costs.

If the actions are consolidated the plaintiffs will have to be satisfied that if there is any differentiation between them on the issue of liability it shall be brought out clearly in the one action.

One of the grounds on which consolidation is allowed is that of convenience. There may be a question of interpretation of the Legal Aid Act and the regulations on how solicitors may appear and be paid 85 per cent. of their costs out of the fund. The certificates now outstanding would have to be revoked and other certificates issued. If solicitors incur any costs on behalf of any plaintiff other than their own, they may not be able to recover those from the fund in so far as they affect the other seven plaintiffs. Therefore, it is submitted, a test action is more suitable and convenient.

Michael Parker for the plaintiff Thompson. The balance of convenience is on the side of a test action and against consolidation.

[Singleton L.J. There is much to be said for the principle of separate representation. The court can make an order for consolidation on the issue of liability and separate representation on the issue of damages, and so vary the order of the judge; but it is desirable that if such an order is made it shall be done by consent of all the parties.]

J. R. Pickering for the National Coal Board. The board will agree to the proposal of the court. They would think it right that each plaintiff should have separate representation on the issue of damages in an action of this character.

March 11. The following order was made by the court, the parties having previously agreed the terms thereof:—

"(2) Liberty to apply in the consolidated action for separate "representation if any question arises which appears to put one "plaintiff in a different position from other plaintiffs.

"(3) Particulars as to injuries and damage of each plaintiff "to be delivered with statement of claim in consolidated actions "within 28 days.

"(4) When liability determined if plaintiff succeeds against "all or any defendants, the court to fix a date to determine "question of quantum of damages for each plaintiff, in respect "of which each plaintiff may be separately represented.

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (WITNESS LIST).

Practice and Procedure — Trial — Witness list — Chancery Division — Length of trial—Date of hearing.

The following practice direction will take effect with regard to witness actions and proceedings set down for hearing on and after Tuesday, April 27, 1954, in substitution for the practice direction dated March 20, 1952, printed in [1952] W.N. 170. It has been framed with a view to ensuring so far as possible that an action comes on for hearing on a definite day related to the date on which it was set down for trial.

1. There will be one witness list only of cases awaiting trial.

2. Within 10 days of setting down an action the solicitors for each party separately represented must lodge with the cause clerk at Room 136 a certificate (signed by counsel if the pleading was settled by counsel) stating the length of time the trial is expected to occupy. This certificate may be sent by post if desired, and a single certificate, signed by all the counsel concerned, should be lodged whenever this course is practicable.

3. An action will appear in the list 23 days after being set down. The date on which it will come on to be heard will be fixed by the court of its own motion, and this date, and the length of time allotted to the case, will be indicated in the list. The date fixed will not be earlier than 21 days after the first appearance of the case in the list.

4. The periods of 10 days (paragraph 2) and 23 days (paragraph 3) will be calculated by reference to the sittings of the courts as prescribed by Ord. 63, r. 1, periods during which the courts are not sitting being excluded.

5. If circumstances affecting the probable length of a case appearing in the list arise, notice of the fact, and, where appropriate, a revised estimate of the length of the hearing, must be given promptly to the cause clerk, who will note it and transmit it to the clerk of the judge in charge of the list.

6. All applications with regard to cases appearing in the witness list are to be made to the judge notified in the daily cause list as the judge in charge of the list. If, upon the settlement of any such case, no order is required, immediate notification of the settlement, signed by the solicitors for all parties, must be left with the cause clerk for transmission to the clerk of the judge in charge of the list, when the case will be struck out of the list.

7. A party intending to apply for an alteration of the date fixed for the trial of a case shall give not less than 48 hours' notice in writing (a) to the other parties to the case (other than parties in default against whom he is entitled to move for judgment), and (b) to the clerk of the judge in charge of the list.

8. It is to be clearly understood that the dates fixed by the court for the hearing of cases will not be altered except for good cause such, for example, as the illness, or absence abroad, of a party or an essential witness.

9. A proceeding commenced otherwise than by writ which is directed to be heard with witnesses will appear in the list not earlier than seven days after the date on which the order for hearing with witnesses was made or (in the case of a summons adjourned into court) the date on which the papers are received by the cause clerk, and will be allotted as early a date for hearing as is practicable. From the date of its appearance in the list, paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 of these directions will apply to such case.

By direction of the judges of the Chancery Division,

W. S. JONES,
Chief Registrar.

Factory—Safe means of access—Transient occurrence—Entrance rendered slippery and unsafe by sudden snowstorm—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 26.

Section 26 of the Factories Act, 1937, requires that "There shall, "so far as reasonably practicable, be provided and maintained safe "means of access to every place at which any person has at any "time to work."

The plaintiff, a man in the employ of the defendants, arrived at the entrance to their factory at about seven o'clock on a Monday morning. Shortly before there had been a sudden fall of snow which froze as it fell and rendered the ramp leading down to the entrance, and a space at the bottom of the ramp, slippery. The plaintiff, in entering the factory, slipped on a piece of ice, fell and sustained injury. The defendants maintained a squad of men, part of whose duty it was to scatter sand should the weather conditions require that precaution to be taken, but the factory being closed during the week-end there was no maintenance man on duty till very shortly after the accident. The plaintiff claimed damages for negligence at common law and breach of statutory duty:—

Held, that to suggest that the employers failed in their duty under section 26 because they did not have a squad standing by on the chance of its being necessary to put down sand or gravel as soon as the surface of the entrance became slippery, would be to impose a higher standard than was imposed either by the Factories Act or at common law. The defendants had done all that they reasonably could be expected to do, in the circumstances, to provide that their entrances were properly maintained.

Per Morris L.J. Even the most perfect system would involve that there must be some interval of time between when the difficult conditions begin and when measures to cope with them can be put into operation.

Decision of Lynskey J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Lynskey J. sitting at Bristol Assizes.

The plaintiff, Charles William Thomas, a workman in the employ of the defendants, the Bristol Aeroplane Co. Ld., suffered injury by slipping on a piece of ice when entering the defendants' Rodney works at about 7 a.m. on Monday, January 1, 1951. He claimed damages from the defendants, alleging negligence at common law and also a breach of section 26 of the Factories Act, 1937, in failing to maintain safe means of access to the plaintiff's place of work. On November 18, 1953, Lynskey J. dismissed the action and the plaintiff appealed.

F. W. Beney Q.C. and Herrick Collins for the plaintiff.

Marven Everett and K. H. Bain for defendants.

SOMERVELL L.J. The plaintiff slipped on some ice on a frosty morning when he was going to work, and he suffered considerable injury. He brings this claim alleging negligence at common law and breach of statutory duty. Before the judge, sections 25 and 26 of the Factories Act, 1937, were relied upon, but before us reliance was placed on section 26 only.

At the entrance to the defendants' works there is a ramp, at the bottom of which the accident took place. The weather at that time was undoubtedly bad; it had been snowing in the night, but at about 6.45 a.m. there was a further fall, described by two of the witnesses as being unusual. The policeman who was stationed near the gate said: "It was remarkable and I have never "experienced anything like it before; it froze over almost as it "landed; as soon as it was on the ground it became slippery "immediately." One Fisher, who was in charge of maintenance men, said: "There is very little frost that we get that would "make that in the condition it was in on that particular day." The policeman had a box with some lights near the entrance door. He came on duty at 6 a.m. and saw that the slippery condition was developing before 7 o'clock. Though it was not technically part of his duty, he scattered some sand down one side and did his best to warn the men to be careful. From the plaintiff's own evidence, it must have been obvious to the workmen that it was a slippery morning as they came along the road. The plaintiff did not hear the policeman's warning but went down the ramp all right. He said he saw a dark area, which he took to be asphalt, and presumably launched himself on to it without due care and it turned out to be ice and he fell. The judge did not

Thomas
v.
Bristol
Aeroplane
Co. Ld.

accept that, so that the exact circumstances of this accident are not known.

There were maintenance men available to sand or gravel slippery surfaces if and when that was required. Fisher, when he arrived at 7 o'clock, saw that it would be a good thing to gravel or sand this part, and he got his men together and by 7.30 he was sanding those surfaces.

The plaintiff submitted that the employers, by having these maintenance men, had a system for dealing with icy surfaces, but that it was a defective system in that on Monday morning, there being a break from Friday to Monday, the system, as it were, could not be made to work until after the men had arrived. He reinforced his argument by the fact that in the week there was a night-shift of maintenance men, and if there was a slippery surface developing during the night there would be men who could gravel or sand it. Therefore, he says, there was a breach at common law and the employers had not so far as reasonably practicable maintained a safe means of access within section 26 of the Factories Act, 1937.

My approach to this case, which is the same as that of the judge, is that this danger of finding surfaces icy is one of the incidents of winter in our country which everyone encounters, and it is one of those things which one has got to anticipate and take care of. I agree that, just as highway authorities have a system of putting down gravel on slippery roads, it is very right and proper that if the icy condition persists, as it very often does, there should be a system in the works for gravelling or sanding such surfaces, but I cannot think that the mere fact that a man is asked to walk upon an icy surface, which at the moment is uncovered or unsanded, in itself indicates a lack of safe system, or that there has been a failure so far as reasonably practicable to maintain a safe means of access. The present case illustrates rather strikingly what would be necessary if the plaintiff was right. This snowstorm was obviously exceptional, as the judge pointed out, and only started at 6.45 a.m. The men started arriving very soon after 7, and on this day Fisher arrived at 7 o'clock, but to be effective, there would have to have been men there for half an hour or an hour earlier. Although an hour earlier, so far as the evidence goes, there was snow, there was no sort of slipperiness which would require gravel or sand.

To suggest that the employers failed in their duty under section 26 because they did not have a squad standing by on the chance of having to put sand or gravel down as soon as any surface became slippery, is to impose a higher standard than is imposed, in my opinion, either by the Act of 1937 or at common law. The judge said: "I am satisfied here that the employers "did do all they reasonably could be expected to do in the circum-"stances to provide that their passages and gangways 'were of a "'sound construction and properly maintained'"—that is a reference to section 25—"Equally, I am satisfied, as far as

"section 26 is concerned, that they did 'provide and maintain "'a safe means of access'—they did so as far as is reasonably "practicable. I think it is putting the duty far too high to say "that in the circumstances that happened in this case, the "employers ought to provide some form of almost 'insurance' "against ways becoming unsafe." Then he says that in his opinion the duty at common law "is not so high, really, as that "contained in section 26"; that is not a matter I have to decide, but certainly the duty at common law is no higher than that imposed under section 26, and for these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

MORRIS L.J. I am of the same opinion and I agree with the conclusions as to reasonableness which were reached by the judge. It seems to me that the view that he took of the system that was in operation was the view to which the evidence pointed. A witness, Stone, said: "The instructions we get are that if the "weather should become dangerous, we should immediately "telephone for the job to be done but this happened to be early "in the morning, after Sunday, and there was no night-shift "to take over anything." Fisher's evidence was as follows: Lynskey J.: "Normally, of course, you would have the night-"shift? (A.) Normally there would be two men. (Q.) And as "far as the night-shift was concerned, if it became slippery in "the night they would deal with it? (A.) Definitely. (Q.) And "there is no night-shift on Sunday, and you come in at about "7.30, apart from the cleaners? (A.) Yes. Mr. Collins: Have "the night-shift any instructions to deal with this? (A.) Yes, on "police instructions. (Q.) Do you mean that the police get in "touch with them? (A.) Yes, the sergeant in charge would get "in touch with them. (Q.) Are there no night people on the "Sunday to Monday night? (A.) No. (Q.) Is there nobody who "could give any warning of the ramp or passage being slippery? "(A.) No, other than the police."

The system was, therefore, that the policeman at the gate, if he thought that some action should be taken, would get in touch with police headquarters and they would get in touch with the works department and the necessary steps would be taken. But the system did not provide for having any men available in the period before most of the men came to work on a Monday morning. Mr. Beney for the plaintiff has strongly pressed before us that the system was consequently defective in that there was admittedly that gap in it. It seems to me that the questions which arise, whether approached on the basis of common law obligations or on a consideration of section 26 of the Factories Act, largely turn in this case on what it was reasonable for the employers to do.

In this connexion I think it is important to have in mind some words used by Lord Tucker in his speech in Latimer v. A. E. C.

Thomas v. Bristol Aeroplane Co. Ld.
Morris L.J.

Ld.[1] when he said: " . . . it appears to me desirable in these " days, when there are in existence so many statutes and statu- " tory regulations imposing absolute obligations upon employers, " that the courts should be vigilant to see that the common law " duty owed by a master to his servants should not be gradually " enlarged until it is barely distinguishable from his absolute " statutory obligations." So, viewing the matter from the point of view of the obligations of the employers at common law it seems to me that the question to be considered is as to what action would or should a reasonably careful employer have taken. I do not think that the judge erred in coming to the conclusion that the employers here were not shown to have been remiss. The men coming to work between 7 and 7.30 on a Monday morning would themselves know that there had been no night-shift on the Sunday night. They would also themselves know the conditions that prevailed that morning and, indeed, the evidence of the plaintiff showed that he himself fully appreciated the difficult conditions that existed. In their journeys from their homes to the factory, all the men would have occasion to cope with the results of the troublesome climatic conditions that had rather suddenly developed.

In those circumstances it seems to me that it would be to place an altogether excessive and intolerable burden upon the employers if it were said that they ought to have provided a system which had the result that no part of the approach to the places where men were going to work would be icy or would be difficult to walk upon: for the obligation, if it existed, could not be confined to the ramp or to the space at the bottom of the ramp: it might have been said to extend to other parts along which men would have to walk. Furthermore, even the most perfect system would involve that there would be some interval of time between the moment when difficult conditions began and when measures to cope with them could be put into operation.

It seems to me, therefore, that the risks which resulted that morning at that time from the vagaries of the weather were really no more than the risks which form a part of the ordinary incidents of daily life to which all are subject. I think that a similar approach applies in this case when considering section 26, for the obligation requires that: " There shall, so far as is reason- " ably practicable, be provided and maintained safe means of " access to every place at which any person has at any time to " work." I have in mind what Lord Porter said in his speech in Latimer v. A. E. C. Ld.,[2] in reference to the statutory definition of the word " maintained ": " It has still, however, to be " determined what it is which has to be in an efficient state. " Does it include the elimination of some matter which is " temporarily superimposed upon the floor or is the requirement

"confined to the floor itself? To be efficient, the appellant "contended, the floor must be fit for any of the purposes for "which it is intended, e.g., for support and for passing over in "safety. The difficulty of such a view is that it puts an excessive "obligation upon the employer. Indeed, it was conceded that "it could not be carried to the length of saying that a temporary "obstruction, such as a piece of orange peel or the like, would "make it inefficient. Once this concession is made it becomes a "question of the degree of temporary inefficiency which con-"stitutes a breach of the employer's obligation."

As to this part of the case it is also useful to have in mind what Tucker L.J. said in this court in Edwards v. National Coal Board[3]: " . . . in every case it is the risk that has to be "weighed against the measures necessary to eliminate the risk." Applying those principles, it seems to me that, viewed by the test of reasonableness, it would be to impose an excessive demand upon employers to say that they ought to have provided against the risk of anyone slipping at this place at this particular moment on a Monday morning. It does not seem to me that it is shown that the employers failed either to fulfil their common law obligations, or that they were in breach of their statutory duty under section 26, and I therefore agree that the appeal fails.

ROMER L.J. I also agree. The learned judge, after pointing out that neither at common law nor under section 26 of the Factories Act are employers bound to provide a perfect system, said and, I think, quite rightly said: "The duty of the employer "is not a duty to put in a perfect system which will avoid all "accidents; he has only to take the care of a reasonable, prudent "man in the circumstances of the case." The learned judge, after a careful and well-balanced review of the evidence, came to the conclusion that the employers in the present case had taken that care which he had described. In my view that is the end of the case, and the appeal consequently fails.

Charity—Hospital—Appeal for funds for erection and maintenance of voluntary hospital—Scheme impracticable after National Health Service Act, 1946 (9 & 10 Geo. 6, c. 81).

National Health Service—Hospital—Gift—Appeal to public. Trust and trustee—Resulting trust—Charity—Failure of object.

In 1938 and 1939 an appeal was launched for the improvement of hospital services in South Bucks and East Berks, and in particular for the erection and maintenance of a new hospital at Slough. The appeal was launched by a "council" who issued a brochure calling for subscriptions and donations. This pointed out the serious lack of hospital accommodation in the area, and emphasized at length and in the strongest terms the superior advantages of "the truly British characteristic of making provision, without "force" for medical care in voluntary hospitals. The brochure was accompanied by forms to be filled in by donors and subscribers, of which "document 1" provided for subscriptions in three forms, viz.: "council's discretion: [for a] Windsor Hospital; "Slough Hospital." Another form, "document 2," provided for seven year covenants to subscribe towards the augmentation of the income or capital of (a) such hospitals as the council might nominate; (b) the Windsor Hospital; (c) the Slough Hospital, and (d) a hospital nominated by the covenantor.

Substantial sums were received under the terms of these documents, and were also raised locally by concerts, church collections, whist drives, etc.

It never became possible to build the proposed hospital at Slough; first, because of war conditions, and, secondly, because the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, precluded the erection of new voluntary hospitals. A summons was taken out by the Slough trustees for directions as to what should be done with the property in their hands; and in particular for the determination of the questions whether (a) any charitable trust formerly affecting the same had failed, and if so (b) whether there was a resulting trust in favour of the donors and subscribers. On appeal from Upjohn J.:—

Held (per Evershed M.R. and Denning L.J., Romer L.J. dissenting), that on the true construction of documents 1 and 2 and the surrounding circumstances no definable class of donors was entitled to claim the return of their donations. Those donors who had allocated in writing their donations to the Slough hospital showed a general intention to provide a Slough hospital, but it was not of the essence of that intention that the Slough hospital should be a voluntary hospital, and there was a presumption in favour of a charitable intent.

There might, however, be exceptional donations to which special conditions had been attached and inquiry should be directed to discover whether any such gifts had been received.

APPEAL from Upjohn J.[1]

Upjohn J. held that the proposal in 1939 to build a voluntary hospital at Slough having become impossible owing to the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, on the true construction of the appeal for funds, the money subscribed was to be devoted to the purposes of a voluntary hospital only, so that the object had become impossible, and that, apart from sums collected by concerts, whist drives, etc., there was a resulting trust in favour of the donors and subscribers.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8. The following judgments were read. EVERSHED M.R. (read by Denning L.J.): Not long before the outbreak of the second world war a number of public-spirited persons, who formed themselves into the "South Bucks and East Berks "Voluntary Hospitals Council," drew attention to the serious shortage of hospital services in, and in the neighbourhood of, Slough, a town which (largely as a result of the first world war) had enormously outgrown its original dimensions. The council appealed to other public-spirited persons to provide money to meet the needs of the situation, which fell broadly under three heads, namely, (1) enlargement and better endowment of the King Edward VII Hospital at Windsor (which mainly supplied the hospital needs of the whole area, including Slough); (2) general assistance to other and smaller hospitals in the neighbourhood; and (3) the erection of a new hospital in Slough itself. It is to the third of these heads that the difficult problem raised in the present appeal is particularly directed; and the question is whether any, and, if so, what numbers of those whose subscriptions were dedicated to the third of the heads ought now to be repaid their subscriptions, having regard to the impact upon all hospital services of the National Health Service Act, 1946.

The efforts of the council had been so far successful that before the publication and issue in 1939 of the "brochure," which has proved to be by far the most significant fact in the case, a sum of over £6,000 had been collected for the third of the objects I have stated, namely, the erection of a new hospital in Slough; and the council had, with that money, acquired in Slough a piece of land which they had regarded as suitable for the erection of the hospital. It is important to observe that there is no evidence of the particular circumstances in which any individual subscriber to the fund of £6,000 made his contribution beyond the bare facts which I have already stated.

To the terms of the brochure, upon which so much depends, I must make some detailed references, though I am repeating much that is fully set out in the judgment of Upjohn J. The brochure was plainly the climax, before the outbreak of the war, of the council's appeal for funds, and it was widely distributed. On a number of the left-hand pages were printed short but arresting extracts from the speeches or writings of well-known men, both living and dead, which (and the purpose of which) the quotation attributed to the late Rt. Hon. John Burns sufficiently illustrates: "The voluntary hospitals had saved in the course of "a single generation a population equal to that of London or "Australia." The extracts from the report of the Sankey Commission on the future of the voluntary hospitals, which appeared on the last page, I shall later set out fully.

The particular purposes of the appeal, and statement of the means whereby those purposes might be achieved, are set out on the right-hand pages. The first page was as follows: "The "council has been formed to appeal on behalf of Windsor, Slough "and associated hospitals for the funds which are necessary for "extensions, new buildings and annual maintenance. It hopes "to carry out the recommendations of the Sankey Report (report "of the Voluntary Hospitals Commission, 1937), to avoid over-"lapping and wastage. By working in close contact with local "and country administrative authorities it is hoped that an "atmosphere of goodwill and mutual assistance will be estab-"lished between such authorities and the voluntary hospitals, "and that as a result really efficient, well organized hospital "services will be made available for all the people of South "Bucks and East Berks. Our voluntary hospital system is the "envy of the world. The truly British characteristic of making "provision, without force, for those in need of medical care is "worthy of preservation. Without adequate finance the work "of the honorary surgeons and physicians cannot go on. It is "hoped that all will play their part in helping us to attain the "objects that are detailed in the following pages. This booklet "is intended to explain the work of the council and to make "residents in this district individually conscious of the value of "the voluntary hospitals. Will you therefore please read its pages "and then consider how you can help us in our work?"

The second page stated the three aims or heads of appeal already noticed, under the three headings "King Edward VII "Hospital, Windsor," "The Slough Hospital" and "The smaller "hospitals in the area." I need only cite what appeared under the second heading (the Slough Hospital): "The rapid industrial "growth of Slough has thrown a heavy extra burden upon King "Edward VII Hospital. The population has doubled in recent "years and is still rapidly growing. To relieve the established "hospital and to provide this industrial area with a hospital near "at hand it has been decided to erect a new building at Slough "on a site already purchased. The hospital, which will have "sixty beds at its commencement, will be worked in close co-"operation with King Edward VII Hospital, and will supply a "further urgently necessary addition to the hospital services of "the whole area. £45,000 is the estimated cost of the new "hospital, and it will cost approximately £13,000 per annum "to maintain."

On the seventh page was indicated a number of forms which donations might take; for example, endowment of a bed, defraying the cost of special equipment and so forth. From this page it appeared plainly that special collections were to be organized at clubs, by dramatic societies, and so forth; and, as will be seen, numerous, though relatively small, sums were in due course received from such sources.

I now set out in full—because of the significance attached to them in argument—the extracts from the Sankey Report printed on the last page of the brochure: "The strength of the volun-"tary hospital system arises from two main causes; the first, "the spirit that inspires it; and the second, the freedom that it "possesses. The spirit that inspires it is the glory of the volun-"tary system. It has enabled all classes to come together in "order that the more fortunate should help and give encourage-"ment to their less favoured fellow citizen. This help has "consisted, on the material side, in collections and gifts of large "sums of money to found, equip and maintain the hospitals "themselves. Complementary to this, there has been the willing "service of generation after generation of doctors to serve the "sick without fee and without reward. Further, there has been "the co-operation of men and women of all classes and creeds "to assist in the finance, the management and the carrying on of "this great work. It would be a national loss if the country "were deprived of this voluntary association of individuals with-"out distinction of class, creed or politics, and if they were no "longer to work together to achieve an end for the benefit of "humanity. The freedom of administration which the voluntary "system permits is also of fundamental importance; such free-"dom is an example of the dislike of over-control and bureau-"cracy which is inherent in the genius of our race. Another "asset of the voluntary hospital is that it has been responsible "for medical education for many generations; medical education "flourishes best in the atmosphere of freedom inherent in "the voluntary hospitals. Co-ordinating Authority suggested. "Almost without exception the witnesses who gave evidence "stressed the advisability of co-ordination in hospitals, so that "not only cottage hospitals but also special hospitals should be "linked up with general hospitals. The commission, therefore, "conclude this general survey with an emphatic expression of "their opinion that the continued existence of the voluntary "system depends upon the voluntary hospitals of the country "forming themselves into an association, regionally organized, "which would be able on all matters of policy to express the "considered views of its members and rely upon their loyal "acceptance of its decisions."

There was a pocket or folder in the cover of the brochure containing (besides an envelope) three forms. The first (which Upjohn J. called "document 1," and to which he attached great importance) was a form to be filled in and signed by the intending donor whereon he could indicate his choice of object "as below." There were three columns headed respectively "Capital Dona-"tion", "Maintenance Donation" and "Annual Subscription"; and under each heading were the three possibilities for selection: £ s. d., Council's Discretion; £ s. d., Windsor Hospital; £ s. d., Slough Hospital.

We are concerned in this case with those benefactors who, by the appropriate erasures, indicated that their gifts were for the Slough Hospital—either as a capital donation, maintenance donation, or annual subscription.

On the remaining two forms less attention was directed in argument; but I regard them as not insignificant. They were designed for use (by appropriate deletions) by those who wished their donations to be allocated by the endowment of a bed or cot, or towards the provision of special equipment either at the Windsor Hospital or at the (intended) Slough Hospital.

There was no evidence as to the numbers of these latter forms which were used. For the purposes of this case it must, I think, be taken that any persons who, using these forms, struck out the word "Windsor" and left the word "Slough" have been equated with those who, using "document 1," allocated their donations to the Slough Hospital; though the result is not, as I shall hope to show, entirely helpful to the respondents.

There was, finally, a form referred to by Upjohn J. as "docu-"ment 2," appropriate to those who were willing to sign deeds of covenant for years in the form commonly used in the case of charitable donations. The covenantee, according to the form, was the secretary of the council; and the form provided that the covenanted sums should be "applied in such proportions as the "council shall direct on my/our behalf for the augmentation "of the income of the following: (a) Such hospital or hospitals "in South Bucks and/or East Berks as the council may from "time to time nominate on my/our behalf; (b) King Edward VII "Hospital at Windsor; (c) the Slough Hospital at Slough; "(d) the . . . hospital at . . ." In the margin opposite the items (a), (b), (c) and (d) were the words: "N.B.—Delete and "initial the alternatives not desired." A number of persons who made use of the form, document 2, and entered, accordingly, into deeds of covenant, deleted the whole of (a), (b) and (d) (supra) and so left (c) only extant. I assume that the effect of so doing was to render of no effect the preceding words in the deed "in "such proportions as the council shall direct." In any case Upjohn J. treated the persons who so made use of the deed of covenant as being in consimili casu with those who made use of document 1, erasing all the appropriate words other than the reference to "Slough Hospital."

In this court it became obvious that the treatment of the two classes above mentioned as (for relevant purposes) indistinguishable was open to the serious objection that there was, upon the evidence, no ground for holding that those who signed deeds of covenant—a copy of the form of which had not been included in the pocket or folder—had ever seen the brochure.

From what I have recited it follows that those who had given moneys to "the Slough Hospital" (that is, for the purposes of the intended Slough Hospital as distinct from the King Edward VII, Windsor, Hospital, or other objects of the appeal) may be broadly grouped into the following classes: (i) those whose subscriptions had made up the £6,000-odd collected before the publication and issue of the brochure; (ii) those who had contributed to special collections made at sporting occasions, entertainments and the like; (iii) those who had signed deeds of covenant (in the form of the so-called "document 2"); and (iv) those whose subscriptions had been accompanied by forms of the so-called "document 1" with appropriate deletions; to which must be added those (if any) who made appropriate use of the other two forms enclosed in the pocket of the brochure.

The effect of the judgment of Upjohn J. was to hold that persons in the first two classes had no right, or interest in, or to a return of their donations; but that persons in the third and fourth classes were, in the events that had happened, entitled to a return of the sums contributed by them.

It is, however, reasonably plain that the classification above made would prove, upon the fullest analysis, an over-simplification. Apart from those (and there are likely to have been at least some) who accompanied their gifts by some kind of special letter, and those (and, again, there will have inevitably have been some) who failed to make correctly the deletions which document 1 suggested, there would be donors who preferred to remain anonymous and donors, in addition to contributors to collections, who accompanied their gifts by no written communication of any kind. Partly, no doubt, having regard to the limits of administrative convenience, Upjohn J. resolved these problems, in effect, by confining the class of persons entitled to recover their donations to those strictly falling within the last two heads already enumerated. Thus, the relevant declarations in his order were as follows: "And this court doth declare that the assets now

HILLIER'S TRUSTS, In re. HILLIER v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.
Evershed M.R.

"representing the funds subscribed (otherwise than anonymously) . . . which were at the time of such subscription allocated in writing by the donors thereof for the said projected hospital now belong to the subscribers of such funds in the proportions in which they subscribed the same. And this court doth declare that the assets now representing the funds subscribed . . . for the purposes of the said projected hospital but which were not allocated thereto in writing signed by the donors thereof at the time of their subscription or were subscribed anonymously do not belong to such donors and that such donors now have no interest in the said assets."

There has been no appeal on the part of those excluded from the benefit of the order by its first recited paragraph. We have also been informed that the Treasury Solicitor makes no claim to any of the moneys as belonging to the Crown as bona vacantia. The only question before us has been whether the declaration in favour of those persons comprehended by the first recited paragraph of the order was rightly made.

Before proceeding to consider the grounds and validity of the conclusion of Upjohn J. I will add some further facts relating to the history of the appeal. The total sum collected from all sources for "the Slough Hospital" has amounted to approximately £50,000. Of this sum approximately £30,000 is represented by donations falling under heads (ii), (iii) and (iv) above stated, and of that figure about one half (£15,000) represents payments made under deeds of covenant in the form of document 2. It appears that the land acquired out of the original £6,000 was later sold (at a profit). The council, or trustees on their behalf, proceeded as late as the year 1948 (but before the coming into operation of the National Health Service Act, 1946), to buy another substantial estate (for the sum of £30,000) on the outskirts of Slough, and this property was (as to the greater part of it) let to, and is now held by, an institution called the Canadian Red Cross Memorial Hospital, which is, in fact, a general hospital now vested in the Minister of Health, upon a yearly tenancy. The trustees also acquired (for approximately £11,500) a further property which is let to an institution known as the Slough Industrial Health Service Ld., and is used to provide accommodation for doctors, nurses and physiotherapists engaged in the health services of the area. The figure of £50,000 above mentioned included the profit made on the sale of the original property, and also the cost price of the two properties later bought.

The question of the rights of subscribers is, no doubt, not to be determined by reference to what the trustees may, or may not, have done in purported exercise of their powers as trustees—save to the extent that their actions might be said legitimately to reflect the intention of the donors, among whom the trustees were themselves numbered. The facts recited might, however, have been suggested to bear upon the question whether the purposes for which the moneys were subscribed had, in any event, been wholly frustrated; and might also give rise to difficult questions of the exact rights of any subscribers where the investment of their subscriptions had resulted in a gain or a loss. No point was made during the argument of any of the kinds suggested. But I have referred to the facts as showing that the case is, to my mind, at least in some respects distinguishable from such a case as that of the University of London Medical Sciences Institute Fund,[1] where the project for the intended Medical Sciences Institute having been totally abandoned as impracticable, no application (save for temporary investment) had ever been made of the funds subscribed, and such funds remained intact in the trustees' hands.

I add at this point that (as appears from the evidence in the case) donations under the second and fourth (at any rate) of the above stated categories continued to be received, though in relatively small amounts, in the years 1947 and 1948, that is, at a time when it must be assumed that the effects of the Act of 1946 had become generally known; though there is no evidence of any receipts after the vesting date, July 5, 1948.

The basis of Upjohn J.'s decision in favour of those categories of subscribers whom he regarded as entitled to a return of their contributions (that is, categories (iii) and (iv) above) is that, upon a proper interpretation of the documents amended and signed by the donors themselves, when read in the light of the brochure which invited their contributions, the intention of the givers was to give for the single and exclusive purpose of contributing to the cost of erecting a voluntary hospital (as this term is commonly understood) and no other kind of hospital. As regards category (ii) Upjohn J. was of opinion that the circumstances in which the contributions were made (that is, on occasions such as collections at a club or dance), including the circumstance of anonymity, the givers cannot have intended to reserve any right to a return of their contributions in any event whatever. In the case of this class of persons the judge followed particularly the reasoning of P. O. Lawrence J. in In re Welsh Hospital (Netley) Fund[2]; but he did not think that in the present case (as had been held in the Netley Hospital case and also later by Wynn-Parry J. in In re North Devon and West Somerset Relief Fund Trusts (the Lynmouth case[3]), that the circumstances and conclusions relating to gifts in the second category could have any material bearing on the intention, or presumed intention, of donors falling within the third and fourth categories.

I have said that there has been no appeal against the judgment so far as it related to any categories of donors other than those falling within the third and fourth categories. But as regards these last it has been contended on behalf of the Attorney-General, as appellant, that the view of Upjohn J. unduly emphasized the significance of the references in the brochure to the "voluntary" character of the proposed new hospital; and that on a true interpretation of the brochure and of the forms used and signed by the donors (as amended by their erasions) and in the light of all other relevant and admissible circumstances, the donors of categories (iii) and (iv) did not intend their gifts to be exclusively referable to the erection of a voluntary hospital so as to make them, in effect, conditional upon such a hospital being erected; but rather that they intended to give their money for or towards the establishment of a hospital or for hospital services in and for Slough. Alternatively, counsel for the Attorney-General contended that if these donors intended, in giving, to assist in the erection of a voluntary hospital at Slough, there was, nevertheless, in their minds a more general charitable intention—that is, the intention of promoting hospital services generally in the area, the proposed new hospital being but a preferred manifestation of that more general object.

As I have already sufficiently intimated—and notwithstanding the somewhat special facts already narrated in regard to the application in fact of the trust moneys—I assume that the project of erecting or establishing a voluntary hospital at Slough was never capable of being carried out, and is now wholly impracticable, Mr. Cross drew attention to the fact that there is nothing in the Act of 1946 to prohibit the execution of such an enterprise or to cause automatic vesting in the Minister of a hospital "voluntarily" erected or established after July 5, 1948. But I agree entirely with Upjohn J. that "it would now be quite "impracticable for a voluntary body of persons to undertake the "erection and maintenance of a voluntary hospital"; though I agree also with him when he added "but it is equally plain that "not only is it possible, but it is contemplated, that a new "hospital will be erected in the Slough area by the Ministry of "Health, and that work is, of course, as much a charitable work "as is the erection of a voluntary hospital . . ."

The question is, in the end, a matter of emphasis, when the relevant documents are examined and all relevant circumstances considered. Did the charitably-minded subscriber respond to the request: "Please join with other volunteers in combining to "build, ourselves and out of our own resources, a hospital of our "own at Slough"? or to the request: "Please help to make "good the absence of a hospital at Slough—and remember that "our voluntary hospital system is one of the most characteristic "and beneficent of all English institutions"?

When the case was first opened to us and the terms of the brochure were read, I confess that my inclination was somewhat strongly towards interpreting its appeal in the first of the two senses I have tried to express. But after hearing the whole argument I have reached, eventually, the opposite conclusion. In any case involving the existence of a charitable intention overriding a single specified objective I take as my guide the language of Parker J. in In re Wilson,[4] which was applied and adopted in the two cases already mentioned of the Netley Hospital[5] and Lynmouth charities.[6] Substituting the word "donor" for "testator," is "the paramount intention . . . to give the "property, in the first instance, for a general charitable purpose "rather than a particular charitable purpose, and to graft on to "the general gift a direction as to the desires and intentions of "the donor as to the manner in which the general gift is to be "carried into effect?" In the present case, the appeal was a single appeal "on behalf of Windsor, Slough and associated "hospitals," so that "really efficient well-organized hospital "services will be made available for all the people of South Bucks "and East Berks" (see the brochure already set out): and the subscriber, invited to "help the council" in one or other of the ways specified, was told: "You can earmark your "help for either of the hospitals, although you may send to the "council." In my judgment there is, at least, a strong argument for the view that the "earmarking" by means of the appropriate use of document 1 was no more than a "grafting on to" a general gift in favour of the whole subject-matter of the appeal of "a "direction as to the desires and intentions of the donor as to the "manner in which the general gift" was to be carried into effect; a view to which the other circumstances later mentioned tend, in my judgment, to support.

But it is no doubt a striking and significant feature of the present case that those who availed themselves of document 1 and struck out all references other than "Slough Hospital," may thereby be said not merely to have indicated a preference, but rather to have expressly negatived all other intentions except that in favour of the "Slough Hospital." It was this aspect of the matter which most strongly impressed Upjohn J.; and I, therefore, prefer to rest my conclusion upon the first head of the argument on the Attorney-General's part, namely, that though the donors gave their money for the establishment of the Slough Hospital (and not, I will presume, for the expansion or endowment of the Windsor Hospital, or the other smaller hospitals, or as the council should, in their discretion, distribute it); still it was not of the essence of their gifts or their intention that the Slough Hospital should be a "voluntary" hospital. The point may, perhaps, be put another way—if and so far as the donor intended to support a "voluntary" hospital, that was but the manner, the only manner then available, of giving effect to the more general intention of contributing to the provision of a hospital in and for Slough. So put, this head of the appellant's argument only differs from the alternative head in the character of the "general "charitable intention" which, in this case, is a general intention to provide a Slough hospital, but in the other is a general intention to support hospital services in the whole area covered by the appeal.

In judging of the emphasis properly to be given to the word "voluntary" used in the appeal, it is, in my judgment, essential to bear in mind that, at the relevant date, all hospitals (other than those established and maintained by local authorities) were "voluntary"; so that to describe a proposed new hospital to be erected, otherwise than by a local authority, as "voluntary" was, prima facie, to do no more than state one of its inevitable characteristics. To emphasize, therefore, the obvious and inevitable characteristic in an appeal of this nature, and the virtues of the existing "voluntary hospital system," may (at any rate) be fairly regarded as doing no more than to give cogent reasons why a "hospital appeal" should excite the generosity of those to whom it was addressed. In support of this interpretation the Attorney-General particularly relied, for example, on the second half of the first paragraph on p. 1 of the brochure which emphasized the need, in the interests of efficient economy, of goodwill and co-ordination between the general "voluntary" hospitals in the area with the hospitals established and maintained by the local authorities. The appellant likewise stressed the fact that the proposed hospital was described (for example on p. 3 of the brochure and in the all-important document 1) as "the Slough Hospital" rather than "The Slough Voluntary Hospital"—its voluntary character being assumed, but not put forward as the essential object or condition of the solicited donations. And Mr. Buckley added that if the voluntary character of the new hospital was of the essence of the matter in the sense I have indicated, then it is noteworthy that Sir Noel Mobbs, the surviving member of the council and himself a substantial donor, nowhere so stated in his affidavit.

In my judgment, therefore, the emphasis on the "voluntary" character of the proposed hospital was not such as to give to the appeal, in this respect, what Mr. Buckley called a "partisan" quality, and I cannot, for my part, construe the cited extracts from the report of the Sankey Commission, and particularly the reference to "the dislike of over-control and bureaucracy which "is inherent in the genius of our race," as giving, in their context such a partisan colour to the brochure as a whole.

I think, moreover, that other legitimate considerations support the view which I have formed. Thus, if the view of Upjohn J. is right, the result is to create a class of benefactors somewhat artificially distinguished from the rest—namely, that class (and that class alone) consisting of persons whose donations were accompanied by documents in the form of document 1 whereon references, other than one or other of the references to the Slough Hospital, had been erased. The right or privilege of the class thus defined was not, in the first place, shared by those who had contributed the £6,000 originally collected by the council—the first of the four categories which I have earlier specified; for it is not shown what were the circumstances in which these contributions were made. Nor, in my judgment, was it shared by the signatories of deeds of covenant, the third of the stated categories, for although the members of this class of donors, by making the appropriate deletion, indicated their intention of benefiting, exclusively, "the Slough Hospital at Slough," it is not established that they did so under the impulse of the brochure; and unless read with the brochure the wording of the deeds of covenant cannot be said to have emphasized the voluntary character of the Slough Hospital so as to justify the inference that their gifts were conditional upon the projected Slough Hospital being a voluntary hospital. Mr. Pascoe Hayward for the Official Solicitor did not indeed press us to the contrary in the course of his argument, and, in the result, the covenantors must, in my view, be in any case excepted from the first of the declarations which I have cited from the judge's judgment, reducing its scope, in value, by a half. Thirdly, the privilege or right is not shared, according to the terms of the judgment itself, by those who gave anonymously or without the accompaniment of a document in the form of document 1; for apart from the administrative difficulty created by anonymity, the intention necessary to support the inference of a resulting trust required the combination of a signed and duly-completed document in the form of document 1 and the terms of the brochure. For this reason I think there must also be excepted from the benefit of the judge's declaration those (if any) who made use of either of the two forms, other than document 1, which were enclosed in the pocket or folder of the brochure; for in these cases there is absent the express exclusion of the council's discretion upon which Upjohn J. particularly relied, and I find it difficult to suppose that a resulting trust arises, or does not arise, according as the donor struck out the word "Windsor" or the word "Slough." Fourthly and last, there is excluded from the right or privilege (as the judge held in his second declaration) those contributors to collections who constitute the second category above specified; for, apart from the almost insuperable administrative difficulty in the way of making a return to these persons occasioned by the circumstances of their gifts, and particularly their anonymity, it has been conceded that persons giving to such collections must be taken to have intended to part, out-and-out, with their money in any event —an inference inconsistent with an intention to benefit a limited and exclusive purpose, or with any but a general charitable intention.

The fact that there had been collections of this nature strongly assisted P. O. Lawrence J. to the conclusion he reached in the Netley Hospital case [7] as regards other individual and named subscribers; and the same is true of the Lynmouth case.[8] It is clear that Upjohn J. did not regard as impressive an analogous argument in the present case—more particularly since in the Netley [9] and Lynmouth [10] cases the question had arisen only in regard to the surplus remaining after full effect had been given to what was, admittedly, the special object of all the contributors. I agree with Upjohn J. that if the particular circumstances in which one donor has made his donation—including his own written statement at the time of making it—lead to a clear conclusion on the question of his intention, that that conclusion cannot be changed because other persons giving to the same cause in different circumstances must be taken to have had a different intention. But where, as I think in the present case, the circumstances affecting the presumed intention of the first donor are, at best, equivocal, then, as it seems to me, it is a relevant and admissible fact in determining his true intention that when he contributed to the fund, he must be taken to have known that his contributions would be mingled with thousands of others, substantial numbers of whom were contributing in circumstances which negatived any right or expectation on their part to any return of their money in any circumstances. I am, indeed, stating in another form what I have said already, namely, that, if Mr. Pascoe Hayward is right, then there emerges a class of contributors whose isolation from their fellow contributors appears (to my mind, at any rate) to be not only unreal and contrary to common sense, but also unjust; for whatever emphasis can legitimately be placed on particular passages in the brochure and on the use of document 1, it is not in doubt that the appeal which brought in the whole of the £50,000 collected was a single appeal addressed to all who would lend their ears to it.

It will be appreciated that the process of elimination which I have employed will in any case have left in the class entitled to the benefits of the first declaration of Upjohn J. considerably less, in value, than half the total of the benefactors. But there remain two further matters of fact still legitimately, in my judgment, to be considered. First, the donors who made use of document 1 include, as I have already stated, some at least who contributed at dates after, as it must be assumed, the effect of the National Health Service Act, 1946, already passed, had become clearly apprehended, and on the part of whom therefore (on precisely the same material as is pertinent to the cases of earlier donations of the same category) a presumed intention to subscribe only towards the erection of a voluntary hospital cannot sensibly or easily be discerned. Second, when the present question came to be brought before the court, and when advertisement was made for any donor to permit his name to be joined as representing those donors who might claim to be entitled to a return of their donations, none was found ready to come forward and make such a claim. I make every allowance for natural embarrassment; but if (as the argument has suggested) donors were moved to give to the projected voluntary hospital at Slough from "the dislike of over-control and bureaucracy which is inherent in "the genius of our race," I find it difficult to suppose that none was found whose feelings in this regard were insufficient to overcome (without risk as to costs) mere shyness or diffidence.

Regarding, therefore, as I do, the language of the brochure, even when taken in conjunction with document 1, suitably employed, as at best in some degree equivocal, I come to the conclusion that the various other facts which I have enumerated are relevant and admissible for consideration and render it impossible to find or presume, as regards any class of donors, an intention such as to entitle them, in the events which have happened, to a return of any part of their donation. In my judgment, there is no good answer to the summary of his argument which Mr. Cross put before us, which was to this effect: It is sought to find a common intention, limited to a single and specific object, among all givers of a particular category; the particular category put forward is that of donors who, in response to the brochure, made use of document 1 to specify the Slough Hospital; but whatever might be the interpretation properly put upon these documents, as it were, in vacuo, the fact is that the category selected not only included persons who subscribed after the passing of the Act, but also consisted of persons who must be taken to have been aware of the pre-brochure contributions, and aware also of the fact that their gifts would be intermingled with those of others who would not in any circumstances expect, or be entitled to claim, a return of their money; and, therefore, no such intention can be found common to donors of a particular category differentiating them from the rest of the contributors on whose part no claim for any return could be substantiated. More briefly, but, in my judgment, no less correctly, the matter was thus put by Mr. Buckley in reply when he said that where there are many sources of contribution to a charitable fund, then all contributions should, in the absence of special circumstances, be taken to contribute on terms common to all; and the only such terms possible in the present case deny any right to a return of their money to all contributors.

To this general conclusion, however, it is, I think, necessary to make one exception; though for reasons which (because of the importance and complexity of the case, and because I am differing from Upjohn J.) I have stated fully, I am of opinion that the facts proved do not suffice to entitle any definable class of donors to claim a return of their donations, it clearly remains possible that some individual donor may have attached to his gift such special terms as would enable him, distinguishing himself from his fellow contributors, to claim now a return of his money. I see no reason, on administrative or other grounds, why (if necessary) an inquiry should not be directed for that purpose, though, having regard to my general conclusion and to the absence of any individual claimant, so far, I do not regard it as likely that any such individual claims would be put forward, or could be successfully made. On the other hand, I see no reason to exclude their possibility.

In my judgment, therefore, this appeal should be allowed and a declaration made that the assets now representing the funds subscribed for the projected hospital at Slough do not belong to the donors thereof, and that such donors have now no interest therein; provided that such declaration is made without prejudice to the right of any individual to prove to the satisfaction of the trustees or (if necessary) the court, that he is now entitled to a return of his donation on the ground that the same was made and intended by him exclusively for the purpose of the erection of a voluntary hospital at Slough. Subject to what counsel may wish to say upon the form of the order, it seems to me that the case should be referred back to chambers for the purpose of any necessary inquiry or directions, including the settlement of a scheme for the cy-près application of the said assets.

Denning L.J. When an appeal was made to the public in 1939 for money to build a new hospital at Slough, the only hospital in mind was a voluntary hospital. Naturally enough, those who made the appeal stressed the benefits of the voluntary hospital system. A large sum of money was collected in amounts, large and small. The large amounts by donations and seven-year covenants. The small amounts by church collections, collecting-boxes, and so forth. The trustees with some of the money bought a suitable site for a hospital, but they have never been able to build it. The coming of the National Health Service has made it practically impossible now to start a new voluntary hospital. So the question is, what is to happen to the money which the trustees have collected? Upjohn J. has drawn this distinction: he has held that those who made gifts in writing in favour of the Slough Hospital get their money back; but those who put nothing into writing do not. I do not think this distinction is well founded.

Let me first state the law as I understand it in regard to money collected for a specific charity by means of a church collection, a flag day, a whist drive, a dance, or some such activity. When a man gives money on such an occasion, he gives it, I think, beyond recall. He parts with his money out-and-out. He can, of course, insist on it being used for the named purpose. If the trustees of the charity do not apply the money for that purpose when they could well do so, the giver can set the law in motion. He can get the Attorney-General to bring proceedings to see that the trustees do their duty, but he cannot get his money back.

The question is, what is to happen when the trustees cannot apply the money in the way intended? Suppose, for instance, they have got more than enough, what is to happen to the excess? It is, I think, well settled that if the money received by the trustees is more than is needed for the named purpose, they do not have to return the surplus to the givers. They must apply it under the directions of the court for a purpose as near as may be to the original purpose. The reason is not solely on the ground of inconvenience. It is not merely because it is practically impossible to find out who gave the money or to check the claimants. It is because they all gave their money without reserve; and no reserve will be imputed to them. It is useless to ask what was their intention; for a situation has arisen which they did not contemplate, and for which they did not provide. They had formed no relevant intention. So the law must provide. The law must say what is to happen to the money. It does it by making presumptions in favour of charity. It presumes that those who gave the money would wish that any surplus should be devoted to a charitable purpose as near as may be to the original purpose: In re Monk, per Sargant L.J.,[11] and the Lynmouth case,[12]; In re British School of Egyptian Archaeology, per Harman J.[13] Next suppose that the specific charity fails before the money is spent at all. The trustees have the money in their hands, but the purpose cannot be fulfilled. What is to happen to the money which has been collected in church, on flag days, and so forth? The answer is, I think, the same as in the case of a surplus. The money has been given out-and-out. No one of those who gave it ever intended that it should be returned. If any one of them had been asked what was to happen to the money if the named purpose became impossible of fulfilment, he would have said: "If that should happen I will expect you "to use it for some other good cause, but I will not expect it "back." The law gives him credit for the best of intentions and presumes that he would have wished it so.

Let me turn from the church collections and flag days to the donations by cheques and deeds of covenant. These were allocated in writing by the donors, and Upjohn J. has held that they are entitled to their money back. He has refused in their case to make a presumption in favour of charity. This seems to me to take a rather harsh view of the donors. I do not myself think that the donors of large sums would wish to get their money back when those who give small sums do not. Those who give of their abundance are just as charitably minded as the poor widows who give their mites; and all should be treated alike. All know that their moneys are given for the same purpose. All know that the moneys are held on the same trusts, whatever the form in which they are given, whether in pence in the church collection or in cheques from the wealthy industrialists. The law in all cases should make a presumption in favour of charity. It should impose on the trustees the same trust for all the money they receive, namely, to apply the money for the named purpose or, that failing, to apply it for a charitable purpose as near as may be to the original purpose: see the Netley Hospital case.[14]

There may be some exceptional cases where the donor makes it clear that if the main purpose should become impossible, he will want his money back. I regard the University of London Medical Sciences Institute Fund,[15] as such a case. But in the absence of some such evidence, the law will, I think, make in every case a presumption in favour of charity.

The present case shows how right the law is to make this presumption. Before the matter was brought before the court, the trustees issued many advertisements in the local papers inviting people to claim their money back. No one did so. The trustees even invited some of the larger subscribers to be parties to friendly proceedings to claim their money back; but none of them was willing to claim it. As no one was forthcoming, there was nothing left to be done except ask the Official Solicitor to represent the donors, and he has done so. And it is significant that, even now, not a single person has come forward, not a single affidavit has been made, to rebut the presumption of charity. I cannot help thinking that all of them would prefer the court to apply the moneys for some charitable purpose as near as may be to the original; and that is what I think the court should do.

I confess that when the present case was opened to us, I had a different impression. It looked as if these moneys were given specifically for the building of a voluntary hospital at Slough, and that the Crown was seeking to take them for a State hospital. In short, the Crown wanted to apply it for a purpose directly contrary to what the givers intended. But that is not correct. Our ruling today does not mean that the moneys must of necessity go to a State hospital. In applying the money cy-près, the court will bear in mind that the money was provided not only for a hospital at Slough, but also for a voluntary hospital; and will seek out some purpose as near as may be to the original intention. The trustees have put forward a scheme which has the approval of the large subscribers. The proposal is that the piece of land (which the trustees acquired for the purpose of a hospital) should be handed over to the Minister of Health so that he can build a new hospital there; and that the rest of the money should be used for voluntary hospital services. That seems to me to be a very appropriate way of using the money and, indeed, to be a way which the donors would have wished. I would allow this appeal so that this can be done.

ROMER L.J. It is with regret that I find myself at variance with my brethren in the conclusions which they have expressed, but, for my part, I am not persuaded that the decision of Upjohn J. was incorrect. I think that in one respect the order which he made went too far, but that was due to the assumption, which has since been shown to be unwarranted, that the persons who signed the covenants had received a copy of the brochure. The terms of these covenants are not, in my opinion, sufficient in themselves to disclose the existence of a particular charitable intent and nothing more, on the part of those who signed them, and it was not proved that the brochure was sent to these covenantors or that they ever saw them. Mr. Pascoe Hayward's argument before us was confined to establishing that donors who did receive the brochures, and made their gifts to the Slough Hospital in response to the appeal which they contained, are, in the events which have happened, entitled to have their money back. In my opinion, Mr. Hayward was right in so limiting his case, because there is no guide (as distinct from guesswork) to show what the intentions of the other contributors may have been.

The question is, accordingly, a narrow one and depends on the intention which is reasonably to be attributed to persons who received the brochures and earmarked their donations to the Slough Voluntary Hospital by an appropriate use of one of the forms which were enclosed in the pocket of each brochure. On behalf of the Attorney-General it is said that the intention of these persons was to promote the establishment of a hospital in Slough, and if it was a voluntary hospital, so much the better. The respondents' contention is that the intention was to promote a voluntary hospital in Slough and nothing else.

It is, in my opinion, a legitimate inference that these particular donors read the brochure which they received and made their gifts as a result of the appeal which it contained. Such an inference was, at any rate, drawn in Fowler v. Attorney-General,[16] to which I refer more particularly hereafter—and is, as I venture to think, a natural one. In my quest, therefore, for the probable intention of these particular contributors I look to the terms of the brochure to see what the proposal was to which they were being asked to subscribe. It was issued and distributed from 1939 onwards by the South Bucks and East Berks Hospital Council, which had its headquarters in Slough. By way of preface to what follows afterwards is a commendation by the council to the residents of South Bucks and East Berks of the following excerpt from a speech which Lord Horder had made at Liverpool in November, 1938: "I believe that the voluntary hospital is as essential to this "country's wellbeing today as ever it was. It still stands as a "fortress of teaching, of research and of efficient treatment; "and as a centre where the spirit of medicine can live in "freedom, owing no allegiance to political doctrine nor State "expediency." These features of the voluntary hospitals which Lord Horder emphasized were also stressed in the Sankey Report, the recommendations of which the council hoped (as stated in the brochure) to carry out, and extracts from which are printed as a conclusion to the appeal. I will not repeat them, but would draw attention to the following passages: "The freedom "of administration which the voluntary system permits is also of "fundamental importance; such freedom is an example of the "dislike of over-control and bureaucracy which is inherent in the "genius of our race. Another asset of the voluntary hospital is "that it has been responsible for medical education for many "generations; medical education flourishes best in the atmos-"phere of freedom inherent in the voluntary hospitals . . . The "Commission, therefore, conclude this general survey with an "emphatic expression of their opinion that the continued exist-"ence of the voluntary system depends upon the voluntary "hospitals of the country forming themselves into an association, "regionally organised, which would be able on all matters of "policy to express the considered views of its members and rely "upon their loyal acceptance of its decisions." The appeal, accordingly, both opened and closed with reasoned tributes to the advantages in the way of medical teaching, freedom of administration and otherwise which derived from the voluntary system as distinct from what some people regard as the dead hand of "over-control and bureaucracy." In addition to the passages which I have cited there are eulogistic references on almost every page to the voluntary hospital system, amongst which I will only quote Mr. John Burns's dictum that "the voluntary hospitals "had saved in the course of a single generation a population equal "to that of London and Australia."

In my judgment, the brochure is in pith and substance an appeal for the establishment of a hospital which is to possess an essential quality, namely, the quality of freedom of management as opposed to the control of bureaucratic officialdom. The local philanthropists to whom the appeal was sent were being asked for funds to provide a hospital enjoying the freedom of administration which the Sankey Report described as fundamentally important, and from which alone could spring the benefits upon which Lord Horder and the report itself laid so much stress. Such a hospital would be, at all events potentially, an additional unit in the association of voluntary hospitals which the Sankey Report envisaged as essential to the continued existence of the voluntary system itself.

In my opinion, the particular character of the purpose in aid of which the council set forth their call for funds was of the essence of the appeal, and would be regarded as such by those who responded to it; and I think that it is a legitimate and reasonable inference that those persons who disclosed their preference, on any one of the forms provided, for the voluntary hospital at Slough would anticipate that their money would be devoted to the projected institution at Slough which was described in the appeal, and to that alone. If that project should become abortive, as in fact it did, these subscribers would, as I think, both expect and intend that their contributions would be returned so that they themselves could decide to what other purpose, charitable or otherwise, their money should be applied. It is difficult to suppose that a man whose "dislike of over-control and "bureaucracy" was deep and fundamental would view with equanimity the diversion of his gift, without reference to himself, to a hospital controlled by the Ministry of Health; and such is the proposal in relation to Wexham Park. The feelings of such a man might well be compared to those of one who subscribes to a movement for liberating wild birds which are kept in captivity and finds his gift applied to the establishment of a municipal aviary.

I appreciate, I hope, the arguments which are urged against my view, but I do not, with respect, think myself that they convincingly support the appellants' case. It is said that the public continued to subscribe even after the health scheme loomed upon the horizon. It is true that they did (though in markedly diminished numbers), but there is no evidence to show that the council continued to send the brochures out after it was known that the voluntary system was doomed; moreover, those who did know something of the proposals which were eventually embodied in the Act of 1946 did not necessarily appreciate that they involved the appropriation of the voluntary hospitals by the State. Then it is said that as all hospitals which the public were asked to assist were voluntary at the time when the appeals were sent the references in the brochures to the voluntary system were merely exhortatory. I do not take this view myself. In my opinion these references were the very foundation of the appeal and were designed to secure the preservation and the development of the voluntary system and the avoidance of a bureaucratic system taking its place. It is further urged that the brochure revealed that funds would be raised by such means as the organisation of special efforts among sports clubs, dramatic societies, and so forth, and that persons who responded to such efforts would in no circumstances expect to recover what they gave. This, of course, is perfectly true, but I find it difficult to see how it really affects the matter. If a man contributes £5,000 towards the promotion of some particular purpose, his intention of getting back his money if the purpose fails is not lessened, I should have thought, by the knowledge that the organizers are also approaching the general public for coins through the medium, for example, of collecting-boxes in the streets.

Finally, reliance is placed upon the fact that none of the donors has asked for his money to be returned, or been willing to be made a representative defendant in these proceedings. I am not greatly impressed by this, for it needs some moral courage to ask for the return of money already subscribed, and still more to play the role of Shylock (for some people might so regard it) in litigation which is of considerable local interest.

In a recent case (In re British School of Egyptian Archaeology [17]) Harman J. observed in effect that in this field of law one case is not usually of much assistance in another, and I agree with him; for each case has to be decided upon its own particular circumstances. The Netley Hospital case [18] and the Lynmouth case [19] were different from the present in at least two important respects. First, in neither case was it shown that the donors, nor any particular class of donors, had signed documents which disclosed so narrow and specific an intention as those which the donors in question signed in the present case. Secondly, each of those cases was concerned only with the surplus which remained after the primary purpose had been achieved; and in my opinion there is far less reason to suppose that a donor expects to receive back some small fraction of such a surplus than there is to suppose that he expects to get his contribution back if the whole object of his bounty fails before any money is spent on it at all.

In so far as an earlier authority does assist, it seems to me that Fowler v. Attorney-General [20] has some bearing on this case. There the University of London resolved that "steps be taken "to secure a site and funds to enable the senate to establish an "institute of medical sciences in the near neighbourhood of the "university." Appeals were, it seems, accordingly made to certain members of the public to assist financially in the project, but the proposal failed to take effect, for various reasons, and came to nothing. The senate thereupon returned to the subscribers the contributions which they had made, and both Joyce J. and the Court of Appeal expressed the view (it was not an actual issue in the proceedings) that the senate had acted correctly. Upon this point Joyce J. said "that contributions towards a "scheme which it is found cannot be carried out are returnable "to the donors is a matter of course"; and Farwell L.J. said: "I do not think that anybody who was not a lawyer could for "one moment doubt that the university were bound to return at "once to the living subscribers the moneys which had been sent "to them for a scheme which they had abandoned."

There is, in my opinion, nothing illogical in holding that the persons who received the brochure and earmarked their contributions to the Slough Hospital are entitled to repayment, although other subscribers are not; for it is a matter of ascertaining the intention of the donors, and it is only in relation to these particular subscribers that an intention can be discovered, as I think, from the terms of the appeal and the forms which they filled in so as to give expression to their wishes. If in fact any other donor, whether large or small, could prove that his intention was the same, even though he had not seen the brochure, he would be entitled to the same relief; but there is no evidence, on the material before us, from which a similar intention on the part of other donors can be inferred.

For the above reasons I would dismiss the appeal (subject only to the question of the covenantors), but as my brethren take a different view the appeal will be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Held, further, that even if the defendants were under a duty to take reasonable care to see that the premises were safe, the cause of the accident was not forseeable and the danger was not one of which a reasonable employer would know or ought to have known; it was not an employer's duty to carry out a complete inspection of the premises to see that the whole of the premises were safe before his workmen began work.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Gladys Ruby Cilia, a widow, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased son, brought an action under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846–1908, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions Act, 1934, against her son's employers, H. M. James & Sons.

On January 10, 1952, the deceased, a man of 21 years of age, employed by the defendants, a firm of builders and contractors, as a plumber's mate, went to a private dwelling-house with the plumber, to carry out some work in connexion with the installation of sanitary equipment on the ground floor of the house. The house was unoccupied, but negotiations for the purchase of the house by the third party, Cecil Spark, were taking place. The owner had allowed the third party entry to have some alterations effected, which were the subject of a contract between the third party and the defendants. While the deceased was working on the ground floor, the storage tank in the loft began to overflow. The plumber told the deceased to go to the loft and attend to the matter, which he did. Shortly afterwards, the deceased was found dead, lying across the tank with one of his arms in the water. It appeared that during the war, some sheets of steel had been laid across the floor of the loft. One of the sheets, lying to the right of the tank, was resting on an electric conduit, which had become defective, as a result of which the steel sheet was charged with electricity.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendants were negligent and were in breach of their common law duty to take reasonable care to see that the premises in which their workmen were required to work were reasonably safe.

The defendants denied that they were under such a duty.

Philip Goodenday and David Sullivan for the plaintiff.
Bernard Finlay for the defendants.
F. S. Laskey for the third party.

The following cases were cited in argument: Taylor v. Sims and Sims [1]; Hodgson v. British Arc Welding Co. Ld. and B. & N. Green & Silley Weir Ld. [2]; Christmas v. General Cleaning Contractors Ld. and Caledonian Club Trust Ld. [3]; London Graving Dock v. Horton [4]; Garrard v. A. E. Southey & Co. and Standard Telephones and Cables Ld. [5]; Harris v. Brights Asphalt Contractors Ld. [6]; Knight v. Demolition and Construction Co. [7]

Byrne J., having stated the facts and found that the deceased met his death as a result of an electrical shock passing through his body, continued: The negligence relied on by the plaintiff is set out in the statement of claim as follows: "The said accident was "caused by the negligence of the defendants and the breach by "them of the obligation and duty referred to in paragraph 3 "hereof in that they failed to inspect the said loft prior to the "deceased working therein and nevertheless required the said "deceased to work therein without removing the said steel plate "or taking any other steps to remedy the said dangerous con-"dition of the said premises, and failed to take any steps or take "reasonable care to see that the premises were safe, though they "knew or ought to have known that the said premises were "dangerous as aforesaid."

Mr. Finlay, on the other hand, has submitted that there is no duty on an employer, who is not the occupier of premises, to see that the premises where his workmen are required to work are reasonably safe. He accepts the position, of course, that the employer is under a duty to see that he devises a safe and proper system of work and that he is also under a duty to supply his workmen with suitable plant and material; but he submits that beyond that the employer is under no duty with regard to the safety of the premises.

Mr. Finlay relies on two cases: the first is Taylor v. Sims and Sims,[1] which was tried by Lewis J. who, in his judgment, dealt with this question of the duty of an employer to ensure that reasonable steps are taken for the safety of his workman in a case in which the workman is working in premises which are not occupied by the employer. Lewis J. said[2]: "The argument of "counsel for the plaintiff is this. This is a matter of common "law negligence and involves the question of the duty of an "employer towards his employee. I have no doubt that when "counsel for the plaintiff put that forward he had in mind the "case which has been cited to me and which justifies that "position, namely, Naismith v. London Film Productions Ld.,[3] "which was not by any means on all fours with this case, "but it has a bearing on this matter which is perhaps worth "mentioning."

The judge dealt with the facts of the Naismith case[3] and then proceeded to deal with that case when it was before the Court of Appeal, and said[4]: "It was held that the direction to the jury "[that the obligation which the defendants owed to the plaintiff "was that owed to an invitee] was wrong. Goddard L.J., who "was a member of the court, agreed with Sir Wilfrid Greene, "M.R. and said[5]: 'In the first place, the standard of duty was "'not correctly stated to the jury, though it is only fair to point "'out that Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co. Ld. v. English,[6] which "'has done so much to clarify the law on that point, was not "'cited to Lord Hewart L.C.J. The relationship of the parties

" ' was not that of invitor and invitee, but that of employer and " ' employee, and it follows that the jury should have been " ' directed that the defendants' duty was not merely to warn " ' against unusual dangers known to them, and not to the plain- " ' tiff, but also to make the place of employment, and the plant " ' and material used, as safe as the exercise of reasonable skill " ' and care would permit.' " Lewis J. went on to say [7]: " It " seems to me that, if in that case Goddard L.J. was saying that " the position was not that of an invitor and an invitee although " the premises upon which the accident happened belonged to the " invitor or were in the occupation of the invitor, it can hardly be " said that the position of invitor and invitee arose where, in my " view, the defendants were not the occupiers of the premises " where the accident happened. That case, as I have said, is a " case exemplifying the doctrine that an employer has got to see " that the plant which he asks his employees to use is reasonably " safe, or, in other words, to take reasonable precaution to see " that it is safe. In my view Naismith v. London Film Produc- " tions Ld.[8] is, as Goddard L.J. clearly said, a case like Wilsons " and Clyde Coal Co. v. English,[9] where the defendants were " found to be liable because they had not taken reasonable care " to see that the plant—if I may use that expression with regard " to a lady's dress—which the employee was told to use at the " performance was proper equipment. When I say that there was " a duty upon the defendants to provide proper equipment, the " equipment in such a case may be a dress but in other cases in " which the expression ' defective plant ' has been used the plant " has been a crane or some sort of tool which the employee had " been called upon by the employer to use. Therefore this case " falls to be decided upon what are the duties of the defendants " in the circumstances of this case towards the plaintiff. The " words I have just read from a judgment of Goddard L.J. in " that case and also the words of Goddard L.J. in Paine v. Colne " Valley Electricity Supply Co. Ld. and British Insulated Cables " Ld.,[10] would seem to bear out this proposition. The common " law duty of an employer towards his employees is to provide a " safe place for their work. In other words, having in mind " similar expressions by other judges, which I need not go into " —and with this counsel for the plaintiff agrees—it is to take " reasonable care to see that the premises are safe.

" I confess that I am very troubled as to whether, when " Goddard L.J. used the expression ' provide a place which is " ' safe ' and the other expressions used in the cases, that means " anything more than that the premises belonging to or occupied " by the employer upon which the employee is to work ought to " be safe. Of course I leave out of consideration, in saying that, " that it is long settled that, if an employee is asked to work "with defective tools or tools as to which the employer has not "taken reasonable care to see that they are efficient, the employee "has a cause of action although he may be working with those "tools or plant quite away from the employer's premises. "Similarly, of course, Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co. Ld. v. "English [11] makes it perfectly clear that, if an employer working "on somebody else's premises, asks his workmen to do their work "on an unsafe system, it does not matter where the premises are "or to whom they belong upon which the workmen are asked to "work. I confess, however, that I see very great difficulty in "saying that there is a duty upon the employer to see that "premises are reasonably safe upon which he asks his workmen "to work when he has no control over those premises whatever. "I have asked counsel to refer me to any case in which it was "held that the plaintiff was liable for unsafe premises, quite "apart from faulty system or unsafe plant, in which those "premises were not in the occupation of the employer, that is to "say, were not the employer's own premises, and the researches "of counsel on each side, I understand, have been unable to find "any such case."

Then the judge went on to say [12]: "Applying, I hope, the "common sense test, it does seem to me a very curious proposi-"tion that, when a householder asks a contractor to come in "and paint his house, unless the contractor goes over the whole "house to see that every floor is safe or takes reasonable steps "to see that the house is safe, he, the contractor, is liable if "the floor collapses and one of his workmen is injured. It may "very well be, of course, that in those cases the occupier of "the house is personally liable by reason of an unusual danger, of "which he knew or ought to have known and failed to warn the "contractor or his workmen. All I can say is that it seems to me "a great extension of the doctrine of reasonable care which an "employer has got to take with regard to his men that, where-"ever they are sent out to work, he has got to go and see that "the premises are reasonably safe for them to work upon. I "have, therefore, as a proposition of law, very grave difficulty "in seeing that there is any liability upon the employers in this "case. If there be any such liability and it is the duty of the "employer to take reasonable steps to see that the premises are "safe although they are not his premises, I have to consider "whether or not any such reasonable steps were taken in this "case, assuming my view of the law is erroneous and that there "was a duty." I entirely agree with that view of the law as stated by Lewis J. The question is whether I am entitled to take that view, having regard to some observations of Denning L.J. in Christmas v. General Cleaning Contractors Ld.,[13] to which I will refer hereafter.

Cilia v. H. M. James & Sons (a firm). Spark (third party).

Byrne J.

The other case relied on by Mr. Finlay is Hodgson v. British Arc Welding Co. Ld. and B. & N. Green & Silley Weir Ld.,[14] in which Hilbery J. said[15]: "On the evidence, I cannot find that "any case is made out against the first defendants, the plaintiff's "employers. The work in question was to be done by them in "premises over which they had no control whatsoever. They "were not occupiers of the premises. They were only a firm of "contractors employed to do certain work in a ship which was "then in the hands of the shipwrights for repairs, and they "contracted to do that work for the shipwrights", and the judge dealt with the case on that basis, there being, of course, a difference to some extent between the facts there and the facts in the case with which I have to deal, because in Hodgson's case the defendants made use of (as was the custom) various tackle, scaffolds and so forth that had been placed in position by other contractors.

Mr. Goodenday, on behalf of the plaintiff, relies upon Christmas v. General Cleaning Contractors Ld.,[16] in which Denning L.J. first of all disposed of Taylor v. Sims and Sims,[17] indicating that he was not in agreement with it. He said[18]: "The next question "is whether the contractors are liable to their workman, the "plaintiff. Mr. Nelson, for the contractors, argued that em-"ployers who send their men out to work on the premises of other "people have no responsibility for the safety of those premises, "and he cited Taylor v. Sims and Sims[19] in support of that "proposition. He said that it was for the occupier to see that "the premises were safe for the workman and not for the employer "to do so. I cannot agree with that proposition. Until recently "many people thought that an occupier was bound to use reason-"able care to see that his premises were safe for workmen he "invited on to them: but that is no longer true. The decision of "the House of Lords in London Graving Dock v. Horton[20] shows "that an occupier can allow his premises to remain defective and "dangerous with impunity so long as he gives the men warning "of the risk, or the danger is so obvious that they must be aware "of it. If this is so, then I think it must follow that it is for the "employer, who sends his men to the premises, to take reason-"able care to see that the premises are safe for the men or else "take proper steps to protect the men from the dangers to which "he sends them. There is a difference between a masterman and "a journeyman. A masterman, working on his own account, who "knows of the dangers, has a choice before him. He need not "do the work if he does not wish to run the risk. But a journey-"man, working for another, has no such easy choice. He has "been sent to do the work and he may well feel that do it he "must, even though he knows that it involves risk. If such a "man has no remedy against the occupier—and Horton's case[20] "shows that he has none—then it must be the duty of his "employer to take reasonable care to protect him. This seems to "me to be implied in the observations of Lord Porter and Lord "Norman in Horton's case.[20]"

The facts of Christmas v. General Cleaning Contractors Ld.,[21] as stated in the headnote, were: "An occupier of premises con-"tracted with a window cleaning company to clean the windows "of his premises once a fortnight. An employee of the company "stepped out on to the sill outside a window of the pre-"mises, 6¼ inches wide, and holding on to the bottom cross-"piece of the top and outer sash with his right hand he "pushed it up to the top of the window frame. The lower "sash, which was raised a few inches from the bottom of the "frame, without being touched by the window cleaner, by "reason of its weights being ill-balanced then came down upon "his hand, so that he lost his balance, fell and was injured. "Safety belts had been provided by the employers, but the "plaintiff did not use one, because no hooks were fixed in the "structure of the club's premises to which a safety belt could "be attached. No complaint about the window had been made "by anyone. The window cleaner sued his employers and also "the occupier, claiming damages for his injury." It was held that the occupier was not responsible, and it was said: "That "it was the duty of the window cleaning company, who sent their "employees to the premises, to take reasonable care to lay out "the work carefully, to see that the premises were safe for their "employees or else to take proper steps to protect them from "the dangers to which they were sent."

It is to be observed that Hodson L.J.[22] in that case did not state the proposition with regard to the obligation of the employer to see that the premises are safe that had been stated by Denning L.J.; and Lloyd-Jacob J., who was a member of the court, expressed the matter finally in this way[23]: "As against "the first defendants, on the judge's findings the only question "is whether they took reasonable care to provide a safe system "of work for their servant. They admittedly required him to "stand upon a ledge 6¼ inches wide and 27 feet from the ground "with no protection from a fall . . ."

That case went to the House of Lords[24] and it is to be observed that in the House of Lords the duty of the employer with regard to the safety of the premises was apparently only referred to, and indeed in their various speeches the Law Lords appeared to base their judgments on the observation of Lloyd-Jacob J. in the Court of Appeal, and based them entirely on the question of the system of work. Mr. Goodenday says that the observations of Denning L.J. in which he disposes of the case of

Taylor v. Sims and Sims[25] is not obiter dictum, but is part of the ratio decidendi. Mr. Finlay, on the other hand, submits that it is obiter, and I agree with Mr. Finlay's contention. I do not think, for the purposes of that case, that the observations of Denning L.J. were necessary, and treating them, of course, with the greatest possible respect, I find that on the consideration of the whole case and on what took place in the House of Lords I am not bound by what the Lord Justice said with regard to the case of Taylor v. Sims and Sims.[25]

Furthermore, in London Graving Dock v. Horton,[26] referred to by Denning L.J., the question for decision was the duty of an employer to an invitee. As I understand Horton's case the invitor fulfils his duty by warning of danger, but an employer has to go further than that with regard to his employee. I therefore adopt the reasoning given by Lewis J. in Taylor v. Sims and Sims,[27] and in my view, in the circumstances of the present case, the employer was under no duty, having regard to the fact that his workman was not to work on premises occupied by the employer, to take all reasonable steps to see that the premises were reasonably safe.

But in case I am wrong with regard to that view of the matter, I think it would be right for me to consider the case on the basis that the employer is under that duty, although the premises are not occupied by him. The question then arises whether the evidence indicates that the employer has fulfilled his duty which is stated by Mr. Goodenday—and there can be no doubt as to the accuracy of the proposition of law—to take reasonable care and to direct his mind to prevent foreseeable dangers of which he knew or ought to have known.

What is the evidence with regard to that duty owed by the employer, assuming that he owes that duty, in the case of premises which he does not himself occupy? The evidence before me is that this steel plate was "live," that it was in this loft where it had been, so far as one could tell, for a number of years; it was put in by the occupier when there were fire bombs falling. The premises were a dwelling-house. The defendants were local builders and contractors who would be expected to know something of the property in the neighbourhood. The work that the defendants had to do was plumbing work on the ground floor. They also had some electrical work to do, it is quite true, and they employed for that purpose a sub-contractor; but this accident happened when they were carrying out their plumbing contract.

Evidence has been given (which, of course, is not necessarily conclusive, but evidence from people in the trade) to the effect that this was a most unexpected thing to occur. [His Lordship referred to the evidence of Mr. James, a member of the defendant firm, who had been in the trade for 40 years, and who said that he looked round the lower floor of the house and, having regard to the work that was going to be done, there was no reason to suspect any kind of danger. According to his experience in the building trade it was not normal practice to carry out a preliminary inspection of premises, unless the premises appeared to be dangerous. His Lordship continued:] Obviously if the builder is asked to do work on a house which is in imminent danger of tumbling down, then, if the builder knows that, it would be his business, by looking, to observe it. If he knows that or ought to have known it then, of course, his duty is not to subject his workmen to unnecessary risks and he would have to devise, according to the work that was required to be done, a system of work having regard to the dangers that were present. But Mr. James said that the house was apparently a perfectly ordinary and normal dwelling-house, and it was not normal practice to carry out a preliminary inspection. He had never heard of an inspection to find electrical faults, and if a plumber was to work on a tank it was not normal to cut off the electric current.

All that sounds to me like common sense. I cannot imagine that we have yet reached the stage, if a householder finds that his storage tank in the loft is overflowing and there is obviously something wrong with the ball-cock or the valve, and he sends for his builder and tells him that he wants a plumber to attend to this, that a builder would then have to come into the house and test every electrical point and perhaps see whether the roof of the loft was quite safe and whether the roof was likely to fall in while the plumber went up to attend to the job. Among other things it would, I should have thought, make attention to a ball-cock a prohibitive item for any householder. I have to determine whether there is evidence here which demonstrates that the defendants failed to take reasonable care and to direct their minds to prevent foreseeable danger, of which they knew or ought to have known. If the defendants did not know of this danger, nobody did, and even the electrician, the contractor employed by the defendants, who went up into the loft, said that he did not see this steel plate lying on the floor. It is quite true, he said, that if he had seen it he would have removed it, because he said that undoubtedly the condition of the loft was dangerous. Everybody knows that that is, unfortunately, only too true, but it is like locking the stable door when the horse has departed. He said: "The condition of the loft was dangerous. There is always a "possibility of leakage from conduit pipes"; I suppose that is a truism also. He said that steel plates on the conduit pipes are dangerous, and this plate should have been moved.

But all those observations are, of course, counsels of perfection. What I have to ask myself is: Would a reasonable employer, exercising due care for the safety of his workmen, be expected to foresee such a remote possibility as a steel plate lying on top of a conduit pipe which has become defective and is therefore sending a charge of electricity through the plate, when all that he is required to do by the terms of the contract is to attend to some matters of a plumbing nature on the ground floor, with, of course, the possibility, I suppose, that some attention might have to be given to the tank in the loft? I cannot find myself able to say that it was a foreseeable matter, or that a reasonable employer would know, or ought to have known, of any such danger as this. Neither am I able to say that it was his duty to carry out a complete inspection of the premises in order to say that all was absolutely safe before his workmen began to work.

In the unusual nature of this accident—the remote possibility of such a state of affairs existing—I find it quite impossible to think that it could have been present to the mind of any employer, no matter how he was trying to foresee the possible dangers in which his workmen might be required to work. For all those reasons this action must fail.

Fire Service. Military law — Court-martial — Certiorari — Whether subject to.

The applicant, a fireman, on being ordered to clean the uniform of an assistant divisional officer of a fire brigade, refused to do so. Thereupon he was suspended from duty and charged under the Fire Services (Discipline) Regulations, 1948, reg. 1, with disobedience to orders. The chief fire officer heard the matter and held that the applicant was guilty of disobedience to orders and punished the offence by a caution, that being the least of the punishments laid down in regulation 13 of the regulations of 1948. The applicant applied to the Divisional Court for leave to move for certiorari to quash the order of the chief fire officer.

The Divisional Court refused leave, holding that a chief officer of a force governed by discipline, such as a fire brigade, in exercising disciplinary authority over a member of the force, was not acting judicially or quasi-judicially. Certiorari went to courts or to some body which could fairly be said to be a court. The court would not interfere with the discipline of police forces, fire brigades or similar bodies which in their nature must be generally known as disciplined services and where the chief officer was simply acting as an officer in the matter of discipline. On appeal:—

Held, that the court, in its discretion, should refuse the application. The applicant had deliberately disobeyed the orders given to him by a superior officer. If he felt that he had been ordered to do something which he thought he ought not to be ordered to do, there were proper means of bringing his complaint to the Fire Authority.

MOTION for leave to move for an order of certiorari.

The applicant, Ronald Alexander Fry, was a fireman in the County of Glamorgan Fire Brigade. He sought an order to quash a decision made by the chief fire officer of the brigade under the Fire Services (Discipline) Regulations, 1948,[1] made pursuant to the Fire Services Act, 1947. In his affidavit in support of his application he stated: "2. On March 5, 1954, I "was ordered by leading fireman Parker to clean the uniform of "Assistant Divisional Officer Evans. I considered that this order "was not a lawful order, because the orders issued to the said "fire brigade preclude an officer from giving such an order to a "fireman and I therefore declined to comply with it. 3. Later "the same day I was notified that I had been suspended from "duty on half pay because of my action and I was escorted off "the fire station. 4. On March 9, 1954, I was charged under "paragraph 1 of the Fire Services (Discipline) Regulations, 1948,[1] "with disobedience to orders in that I on March 5, 1954, "failed to carry out a lawful order given to me to clean the fire "uniform of an officer attached to Station C. W. "Bates the chief officer of the said fire brigade (hereinafter called "'the chief officer') on March 19, 1954. The hearing was con-"ducted by the chief officer in such a way that I was denied "a fair trial. 6. Divisional Officer Hogg, the complainant, acted "as presenting officer and made a speech opening his case. "Before any witnesses were called Gunter said that the proceed-"ings were out of order because I had not been supplied with "copies of any report, complaint or other written allegation on "which the charge was founded as required by paragraph 2 (2) of "the said regulations. The chief officer swept this aside without "considering it. 6. Gunter next said that he submitted that "there was no case to answer on the grounds that the said order "was unlawful because it was an order to do something which "was outside the scope of a fireman's duties and because it "contravened National Fire Service Instruction No. 45/1942, "which instruction held good in the said fire brigade. A copy of "the said instruction, which prohibits firemen being employed as "personal servants of officers and precludes an officer from having "his uniform looked after by a fireman, except as a purely "private arrangement in certain circumstances, is now produced "and shown to me marked 'R.A.F. 1.' 7. Gunter was about to "develop this argument when the chief officer interrupted him "and said that he had no doubt that the order was lawful."

The following case was cited in argument in addition to those referred to in the judgment: Rex v. Milk Marketing Board, ex parte North.[2]

April 2, 1954. LORD GODDARD C.J. Mr. Lloyd-Jones applies for leave to move for certiorari to bring up an order of the chief fire officer of the Glamorgan Fire Brigade before whom the applicant was charged with a disciplinary offence and was cautioned.

In my opinion, the chief officer, although he is the chief officer of a body set up by statute in the sense that he sits by virtue of the regulations made under the Fire Services Act, 1947, cannot in any sense be said to be a court. The Secretary of State, under the power given him by the Act of 1947, has made disciplinary regulations laying down terms under which fire officers are to administer discipline in the body of which they are chief officers, and providing for certain penalties which may be inflicted, and the conditions under which they may be inflicted. Those regulations give a right of appeal, to the fire authority in certain cases, and to the Secretary of State in other cases, but where the only punishment awarded, if it can be dignified by the name of punishment, is a caution, there is no appeal.

It is said that this court can review the order of the chief officer who administered the caution.

In Regina v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner, ex parte Parker,[1] a case under a different statute and which is not entirely on all fours with the present case, I said[2]: "Where a "person, whether he is a military officer, a police officer or any "other person whose duty it is to act in matters of discipline, is "exercising disciplinary powers, it is most undesirable, in my "opinion, that he should be fettered by threats of orders of "certiorari and so forth, because that would interfere with the "free and proper disciplinary exercise of the powers that it may "be expected he would otherwise use."

It seems to me impossible to say that a chief officer of a force which is governed by discipline, such as a fire brigade is, in exercising disciplinary authority over a member of the force, acting either judicially or quasi-judicially, any more than a schoolmaster is when he is exercising disciplinary powers over his pupils. It is true that there is an Act of Parliament, the Fire Services Act, 1947, but so there is an Army Act, and there are the Queen's Regulations under the Army Act. Under the Army Act a court-martial can be set up to deal with certain offences, and a commanding officer has power to deal with certain disciplinary offences in the orderly room; there he is not sitting as a court but as an officer administering discipline. I have never heard it suggested that this court can issue certiorari to bring up his order, nor do I know of any case with regard to police officers, who are also dealt with under regulations in matters of discipline, in which this court has ever yet purported to exercise control over those bodies by the issue of the writ of certiorari. Certiorari goes to courts, or to something which can fairly be said to be a court. Recently, beginning with Rex v. Electricity Commissioners, ex parte London Electricity Joint Committee Co. (1920) Ld.,[3] very considerable expansion has been given to the word "court" because nowadays government departments are given powers which may be called semi-judicial or quasi-judicial powers, and, accordingly, this court has exercised control over them by certiorari. That is an entirely different thing from saying that this court can interfere with the discipline of police forces, fire brigades or similar bodies which, in their nature, must be generally known as disciplined services, and where the chief officer is simply acting as an officer in the matter of discipline. In such cases this court ought not to exercise control by means of the writ of certiorari. In my opinion, there is no ground for giving leave to move in this case, and the application is refused.

Hallett J. I agree. I am reinforced in my opinion by the allegations contained in the affidavit filed on behalf of the applicant. Mr. Lloyd-Jones has sought to convince us that this court is being asked to exercise its jurisdiction of supervising the proceedings of inferior courts, but the first complaint in the affidavit is that the applicant was given an order to do something which he says he ought not to have been ordered to do. There is there no question of any proceeding of any court, but this court so far is being asked to review whether an order given to one member of an organized body by a senior member of the body was a proper order or not. Then he says: "In fact the penalty "I sustained was a loss of pay of £8 14s. 6d. because I was sus-"pended on half-pay for two weeks prior to the hearing." Neither the order nor the suspension had anything to do with the conduct of the hearing and cannot be affected by the hearing; but we are asked by a side wind to review the propriety of the order and the subsequent suspension by going into whether the hearing was conducted in what is alleged to have been a non-judicial manner. I only add those two facts because they seem to me to illustrate the distinction which Lord Goddard C.J. has drawn between a purely disciplinary proceeding which is not the proper subject of review by this court, and a judicial proceeding which is. I agree that this application ought to be refused.

Application refused.

Singleton, Hodson and Morris L.JJ.

April 6, 1954. Singleton L.J. By the Fire Services Act, 1947, s. 4: ". . . the council of every county and county borough "shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be the fire authority "for the area of the council," and power was given by the Act under which the county council can delegate certain of its powers. The Fire Services (Discipline) Regulations, 1948, deal, as the name shows, with questions of discipline. [His Lordship read the relevant regulations and the portions of the affidavit of the applicant set out above and continued:] There is nothing to show that there was any written report, complaint, or other written allegation. The submission which was made by the friend of the accused that the proceedings were out of order, because he had not been supplied with copies of the report failed because of want of any proof that there was any written report. The accused did not ask, nor did his friend ask, if there was any such written report. The submission was not based upon fact, and perhaps it is not surprising in those circumstances that the chief officer swept it aside, though I should not think it is right to say that he did so without considering it.

The chief officer was well acquainted with the Statutory Instrument; he knew the nature of the order which had been given, and he formed the view that the order was a lawful order, and he so held.

It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that the applicant was given an order which he disobeyed. He was found guilty of disobedience to orders, and the punishment inflicted upon him was the least of those set out under regulation 13 of the regulations of 1948—a caution. It meant that, as he had been suspended for some days, he lost half his pay during the time of his suspension. The order which was given was a simple one according to the applicant, namely that he should clean the uniform of Assistant Divisional Officer Evans. The applicant disobeyed that order. He might have dealt with it otherwise; he might have obeyed the order and then have put forward to the fire authority, or, if necessary, to the Secretary of State, the question whether, in view of the instruction which had been issued, this order was lawful and one with which a fireman was bound to comply. He did not do that; he disobeyed the order, and so the case was made the subject-matter of a charge. I cannot help feeling that it was extraordinarily foolish conduct. In these days it behoves everyone to act reasonably. If every fireman or every policeman is to take it upon himself to disobey an order of this kind and to say: "I do "not think it is lawful," it will become almost impossible to carry on any public service. The Secretary of State has made other regulations—the Fire Services (Ranks and Conditions of Service) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 546)—which deal with the good government of the fire services, and with questions of discipline. It is always possible for a man to raise a question whether or not an order, such as this, is a proper order to give, and the sensible way is to carry out the order and raise the matter afterwards, if he wishes to do so, instead of disobeying it and asking for trouble. The applicant says in his affidavit that the chief officer did not deal with his case in the way in which he ought to have done. He complains that as to one matter (and I have mentioned it already) the chief officer swept this aside without considering it, and, as to the lawfulness or otherwise of the order, that the chief officer interrupted Gunter's argument and said he had no doubt that the order was lawful. I have said nothing as to the latter part of the affidavit, as it has not been possible that this court should hear any answer to it, but if that which is stated in the affidavit is true (and I say nothing as to that) it does not bear a very pleasant look.

The relief which the applicant seeks arises under section 7 (2) of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1938. By subsection (1) of the section it is provided: "The "prerogative writs of mandamus, prohibition and certiorari shall "no longer be issued by the High Court." Subsection (2) provides: "In any case where the High Court would, but for the "provisions of the last foregoing subsection, have had jurisdic-"tion to order the issue of a writ of . . . certiorari removing any "proceedings . . . into the High Court . . . the court may make "an order . . . removing the proceedings or matter, as the case "may be." Thus the remedy is discretionary in the court. If it is seen that there is a danger of serious injustice being done by the decision of an inferior court through its assuming a jurisdiction it had not, or through something in the trial which is unlawful or contrary to the interests of justice, then the Divisional Court may grant the remedy which is sought in this case.

In the Divisional Court Lord Goddard C.J. said: "In my "opinion, the chief officer, although he is the chief officer of a "body set up by statute in the sense that he sits by virtue of "the regulations made under the Fire Services Act, 1947, cannot "in any sense be said to be a court"; and later in his judgment the Lord Chief Justice said: "It seems to me impossible to say "that a chief officer of a force which is governed by discipline, "such as a fire brigade, is, in exercising disciplinary authority "over a member of the force, acting either judicially or quasi-"judicially." The Lord Chief Justice was following the decision of the Divisional Court, in which he gave the first judgment in Regina v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner, ex parte Parker.[1] The Lord Chief Justice in that case having held that the Commissioner of Police, in the circumstances of that case, was not exercising any judicial or quasi-judicial function, but was merely acting as a disciplinary authority, added[2]: "Where a person, "whether he is a military officer, a police officer or any other "person whose duty it is to act in matters of discipline, is exer-"cising disciplinary powers, it is most undesirable, in my opinion, "that he should be fettered by threats of orders of certiorari and "so forth, because that would interfere with the free and proper "disciplinary exercise of the powers that it may be expected he "would otherwise use."

In that case the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was based on both points: first, that the commissioner of police was not sitting in a judicial or quasi-judicial capacity; and, secondly, that the remedy which was sought was discretionary in the court. In this case I prefer to base my decision upon the second ground. This applicant is a member of a service which is of great public importance. For the good of that service and of those who are employed in the service, the Secretary of State has made regulations so that their position may be ascertained, and so that there may be as few difficulties as possible. There is, as was said in another case, a complete code. If a man feels that he is ordered to do something which he ought not to be ordered to do, he can raise the matter in the way that I have said, but, if instead of doing that, he deliberately sets out to disobey the order given to him by a superior officer, he is only making difficulties for himself and for the whole of the service, and that is something which he ought to realize. Again, in the ordinary case which is dealt with by the chief officer, a case of discipline, there is an appeal to the fire authority. In the circumstances of the present case, there was not, because the punishment inflicted was only a caution, but there are ways and means of bringing to the notice of the fire authority in a proper case the conduct of one who has to preside over a disciplinary tribunal of this kind, if it is thought right and proper that that should be done.

In the circumstances I do not think that the Divisional Court ought to have granted the relief which the applicant sought, nor do I think that this court should do so. The application must be dismissed.

HODSON L.J. I agree, and have nothing to add.

MORRIS L.J. I also agree.

Application dismissed.

* MORTON v. MORTON (No. 2).

[M. 1952 (D.) 250.]

Husband and Wife — Maintenance — Agreement — Change of circumstances—Whether wilful neglect to maintain—Jurisdiction of court to review agreed terms—Whether reasonable at time of application —Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 23.

Legal Aid—Costs—Husband and wife—Order for security for wife's costs —Wife legally aided—Hardship.

On an application under section 23 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, the court has jurisdiction to review the terms of a separation agreement relating to the maintenance of the wife, and to decide whether, in all the circumstances at the time when the application is made, the husband is providing reasonable maintenance for his wife. In considering such an application it is however essential to bear in mind that the parties have agreed terms and the court will be reluctant to vary those terms.

Decision of Judge Gerwyn Thomas (sitting as a Special Commissioner in divorce) affirmed.

Appeal from Judge Gerwyn Thomas.

The applicant, Maria Alice Morton, was married to the respondent, Willie Colston Morton, in 1913 and they had two children, a girl who was born in 1914 and a boy born in 1919. Both these children were alive at the time of the application. In 1930, the husband and wife made a separation agreement in writing, the terms of which are set out in the judgment of Singleton L.J. The husband thereafter continued to make the payments to the wife which he had agreed to make for her maintenance. In 1933 he stopped making payment for the maintenance of his son as the son had started working. The wife took proceedings in the magistrates' court against the husband for wilful neglect to maintain her, but on appeal to the Divisional Court [1] the order made in her favour by the stipendiary magistrate was discharged. In 1951 the wife again applied to the court of summary jurisdiction on the ground that her husband had wilfully neglected to maintain her and had deserted her. That summons also was dimissed. In May, 1952, the wife applied to the District Registry of the High Court under section 23 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950,[2] again alleging that her husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her. Her application was heard by Judge Gerwyn Thomas sitting as a special commissioner in divorce and, after considering a report by the District Registrar of Cardiff District Registry about the circumstances and means of the parties at various dates, he dismissed the application. The wife appealed.

The facts are more fully stated in the judgment of Singleton L.J.

E. P. Wallis-Jones for the applicant wife.

D. P. Rowland for the respondent husband.

No cases other than those referred to in the judgment of Singleton L.J. were cited in argument.

Singleton L.J. This is an appeal from an order of Judge Gerwyn Thomas, sitting as special commissioner in divorce on

[2] Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23: "(1) Where a husband has "been guilty of wilful neglect to pro- "vide reasonable maintenance for his "wife or the infant children of the "marriage, the court, if it would have "jurisdiction to entertain proceedings "by the wife for judicial separation, "may, on the application of the wife, "order the husband to make to her "such periodical payments as may be "just; and the order may be enforced "in the same manner as an order for "alimony in proceedings for judicial "separation."

November 25, 1953. He had before him an application under section 23 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which replaces section 5 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act of 1949. [His Lordship read section 23 (1), and continued:] The power given by that subsection is in addition to any rights which the wife may have to apply to the magistrates for an order.

The facts of this case are, I hope, unusual. The history, as given to us by Mr. Wallis-Jones, is as follows: The wife is now 60 years of age; the husband is 62. He was until comparatively recently a collier earning considerable wages, and wages which were higher in 1953 than they had been before. The parties were married in 1913. There were two children, a girl born in 1914, and a son who was born in 1919. Both of those children are still alive; both are married, and the wife, who is the appellant in this court, lives with her married daughter. In 1930 there were matrimonial differences between husband and wife, and the wife took proceedings, which were compromised; an arrangement being made and reduced to writing, bearing a sixpenny stamp. The arrangement is in these terms: "Morton against Morton. Heads "of Agreement. In consideration of Maria Alice Morton . . . "withdrawing summons for maintenance against Willie Colston "Morton . . . the said Maria Alice Morton and Willie Colston "Morton hereby mutually agree to enter into separation deed con-"taining the following clauses: 1. Husband to pay wife one "pound a week and boy ten shillings a week the first payment "to be made on Saturday next. 2. While unemployed husband "to pay wife for herself and boy amount of dependants benefit "only. 3. Husband to deliver to wife her goods and furniture. "4. Wife to have custody of boy with right of access by husband. "5. Usual clause that no proceedings be taken while terms of "agreement kept. 6. Mutual dum casta clause." That was perhaps a little unusual. "7. Husband to contribute £3 3s. 0d. to "wife's costs." That document is dated August 19, 1930. No further agreement followed, but under the terms of that document the husband paid £1 a week to his wife regularly, and it is not said that he ever fell into arrears.

In 1933 the son of the marriage started working, and the father ceased paying the 10s. a week in respect of the boy. The wife took proceedings against the husband in the magistrates' court, and an order was made by the stipendiary magistrate that the husband should pay the sum of 30s. a week to the wife. The husband's appeal to the Divisional Court was heard by the President and Hodson J. on January 14, 1942.[1] It was held that the heads of agreement were a binding contract, and were not a contract to make a contract; that the existence of the contract was not necessarily a bar to the making of a subsequent order; and, according to the headnote, it was further held that as the terms of the agreement had been faithfully carried out, the husband could not be said to be guilty of an offence of wilfully neglecting to maintain, and there were no grounds on which the magistrate could make an order. It may be that the latter part of that headnote goes a little too far in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Tulip v. Tulip,[2] to which I shall refer. The result was that the Divisional Court discharged the order made by the stipendiary magistrate.

On November 13, 1951, the wife again applied to the stipendiary magistrate on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain her, and on the ground of desertion. How there could be desertion, in view of the terms of the agreement, which the husband and wife had made, I fail to see. The stipendiary magistrate dismissed the summons; and there was no appeal from that decision.

On April 19, 1952, the wife's solicitors wrote to the husband: "We have been instructed by your wife to write to you regarding "the amount of £1 a week which she receives from you under "the terms of an agreement entered into as long ago as August "19, 1930, when proceedings under the Summary Jurisdiction "Acts, instigated by her, were compromised and as a result "she then withdrew the summons for maintenance. In view "of present day conditions you will surely appreciate that this "sum is quite inadequate to maintain your wife and we hope "to learn from you that you are prepared to increase the weekly "sum by a substantial amount. Please let us hear from you "at an early date." To which the husband's solicitors replied on April 26, 1952: "Mr. W. C. Morton of Tonypandy has called "to see us today upon your letter addressed to him on the 19th "instant. We would refer you to our letter of November 29 last. "Before the fresh proceedings between the parties came to a "hearing in the Merthyr magistrates' court in November last "negotiations were conducted between your client's then solicitor "and ourselves with a view to a new agreement being entered "into out of court. Those negotiations were carried on strictly "without prejudice to our client's position under the existing "agreement, and although it was stated on his behalf that he was "prepared to consider making an increase in the weekly main-"tenance provided by the existing agreement your client's terms "were so unreasonable having regard to her husband's circum-"stances that he had no alternative than to allow the case to "come on for hearing with the result mentioned in our letter "to you of November 29 last." That was a reference to the dismissal of the wife's complaint. The letter continues: "Since "he failed to reach an agreement with his wife then he feels "that it is useless making another attempt to reach a reasonable "agreement with her and he has therefore instructed us to say "that he will defend any proceedings which she may be advised "to take against him in the matter."

On May 9, 1952, Mrs. Morton issued an application under section 23 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, claiming that her husband " . . . has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable main- " tenance for her and prays that he be ordered to make to her " such payments for her maintenance as may be just." The application was referred to the registrar so that he could ascertain the facts, about means and the like. Counsel appeared before him on both sides and in due course he reported: " Counsel " requested reports of means on various dates as follows " as to the applicant, and as to the respondent, so that at the request of counsel the financial position of the applicant and of the respondent was ascertained at each time for which counsel had asked. " As to applicant. On April 26, 1952, she had no income " but was in receipt of 20s. per week from the respondent and " national assistance at 22s. per week up to June 16, 1952, when " it was raised to 27s. per week but subsequently reduced (some " weeks before March 26, 1953) to 23s. 6d. per week until March " 26, 1953, on which date she became entitled to retirement " pension of 24s. per week. Therefore:—At April 26, 1952, and " May 9, 1952, no income, but receipts were 42s. per week. At " June 26, 1952, and August 20, 1952, no income, but receipts " were 47s. per week. From October 25, 1952, to March 26, 1953, " no income, but receipts were 47s. reduced to 43s. 6d. per week. " From March 26, 1953, to April 18, 1953, her income was 24s. " plus receipt of 20s., a total of 44s. per week. The rent of her " house is £1 2s. 3d. per week, electricity charges are 4s. or 5s. " per week and gas 6s. per week, one-half of which is paid by " her daughter. Applicant's outgoings therefore were at all " material dates constant at 18s. 7½d. per week. Applicant has " her daughter (working) with her husband (working) and two " daughters (one working) living with her occupying four-fifths of " the house, but paying only half the outgoings. A rental of 40s. " per week would not be unreasonable for the accommodation " used. Applicant looks after the house for herself and " daughter's family and services rendered could be valued at 20s. " per week." From the latter part of the report on the applicant's position, it will be seen that she could have been in a better financial position than she was, if her daughter and her daughter's husband had paid a reasonable amount for the accommodation they had at her house. They were paying very little. At the date of the report the daughter had been left by her husband; but prior to the time of his leaving the daughter, he had been working as a collier and had been contributing £7 a week to the house, from which it may be said that the income of the household was very considerable, although that may not be an element for consideration. At the same time I think that it is something which is worth noticing in the unusual circumstances of this case.

As to the respondent husband, the report says: " At all " material dates he had a varying wage plus a constant income

"as follows." He had some house property from which there was a balance of rent in his favour, after paying rates, of 4s. 0d. a week. On April 26, 1952, his gross wages were £14 11s. 11d., but by May 3, 1952, he was sick and not working, and he did not work again until June 26, 1952. During that time he was drawing sickness benefit. He returned to work as a collier for a short time, and I should imagine he was not fit for it, because on March 25, 1953, he took other work, and his gross wages from October 25, 1952, to April 18, 1953, were £9 15s. 11d. a week. That was the report of the registrar on the position of the two parties to this dispute.

It appeared to me at an early stage in the argument that the question before the commissioner was really one of fact, and it appeared, too, when the judgment of the commissioner was read, that he so treated it. His judgment set out the facts, and he said: "The wife, under the appropriate section of the Act, applies "to the court for maintenance from her husband on the ground "of his wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance. The "figures (which are, in fact, agreed) before me, or the funda-"mental figures, are that the husband earns £8 7s. 6d. a week as a "workman, plus 17s. 9d. a week income, which he derives from "one or two cottages, making a total of £9 5s. 3d. a week." That is the figure taken from the report as at October, 1952. The commissioner continued: "I think it is clear from the cases "quoted to me, namely, Morton v. Morton,[3] Tulip v. Tulip,[4] and "Dowell v. Dowell,[5] that that agreement"—that is the agreement of 1930—"does not preclude the court from going into this "question as to whether there is wilful neglect to provide reason-"able maintenance; and, accordingly, I permitted the application "to be heard, the registrar's report to be put in before me, and "evidence to be called by either party. I think I am entitled to, "and should, look at the agreement and the terms of the agree-"ment as representing what was fair and reasonable in 1930, at "any rate, and I treat it as of evidential value as to what was "fair at that time as constituted by the free will of both parties: "£1 per week. If I understand the law, what I have to consider "at the present moment, in view of the change of circumstances, "and having regard to all the circumstances, is whether the "husband has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable mainten-"ance, having regard to the fact of what his earnings were, and "as to what her receipts are."

Mr. Wallis-Jones in his submission to this court argued there that the commissioner took too narrow a view of the position, and that his duty was to consider not only what the earnings were at a particular date, but to consider what they had been before that time as well. I think, when one looks at the whole of the judgment, the commissioner did that, in fact.

The judgment continues: "I have already spoken as to his "earnings and income, and it remains for me to say what the "agreed receipts of the wife are at the present time: £1 a week "from the husband and 24s. as permanent pension, so that her "total receipts are £2 4s. 0d. That is not a high figure in all "conscience, but more than double what she thought was fair in "1930 when his wages in 1930 were about half, roughly, what "he is earning today. His wages have gone up by a little over "half, and her receipts are up by more than half. I do not know "by how much the cost of living has gone up but I take judicial "notice of the fact that the cost of living undoubtedly has gone "up since 1930. With £2 4s. 0d. a week coming in to her from "two sources, she is living in a house with a daughter and a "grand-daughter, and they are paying the expenses of the house "between them. She says that her daughter pays half the rent, "the rent being £1 5s. 3d.; she says her daughter also pays half "the gas, and I think she said half the light. She is only "charging half in spite of the fact that there are three bedrooms "in the house, she only occupies one, and the other two are "let. It is what I call a difficult case. I do not think, having "regard to all the circumstances: the earnings and income of "the husband, and the receipts of the wife, that he is in breach "of his statutory duty. I am not satisfied, accordingly, that he "has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for "his wife."

As the President pointed out in the case between these parties before the Divisional Court a dozen years or so ago, wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance imports some element of matrimonial misconduct. The commissioner did not find proof of that on the facts of this case. He applied his mind to the decision of this court in Tulip v. Tulip.[6] In that case: "In June, 1942, a "husband and wife entered into a deed of separation, the husband "covenanting (if certain stipulations were observed) to pay such "sum as after the deduction of income tax would amount to and "leave the net yearly sum of £156. Those payments were "regularly made. The wife covenanted to support and main-"tain herself out of that provision and out of her separate estate, "or otherwise. In December, 1949, the wife asked the husband "to increase the amount payable under the deed of separation. "This request was refused, and thereupon she took out a "summons in the High Court for increased maintenance, alleging "that her husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable "maintenance for her. She further asked the court to order the "husband to secure such payments as might be ordered. In his "affidavit the husband referred to the deed, and to the discharge "of his liabilities under it, and said that he relied upon the deed "and upon his wife's covenants in it 'whether by way of estoppel "'or otherwise.' It was conceded that since the date of the deed "the husband's financial position had materially improved, while "that of the wife, who was suffering from spinal arthritis, had "deteriorated. Barnard J. held, refusing the wife's application, "that, despite the change in the respective positions of the "parties, the husband, who had faithfully carried out the terms "of the deed, could not be held guilty of wilful neglect to main-"tain, which imported some element of matrimonial mis-"conduct."

The wife appealed to this court, and it was held by a majority of the court (Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Birkett L.J.), "that the existence of the deed did not preclude the wife from "applying to the court under section 5 of the Law Reform (Mis-"cellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, and that the court had juris-"diction to determine whether at the time of that application "the husband was providing maintenance for the wife which was "reasonable in the circumstances."

Harman J., who was the other member of the court, took a different view. He said [7]: "A husband who merely declines to "pay a greater sum than that stipulated in a deed is not guilty "of 'wilful neglect' to maintain within the meaning of section 5 "of the Act; the existence of a binding deed, providing present "maintenance, the terms of which have been faithfully observed, "is conclusive evidence that the husband has discharged his "obligations."

Of course, this court is bound by the decision in Tulip v. Tulip.[8] I have said already that the commissioner followed the decision in that case. I think it is right to refer to passages from the judgment of the majority, which was given by Birkett L.J. Having referred to several of the authorities, including Morton v. Morton (No. 1),[9] Birkett L.J. said [10]: "It is quite clear from a "consideration of that case, and indeed all the cases cited to us, "that the existence of a deed is no bar to the wife's application "under section 5 of the Act of 1949. Indeed, all the discussion "in the cases on the evidential value of the deed would be quite "irrelevant if this were not so. The real question therefore in "the present appeal is whether Barnard J. was right in saying, "as I think it is quite plain that he did say from the passage "which Mr. Latey cited, that because there was a deed of "separation in existence providing for maintenance, and that "this provision had been faithfully observed by the husband, it "was impossible to say that he had been guilty of wilful neglect "to provide reasonable maintenance, and that as no matrimonial "offence had therefore been committed the wife's application "must be dismissed. I am of opinion that in so deciding "Barnard J. was wrong. With great respect to him, he seems "to have ignored several essential matters. He seems to have "decided that a sum for maintenance, agreed to in 1932, was "unalterable so long as the husband continued to pay it, and "was willing to go on paying it. But the real question for his "determination was not that, but whether at the time the "application was made to him the husband had wilfully neglected "to provide reasonable maintenance. That must mean reason- "able at the time of the application, in the light of all the "circumstances then existing. . . . I think that the judge never "considered, or, if he did consider, never decided, the two "essential elements in the wife's application: (a) whether the "husband was neglecting to provide reasonable maintenance for "his wife, and (b) whether his neglect was wilful; and I think "it is plain why he never considered or decided these points. "His judgment was based on the view that where a deed was "in existence providing for maintenance, and the provision for "maintenance had been faithfully observed, there could be no "matrimonial offence of 'wilfully neglecting to provide reason- "'able maintenance' however much the circumstances had "changed. In a word, he said that once a sum for maintenance "had been fixed by mutual agreement, and embodied in a separa- "tion agreement, it must be considered to be reasonable main- "tenance for all time. In my view, this way of deciding the "application was wrong. . . ."

Thus the decision of the Court of Appeal was that although when the husband and wife separated they entered into an agreement as to what payment should be made by the husband to the wife, and the provision for maintenance had been faithfully observed, section 23 of the Act of 1950 (or section 5 of the Act of 1949) gave the wife a right to come to court and complain that her husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her, although she recognized that she had entered into an agreement with him which she thought would bind her at the time it was made, and that he had kept his side of the bargain. The decision is far-reaching and it may be that the effect of the section may well cause a husband to say: "Why "should I enter into an agreement? If I do, and I fall out of "work, or if my means become less, I am bound by the terms "of the agreement; but why should I, or any other husband, "enter into an agreement if the other party is not going to be "bound by it?" Thus it may be thought that the effect of section 23 of the Act of 1950, or of section 5 of the Act of 1949, takes something away from the sanctity of an agreement between husband and wife.

It is right that I should say that Birkett L.J., towards the end of his judgment in Tulip v. Tulip added [11]: "I refrain from "expressing any view of the merits of the application. It may be, "in such a case as this, that the court might find it difficult to "exercise its jurisdiction in favour of the wife, having regard to all "the circumstances of the case; but with that we are not con- "cerned." That is something which should be remembered before an application under section 23 (1) of the Act of 1950 is made. If there is an agreement between husband and wife, even though it be some years old, it is the duty of the one who has to consider an application under section 23 to remember that there is such an agreement, and to consider its terms, and to bear in mind that that agreement is binding on the husband, even if it does not prevent the wife from making an application under section 23. It is further to be remembered that the wife, who obtains a measure of certainty under the terms of the agreement, may be, by the terms of that agreement, in a very much better position than she would have been if she had not had the agreement. The time might come when the husband had little means of earning or of paying the amount which he had undertaken to pay. He has no answer under the agreement.

It follows from what I have said that I regard it of the utmost importance that the existence of an agreement and its terms should not be overlooked in considering whether an application should be made under this subsection. The courts ought not lightly to be asked to upset, or to go behind, the terms of an agreement freely entered into between the parties, even though, under a decision of this court, the court is clothed with power by section 23 (1) to make an order in a proper case in which it is shown that the husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife.

Let me go one stage further. The application was made notwithstanding the correspondence to which I have referred—the letters of April 19 and 26, 1952—from the terms of which it would appear that the husband had been ready to make an increased offer, and from which, again, it would appear difficult to establish "wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance." After the issue of the application, there was further correspondence which came to light during the argument before this court. A letter from the wife's solicitors, dated September 16, 1952, reads: "Dear Sirs, Morton v. Morton. Our client does not accept "your client's offer of £2 10s. 0d. a week and prefers to take the "judge's award." That offer is two-and-a-half times the amount which the wife had agreed to accept under the terms of the agreement of 1930. The earlier letter of April 26 had referred to discussions and to an offer.

It is difficult to see how it can be said that a husband is guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife in view of the fact that she was satisfied with an agreement in those circumstances.

Mr. Wallis-Jones, on behalf of the wife, said that for some part of the time in the years gone by the wife was receiving public assistance. During most of that time her son-in-law was living in the same house and earning, I suppose, much the same money as a collier as her husband was doing. The son-in-law contributed £7 a week to the house, and the daughter herself was working, while one of her daughters was working at the time of this application.

New solicitors had come upon the scene, and I suppose legal aid had been granted. After Judge Gerwyn Thomas had given his judgment, it was pointed out to him that there was a sum of £30 in court as security for the applicant's costs. The wife had obtained legal aid, and, according to a practice that prevails, the wife asked for an order for security of the costs of her application under section 23 (1). An order was made that the husband should lodge £30 in court and this was done.

I wonder how much the hearings in the various courts have cost this man? The application to the magistrate; the hearing in the Divisional Court in 1942; the hearing before the registrar, when counsel were present; the hearing before the commissioner; the £30 as security for costs provided by the husband. It is perhaps not surprising that his solicitors had written on his behalf making an offer of £2 10s. 0d. a week. It would have paid him to pay something more than he ought to pay rather than to face the costs of all these proceedings, for his wife has legal aid. There was no prospect of his getting anything back. The matter was fully investigated by a registrar, and by the county court judge sitting as special commissioner; still, an appeal was made to this court, and on February 9, 1954, a full certificate for legal aid upon the appeal was granted to the wife. There is no chance whatever of the husband getting any costs. He is a working man who is earning £8 or £9 a week, but he has had to find considerable sums of money for costs. The judgment of the commissioner gave the interpretation to the section for which the wife asked, and that which he had to decide was a pure question of fact, subject to some small criticisms which Mr. Wallis-Jones made upon his manner of approach to the subject.

I feel that this is very hard upon a working man. The wife entered into an agreement but times changed. She has had the benefit of that agreement for more than 20 years. Her husband was ready and willing in September, 1952, to increase the amount to £2 10s. 0d. a week, to avoid continued litigation, but the litigation has gone on and on. The Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, was intended to help litigants who could not bear the expense of litigation. This case at least shows what a hardship it may work on the other side. It has been said in recent years that there may be great hardship to a successful defendant to any action which is supported by the legal aid fund; for when he wins, he has little chance of getting any costs from anyone. That is a loss which, in some cases, falls upon an insurance company. In this class of case the costs of the litigation, so far as the successful husband is concerned, fall upon him, and it is a considerable burden.

I have taken a little time in this case; I hope that I have set out the facts clearly. I am satisfied that the commissioner had to decide a question of fact. He decided that there was no proof of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance within Bankruptcy—Public examination of debtor—Adjournment—Adjournment generally with liberty to restore—Whether adjournment ultra vires—Power to adjourn "from time to time"—Meaning—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), ss. 15 (3), 18 (1), 109 (2)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1952 (S.I. 1952, No. 2113), r. 192.

The power conferred by section 15 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, on the court to adjourn the public examination of a debtor "from time to time" gives power to the court to make an order not only adjourning the examination from one fixed date to another but also adjourning it generally with liberty to restore.

On May 7, 1953, a receving order was made against the debtor Olga Natalie Franciszka Lubranska von Dembinska. Her public examination was fixed for July 7. It appearing that the debtor was ill, the public examination was adjourned until July 21. Medical certificates were then produced which stated that the debtor was ill and that she might not be able to attend for "four "or five weeks at least." Thereupon an order was made adjourning the public examination generally with liberty to the debtor to apply to have it restored. The debtor did nothing further and on October 12 the Official Receiver wrote to her asking whether she wished to have the public examination restored. She did not reply to that letter, and on November 4 the late Mr. Registrar Parton made an order adjudicating the debtor a bankrupt on the ground that she had not set down an application to reinstate her public examination.

The debtor applied to Mr. Registrar Bowyer to annul the adjudication order on the ground that the order of July 21, adjourning generally her public examination, was ultra vires the court, since it was not within the powers conferred by section 15 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914,[1] and that, accordingly, the basis of the order of adjudication was wrong. The registrar dismissed the debtor's application.

The debtor appealed.

F. H. Collier for the debtor.
Muir Hunter for the Official Receiver.

EVERSHED M.R. On November 4, 1953, the late Mr. Registrar Parton made an order adjudicating one Olga Natalie Franciszka Lubranska von Dembinska a bankrupt. The order was in the following terms: "This being the day appointed for "the hearing of the Official Receiver's adjourned application for "an order of adjudication against the above-named debtor pur-"suant to section 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. And upon "hearing the Official Receiver and the debtor not being present "or represented. And it appearing that the debtor has not set "down an application to reinstate her public examination which "was adjourned generally on the 21st day of July 1953 and is "not therefore in a position to make application to the court to "approve her proposal for a composition which has been accepted "by the creditors. It is ordered that the debtor . . . be and the "said debtor is hereby adjudged bankrupt."

The circumstances which gave rise to the recital which I have read were briefly these: A suggested scheme or composition had been put forward by or on behalf of the debtor, and it is the fact that upon some date in September at a meeting of creditors summoned for the purpose those creditors had resolved to accept the proposal; but, in the meantime, the public examination of the debtor which was required to be held under the terms of section 15 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, had been from time to time adjourned. Various reasons accounted for the adjournments; but eventually on July 21, the court, having in its possession certain evidence about the state of the debtor's health, instead of again adjourning the public examination to some future fixed date, proceeded to make an order adjourning the public examination generally with liberty for the debtor—and also no doubt for the Official Receiver—to apply to have it restored; and the note of the proceedings indicates, as is the fact, that a further medical certificate had been produced stating that the debtor would be unfit to attend the court for "four to five weeks at "least." It is obvious, therefore, that the order made, if it were

"(3) The court may adjourn the "examination from time to time."

validly made, was the most sensible order which could have been made.

Thereafter nothing further happened and the Official Receiver, according to the debtor's own somewhat long affidavit, wrote on October 12 reminding her that the public examination had been standing over for a very long time indeed and asking her whether she desired to have the public examination restored. It must have been quite plain by this time to the debtor that until it had been restored and concluded, or alternatively dispensed with altogether, it was impossible to have the proposal for composition effectively approved.

However, this letter remained unacknowledged and unanswered on the debtor's part; and after about three weeks, the Official Receiver proceeded to bring on again his application for an order of adjudication, which application had itself already been once or twice adjourned.

Mr. Collier, for the debtor, has expressed the sense of grievance which his client feels, because, as events have turned out, she has been unable, so she says, to get the composition which was proposed formally approved, and she thinks that that is a hardship which she ought not to suffer. I am bound to say that I think she suffered no hardship and has no real cause for grievance whatever. I should have thought she had been treated with great consideration, numerous adjournments having been granted; but, of course, whether she has really suffered any kind of hardship is not the question which we have to decide; the question is whether on the face of it this order is liable to be impugned.

The basis upon which the debtor attacks the order is this: she says that the order made on July 21, 1953, adjourning generally the public examination with liberty for the debtor to restore, is ultra vires the court, and accordingly the whole basis upon which this adjudication rested goes. Section 15 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, provides: "The court may adjourn the "examination from time to time." I add that, as Birkett L.J. observed early in the course of the argument, there is also a general power under section 109 (2) of this Act that the court "may at any time adjourn any proceedings before it upon such "terms, if any, as it may think fit to impose."

In my judgment section 15 (3), on the face of it, quite manifestly gives power to the court to make an order, not only adjourning the examination from one fixed date to another but also adjourning it generally with liberty to restore; and that prima facie view of the subsection is, I think, strongly reinforced by the terms of section 109 (2). It seems to me also to be in accordance with the plain and ordinary sense of the English words used, and particularly the last four of the, "from time to "time," which I interpret as meaning: "as and when it is "appropriate so to do."

But Mr. Collier has argued most strongly that "from time "to time" means "from one fixed time to another fixed time," and that the court cannot do more than that, save to the extent to which express power so to do is conferred; and he says that the only express power to adjourn otherwise than from one fixed date to another fixed date is contained in rule 192 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952. I think that Mr. Collier is involved in considerable difficulty about this, because if the words of sub-section (3) are to be construed in the way he means, so as to limit the court's power of adjournment to an adjournment from one fixed date to another, then the rule would itself appear to be ultra vires, since, on the face of it, it would give a power in excess of the power given by the statute.

Rule 192 and certain other rules which follow concern, however, what are called adjournments sine die, and the rules provide that in certain events which are there specified—for example, the debtor not making a full and true disclosure—events which have not happened and which are not applicable here, then the court may adjourn the examination sine die; and in that event certain other consequences follow. Mr. Collier has said that an adjournment sine die and an adjournment such as was made here are necessarily the same thing, and that whatever the language used, the order which was made on July 21 was in fact an adjournment sine die and was bad, because it was not made in accordance with the rules.

I entirely reject that argument. This order was an order of the character which the notes I have read stated it to be—a common enough form of order which is, I think, well within the discretion of the court conferred by the statute and commonly experienced in other branches of the administration of justice. It was an order adjourning this examination generally with liberty for the debtor to restore it, and I need not repeat the obvious convenience and, as I think, consideration shown to the debtor in making the order in that form.

The rules to which I have alluded confer, within the general discretion, an express power to make orders in a particular form, called orders for adjournment sine die in certain events; and when such an order is made, and properly made, because such events have happened, certain other consequences follow which are set out in the rules; but that is to my mind in no way a limitation of the more general power under the section, which I am quite satisfied was expressly and designedly exercised in this case.

The decision of that point adversely to the debtor really disposes of this appeal, because, as Mr. Collier pointed out at the beginning of his address, his attack upon the order here, which he called a speaking order, was an attack upon what was said on its face; the ground for the adjudication made under section 18 (1) is, in effect, stated to be that the composition or scheme had not been approved in pursuance of the Act. But I add that, even if Mr. Collier were right, or if it were necessary

VON DEMBINSKA, In re.

or appropriate to look outside the recital in the order, I am far from satisfied that this court could or should interfere with the adjudication made; that is, annul it under section 29. It appears that the creditors at the first meeting, or at some adjournment of it, were invited to pass a resolution adjudging the debtor bankrupt. The resolution failed; the creditors did not pass any other resolution to the opposite effect, and therefore it might well, as it seems to me, be said that no resolution having been passed by the creditors at the first meeting or any adjournment thereof, the debtor was liable to be made bankrupt on that account. Mr. Collier says that the jurisdiction to adjudicate on that ground was excluded by the fact that at another meeting, not being the first meeting or an adjournment thereof, the creditors did pass a resolution approving what the debtor had proposed by way of composition.

I have indicated during the argument reasons for thinking that a resolution passed in such circumstances does not enable the debtor to escape from the effects of the first four lines of section 18, but I need not pursue the matter further; I only mention it to indicate that, as I think, this debtor has no grievance.

It is also said that the Official Receiver should have given the debtor express notice of the circumstance that his application for an order for adjudication, which had already been adjourned on two or so occasions, was coming up again for hearing on November 5. Upon that, all I need say is that in all the circumstances of the case I am quite satisfied that failure to give express notice to that effect is no ground whatever for annulling the adjudication.

For those reasons I think that the registrar was clearly right in refusing to make the order for annulment, and I would dismiss the appeal.

BIRKETT L.J. I am entirely of the same opinion, and I think it is scarcely necessary to add anything to what my Lord has already said.

Perhaps, however, I could say a word or two about the principal point raised in this appeal by Mr. Collier. It would appear that on May 7, 1953, the receiving order was made against the debtor and the public examination was fixed for July 7. On July 7 it appeared that the debtor was ill and medical certificates were produced in support. Thereupon the examination was adjourned until July 21, but again on July 21 medical certificates were produced which stated that the debtor was ill, and might not be able to attend for four or five weeks. Thereupon, the order was made which has been the substance of the controversy in this case, namely, that the public examination should be adjourned generally with liberty to restore.

I am bound to say that from a very early stage in this case I myself took the view that that was what I would call a sensible and humane order. There was the history of illness; there was the factor of uncertainty as to when the debtor would be well enough to attend, and in all the circumstances it would seem right and proper to say: "Very well; it is impossible to fix any "date with precision, so we will adjourn this matter generally "with full liberty to restore it to the list." There could be no hardship or grievance there; but Mr. Collier said, in effect, that there has been a great grievance, and he has given utterance to it, because the order in this case which was made on November 4 was an order adjudicating the debtor bankrupt in these terms: ". . . it appearing that the debtor has not set down an applica- "tion to reinstate her public examination which was adjourned "generally on the 21st day of July, 1953, and is not therefore in "a position to make application to the court to approve her "proposal for a composition which has been accepted by the "creditors. It is hereby ordered that the debtor . . . be and the "said debtor is hereby adjudged bankrupt."

Whilst I myself am quite satisfied that there was no real ground for any grievance on the part of the debtor, the point that is taken—and quite rightly and properly taken—is that the order that was made on July 21 postponing this matter generally with liberty to restore was made under a power which it was not proper for the registrar to use—that there was no statutory authority for that to be done—and it was contended that section 15 (3) of the Act of 1914, which provides that the court may adjourn the examination "from time to time," on its true construction meant that it only gave a power to adjourn from a fixed day to a fixed day. I am quite clearly of opinion that on the construction of the words—and indeed I would add as a matter common English usage—the words "from time to time" cannot have that interpretation.

I think they mean that when the circumstances warrant it there may be an adjournment as and when the occasion requires. I do not think they can possibly be meant to bear the rigid interpretation for which Mr. Collier contends, namely, that it should be from one fixed day to another.

He reinforced his submission by saying that the order of July 21 first of all did something which the registrar had no power to do, and secondly, it was in effect an order under rule 192 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952. That rule reads: "The court may "adjourn the public examination sine die and may make such "further order as it thinks fit, where—(a) it is of opinion that "the debtor is not making a full and true disclosure of his "affairs; or (b) the debtor, without showing any sufficient reason "has failed to attend the public examination or any adjournment "thereof, or to comply with any order of the court in relation to "his accounts, conduct, dealings, or property."

First of all it is quite clear that these matters which are set out in (a) and (b) do not apply to this case. I have heard nothing which leads me to suppose that any adjournment of this matter

1954

was made because a true and full disclosure of the debtor's affairs had not been made. Secondly, with regard to (b), "without "showing any sufficient reason has failed to attend the public "examination," it is quite plain that the registrar accepted the medical certificates and acted upon them, believing the debtor's state of health to be an adequate reason.

The only importance of this matter is that Mr. Registrar Bowyer expressly disclaims and disclaimed at the time any such intention. He says: "I did not bring into play the provisions of "this rule"—which, of course, Mr. Collier says is in a sense a penal rule—"I did not do that at all; I did it under the powers "given to me in section 15 (3) of the Act."

For my own part, I think that the registrar was wholly right, and therefore on the main point upon which this appeal has been argued, I am of opinion that it fails, and there is, therefore, no necessity for me to add anything on any of the other matters with which my Lord has dealt.

Romer L.J. I quite agree with my Lords, and I only want to add one word about section 15 (3) of the Act of 1914, which provides that the court can "adjourn the examination from time to "time."

I agree with what my brethren have said about that. It is not confined to adjourning from one specific date to another specific date; it means adjourning for such periods of time, or generally, as the court may think most convenient.

I would like to draw attention to the similarity of the language which is used in Ord. 52, r. 7, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which states: "The hearing of any motion or application may "from time to time be adjourned upon such terms, if any, as the "court or judge shall think fit"; it is a matter of common practice and common knowledge that applications, summonses and motions are constantly stood over or adjourned generally with liberty to restore, in the same way that the public examination was adjourned generally in the present case. I think it would be most unfortunate, both from the point of view of the creditors and from the point of view of the debtor and of everybody concerned, if there were not that power, which gives a flexibility to the proceedings and without which, as I think, there would be considerable difficulty in carrying them through to a successful conclusion; and I am quite satisfied that there is such a power. I am satisfied that the registrar acted upon that power and not under the special power conferred by rule 192, and that it becomes plain through the opinion which has been expressed by the present registrar—who indeed may be regarded as the mouthpiece of the court. The court says that that is the power which was exercised; I am well assured that it was the power that was exercised, and that great care was taken, and deliberately taken, to avoid action under rule 192, which is a penal provision, and which in a sense puts a debtor rather in the position of somebody who is in contempt and who can only be heard after satisfying the court that the misdemeanours which have resulted in his ostracism have been removed and that he has made out a proper case that the application should proceed.

There are various formalities attendant upon rule 192, and I am quite certain, apart altogether from what Mr. Registrar Bowyer has now said, that there was never any intention on the part of the registrar to act under that rule.

I agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Winding up—Void dissolution—Effect of declaration—Misfeasance summons pending at date of dissolution—Subsequent order declaring dissolution void—Whether summons revived—Companies Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 38), s. 352.

A misfeasance summons was taken out against certain alleged promoters of a company, which was wound up in a creditors' voluntary liquidation before process was served on the respondents.

At a later date an order was made under section 352 of the Companies Act, 1948,[1] declaring the dissolution void. The summons then came before the registrar, who made no order. On appeal by the applicant:—

Held, that the order under section 352 did not have the effect of reviving the summons, which had abated on the dissolution of the company.

Observations of Lord Blanesburgh in Morris v. Harris [1927] A.C. 252, at p. 268, applied.

MOTION.

The company went into voluntary liquidation on June 11, 1951, the liquidation being a creditors' voluntary liquidation. On February 5, 1952, the applicant issued an originating summons joining as respondents the liquidator of the company and three persons who were alleged to have been concerned in the promotion of the company and, in connexion with that promotion, to have made a secret profit.

[1] Companies Act, 1948, s. 352: "(1) Where a company has been dissolved, the court may at any time within two years of the date of the dissolution . . . make an order, upon such terms as the court thinks fit, declaring the dissolution to have been void, and thereupon such proceedings may be taken as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved."

On April 7, 1952, the liquidator called the final meeting. On April 10, 1952, he filed the usual return, and three months later, on July 10, 1952, the company became dissolved under the provisions of section 300 of the Companies Act, 1948. On October 5, 1953, an order was made by the court under section 352 declaring the dissolution void. Between the date of the dissolution and that order the summons was served on the various respondents. On November 18, 1953, the originating summons was before the registrar for the purpose of obtaining directions. It was stood over for three weeks in order that the evidence, directed to be by way of affidavits, might be completed.

During that period it was intimated to those representing the applicant by those representing one of the respondents that the point would be taken on her behalf that the effect of the dissolution had been to cause the originating summons to abate, and that the effect of the order declaring the dissolution void was not to revive the summons.

On the further hearing the registrar made no order on the summons. The applicant then brought this motion by way of appeal.

J. G. Monroe for the applicant.
T. M. Shelford for a respondent.

The other respondents did not appear.
The cases referred to in argument are cited in the judgment.

Wynn-Parry J., after stating the facts: On February 4 of this year the summons came before the registrar, who accepted the submission that the summons had abated and had not been revived on the authority of Morris v. Harris.[1] In his order the registrar expressed the opinion that the originating summons abated on the dissolution of the company and was not revived by the order of October 5, 1953, declaring the dissolution to have been void; and therefore he made no other order than for the taxation of the costs of the applicant and of one of the respondents, Terence Patrick Smart, to be taxed as between solicitor and client under the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. It is by way of appeal from that order that this motion comes before me.

In Morris v. Harris[2] the distinctions between sections 223 and 242 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, now respectively sections 352 and 353 of the Companies Act, 1948, were exhaustively considered. I quote from the speech of Lord Blanesburgh, which, in my respectful view, most clearly emphasizes the distinction between the two sections. Referring to section 223 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, now section 352 of the Companies Act, 1948, Lord Blanesburgh said [3]: "It is true that "a declaratory order under the section unqualified in terms does, "and it was in my judgment essential, if many difficulties which "readily occur to the mind were to be avoided, [provided] that "such an order should have the effect of restoring to the revived "company its corporate existence as from the very moment of the "dissolution thereby declared 'to have been void.' But the "expository words which follow carefully and, as I think, "advisedly refrain from adding that such an order is to have the "effect of restoring to the company from the same moment, not "its corporate existence only, but its corporate activity also. On "the contrary, these expository words import, as I think, that it "is only after the order has been made—it is 'thereupon' but not "before—that any active consequences are to ensue.

"I think, my Lords, that the terms in which these conse-"quences are described are exhaustive and emphatic. They are "intended to show that an order under the section made, it may "be, as long as two years after a dissolution which up to that "moment was completely effective, is not at once and as of course "to ratify acts done during the interval, which, if done at all, "must necessarily have been acts of mere usurpation, by a "liquidator or other pretended agent with no office knowingly "done on behalf of a company which had no existence. On con-"sideration, it appears, I think, clear that automatically to "validate such acts as being the acts of a duly constituted officer "on behalf of a duly incorporated company might involve con-"sequences too disastrous to be even envisaged. These are "avoided by the terms of the section. The company is restored "to life as from the moment of dissolution but, continuing a con-"venient metaphor, it remains buried, unconscious, asleep and "powerless until the order is made which declares the dissolution "to have been void. Then, and only then, is the company "restored to activity.

"And now is made apparent the reason for the difference in "phraseology and effect between section 223 and subsection (6) of "section 242. A dissolution under section 242, as I have said, is "preceded by no winding up, and the section had to envisage a "dissolution which might have taken place without the knowledge "any one concerned in the company. Hence the wide powers "given to the court by subsection (6). Section 223, on the other "hand, is confined to cases where the dissolution succeeds the "complete winding up of the company's affairs and cannot take "effect at all except at the instance or with the knowledge of the "liquidator, the company's only executive officer. The legisla-"ture has not seen fit to make provision for validating any "intermediate acts done on behalf of such a company so "dissolved."

LEWIS & SMART LD., In re.

Wynn-Parry J.

Lord Blanesburgh then stated his conclusion: "In my judgment, accordingly, the arbitration proceedings which abated on the dissolution of the old company thereby became abortive and have in no sense been reconstituted as a result of Astbury J.'s order."

It is clear from the passages which I have read that the question to which I must direct my mind is whether or not the proceedings started by the originating summons abated on the dissolution of the company in July, 1952. For this purpose I think it is necessary to consider what is the real nature of misfeasance proceedings.

In Cavendish-Bentinck v. Fenn,[4] Lord Macnaghten said: "The 165th section of the Act of 1862"—that is the misfeasance section—"has often come under discussion, and it has been settled, and I think rightly settled, that that section creates no new offence, and that it gives no new rights, but only provides a summary and efficient remedy in respect of rights which apart from that section might have been vindicated either at law or in equity. It has also been settled that the misfeasance spoken of in that section is not misfeasance in the abstract, but misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust resulting in a loss to the company. Apparently it has not been judicially determined that the applicant is bound to show that he is interested in the result of the application, but I think it must be so. I cannot think that Parliament intended that a person who happens to come under the description of a creditor or a contributory may take upon himself the functions of a public prosecutor in a matter with which he has really no concern. It was, therefore, in my opinion, necessary for the appellant to prove that Mr. Fenn has committed a breach of trust, or a misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust, as a director of the Cape Breton Company, and that by reason of that misfeasance the company has sustained loss; and it was also necessary for him to show that he has an interest in the result of the application."

The object of any misfeasance proceedings, by whomsoever they are brought, is to swell the assets of the company by the recovery of damages. The successful fruits of misfeasance proceedings must be paid to the company or its liquidator in a liquidation for the purpose of distribution among those who are interested in the assets; but, if the company for the benefit of whom or for whose creditors and contributories misfeasance proceedings are started becomes dissolved under section 300 of the Companies Act, 1948, it follows, in my view, that those proceedings are necessarily at an end, because so long as the company remained dissolved it would be impossible to carry the proceedings to judgment, for no effective order, having regard to the nature of the proceedings, could be made.

It therefore appears to me that the true conclusion is that, upon the dissolution of this company in July of 1952, the proceedings started by the originating summons abated. Taking that view, it appears to me that this case is directly covered by the reasoning and the conclusion of Lord Blanesburgh in Morris v. Harris.[5]

I was referred to a recent decision of Vaisey J. in In re C. W. Dixon Ld.[6] where he had to consider the effect of an order declaring the dissolution of a company to have been void in regard to property which on the dissolution was supposed to have been vested in the Crown as bona vacantia; but, in my view, that case does not touch the present case. Vaisey J. held in regard to that subject-matter that the dissolution was avoided ab initio, and I respectfully agree. That was necessary in that case to produce an effective order, having regard to the fact that on the dissolution the property was taken to have vested in the Crown; and, as I read the judgment, that is really the basis of it.

Vaisey J. said[7]: "Anyone can declare a dissolution to be void; "it is a mere matter of utterance; but when the court is given "power to declare that something has happened, I apprehend the "legislature must inevitably intend to give the court power of "making a declaration which is effective."

It seems to me that that can have no relation to a case, such as the present, concerning proceedings which, on the view which I take of the matter, abated upon the dissolution. Those proceedings, having abated, cannot, in face of the clear reasoning of Lord Blanesburgh in Morris v. Harris,[8] be treated as having been revived by the order declaring the dissolution void.

Therefore, for those reasons, I must hold that the motion fails and must be dismissed.

Order accordingly.

Family Provision — Limitation — Extension of time — Circumstance affecting administration or distribution of estate—Mistake as to time by applicant's solicitors — Evidence —Practice — Procedure summons inappropriate—Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (1 & 2 Geo. 6, c. 45), as amended by Intestates' Estates Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 64), s. 2 (1) (1A).

By section 2 of the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, as amended by Sch. III to the Intestates' Estates Act, 1952: "(1) "Except as provided by the following provisions of this section or "section four of this Act, an order under this Act shall not be "made save on an application made within six months from the "date on which representation in regard to the deceased's estate . . . "is first taken out. (1A) If it is shown to the satisfaction of the "court that the limitation to the said period of six months would "operate unfairly,—. . . (c) in consequence of some other circum-"stances affecting the administration or distribution of the estate, "the court may extend that period."

The widow of a deceased testator made application under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, for further provision to be made for her. When the summons came before the master, it was discovered that it was out of time, having been taken out more than six months after the grant of probate; the reason for the delay being that the plaintiff's solicitors were ignorant of the time limit prescribed by the Act. On an application to the court to extend the time pursuant to section 2 (1A) (c):—

Held, that the solicitors' mistake was not a "circumstance "affecting the administration or distribution of the estate," so that there was no jurisdiction to extend the time.

Held also, that in view of the novelty and importance of sub-section (1A), it would be right to hear any evidence which counsel in their discretion might put forward as relevant.

Observations on the correct procedure in taking out a summons asking for an extension of time under section 2 (1A).

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The widow of a testator, being dissatisfied with the provision made for her under her husband's will, through her country solicitors entered into negotiations with the solicitors of the deceased's personal representatives regarding an increased provision. After the negotiations had been suspended for some time, a summons was taken out under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, asking for further provision. At the hearing, the master pointed out that the summons was out of time, having been taken out more than six months after the grant of probate. The plaintiff then applied under section 2 of the Act (as amended by Sch. III to the Intestates' Estates Act, 1952) for an extension of time, the summons in its original form being adjourned into court as a procedure summons.

R. J. S. Thompson (F. B. Alcock with him) for the plaintiff.
W. P. A. Graetz for the defendants.

At the hearing Roxburgh J. expressed the view that the summons was not in proper form, and consulted the chief master.

ROXBURGH J. I have spoken to the chief master, and, as a result of my conversation with him, the proper practice, in my view, is this: If the plaintiff wants relief under section 2 (1A), the proper course is to ask for that relief as a separate item by originating summons, proceeding also as a separate item to ask for the main relief. If the plaintiff becomes aware that his summons is out of time after he has issued it, then his duty is to ask for leave to amend the summons by asking for relief under section 2 (1A) as a separate item. Then it would be quite proper and, indeed, desirable, for the question of relief under section 2 (1A) to be adjourned into court as a separate matter and before the hearing of the main part of the summons. But it is not a procedure summons and should not be so listed. It is the ordinary case of an originating summons adjourned into court on one point and not on the other point. There will be leave to amend.

During the reading of the affidavits, counsel for the plaintiff proposed to read certain evidence relating to the plaintiff's circumstances; counsel for the defendants submitted that this was irrelevant.

ROXBURGH J. I will give a formal ruling on this. In view of the novelty of this subsection and of its importance, I am not prepared at this stage to rule out any evidence which you may think material to your client's case. I am not at all sure what my real duty is under this section. The Court of Appeal may take a different view from mine, and, therefore, my ruling is that counsel may read any evidence which they have filed which they regard as material in any way.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 14. ROXBURGH J. read the following judgment. Edwin Horace Greaves died on March 2, 1953. His will was proved on April 14, 1953, and this application under the aforesaid Act was made on December 21, 1953. When it came before the master he pointed out that it was out of time. Hence this preliminary application for an extension of time.

Well within the prescribed time the plaintiff (who is the testator's widow) instructed solicitors and they negotiated with the solicitors for the defendants, who were both executors and beneficiaries. On August 7, 1953, the solicitors for the widow wrote (in a letter headed "without prejudice"): "It has "occurred to us that if the suggested arrangement can be carried "into effect it would save any further controversy and possible "litigation, and would, we think, satisfy all parties concerned." On September 9, 1953, the solicitors for the defendants replied (in a letter, also headed "without prejudice"): "Our clients are "considering your letter, but we have today before us certain "communications from the Revenue affecting values for estate "duty purposes. To use our clients' own words, they cannot say "whether there will be anything to be generous with, and until "we can conclude matters with the Revenue we do not think "our clients can give us any definite instructions." At this point the negotiations were suspended. On October 14, 1953, the prescribed period expired.

GREAVES, DECD., In re. GREAVES v. GREAVES.

There is, in my judgment, no doubt that the reason why no proceedings began in due time was that the plaintiff's solicitors were ignorant of the time limit. But it has been submitted by counsel that the limitation to the period of six months would operate unfairly because (1) the plaintiff was without information as to the true value of the estate; (2) the negotiations for a compromise had been suspended but not ended; (3) the estate had not been distributed, and that these were circumstances affecting the administration or distribution of the estate. I think that they were. But, in my judgment, no unfairness flows from any of them. As to the first point, the plaintiff's solicitors never asked for any information regarding the true value of the estate; and indeed, the true value of any estate is seldom known within six months from the date of a grant. As regards the second, the plaintiff had ample time within the prescribed period and after the negotiations had been suspended to issue a summons, and this step would undoubtedly have been taken by anybody aware of the time limit. As to point three, I certainly cannot lay down a rule that it would be unfair not to extend the time in every case in which no distribution has yet been made. This is so in the great majority of cases, and is not, in my view, a circumstance which makes it unfair to require a plaintiff to proceed within the prescribed period. In my judgment if, in the present case it is unfair to hold the plaintiff to the prescribed time, it is so in consequence of the mistake of her solicitors and for no other reason, and that is not a circumstance affecting the administration or distribution of the estate.

The consequence is that the summons is dismissed.

Order accordingly.

1954

Stirling, decd., In re. Union Bank of Scotland Ld. v. Stirling.

Wynn-Parry J.

Josefina Stirling. The two wills are for all material purposes in the same form, and I can deal with the whole summons conveniently by reference to the will of the testator, Robert Stirling.

He appointed the plaintiffs to be his executor and trustee, and, having inserted the usual clauses necessitated by the appointment of a bank as executor and trustee, he then proceeded by clause 2 to provide that, if his wife should survive him for the space of a month then, but not otherwise, he gave and devised all his real and personal estate to her absolutely and beneficially without any sort of trust or obligation. In the events which happened, he died first and his wife did not survive him for a month, so in the case of neither will did clause 2 operate.

The will of Robert Stirling continues: "If my said wife "shall not survive me for the period aforesaid then I direct and "declare that the subsequent clauses of this my will shall take "effect." Then follows clause 4 (a), which is one of the material clauses for consideration: "I bequeath the following pecuniary "legacies: (a) To the bank the sum of £1,000 free of duty to be "paid in priority to all other legacies bequeathed by this my will "with the request that it will dispose of it in accordance with "any memorandum signed by me and I direct that any such "memorandum is not to form part of this my will or to have any "testamentary character and I request the bank that if the said "legacy of £1,000 is not wholly disposed of in complying with "such memorandum the balance not so disposed of shall fall "into and form part of my residuary estate and I declare that the "foregoing expression of my wish in connexion with the said sum "of £1,000 shall not create any trust or legal obligation even "if the same shall be communicated to the bank in my lifetime." Then follow a number of further pecuniary legacies to various relations.

By clause 5 the testator constituted his residuary estate and bequeathed it "as to one-third share thereof to my brother the "said James Fairlie Stirling absolutely as to another one-third "share thereof to my brother the said David Edward Stirling "absolutely and as to the remaining one-third share thereof to "the bank with the request that it will dispose of it in accordance "with any memorandum signed by me and I direct that any "such memorandum is not to form part of this my will or to have "any testamentary character and I declare that the foregoing "expression of my wish in connexion with the said one-third "share shall not create any trust or legal obligation even if the "same shall be communicated to the bank in my lifetime."

The testator, Robert Stirling, died on November 24, 1952, and his wife, the testatrix, Josefina Stirling, died on December 2, 1952. Neither of them made any communication to the plaintiff bank during their respective lifetimes of their wishes in respect of either the legacies or the one-third of their respective residues, but certain memoranda were found among their papers at their deaths. It is not contended, in the circumstances, that any of those memoranda can have any legal effect, and the sole question in the circumstances which I have to consider is whether, on the true construction of the will, both as regards the legacy and the one-third residue in each case bequeathed to the plaintiffs, the legacy and the share of residue may be retained by the plaintiffs and disposed of by them as they think fit without any trust or obligation, or are subject to a trust for the benefit of the persons entitled to the residue of each estate and for his or her next-of-kin respectively.

I propose first to construe the will unaided or unembarrassed by any authority. It is pointed out by Mr. Mervyn Davies that in the very first clause the bank is stamped with a fiduciary character, being described as and appointed as "executor and "trustee." It is further poined out by Mr. Mervyn Davies that in the second clause in the conditional gift to his wife the testator uses the words "absolutely and beneficially," but it is, on the other hand, to be observed that he adds the words "without any "sort of trust or obligation," which words, of course, may be considered strictly to be otiose, following as they do the words "absolutely and beneficially." Those, of course, are points to be taken into consideration.

I then proceed to the first of the two vital clauses, clause 4 (a). It opens, as I have said, with the words: "To the bank the sum "of £1,000 free of duty to be paid in priority to all other legacies "bequeathed by this my will," and if the clause stopped there there would be nothing whatsoever in the language used to indicate that the bank were to take that £1,000 otherwise than absolutely and beneficially; for I should find that there was insufficient in the points to which I have already referred, in view of that language, to cut down what would be a perfectly plain and unqualified gift.

The clause goes on with the request that the bank will dispose of the £1,000 in accordance with any memorandum signed by the testator, and there is the direction that the memorandum is not to form part of the will. That is a direction, and is, therefore, intended to be operative. That is followed by a request as regards any balance, and in contrast to the verb "direct" there is the verb "request." That is followed by a declaration, which again is the introduction to a phrase intended clearly to be operative, namely, "that the foregoing expression of my wish in "connexion with the said sum of £1,000 shall not create any "trust or legal obligation even if the same shall be communicated "to the bank in my lifetime." Turning to clause 5, where the last third of the residuary estate is given to the bank, there is exactly the same direction and the same declaration, the only difference in the construction of the residuary clause being the necessary omission of the request relating to any part of the £1,000 not wholly disposed of, which the testator desired to fall into residue.

Regarding the matter as purely one of construction, it appears to me to be a necessary conclusion from the scheme of the will that the testator intended that the bank, at any rate as regards the other residuary legatees so far as the bequest of the £1,000 is concerned, and as regards the next-of-kin so far as the residuary clause is concerned, should take the £1,000 legacy and the share of residue absolutely and beneficially. The question then arises: Is there any authority, or line of authority, which will operate to prevent me giving effect to the construction which I have placed on these two wills?

The nearest case is In re Falkiner.[1] The headnote of that case reads as follows: "By her will, dated April 22, 1922, a "testatrix devised and bequeathed her real and personal estate "to two persons upon trust for sale and conversion and invest-"ment of the net proceeds as therein mentioned. She then "bequeathed to the two persons by name 'absolutely as joint "'tenants one half of the residuary trust moneys, with the "'request that they will dispose of the same in accordance with "'any memorandum or paper signed by me and deposited with "'this my will or left amongst my papers at my death.' There "was a similar gift of the other half of the residuary trust "moneys, subject to a life interest. She then declared that any "such memorandum or paper should not have any testamentary "character, 'and the above expression of my wishes as to the "'disposal of the said sums shall not create any trust or legal "'obligation, even if the same shall be communicated to my "'trustees in my lifetime.'" Pausing there, it will be seen that the relevant provisions in that will are very similar to the relevant provisions in these two wills.

"The two persons were the partners in the firm of solicitors "which prepared her will, and an earlier will dated August 9, "1921, which contained the same bequests and declaration. "Before the date of the first will the testatrix sent to one of the "partners a list containing the names of those she wished to "benefit, and in preparing her first will he did his utmost to "induce her to allow the names of beneficiaries to be inserted in "the ordinary way, but she refused. On October 18, 1921, the "testatrix sent him revised lists of the persons and institutions "she wished to benefit, and requested him to destroy the earlier "list, and he replied next day, 'I have your letter of the 18th "'instant, with the enclosures, and quite understand your "'instructions.' Subsequently she wrote letters making slight "alterations in the lists, which he similarly acknowledged." It was held: "that the true inference was, seeing that the partners "had full knowledge of the contents of the testatrix's will, that "they only agreed to give effect to the testatrix's wishes in "accordance with the scheme of the will, including the provision

"that there was to be no trust or legal obligation, and accordingly that they took the property bequeathed to them absolutely for their own benefit."

In the course of his judgment Tomlin J. said [2]: "The first question is whether they are absolute owners of what is expressed to be given them by the will. If not, then the further question will arise whether they are trustees for the persons and institutions set out in the lists of October 12, 1921, or whether they are trustees of a fund of which the beneficial interest is undisposed of, so that the persons beneficially entitled are the testatrix's next of kin. I think the question whether, if there is not a trust created outside the will in favour of the persons named in the lists, the Messrs. Mead are trustees for the next of kin must depend on the construction of the will itself; because if there was no bargain outside the will imposing a fiduciary relationship"—and that is the case here—"then that relationship can only exist by virtue of the terms of the will itself. Looking at the will, I do not think that any fiduciary relationship is created. By the fifth clause of the will the testatrix bequeathed to them absolutely as joint tenants a moiety of the residuary trust moneys, with the request that they would dispose of the same in accordance with any memorandum or paper signed by her and deposited with her will or among her papers; and the position is similar with regard to the remaining moiety subject to a life interest given to Dr. O'Sullivan. Then by clause 8 the testatrix provides: 'Any such memorandum or paper referred to in clauses 5 and 7 hereof shall not be deemed to form part of my will or to have any testamentary character and the above expression of my wishes as to the disposal of the said sums shall not create any trust or legal obligation even if the same shall be communicated to my trustees in my lifetime.' I think on the true construction of the will the Messrs. Mead take these interests absolutely, and that, assuming there are no trusts created outside the will, they cannot be said to be trustees for the next of kin."

It will be observed that Tomlin J. placed great weight upon the language of clause 8 of the will, which, in effect, corresponds to the declaration found at the end of clause 4 (a) and at the end of the provision in clause 5 dealing with the one-third share of the residuary estate bequeathed to the bank, and in so far as, upon a question of construction, one case can be said to govern another, it appears to me that this case is covered by the reasoning of Tomlin J. in that case.

In the later case of In re Schär,[3] it appears that in the matter of the estate of that deceased at an earlier stage Cohen J. had to consider the true construction of the will and codicil of the deceased in regard to this point. The testator had made a will in 1931 directing that his residuary estate should be divided among beneficiaries, all or some of whom lived in Germany. In 1940 he made a codicil providing that if, at his death, or before his trustees had wound up his estate, there should be legislation in force in this country depriving the beneficiaries of the right to receive those benefits, they should go to his trustees absolutely.

When the matter came before Cohen J. in March, 1945, he declared, on the true construction of the will and codicil, and particularly clause 6 of the codicil—the effect of which I have read, with the exception of these words: "then I give such "benefits to my trustees absolutely with the request but without "creating any trust that they will carry out the wishes contained "in my said will or any codicil thereto when legislation permits "them to do so"—that "legacies and shares of residue thereby "given to persons who survived the testator and were at his death "enemies within the meaning of the Trading with the Enemy "Act, 1939, and any orders made thereunder were payable to the "bank and to the first two defendants beneficially." Unfortunately, there is no report of his judgment, but it is clear from that reference to his order that he had approached the case, as Tomlin J. did in In re Falkiner,[4] as one purely of construction. Those two cases, and particularly In re Falkiner,[4] appear to me to support the contention that I ought to declare that the legacy and the share of residue passed to the bank absolutely. Indeed, as I have already indicated, I think that upon this point In re Falkiner[4] is decisive.

I was referred to one or two other cases. The first was In re Rees' Will Trusts,[5] a decision of the Court of Appeal. In that case, Evershed M.R. pointed out[6] that "These courts have also "been very insistent on the importance of the principle that those "who assume the office of trustees should not, so far as they fairly "can prevent it, allow themselves to be in a position in which their "interests and their duties conflict," but I find nothing in that case which could cut down the effect of In re Falkiner,[7] and it would appear to me that In re Rees' Will Trusts[8] is distinguishable from the present case because the devise and bequest there was to the trustees "they well knowing my wishes concerning the "same"; that is, the whole of his property.

In In re Hawksley's Settlements[9] the relevant provision was that the testatrix appointed three persons to be her executors and residuary legatees "to carry out instructions that I may leave in "writing or verbally which I have not yet fully completed," but there was not in that case anything which corresponded to clause 8 of the will in In re Falkiner,[10] or to the declaration at the end of clause 4 (a) and clause 5 in the wills in this case; and it appears to me that the older case of In re Boyes[11] is distinguishable on the same basis.

Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction—Death of tenant—Widow occupying as statutory tenant—Acceptance of new rent book containing new conditions of tenancy—Statutory tenancy converted into contractual tenancy—Death of widow—Daughter's right to remain in possession—Increase of Rent & Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g).

On the death of the defendant's father, who was the contractual tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restriction Acts applied, his widow continued in occupation as a statutory tenant under section 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. Some three years later the agent and rent collector of the landlord presented a new rent book, containing "regulations and conditions of the tenancy" different from those under which the original contractual tenancy had been granted. The widow's daughter, as her mother's agent, accepted the new rent book, the widow's name was entered in it, and rent was paid on the basis of the new agreement. On the death of the widow the landlords claimed possession from the daughter, who claimed to be entitled to remain in occupation as a statutory tenant:—

Held, that the landlords, through their agent, had offered the widow a tenancy on new conditions, rent had been paid and accepted on that basis, and the widow's statutory tenancy had been converted into a contractual one. Therefore on the widow's death the daughter was entitled to the protection of section 12 (1) (g).

APPEAL from Judge Elder-Jones, sitting at Windsor County Court.

The defendant's father was, at the date of his death in 1949, the contractual tenant of a dwelling-house of which the plaintiffs' predecessors were landlords. His widow, Mrs. Mason, remained in possession, paying rent, as a statutory tenant, subject to the conditions of the previous tenancy, until February, 1952. By that time the plaintiffs had purchased the dwelling-house with other buildings. Mrs. Mason was by then bed-ridden, and the defendant, her daughter, paid the rent and dealt with other business matters in her behalf. One Harvey, who was employed by the plaintiffs as their agent and rent collector, called at the house with a new rent book, although there was space in the old rent book for further entries. He asked certain questions, and, according to his evidence, it was agreed between himself and the defendant, as representing her mother, that Mrs. Mason should be the tenant. Her name was put in the new rent book, which contained "regulations and conditions of the tenancy" differing from those in the previous rent book, and which presumably were those applicable under the original tenancy granted to the defendant's father. The defendant admitted that Harvey drew her attention to the new conditions, and rent was duly paid and accepted on that basis. On the death of Mrs. Mason the plaintiffs claimed possession, but the defendant claimed to be entitled to remain in occupation as statutory tenant under section 12 (1) (g) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920.

The county court judge dismissed the claim of the plaintiffs, and they now appealed.

N. C. Tapp for the landlords.

Sir Shirley Worthington-Evans, for the defendant, was not called on.

Somervell L.J., stated the facts and continued: Mr. Tapp for the landlords contended that we should regard the "Regulations and conditions of the tenancy" not as terms of the "tenancy" but simply as regulations, but in view of the heading and of their wording it seems to me plain that they must be treated as conditions of the tenancy. They were brought to the defendant's attention as agent for her mother. In those circumstances there was ample evidence on which the judge could find, as he did, that the landlords, by Harvey, offered Mrs. Mason, through the agency of the defendant, a tenancy on new conditions. That was accepted, and rent was paid and accepted on that basis. From that time, in my view, Mrs. Mason became a contractual tenant, and so the defendant is entitled to the benefit of section 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 on her mother's death.

There are two other matters which I think I should mention. One is that a week after the rent had been accepted, and, in my opinion, the contract concluded, Harvey called again and pasted on the rent book a note indicating that Mrs. Mason held as successor of her husband, but, of course, it was too late to alter the contractual position which had already been set up. Mr. Tapp also sought to argue a point which he admitted he had not taken below, namely, that where a person is in possession as a statutory tenant, as a matter of law his position cannot by agreement be turned into that of a contractual tenant. Having looked at some observations by McNair J. in Murray Bull & Co. Ld. v. Murray,[1] on which counsel said that he was going to rely, it seems to me plain that the point is a bad one. All I would say about that case is that McNair J. was not dealing with this point. He was dealing with a case where it was suggested that the position of a statutory tenant had been worsened by being turned into that of a licensee. For these reasons I think this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Sunday.

By the Shops Act, 1950, s. 47: "Every shop shall . . . be closed "for the serving of customers on Sunday: Provided that a shop "may be open for the serving of customers on Sunday for the "purposes of . . ." the sale of motor supplies or accessories.

Where the business of a dealer in second-hand cars is carried on and cars for sale are displayed in a shop which is lawfully open on Sunday for the sale of motor accessories and persons who may wish to buy a car come into the shop on Sunday and examine the cars displayed for sale and discuss them with an assistant, but no sale takes place, the shop, being lawfully open for the sale of accessories, cannot be said to be open for the serving of customers in connexion with the business of a dealer in second-hand cars and no offence is committed under section 47.

Where, however, in similar circumstances, the persons who examine the cars are taken by an assistant for a demonstration ride in one of the cars, that fact affords evidence from which justices may conclude that the shop was not closed as required by section 47.

WATERMAN v. WALLASEY CORPORATION.

CASE STATED by Wallasey justices sitting at Wallasey.

An information was preferred against the defendant, Harry Waterman, for that he, on August 2, 1953, being the occupier of a shop in which he carried on business as a dealer in used and

Waterman v. Wallasey Corporation. Hesketh v. Same.

second-hand motor-vehicles did not close the shop for the serving of customers on that day, being a Sunday, contrary to sections 47 and 59 of the Shops Act, 1950.[1]

The following facts were found by the justices: The defendant was the occupier of premises known as The Empress Motors Garage, Wallasey, where he carried on business as a dealer in used and second-hand motor-vehicles. The premises were normally open seven days a week for the sale of petrol and motor accessories, and on August 2, 1953, were open for the sale of motor accessories but not for petrol. The garage and show-rooms were in the same building and on August 2, 1953, second-hand cars awaiting sale on view in part of the premises were visible from the pavement, and one car awaiting sale was parked on the roadway outside the premises. A man, woman and child entered the premises and in company with the manager of the garage walked over to a car and examined it. A discussion took place and the woman opened the doors of the car and examined its interior. No money was seen to pass. Later on the same day a man and a woman in company with the manager inspected the car parked in the roadway and a discussion took place lasting some minutes. The manager opened the rear door of the car to allow the woman to enter and sit in the rear seat. No money passed and the man and woman walked away.

The defendant contended that his premises were lawfully open on a Sunday for the sale of accessories and that he had not served a customer merely by reason of the manager having gone over to the vehicle and acted as he had done.

The prosecutor contended that by reason of the actions of the manager in discussing the cars with the persons who had come on to the premises and in attending to them, the premises were not "closed for the serving of customers."

The justices considered that the premises being a shop were not closed for the serving of customers in connexion with the appellant's second-hand motor-car business on the material date. They convicted the defendant and imposed a fine of £3. The defendant appealed.

[1] Shops Act, 1950, s. 47: "Every "shop shall, save as otherwise pro- "vided . . . be closed for the serving "of customers on Sunday: Provided "that a shop may be open for the "serving of customers on Sunday "for the purposes of any transaction "mentioned in the Fifth Schedule to "this Act."

S. 50: "Where several trades or "businesses are carried on in the same "shop and any of those trades or busi- "nesses consist only of transactions of "such a nature that, if they were the "only transactions carried on in the "shop, the provisions . . . requiring "the shop to be closed for the serving "of customers . . . George Bean for the defendant.
R. S. Nicklin for the prosecutor.

The following cases were mentioned in argument: Willesden Urban District Council v. Morgan [2] and London County Council v. Freeman, Hardy and Willis.[3]

DONOVAN J. referred to section 47 and Schedule 5 to the Shops Act, 1950, and continued: The defendant kept a shop which was lawfully open on Sunday for the sale of motor a cessories. The justices found that in the window motor-cars were displayed for sale with the prices on them. There were two instances of persons, who may have been prospective customers, coming along and being allowed by the manager to examine the cars. There were discussions but no sale took place and no money passed. What in fact happened was that somebody interested in a car asked questions about it and was answered.

On those facts it was contended that the defendant had infringed section 47 by not closing his shop for the service of customers on Sunday. The precise question is whether this shop was closed although there were customers, persons there, who might want to buy a motor-car. The question is a nice one, but we think that the shop was so closed. No sale was effected.

The purpose of the Act is to protect shop assistants; but if a shop may lawfully be open, as this one might, and someone comes along and inspects a motor-car which can be lawfully sold the next day, in our view it is stretching the Act too far to say that the shop is open for the serving of customers who wish to buy a car. In the course of the argument the case was put of a chemist's shop which may open on Sunday for the sale of medicine and other things; if somebody goes in for a bottle of aspirin and is shown a camera and how it works, it seems to us that it is extravagant to say that that shop is open for the sale of cameras or for the service of customers who may wish to buy a camera. There is no evidence, in our view, which justified the justices in saying that this shop was open merely because someone came along and asked about the motor-cars. We think on the facts of this case that the justices adopted too narrow and rigorous a construction of the section and that this conviction must be quashed.

LORD GODDARD C.J. I agree.

Waterman v. Wallasey Corporation. Hesketh v. Same.

Hesketh v. Wallasey Corporation.

Case stated by Wallasey justices sitting at Wallasey.

An information was preferred against the defendant, William Cecil Hesketh, for that he, on August 2, 1953, being the occupier of a shop known as Dodd's Garage, Hoylake Road, Wallasey, in which he carried on the business of a dealer in used and second-hand motor-vehicles, that not being one of the transactions mentioned in the Fifth Schedule to the Shops Act, 1950, did not close the shop for the serving of customers in connexion with such business, contrary to sections 47 and 59 of the Shops Act, 1950.

The following facts were found by the justices: The defendant carried on at his premises the business of a dealer in used and second-hand motor-vehicles and in petrol and oil and and motor and cycle supplies and accessories. The premises comprised a garage and forecourt, freely accessible from the road, in which were petrol pumps and other appliances used in connexion with the business. The garage was too small to contain all the motor-cars which the defendant possessed for the purposes of sale, and some of them normally stood in the forecourt. Notices indicating that they were for sale were exhibited on two of the vehicles standing in the forecourt. On Sunday, August 2, 1953, the garage part of the premises was open, and three of the defendant's employees, two of whom were seen to serve petrol, were present. A man entered the forecourt, examined the vehicles, and discussed several of them with one of the defendant's employees. Later a motor-cyclist rode up, dismounted and examined the vehicles, and was taken for a drive in one of the vehicles exposed for sale by one of the defendant's employees. Another employee also demonstrated cars to a man and a woman and drove them away from the premises in one of the cars. No sale of any vehicle was seen to be effected on that day.

The defendant contended that by reason of paragraph 1 (h) of the Fifth Schedule to the Shops Act, 1950, the premises could lawfully be open and he and his employees could lawfully be present for the serving of customers; that there had been no serving of customers within the meaning of section 47 in connexion with his business as a dealer in used and second-hand vehicles, and that the mere display, inspection and demonstration of vehicles to persons coming on to the forecourt did not amount in law to the serving of customers; and that the Act was designed to prevent and render unlawful sales to customers in a shop on Sundays, but did not render unlawful the transactions, not being sales, disclosed by the facts of the case.

The prosecutor contended that if the defendant or any of his employees were on the premises available and ready to serve in connexion with the defendant's business as a dealer in used or second-hand motor-vehicles the offence charged was committed and that, in view of the actions of his employees, the premises were not "closed for the serving of customers" within the meaning of the Act.

The justices considered that the prosecutor's contentions were correct and that the premises, being a shop, were open on a Sunday for the serving of customers in connexion with the defendant's business as a dealer in used and second-hand cars. They convicted the defendant and imposed a fine of £3.

The defendant appealed.

R. S. Nicklin for the prosecutor.

DONOVAN J. The difference in the facts between this case and that of Waterman v. Wallasey Corporation is that in this case people were taken for demonstration runs in a car. We think that that fact makes a material difference in this sense, that it was some evidence from which the justices could reasonably draw the conclusion that the shop was not closed on Sunday as section 47 requires. That being so, the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Limitation of Action — Negligence — Injury caused by acts outside statutory period—Injury first discovered within statutory period—Limitation Act, 1939 (2 & 3 Geo. 6, c. 21), s. 2 (1).

In an action of negligence, the cause of action accrues at the time of the negligence, because it is then that the damage is caused even though its consequences may not be apparent until later.

Between 1923 and 1940 the plaintiff was employed by the defendants on work which resulted in the casting-off of a great deal of fine dust. In October, 1943, for the first time the plaintiff found himself to be suffering from a condition of the chest which, he alleged, had been caused by his subjection to the dust up to 1940. On September 27, 1949, he issued a writ against the defendants claiming damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty. In a preliminary issue on a plea by the defendants that the action was barred by section 2 of the Limitation Act, 1939:—

Held, that the plaintiff's cause of action accrued up to 1940 and, the writ not having been issued until more than six years thereafter, his claim must fail.

Howell v. Young (1826) 5 B. & C. 259 applied.

[Reported by G. M. SMAILES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Archer
v.
Catton
& Co. Ld.

Preliminary issue.

The plaintiff claimed damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty under section 47 of the Factories Act, 1937. The defendants denied negligence and breach of statutory duty and also pleaded that the action was barred as not being brought within six years from the date when the cause of action accrued. The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

J. Harvey Robson for the plaintiff.
R. Withers Payne for the defendants.

Streatfeild J. The plaintiff pleads that he has suffered injury, namely a condition of his lungs, due to the inhalation of dust while in the employment of the defendants, Catton & Co. Ld. He alleges in his statement of claim that the injury was brought about by the negligence and breach of duty of the defendants, and so far as the breach of duty is concerned reliance is placed on section 47 of the Factories Act, 1937, dealing with measures to be taken to protect employees against the inhalation of dust. One of the pleas of the defence is that the action was not brought within six years from the date when the cause of action accrued. The defendants contend, therefore, that the cause of action is barred by section 2 of the Limitation Act, 1939. I am now required to deal with that as a preliminary issue, not having heard any evidence on the merit of the actual cause of action; but I have been invited by counsel on both sides to consider that issue on a statement very fully made by Mr. Harvey Robson, which is agreed by Mr. Payne on behalf of the defendants as an accurate statement of the facts for the purposes of the issue.

The facts upon which I am asked to pronounce upon this point of law are these. Between 1923 and 1940 the plaintiff was employed by the defendants. Until 1937 of that period his work had consisted of servicing Bessemer furnaces, which necessitated the breaking up of the fire brick linings to Bessemer converters in order that they might be renewed with new fire brick. That was work done in a confined space and resulted in the casting off of a great deal of fine dust. In 1937 a change was made, but only to the extent that, instead of being fire brick for the next three years it was fire clay, the plaintiff's work being otherwise the same and a great deal of dust being given off in its removal. In 1940 the plaintiff was directed to different work altogether, work which either did not involve him being subjected to dust or, if it did, only very slightly; so Mr. Harvey Robson concedes that nothing that took place after 1940 can in any way be said to have contributed to the condition from which this man afterwards was found to be suffering. In October, 1943, having been employed on that other work, he then for the first time found himself to be suffering from a condition of his chest which is said to have been caused by his subjection for a long period of time to dust collections and had to give up his work by reason of his chest trouble. He returned in the summer of 1944. In 1945 he was off work again, and he then returned after a little time until January 1946 when he was laid off work for the same reason; and he has been off work ever since.

The writ in this action was not issued until September 27, 1949. Mr. Harvey Robson contends that, if his cause of action can be said to have arisen in October 1943, when the plaintiff for the first time gave up work by reason of his chest trouble, then this action was brought just within the statutory limit of six years. On the other hand, he concedes that, if in fact his cause of action arose in 1940, then the writ issued in 1949 was out of time. On that question of law, reference has been made to Dr. Charlesworth's Law of Negligence, 2nd ed., p. 597, in which, after quoting section 2 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, and pointing out that the section applies to actions founded on simple contract or on tort, the learned author continues: "In an action "of negligence, the cause of action accrues at the time of the "negligence, because it is then that the damage is caused, even "though its consequences may not be apparent until later." He then quotes Howell v. Young,[1] where a solicitor was sued for negligence in representing that certain mortgages were sufficient security for a loan. More than six years after that alleged negligence damage was suffered and an action was begun to which the solicitor pleaded that it was statute barred. Holroyd J. held that it made no difference that the damage was suffered more than six years afterwards and that the cause of action accrued when the solicitor negligently gave the advice that the mortgages were sufficient security for a loan. If the proposition laid down in that case and enunciated by Dr. Charlesworth is correct, it seems to be quite clear that it is fatal to the plaintiff's claim in this case.

Mr. Harvey Robson, however, has argued strenuously that a cause of action in negligence cannot be complete until there is, first of all, negligence and until the plaintiff either knows or should know that he has suffered injury in consequence of it. In other words, he is contending that, although the act of continued negligence over a long period, if negligence it was, was complete by 1940, in fact it led to no ill consequences until October, 1943, when for the first time the plaintiff became aware of the damage which he had suffered and his cause of action became complete.

I have come to the conclusion, although with regret because it may well be that hardship has been suffered, that that is not a sound proposition, and that Howell v. Young[2] is in principle indistinguishable and that I am bound by that case and a line of cases which have stood the test of time for many years. In my judgment, the proposition is correctly stated in Dr. Charlesworth's learned work to which reference has been made, and the true view in the present case is that all the time up to 1940 when the plaintiff was exposed to this dust, assuming for the moment that that amounted to negligence or breach of statutory duty, there was the accrual of the cause of action, and it makes no difference, as Holroyd J. found in Howell v. Young,[2] that the plaintiff himself was not aware of the fact that it would have led to ill consequences. For these reasons, in my judgment this action is statute barred, the writ not having been issued until more than six years after the accrual of the cause of action. Under those circumstances, therefore, the plaintiff's claim must fail.

Family Provision — Practice — Applicants with adverse interests — Representation by counsel—Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (1 & 2 Geo. 6, c. 45).

The following has been issued by Vaisey J.—Where two or more persons are joined as plaintiffs in an application under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, it will generally be the case that their respective interests are, or may be, in conflict, and difficulties will then arise as to the presentation of their claims, since two or more plaintiffs cannot be separately represented by counsel at the hearing.

The Act requires that the application shall be "by or on "behalf of" the dependant and it is therefore not possible for one claimant to initiate the proceedings, making the other claimant a defendant.

In a recent case, in which a widow and her infant daughter were joint plaintiffs and this difficulty arose, an order was made (upon summons by the plaintiffs in the proceedings) in the following form:—

"AND IT APPEARING that the interests of the Infant Plaintiff "are or may be adverse to those of the Plaintiff . . . and "that it is desirable that the Infant Plaintiff should be "enabled to be separately represented for the purpose "of prosecuting her claim in this action under the above "mentioned Act

"IT IS ORDERED that the Infant Plaintiff . . . be struck out "as a Plaintiff and added as a Defendant

The recital was inserted to make it plain that the infant, having complied with section 1 (1) of the Act by originally joining in the application as a plaintiff, remains a claimant although transferred to the other side of the record.

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Agreement—Foreign divorce—Agreement purporting to oust jurisdiction of foreign court—Enforceability in England—Public policy.

Contract — Implied term — Consent not to be unreasonably withheld — Husband's agreement to pay child's medical expenses if "reasonable "and approved by the husband" — National Health Service not used. National Health Service.

In 1939 the plaintiff married an American subject domiciled in California and there were three children of the marriage. Differences having arisen between the parties, the husband informed the wife that he wished to divorce her in America. Before any proceedings had taken place an agreement was executed whereby the husband undertook to pay a weekly sum for the maintenance of the wife and children. By a clause in the agreement it was provided that in the event that either the husband or wife should institute proceedings or obtain a divorce in the state of California the provisions of the agreement should continue in full force and effect and should be conclusive with respect to the husband's obligations under the agreement. The clause continued: "Neither the "husband nor the wife will make application to any court in such "proceeding, if any, for any different relief, but this agreement "may be embodied in and made part of such judgment or decree. If "any judgment of any court shall otherwise provide with respect "to any of the matters in this agreement embraced, the provisions "hereof shall control notwithstanding the terms of any such "judgment."

In 1948 a court in California pronounced an interlocutory judgment of divorce in favour of the husband and incorporated the agreement making it part of the order. In 1949 the judgment was made absolute. In an action by the wife to enforce the terms of the agreement, the husband contended that the action was not maintainable in the English courts, the agreement being contrary to public policy and therefore void:—

Held, that although an agreement purporting to oust the jurisdiction of the English courts was contrary to public policy, one which purported to do so in respect of a foreign court was not, and therefore the agreement was actionable.

Addison
v.
Brown.

Action.

The action was brought by the defendant's former wife, Mrs. Olivia Josephine Addison, against Stewart D. Brown, on an agreement to pay maintenance. The defendant was an American subject, domiciled in California. In April, 1939, he married the plaintiff in England, there being three children of that marriage, now aged 14, 13 and 10 years. Differences arose between the parties and the defendant told the plaintiff that he wished to divorce her in the United States of America.

Prior to divorce proceedings an agreement in regard to property and the custody of the children was executed and provided: "The husband agrees to pay to the wife the sum of "twenty dollars a week for the support and maintenance of the "wife and for the support, maintenance and education of the "children of the marriage until the youngest of the said children "shall attain the age of 18 years. Nevertheless, the said sum "of twenty dollars a week shall be reduced from time to time "by five dollars a week in respect of any child who shall be at "boarding school during such period as such child is, in fact, "boarding at the school. The husband further agrees to pay all "proper school bills incurred by the wife for the children, dental "and medical expenses and clothing bills, provided in each case "that the items are reasonable and approved by the husband . . . "In the event that either the husband or wife shall at any "time institute or continue a proceeding for divorce or obtain a "divorce in the state of California, whether upon matters here-"tofore or hereafter arising, the provisions of this agreement shall "continue in full force and effect and shall be conclusive with "respect to the husband's obligations to pay to the wife for "her own use and purpose the sums hereinbefore provided by "him to be paid. Neither the husband nor the wife will make "application to any court in such proceeding, if any, for any "different relief, but this agreement may be embodied in and "made part of such judgment or decree. If any judgment of any "court shall otherwise provide with respect to any of the matters "in this agreement embraced, the provisions hereof shall control "notwithstanding the terms of any such judgment."

On February 26, 1948, the court in California pronounced an interlocutory judgment of divorce in favour of the husband, and the order of the court stated that the agreement was approved and directed the parties to comply with the provisions of the agreement, which was incorporated and made a part of the order. The order continued: "Provided, however, that the court hereby "orders the money payments provided to be made by the terms "of the said agreement to be so made as alimony, subject, and "without prejudice to the court's continuing jurisdiction thereof; "and the court expressly reserves the right to modify, amend or "add to the said agreement in so far as it provides for the care, "custody and maintenance of the three minor children of the "plaintiff and defendant."

In March, 1948, the defendant paid to the plaintiff a lump sum of £50 and in May a further sum of £50. It was agreed that by the acceptance of the total sum of £100 the plaintiff compromised her personal claim, leaving the agreement in full force and effect only with regard to the three children of the marriage. In April, 1948, the defendant began making payments under the agreement. On March 25, 1949, the court in California made absolute the judgment of divorce, and again recited that the provision for alimony was binding on the parties. In May, 1949, the plaintiff married a warrant-officer in the British army, and by him she has had two children.

On July 18, 1949, the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff sending a cheque for £16 5s.—the first time that a cheque for that exact amount had been sent—and informing the plaintiff that the defendant was about to remarry. The letter continued: "We are directed to say further that Mr. Brown "considers that the past monetary demands made upon himself "have been unnecessarily high and that in future he is only "prepared to send to you the 25s. per week per child as set out "in the original agreement between you. He points out also "that in view of a settlement of £100 cash paid over to you last "year there is clearly no further weekly payment due to you."

To that letter the plaintiff replied acknowledging the cheque and stated: "I should also like to point out that the agreement "clearly states that Mr. Brown has to pay for the children's "clothing, for which I enclose two bills to date. Will you be "good enough to send any letters to the above address."

The defendant continued until July, 1950, to remit through his solicitors a monthly sum of £16 5s. He omitted to do so in October, 1949, because he said that he was too pressed financially owing to the expense of the children's school bills.

On September 20, 1949, the pound was devalued from four dollars to two dollars 80 cents. to the pound.

On August 9, 1950, the plaintiff issued a writ, and in January, 1952, she issued a second writ, in which she claimed maintenance for the children from the date of the last writ up to date, relying on the agreement under seal of December, 1949, so far as the children were concerned, both with regard to their five dollars a week each and with regard to their school bills, medical and clothing expenses.

On March 25, 1952, the actions were consolidated, and the plaintiff, giving credit for amounts which the defendant had paid, claimed a balance of £442 15s. 6d.

Addison
v.
Brown.

Streatfeild J. stated the facts and continued: It is contended on behalf of the defendant that this action is not maintainable in the English courts because the agreement sued on is contrary to public policy and, therefore, void by reason of the decision in Bennett v. Bennett.[1] It is not for a moment suggested that this action is not maintainable in the English courts on the ground that the agreement has been incorporated and has become merged in a foreign judgment. Apart from the point that the agreement is unenforceable because it is contrary to public policy, no one has suggested that the English courts have no jurisdiction to entertain this agreement.

The question whether the agreement is contrary to public policy is a matter of law of which I should be obliged to take note quite apart from the pleadings. Bennett v. Bennett[1] was decided by Devlin J., and went to the Court of Appeal where his judgment was unanimously upheld. The circumstances of that case were, however, entirely different. In August, 1948, the plaintiff wife presented a petition for the dissolution of her marriage. In the petition she asked for the custody of the two children of the marriage, alimony pendente lite, maintenance for the younger son and maintenance and security for herself. By an agreement before the pronouncement of any decree, her husband entered into a deed under seal whereby he agreed to make financial provision for the plaintiff and the younger son in consideration for which the wife covenanted not to proceed with the prayers for maintenance, and to consent to those prayers being dismissed, and not to present any further petition for maintenance. The registrar made a consent order in which the prayers for maintenance were struck out. When the husband fell into arrear with the payments under the deed his wife sued him for the arrears. Devlin J. held—rightly in my view—that the agreement sued on was unenforceable because it was contrary to public policy. In the Court of Appeal the material judgment is that of Denning L.J.,[2] and it is not without significance that he commences his judgment with these words: "In this case the only question to my "mind is whether the wife can sue upon the deed by action at "law or whether her proper remedy is by application to the "Divorce Court. I would not subscribe to a decision which "deprived her of all remedy." The case proceeded on the ground that, under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 190 (1) provides: "The court may, if it thinks fit, "on any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, order that the "husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the "wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any "term . . . the court may deem to be reasonable," and under section 176 it is clear that "the court" for that purpose means the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Courts of Justice in England. Denning L.J., when he came to the question of permanent maintenance, said[3]: "An award of "permanent maintenance on a divorce is peculiarly a matter for "the Divorce Court, and the jurisdiction of that court in regard "to it cannot be ousted by the private agreement of the parties. "The reason lies in public policy." I would particularly draw the attention of the defendant to what the Lord Justice said about the public policy of the law of England on which he (the defendant) now places reliance in stating that this agreement is unenforceable. Denning L.J. said: "First, it is in the public "interest that the wife and children of a divorced husband should "not be left dependent on public assistance, or on charity, when "he has the means to support them. They should therefore be "able to come to the Divorce Court for maintenance, notwith-"standing any agreement to the contrary: Hyman v. Hyman.[4] "Secondly, when maintenance is awarded by the Divorce Court, "it is not fixed irrevocably at a named figure. It can be varied "thereafter, upwards or downwards, according to the circum-"stances prevailing at the time. And if the husband is unable "to pay, and arrears accumulate, it is in the discretion of the "Divorce Court whether to enforce payment of the arrears or "not. These beneficent controls would be lost if the parties "could, by agreement, without the intervention of the court, fix "maintenance permanently at an unalterable figure. Any "private agreement of the parties which purports to make main-"tenance a debt enforceable at law must of necessity impliedly "oust the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court to fix it, vary it or "discharge it, and it is, by reason of that implication, invalid, "for the ouster goes to the whole consideration. There is no "consideration moving from the wife except an implied promise "to accept the named figure and not to ask for more, and that is "invalid, because it impliedly takes away the jurisdiction of the "court to give her more. If her promise does not bind her, then "his should not bind him: Gaisberg v. Storr,[5] Combe v. Combe.[6] "Sometimes there may be an implied promise by her to prosecute "the divorce proceedings, but that would be worse, for it would "be collusion. In the present case, however, the ouster is not "merely by implication. It is expressed in clause 10 of the "deed. That clause is invalid. It forms the whole, or substan-"tially the whole, consideration for the husband's promise to "pay the annuities. His promise is therefore invalid." It is clear from that passage of the judgment that had these proceedings been brought in the Divorce Division of the High Court this agreement would have been unenforceable. But I cannot think that the public policy of the law of England works in that way.

Addison
v.
Brown.

Streatfeild J.

Although it may be contrary to public policy to oust the jurisdiction of the English courts, I cannot think that it is the public policy of England to oust a plaintiff in the English courts from suing on an agreement, assuming that it is otherwise actionable, on the ground that that agreement purports to oust the jurisdiction of a foreign court. It is submitted that it makes no difference that the court whose jurisdiction the agreement purports to oust is an American court rather than an English one. In my judgment, there is nothing in Bennett v. Bennett[7] which compels me to hold that the purported ouster of the jurisdiction of a foreign court is contrary to the policy of the law of England. I do not think that it is. And even if it were, as was pointed out by Mr. Hollins, the American court has adopted this agreement and has preserved the right to alter or vary it as the case may be. So I do not think, therefore, that there is anything in the point that this agreement is contrary to public policy and is therefore void. It is not suggested that the courts in England on any other ground have not jurisdiction to entertain this action. This agreement, although it was executed before the American Consulate, and although it has been incorporated in a foreign judgment, nevertheless was one which at all material times was intended to be executed in this country where the wife was resident. Under those circumstances, in my judgment the first point taken on behalf of the defendant that this agreement is unenforceable fails.

The other point which is taken is whether I can hold on the facts that there was any implied variation of this agreement under seal as the result of correspondence which took place in July, 1949, and the plaintiff's conduct in accepting a figure of £16 5s. monthly until July, 1950, just before she issued her writ. Reliance is placed for that proposition on Berry v. Berry,[8] a decision of the Divisional Court, where it was held that a deed of separation under seal could be varied, applying the rules of equity under the provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and it was there held that there was a variation as a result of an agreement in writing which was an answer to the wife's claim on a maintenance agreement. Applying the rules of equity, the court came to the conclusion that the agreement was varied. But on the facts of the present case how can I come to the conclusion that there was a variation of this agreement? The agreement provided for five dollars per child per week. The letter of July 18, 1949, in effect, said precisely the same thing. The plaintiff told me that she regarded it as being an agreement for approximately 25s. per week per child, which in fact was five dollars per week at four dollars to the pound. There is nothing in that letter to suggest that there was an agreement between them that, come what may thereafter, it was to remain at 25s. for evermore. There is nothing to my mind in her letter of reply to show that she was consciously or willingly accepting the variation of the term of the agreement. It is true that two months later, when devaluation came in, she continued to receive without complaint £16 5s. a month; whereas, if she is right in this action, she was entitled to receive in sterling a larger sum per month. But I am not surprised, having looked at the correspondence, that she took the attitude of accepting what she was given from her husband and being reasonably thankful for something less than she was legally entitled to. In those circumstances I am not able to find that there was anything in the correspondence or in her conduct for some months afterwards in accepting £16 5s. which can amount to a variation of that deed so as to invoke the principles of equity, and I find that there was no implied variation of the agreement.

On those two findings it follows that the plaintiff is entitled to enforce this agreement in the English courts at the rate of four dollars to the pound from April 1, 1948, which is the start of her claim, to September 15, 1949. After that date, there being a devaluation and the agreement being expressed in dollars, she is entitled to payment at the rate of five dollars a week, whatever that may entail. There then being two dollars, eighty cents. to the pound, she, of course, is entitled to a larger sum. But, of course, she must give credit, as she does, to the payments on account which the defendant has made.

There remain only the two other items for clothing and for medical expenses. It is true that in the agreement itself both of those items are subject to the approval of the defendant: "The husband further agrees to pay all proper school bills "incurred by the wife for the children; dental and medical "expenses and clothing bills, provided in each case that the "items are reasonable and approved by the husband." It was contended that by analogy to the law of landlord and tenant, where, under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, it was found necessary to provide that in any agreement containing a covenant against subletting without the consent of the landlord there must be implied a term that such consent must not be unreasonably withheld, which would also have so provided, if it had been necessary, in the case of ordinary agreements. From that it is argued that the court is not entitled to imply that the consent of the husband must not be unreasonably withheld. The position with regard to medical expenses was that one child was suffering from adenoids and tonsils. The plaintiff took the child to her own doctor, who sent her to a specialist, who advised that the tonsils and adenoids should be removed and that it should be done reasonably quickly. He also told her that if she had it done under the National Health Service it might lead to a delay of two years. That does not speak very well for the National Health Service if it is correct. But that it would have led to some delay there can be no doubt. It was for that reason that the plaintiff had this operation done at the expense

v.
BROWN.

Streatleild J.

of her new husband, and ultimately at the expense of the defendant. She sent in the account, which was twelve guineas for the surgeon's fee, two guineas for the consultation fee, and a nursing home charge of £4 13s., making a total of £19 7s. The defendant, a man earning £2,000 a year, told me that he considered that that was far too much; that it ought to have been done under the National Health scheme, and that he was not prepared to pay any of it. In my view that figure was a very reasonable charge. In my judgment, in matters of medical and dental attendance, there is no difficulty, to give business efficacy to this agreement, in implying that the plaintiff was entitled to use her own good judgment, and that her husband's approval ought not to be unreasonably withheld. It was a wholly unreasonable attitude for the defendant to take, that he should have left it to the public funds of the National Health Service to look after his child.

[His Lordship considered the claim of £35 12s. 6d. for clothing, and continued:] In the same way, it seems to me ridiculous that the plaintiff was not entitled to give the children these modest requirements in the way of clothing without first referring to her former husband. I cannot think that it was necessary for her, within the four walls of this agreement, to have to write to her former husband, wherever he was, to obtain his authority for buying things like vests or pants or gym-slips or cardigans for these little children. So that, in those circumstances, again I would say that there is nothing unreasonable in these bills for clothing.

In those circumstances, therefore, in my judgment, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed and the total amount that she is entitled to, taking her claim down to December 15, 1951, is the sum of £442 15s. 6d. Accordingly, there will be judgment for the plaintiff for that sum.

Land Charge—Share in land—Registration—Property held on trust for sale—Purchase of share of property—No written contract—Receipt for purchase-money—Receipt registered as estate contract and general equitable charge—Interest only in proceeds of sale—Not registrable as land charge—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. 5, c. 20), ss. 1 (6), 42 (6)—Land Charges Act, 1925 (15 Geo. 5, c. 22), ss. 10, Class C (iii), (iv), 20 (6), (8).

The respondent purchased or agreed to purchase on October 11, 1948, for £10,000 an eighth share of property, which the owner of the legal estate held on behalf of himself and his partner equally as part of the assets of the partnership. On February 16, 1949, the respondent registered his interest as an estate contract under Class C (iv) of section 10 of the Land Charges Act, 1925. In December, 1949, the partners were adjudicated bankrupt, and the property vested in their trustee in bankruptcy. On October 17, 1953, the respondent registered a further charge in respect of the property under Class C (iii), as a general equitable charge. The trustee, who wished to sell the property, by this summons asked for an order that the charges should be vacated:—

Held, (1) that as the definition of "land" in section 20 (6) of the Land Charges Act, 1925, excluded an undivided share in land, a charge on an undivided share in land was not capable of registration as a land charge under the Act; (2) that since by section 1 (6) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, a legal estate could not subsist in an undivided share in land, the respondent could have no legal interest in the property, but having regard to section 42 (6) of that Act his interest under the transaction of 1948 constituted a share in the proceeds of sale of the property; (3) that, as a charge arising under a trust for sale was expressly excluded from registration under Class C (iii), the respondent's interest was accordingly wrongly registered in that class; (4) that the transaction (if it was a contract at all) was not a contract to convey the legal estate, and the legal owner of the property had been under no obligation to create a legal estate either in his partner or the respondent, so that the respondent's interest was not a contract registrable as an estate contract under Class C (iv); and both charges must therefore be vacated.

Rose v. Watson (1864) 10 H.L.Cas. 672 considered.

By this application the court was asked for an order to vacate two land charges registered respectively under Class C (iii) and Class C (iv) of section 10 of the Land Charges Act, 1925,[1] by the respondent, Ernest Charles Randall, a solicitor, in respect of freehold property known as Rayleigh Weir Stadium at Thundersley, Essex.

[1] Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 10: "(1) The following classes of charges "on, or obligations affecting land "may be registered as land charges "in the register of land charges, "namely:— . . . Class C (iii) Any "other equitable charge, which is not "secured by a deposit of documents "relating to the legal estate affected "and does not arise or affect an "interest arising under a trust for "sale or a settlement and is not "included in any other class of land "charge (in this Act called 'a "'general equitable charge'); and (iv) "Any contract by an estate owner or "by a person entitled at the date of "the contract to have a legal estate "conveyed to him to convey or create "a legal estate. . . ."

Subs. (8): "The registration of a "land charge may be vacated pur-"suant to an order of the court or a "judge thereof."

S. 20 (6): "'Land' includes land "of any tenure . . . but not an un-"divided share in land. . . ."

Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 1: "(6) A legal estate is not capable of "subsisting or of being created in an "undivided share in land. . . ."

Rayleigh Weir Stadium, In re.

In 1948 the stadium was the property of Francis Bernard McGreavey who carried on business there as proprietor of the stadium, and owned, in addition to the freehold of the stadium, a number of loose chattels and equipment.

McGreavey entered into partnership with one Frederick Leslie Rundle, and they carried on the business of speedway and greyhound racing at the stadium. The partners were equally interested in the assets of the business which included the stadium, the legal estate in which remained vested in McGreavey.

According to the respondent, the land charges arose out of a transaction between him and McGreavey and Rundle, dated October 11, 1948, by which they sold him or agreed to sell one-eighth share of the freehold of the stadium in consideration of his payment of £10,000 to them.

On February 16, 1949, the respondent entered the first charge on the register under Class C (iv) of section 10 of the Land Charges Act, 1925, the charge being described as "an estate contract "imposed or created by an instrument dated October 11, 1948, "made between Francis Bernard McGreavey . . . and Frederick "Leslie Rundle . . . of the one part and Ernest Charles Randall ". . . of the other part."

On December 14, 1949, the partners were adjudicated bankrupt. On December 16, 1949, the present applicant was appointed trustee in their bankruptcy, and the property in the stadium vested in him as trustee.

Some years later the trustee wished to sell the property, and the respondent having learned of this intention, wrote, on June 5, 1953, in the following terms to the trustee: "Re McGreavey "and Rundle (In bankruptcy). Rayleigh Weir Stadium. I have "heard that there have been negotiations for the sale of the free-"hold of the stadium and the chattels thereat and I have also "heard that a contract has been entered into for their sale. You "are aware that the debtors, in consideration of a payment of "£10,000 by me to them, sold to me a one-eighth part of the "freehold of the stadium and a one-eighth part of the chattels "thereat on October 11, 1948, and that they undertook to dis-"charge the mortgages existing on the freehold on October 11, "1948."

On October 17, 1953, the respondent further registered his interest as a charge under Class C (iii) of section 10 of the Act "being a general equitable charge imposed or created by an "instrument." The instrument was stated as having been made between McGreavey and Rundle and Randall, and was described in the following terms: "Whereby the said Ernest Charles "Randall [the respondent] paid the sum of £10,000 in respect of "the purchase of a one-eighth part of the under-mentioned "property, and in respect of which no conveyance has been "executed." No mention was made of any contract, but only of a payment in respect of a purchase. That charge was registered against McGreavey, Rundle and the trustee.

The respondent refused to comply with the trustee's demand that he should remove the charges from the register; and on November 19, 1953, the trustee took out the present summons asking for an order vacating the charges registered by the respondent.

The respondent by his affidavit dated December 30, 1953, stated: "On October 11, 1948, Francis Bernard McGreavey and "Frederick Leslie Rundle agreed to sell and I agreed to purchase "for £10,000 a one-eighth share of the freehold property called "the Rayleigh Weir Stadium and other property and on the same "day I paid to each of them the said Francis Bernard McGreavey "and Frederick Leslie Rundle the purchase price of £5,000 in "respect thereof."

Case cited in argument other than those referred to in the judgment: In re Engall's Agreement.[2]

HARMAN J., having stated the facts: The respondent in his affidavit refrained from making any statement about the instrument which he registered under the Land Charges Act, 1925, but a little more is to be found about it from the answers which he gave when he was examined under section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, from which it would appear that the document described in the register either as an estate contract or as a general equitable charge was a receipt. He modestly declines to say what was the form of the receipt, and he avers, moreover, that he put it in a drawer immediately after receiving it, and that he was unable to find it when he searched for it. The instrument said to constitute the document of charge is not, in consequence, forthcoming.

On a summons such as this to vacate the register, the question whether or not such a document ever existed is not one which I can determine. I must proceed with this application on the footing that the respondent paid, as he alleges, £5,000 each to McGreavey and Rundle. He did, in fact, in the course of his examination in their bankruptcy produce two cheques, one of which went to McGreavey and one to Rundle drawn in his own favour and endorsed to them severally. What was in the receipt, however, remains a mystery. It was not, so far as I can see, a contract; it may have been a memorandum of a contract and it may have contained the terms of a contract, but its operative effect, according to the respondent, went beyond that of a receipt. It is an extraordinary story that a solicitor of experience should pay the whole of his purchase-money and have no scrap of paper to show for it, or indeed that he should pay the whole of the purchase-money and receive nothing but a receipt.

Harman J.

The trustee in bankruptcy has claimed that the respondent had gone into partnership with McGreavey and Rundle to the extent of £10,000 for an eighth share. But the respondent denies that, and says that although he bought one-eighth of the assets he did not buy one-eighth of the liabilities. That is not a matter which I can determine.

I have, therefore, to decide whether this receipt, or the contract evidenced by this receipt, is capable of registration under the Act. Examination of section 10 shows that "The following classes "of charges on, or obligations affecting, land may be registered as "land charges in the register of land charges. . . ." So that the charge has to be a charge on land. Under the definition in section 20 (6) "land" includes various things, but it does not include an undivided share in land. If therefore this is only a charge on an undivided share in land, it cannot be registered as a land charge under the Act. Class C (iv), under which the respondent made his first registration, states: "Any contract by an estate owner . . . "[McGreavey was undoubtedly 'an estate owner'] to convey "or create a legal estate" is to be called "an estate contract." The question is, therefore, whether there was a contract by McGreavey—there was not by Rundle because he was not an estate owner—to create a legal estate. Class C (iii), which is the second class on which the respondent relies, provides: "Any other equit-"able charge, [that is other than a charge under C (ii)] which is "not secured by a deposit of documents relating to the legal "estate affected and does not arise or affect an interest arising "under a trust for sale or a settlement and is not included in any "other class of land charge. . . ." In order therefore to come under that class, the contract or instrument has first of all, to constitute an equitable charge and, secondly, it has to be an equitable charge not arising nor affecting an interest arising under a trust for sale.

What was the position on October 11, 1948? McGreavey who had been the absolute owner of this land, had taken Rundle into partnership. He was, in consequence, obliged to hold the freehold property which constituted the partnership on trust for himself and Rundle in equal shares. He retained the legal estate, but though he could have been obliged by Rundle to sell it and divide the proceeds equally between them Rundle could not have obliged him to convey to him a half share in the land itself. That emerges, first, from section 1 (6) of the Law of Property Act, 1925: "A legal estate is not capable of subsisting or of being "created in an undivided share in land . . ." and section 34 to the same effect provides "(1) An undivided share in land shall not "be capable of being created except as provided by the Settled "Land Act, 1925, or as hereinafter mentioned."

In section 42 (6) of the former Act, is this rather oracular statement: "Any contract to convey an undivided share in land . . . "shall be deemed to be sufficiently complied with by the convey-"ance of a corresponding share in the proceeds of sale of the land

"in like manner as if the contract had been to convey that "corresponding share." McGreavey's obligation to Rundle could therefore have been carried out by the conveyance to him of a share in the proceeds of sale. McGreavey, in my view, held the land on trust for sale, although the trust for sale does not appear in the title. He could no doubt have made a good title at that time without showing it, if Rundle did not choose to object or to register his interest.

What in the circumstances did the respondent acquire from Rundle? Clearly no more than Rundle could give him, namely a one-eighth share in the partnership assets. That was clearly (disregarding chattels) an interest in the proceeds of sale and nothing else. Indeed, even if Rundle had expressly contracted to give him something else, namely, an undivided share in land, section 42 (6) would have made that contract satisfied by a conveyance of a corresponding share in the proceeds of sale.

On the other hand, what, if anything, did McGreavey sell or agree to sell to the respondent? He agreed to sell him a one-eighth share of his interest in the land and the chattels. McGreavey's interest in the land was, having regard to his obligations towards Rundle, clearly an interest only in the proceeds of sale. What the respondent got by this payment was, at the highest, a contract to convey to him, or assign to him, a share in the proceeds of sale of the land.

Mr. Pascoe Hayward said that McGreavey was bound to create a legal estate not in the respondent, but in himself and his partner in order to implement the trust for sale, and he referred to Turley v. Mackay [1] in support of the proposition that a legal estate to be conveyed or created under Class C (iv) need not be created in favour of the obligee. I accept that, of course, but I do not see that McGreavey was under any necessity of creating a legal estate. It seems to me that the trust for sale existed while the property was in his hands. It is true, if somebody had wanted him to execute the trust, that it would have been necessary for him to appoint a trust corporation or another person to be trustee, in order to give a good receipt to a purchaser. But that is merely a matter of machinery, and it does not seem to me there was any contract to convey or create a legal estate as envisaged by section 10. This was not therefore a contract (assuming that it be a contract) which could be registered under Class C (iv).

With regard to Class C (iii), Mr. Pascoe Hayward says, first, that his client, having paid his purchase-money and not having got a conveyance, is entitled to a general equitable charge on the land, and for that proposition he cites Rose v. Watson.[2] In that case Lord Cranworth, concurring in the judgment of Lord Westbury, said [3]: "There can be no doubt, I apprehend, that when

"a purchaser has paid his purchase-money, though he has got no "conveyance, the vendor becomes a trustee for him of the legal "estate, and he is, in equity, considered as the owner of the "estate. When, instead of paying the whole of his purchase-"money, he pays a part of it, it would seem to follow, as a "necessary corollary, that, to the extent to which he has paid his "purchase-money, to that extent the vendor is a trustee for him; "in other words, that he acquires a lien, exactly in the same way "as if upon the payment of part of the purchase-money the vendor "had executed a mortgage to him of the estate to that extent." Mr. Pascoe Hayward contends that if payment of part of the purchase-money for the whole will give a lien, payment of the whole of the purchase-money for a part will also give a lien. It is a neat way of turning the thing upside-down, but it does not, in my judgment, help him because, in order to get within the sub-section, there must be a charge which does not affect an interest arising under a trust for sale, and that is precisely the effect of this charge. The interest arising under a trust for sale was, until they went bankrupt, the interest of McGreavey and Rundle in this property and that was an interest expressly excluded from Class C (iii) of section 10. What the respondent acquired, if he acquired anything at all, was a general equitable charge on the proceeds of sale of this partnership property. Whether or not he became a partner does not matter for that purpose. I take the view, therefore, that, assuming the respondent to have all that he says he has, and notwithstanding the fog in which the facts remain carefully concealed, he could not on the facts as stated have an interest in this land which would entitle him to register a charge against it, and I propose accordingly to make an order vacating both registrations.

and was carried on as if there had been no change of ownership. The portion of the purchase price allocated to the plant and fittings, in respect of which an initial allowance had been made, exceeded their written down value at the date of the sale, and under section 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, a balancing charge was made on B:—

Held, that the sale took place before the trade was "permanently "discontinued" within the meaning of section 17 (1), since after the sale the trade was carried on by the purchaser, and that, accordingly, a liability to a balancing charge arose.

APPEAL from the First Division of the Court of Session.

This was an appeal against an interlocutor dated January 13, 1953, pronounced by the First Division of the Court of Session as the Court of Exchequer in Scotland on a case stated under section 64 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. The case was stated on the requisition of the appellants, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the matter of a determination by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for the Division of the Upper Ward of Renfrew on an appeal taken to them by the respondent John Barr against an assessment to income tax for the year of assessment 1946–7 in respect of a balancing charge made on him under sections 17 and 55 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, in the sum of £1,405.

The facts are set out by Lord Morton of Henryton and Lord Reid.

Sir Lionel Heald A.-G., J. O. M. Hunter Q.C. (of the English Bar, Q.C. of the Scottish Bar), Sir Reginald Hills (of the English Bar) and W. P. Grieve (of the Scottish Bar) for the appellants.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

May 4. LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON. My Lords, the only question arising on this appeal is whether, on the facts set out in the case stated, a liability to a "balancing charge" under section 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, arose on the sale by the respondent of the plant and machinery used in the business formerly carried on by him under the style of "Henry & Galt." The facts are fully set out in the case stated and I can summarise them, for the purposes of my opinion, as follows.

For many years the firm of Henry & Galt carried on business as ironfounders at Paisley. The respondent (who was previously the manager of the concern) became a partner with Mr. James Galt on April 1, 1928, and from the latter's death in 1945 carried on the business as sole proprietor until July, 1946. On July 15, 1946, the transfer of the business as a going concern to one Thomas Reid was completed. The purchase price was £14,000, which included the sum of £4,000 allocated to the plant and fittings. I now quote paragraphs 5 and 6 of the case stated: "5. The "respondent's interest in and connection with the trade of Henry "& Galt ceased when the sale thereof to Mr. Reid took place, "and the respondent then retired from business and permanently "discontinued trading. 6. After the sale the business was carried "on and continued as if there had been no change." I pause to say, that I attach no significance to the change in wording from "trade" in paragraph 5 to "business" in paragraph 6, nor was any argument based on this at the hearing.

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Barr.
Lord Morton of Henryton.

Section 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, so far as relevant for the present case, is in the following terms: "(1) Subject to the "provisions of this section, where, on or after the appointed day, "any of the following events occurs in the case of any machinery "or plant in respect of which an initial allowance or a deduction "under rule 6 of the Rules applicable to cases I and II of "Schedule D has been made or allowed for any year of assess-"ment to a person carrying on a trade, that is to say, either— "(a) the machinery or plant is sold, whether while still in use or "not; or (b) the machinery or plant, whether still in use or not, "ceases to belong to the person carrying on the trade by reason "of the coming to an end of a foreign concession; or (c) the "machinery or plant is destroyed; or (d) the machinery or plant "is put out of use as being worn out or obsolete or otherwise "useless or no longer required, and the event in question occurs "before the trade is permanently discontinued, an allowance or "charge (in this part of this Act referred to as 'a balancing "'allowance' or 'a balancing charge') shall, in the circum-"stances mentioned in this section, be made to, or, as the case "may be, on, that person for the year of assessment in his basis "period for which that event occurs. . . . Any reference in this "subsection to the permanent discontinuance of a trade does "not include a reference to the happening of any event which, by "virtue of any of the provisions of rule 11 of the rules applicable "to cases I and II of Schedule D, is to be treated as equivalent "to the discontinuance of the trade."

It will be observed that a balancing charge is made in the case of machinery or plant only if three conditions are fulfilled, namely, (1) that an initial allowance or a deduction under rule 6 of the Rules applicable to cases I and II of Schedule D has been made or allowed for any year of assessment to a person carrying on a trade; (2) that one of the four events set out in the section has occurred; and (3) that the event in question occurs before the trade is "permanently discontinued." My Lords, it is common ground that the first two of these conditions are fulfilled in the present case, but your Lordships have to determine whether the sale to Mr. Reid occurred before the trade was permanently discontinued, within the meaning of the section.

Before I go on to consider this question I ought to quote sections 68 (4) and 70 of the Act of 1945.

"68.—(4). Any reference in this Act to the setting up or "permanent discontinuance of a trade includes, except where the "contrary is expressly provided, a reference to the occurring of "any event which, under any of the provisions of the Income Tax "Acts, is to be treated as equivalent to the setting up or perma-"nent discontinuance of a trade."

It is common ground that the concluding sentence of section 17 (1) of the Act supplies an instance where "the contrary is "expressly provided."

"70. This Act may be cited as the Income Tax Act, 1945, and "shall be construed as one with the Income Tax Acts."

I shall refer later to rule 11 of the rules applicable to cases I and II of Schedule D, as this rule is referred to in section 17 (1) of the Act of 1945 and is, in my view, of considerable importance in the case.

The respondent appealed against the assessment to income tax upon him for the year of assessment 1946–7 so far as it included a balancing charge of £1,405. The Commissioners expressed their decision in the case stated as follows:—"We, the "Commissioners who heard the appeal, held that we were bound "by the decision of the Court of Session in the case of Inland "Revenue Commissioners v. West and Others ("Girl Eileen"),[1] "and that no 'balancing charge' was exigible in this case, and "the assessment in respect thereof was accordingly discharged." They stated a question of law for the opinion of the court in the terms which I quoted in my opening words. In the First Division of the Court of Session Lord Carmont referred to the case of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. West[1] and continued[2]: "It "was held in that case that no balancing charge was exigible, and "although the facts before us are different from those in West's "case,[3] the Lord Advocate for the appellants, in opening his "appeal before us, said he could not maintain that the ratio of "West's case[3] did not cover the present case. Accordingly, as "the case cannot be argued on the footing that the decision in "West[3] is distinguishable, the judgment of the court in that case "applies in such circumstances as we have now before us, and "there is no alternative open to us but to answer the question "put in the negative and I so move your Lordships." Lord Russell and Lord Keith agreed.

In the case of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. West[3] the Court of Session had to consider whether a balancing charge arose on the sale of certain fishing vessels, the relevant vessel for the present purpose being named the Girl Eileen. In my view West's case[3] is distinguishable from the present case, for reasons which I shall state hereafter; but the Lord President and Lord Keith, in the course of their opinions, expressed views upon the construction of section 17 (1) of the Act of 1945 which, if they are correct, would be fatal to the claim of the appellants in the present case. For instance, Lord Keith said[4]: "It is clear, in my opinion, "that section 17 is looking, not to the continuance of the "machinery or plant in trade, but to the continuance of the "owner of the machinery or plant in trade." These views were not accepted by Upjohn J. in Boarland v. Madras Electric Supply Corporation[5] or by Danckwerts J. in Bramford's Road Transport Ld. v. Evans.[6] Each of these two learned judges felt free to differ from the Court of Session, in all the circumstances, for reasons which he expresses in his judgment.

My Lords, the question arising for decision, and the conflicting views upon it, may be stated as follows. A business is sold as a going concern, with its plant. From the moment of its transfer to the purchaser, the seller permanently discontinues trading, but the business is "carried on and continued as if there had been no "change"—to quote again the case stated. In these circumstances, (1) does the sale take place "before the trade is per-"manently discontinued" within the meaning of section 17 (1) of the 1945 Act, because after the sale the trade is carried on by the purchaser, or (2) is the trade "permanently discontinued" at the moment when the sale takes place, because the person who had carried on the trade up till that moment permanently discontinues trading as from that moment? Upjohn J. and Danckwerts J. thought that the former was the correct view but I think it is clear that the First Division in West's case[7] took the latter view. If the former view is correct, the appeal succeeds, if the latter view is correct, it fails.

It is in these circumstances that I apply myself to the task of construing the language of section 17 of the Act of 1945. I start by observing that the section first refers to a "person carry-"ing on a trade" to whom an initial allowance or deduction has been made in respect of certain machinery or plant, and then goes on to impose a balancing charge on that person if (inter alia) that machinery or plant is sold before the trade is permanently discontinued. So far, the language used seems to indicate that the legislature contemplates that a trade is not necessarily discontinued when the person carrying it on sells the business to someone else. It contemplates that plant and machinery, while still in use, may be sold before the trade in which it is used has been permanently discontinued. This provision seems to me inconsistent with the view that a trade is at once "permanently "discontinued," within the meaning of the section, if A.B. sells his business to C.D. One illustration of the difficulties arising from the acceptance of this view may be given at once. If it were accepted, the section could never apply in the common case where

I think the true view is that the section regards the question whether the trade itself does or does not "continue" as being completely divorced from the ownership of the trade at any particular time. Moreover, I think this view is in accordance with the ordinary use of the word "discontinuance" as applied to a trade or business. If A.B. sells his business to C.D., and retires to a life of leisure, but C.D. carries on the business just as A.B. previously carried it on, I do not think it would occur to the ordinary person to say that the business had been discontinued. He would say: "A.B. has sold his business "and it is being carried on by C.D." Similarly, if the owner of a business dies, having bequeathed his business to his son, and the son carries it on just as the father did, who would say that the business had been "permanently discontinued"? Further, it has for many years been a familiar conception in income tax law that a business can "continue" notwithstanding that one owner goes out and a new owner comes in. See, for instance, the Income Tax Act, 1918, rule 9, applicable to Cases I and II of Schedule D. The idea that the same business can be carried on by one person as the "successor" of another is surely inconsistent with the view that a business is "permanently dis- "continued" when A.B. sells it to C.D. and C.D. carries on the business on the same lines. If this view were correct, C.D. would not be carrying on the same business as the successor of A.B.; he would be starting a new business in place of the business which had been permanently discontinued. Yet the idea of "succes- "sion" to a business appears throughout the income tax law, as well as being a familiar idea in everyday life.

For these reasons, even if the earlier part of section 17 (1) stood alone, I should hold that the trade now under consideration was not "permanently discontinued" within the meaning of the section, when the respondent sold it to Mr. Reid, because it was in fact "carried on and continued as if there had been no change," though under new ownership. If, however, there had been any ambiguity in the earlier part of the subsection it would, in my opinion, be completely removed by the concluding sentence thereof, which it is convenient to quote again at this stage: "Any "reference in this subsection to the permanent discontinuance of "a trade does not include a reference to the happening of any "event which, by virtue of any of the provisions of rule 11 of the "rules applicable to Cases I and II of Schedule D is to be treated "as equivalent to the discontinuance of the trade."

In order to apprehend the effect of this sentence, it is necessary to read rule 11 there referred to. That rule is now to be found in section 32 of the Finance Act, 1926, and the material portions of it are as follows:—"(1) If at any time after April 5, 1928, a "change occurs in a partnership of persons engaged in any

"trade, profession or vocation, by reason of retirement or death, "or the dissolution of the partnership as to one or more of the "partners, or the admission of a new partner, in such circum-"stances that one or more of the persons who until that time "were engaged in the trade, profession or vocation continued to "be engaged therein, or a person who until that time was engaged "in any trade, profession or vocation on his own account continues "to be engaged in it, but as a partner in a partnership, the tax "payable by the person or persons who carry on the trade, profes-"sion or vocation after that time shall, notwithstanding the "change, be computed according to the profits or gains of the "trade, profession or vocation during the period prescribed by the "Income Tax Acts: Provided that, where all the persons who "were engaged in the trade, profession or vocation both imme-"diately before and immediately after the change require, by "notice signed by all of them or, in the case of a deceased person, "by his legal representatives, and sent to the surveyor within "twelve months after the change took place, that the tax payable "for all years of assessment shall be computed as if the trade, "profession or vocation had been discontinued at the date of the "change, and a new trade, profession or vocation had been then "set up or commenced, and that the tax so computed for any "year shall be charged on and paid by such of them as would "have been charged if such discontinuance and setting up or com-"mencement had actually taken place, the tax shall be computed, "charged, collected and paid accordingly. (2) If at any time after "the said April 5 any person succeeds to any trade, profession "or vocation which until that time was carried on by another "person and the case is not one to which paragraph (1) of this "Rule applies, the tax payable for all years of assessment by the "person succeeding as aforesaid shall be computed as if he had set "up or commenced the trade, profession or vocation at that time, "and the tax payable for all years of assessment by the person "who until that time carried on the trade, profession or vocation "shall be computed as if it had then been discontinued."

The vital words for the present purpose are, in the proviso, "as "if the trade . . . had been discontinued at the date of the change "and a new trade . . . had been then set up or commenced," and in subrule (2) "as if it had then been discontinued." These phrases clearly indicate that in the view of the legislature there is no real "discontinuance" of a business, either when a change takes place in the personnel of the partnership by which it is carried on, or (still more important for the present purpose) "if "any person succeeds to any trade, profession or vocation which "until that time was carried on by another person." Bearing in mind that the Act of 1945 is (by section 70 thereof) to be "con-"strued as one with the Income Tax Acts," I turn back to the concluding sentence of section 17 (1) of that Act, already twice quoted. In effect that sentence says: "What we refer to in this "section is a real discontinuance of the trade itself, and not such "an event as a change in the ownership of the business, which "under rule 11 may be treated as being equivalent to a real "discontinuance."

To my mind, my Lords, this concluding sentence makes it abundantly clear that in the earlier part of the section the words "permanently discontinued" have the meaning which I have already ascribed to them.

I add that the cases cited in your Lordships' House show that the courts in both England and Scotland, in considering whether a trade has been "permanently discontinued" have looked, not at a change of ownership, but at the circumstances which arose after the change of ownership— was the trade carried on by the successor, or was it not? See for instance Alexander Ferguson & Co. Ld. v. Aikin,[8] per Lord McLaren, Bartlett v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[9] where Scrutton J. (as he then was) said: "The trade was not discontinued in the year. The trade "was sold to a company and continued during the whole year."

For all these reasons I find myself unable to agree with the views expressed by the First Division of the Court of Session in West's case [10] as to the construction of section 17 of the Act of 1945. I think, however, as I have already said, that that case is distinguishable on its facts from the present case and I see no reason to doubt the correctness of the actual decision. The Girl Eileen was owned by the respondents in that case in certain shares, and was engaged in fishing. The respondents continued to employ the vessel in fishing from the port of Fraserburgh until January 24, 1947, when they sold their shares in the vessel for £990. The purchasers continued to employ her in fishing from the port of Lerwick but it does not appear that any goodwill of a business was sold to them; they merely bought a chattel, namely, the ship, and used her for the purpose for which she was built. It was sought to impose a balancing charge on the respondents under section 17. The decision of the Special Commissioners was in the following terms [11]: "We, the Commissioners who heard "the appeal, were of opinion that a sale of plant did take place, "but found that on the facts there was a simultaneous permanent "discontinuance of the trade. We accordingly discharged the "assessment in respect of the balancing charge." This finding, coupled with the special facts of the case, fully justified, in my view, the decision at which the First Division arrived.

In the present case, however, I feel no doubt that, on the true construction of section 17 of the Act of 1945 and in the events which have happened, a balancing charge was properly made upon the respondent, and there is no dispute that the figure of £1,405 is correct, if any balancing charge is payable.

I would allow the appeal and answer the question of law posed in the case stated in the affirmative.

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Barr.

My noble and learned friends, Lord Tucker and Lord Asquith of Bishopstone, who are unable to be present, have asked me to say that they concur in the opinion which I have just delivered.

Lord Reid. My Lords, the relevant facts in this case are few and simple. In 1946 the respondent was carrying on an iron-founding business in Paisley under the firm name Henry & Galt. He sold the business for £14,000. The transfer of the business as a going concern was completed on July 15, 1946. The respondent then retired from business but the business of Henry & Galt was carried on by the purchaser and continued as if there had been no change. £4,000 of the purchase price was allocated to plant and fittings. In respect of that sum a balancing charge under the Income Tax Act, 1945, of £1,405 was assessed on the respondent for the year of assessment 1946–7. There is no dispute that if any balancing charge is due by the respondent the amount assessed is correct. The question is whether any balancing charge can be due by him in view of the fact that he ceased carrying on business when he sold the plant and fittings.

Section 17 (1) of the 1945 Act provides (omitting those parts not material to this case): "... where, ... any of the following "events occurs in the case of any machinery or plant ... (a) the "machinery or plant is sold, whether while still in use or not; ... "and the event in question occurs before the trade is permanently "discontinued, an allowance or charge (in this Part of this Act "referred to as 'a balancing allowance' or 'a balancing charge') "shall, in the circumstances mentioned in this section, be made "to, or, as the case may be, on, that person for the year of assess-"ment in his basis period for which that event occurs: ... Any "reference in this subsection to the permanent discontinuance of a "trade does not include a reference to the happening of any event "which, by virtue of any of the provisions of rule 11 of the Rules "applicable to Cases I and II of Schedule D, is to be treated as "equivalent to the discontinuance of the trade."

The sole question in this case is whether on July 15, 1946, "the trade" was permanently discontinued. If "the trade" means the trade of the respondent then it was permanently discontinued, but if it means the business carried on under the firm name of Henry & Galt then it was not because it has been found as a fact that this business was carried on and continued as if there had been no change.

Section 62 of the 1945 Act provides that Part II of the Act (which includes section 17) shall be construed as one with the Income Tax Acts and it is necessary to go to the earlier Acts to see what is meant by discontinuance of a trade. Those Acts contain provisions dealing with cases where one person succeeds to a trade previously carried on by another and there is no doubt that in this case the purchaser "succeeded" to the trade previously carried on by the respondent. On the question of what is meant by succession to a trade I need only refer to the opinion of the judges of the First Division in Alexander Ferguson & Co. Ld. v. Aikin[12] and Watson Brothers v. Lothian.[13] One would expect the Acts to be so drafted that succession and discontinuance of a trade would be mutually exclusive: if someone succeeds to a trade it is not discontinued, whereas if it is discontinued no one succeeds to it. That appears to have been the view of Scrutton J. in Bartlett v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.[14]

The last part of section 17 (1) which I quoted refers to rule 11 of the Rules applicable to Cases I and II of Schedule D. The original rule 11 was replaced by section 32 of the Finance Act, 1926, and paragraph (2) of the new rule is as follows: "If at any "time after the said April 5 any person succeeds to any trade, "profession or vocation which until that time was carried on by "another person and the case is not one to which paragraph (1) "of this rule applies, the tax payable for all years of assessment "by the person succeeding as aforesaid shall be computed as if he "had set up or commenced the trade, profession or vocation at "that time, and the tax payable for all years of assessment by the "person who until that time carried on the trade, profession or "vocation shall be computed as if it had then been discontinued." That must mean that although the person succeeding does not in fact set up a new trade he is treated for certain purposes as if he had done so; and although the trade to which he succeeded was not in fact discontinued the person who formerly carried it on is to be treated for certain purposes as if it had been discontinued. In other words when a person succeeds to a trade formerly carried on by another there is no actual discontinuance of the trade but there is a notional discontinuance for the purposes of rule 11. The last part of section 17 (1) of the 1945 Act means that this notional discontinuance is not to be treated as a discontinuance for the purposes of section 17. For the purposes of this section there must be an actual discontinuance and no succession to the trade by another person. In the present case the purchaser did succeed to the trade and there was no discontinuance of it. So the sale of the plant occurred before there was any discontinuance of the trade and section 17 applied so that the balancing charge was properly assessed.

The First Division decided this case in favour of the respondent because it was covered by the ratio of their decision in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. West,[15] so it is necessary to examine that case. Four cases were heard together and the relevant case is that against William Reid which was concerned with the fishing vessel Girl Eileen. This vessel had been owned by part owners each holding so many one-sixtyfourth shares. In 1947 all the owners sold their shares and balancing charges were assessed on them. The contention of the Inland Revenue before the Special Commissioners was that the trade was not discontinued because after the sale the vessel was still used for fishing by the new owners. It was not contended that the new owners had succeeded to the trade of the old owners and it is not clear on the facts whether that could have been maintained. The Commissioners found that there had been a permanent discontinuance of the trade. Before the First Division the argument for the Crown as reported was that so long as the plant was used in the trade, although not necessarily by the original owners, there was no discontinuance of the trade. The First Division held that the decision of the Commissioners was correct and I think that they were right in rejecting the argument submitted for the Crown. The mere fact that plant after a sale is still used in the same kind of trading as before is not inconsistent with the trade of the seller having been discontinued. The purchaser may simply have bought the plant to use it in his own business and may not have succeeded to the seller's business.

But that was not the ground of judgment. The Lord President said [16] "the scheme of the Act requires that a balancing "charge should be recoverable only from persons still carrying "on the business in question." And Lord Keith said [17] "it is "clear, in my opinion, that section 17 is looking, not to the con-"tinuance of the machinery or plant in trade, but to the continu-"ance of the owner of the machinery or plant in trade." In this I think they went too far: in my opinion what the Act requires is the continuance of the business in question. Under section 22 the charge must be made on the seller in charging the profit or gains of his trade but that can be done after he has ceased trading and it was done in this case.

I am therefore of the opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

Lord Cohen. My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion of the noble and learned lord on the Woolsack. I agree with him that this appeal should be allowed for the reasons he gives.

Fatal Accidents Acts — Damages — Benefit to dependant—Claim by widower as deceased wife's dependant—Receipt of voluntary payment from beneficiaries of deceased's estate—Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93).

Damages—Personal injury—Voluntary payment.

The plaintiff's wife died as a result of an accident sustained while she was a passenger on a miniature railway owned by the defendants, and the plaintiff claimed damages as a dependant under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846–1908. The wife's estate consisted of a grocery shop with living accommodation attached where the plaintiff had resided, which she left to a son and daughter by a previous marriage, who sold the business. They voluntarily paid to the plaintiff a sum representing one-third of the value of the estate. The defendants contended that the sum so paid should be taken into account in assessing damages:—

Held, that the voluntary payment was not too remote to be brought into account in calculating damages as it was part of the wife's estate which the plaintiff had received as a result of her death.

Semble: a grant from a fund brought into existence after death subscribed to by strangers from charitable motives would not fall to be taken into consideration in assessing damages.

Redpath v. Belfast and County Down Railway [1947] N.I. 167 considered.

ACTION.

In 1940 the plaintiff, Henry Hector Peacock, a tool supervisor, married a widow with two children. Between 1940 and 1950 the family occupied a house bought by the plaintiff's wife in her own name on mortgage and on which she had paid a deposit. During that time the plaintiff contributed most of his salary, namely £8 a week, towards the upkeep of the home and the living expenses of himself, his wife and her two children. In 1950 the two children left home, the house was sold and a grocery business was bought with the proceeds, some £1,750. Thereafter, the plaintiff and his wife resided in living accommodation attached to the shop premises, and the plaintiff ceased to contribute towards his living expenses which were met by the wife out of the profits of the business.

On August 10, 1953, the plaintiff's wife met with an accident while a passenger on a miniature railway owned by the defendants. As a result of the accident she died. After her death the grocery business was left to her son and daughter who sold it, and the plaintiff found accommodation elsewhere at a cost of £3 a week for board and lodging. After the sale of the business the deceased's son and daughter voluntarily paid over to the plaintiff the sum of £575 representing one-third of her estate. In a claim by the plaintiff against the defendants as a dependant under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846–1908, liability was admitted.

At the trial the question arose whether or not the voluntary payment made to the plaintiff by his step-children should be taken into account in assessing damages.

Patrick O'Connor for the plaintiff.
Malcolm McGougan for the defendants.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Parker J., having stated the facts and referred to the evidence, found that had the business not been purchased the plaintiff would have had to pay £4 a week towards the upkeep of the home for his wife and himself; that, as a result of the purchase of the business he paid nothing; and that, accordingly, by his wife's death he had lost £4 a week which remained to be capitalized. He continued: There are a number of matters to be taken into consideration. There is the consideration that the grocery business is not a gilt-edged investment; that the woman herself was 53 years of age at the time of her death. There is the possibility of the plaintiff's remarriage. There is the consideration that if and when the deceased died the plaintiff would get nothing, because it cannot really be suggested that she would have made a will later on any different from the will which she did make. All those matters have to be taken into consideration in arriving at the appropriate number of years' purchase. But in addition there remains the fact that after the two children had come into the property and it was sold, all the estate was distributed and they paid over voluntarily to the husband a sum of £575, said to represent about a third of the estate, and one of the questions which remain is whether that £575 is to be put into the balance sheet to arrive at the amount of damages to be paid.

Mr. McGougan for the defendants referred me to Baker v. Dalgleish Steam Shipping Co. Ld.,[1] and also to Davies v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries Ld. (No. 2),[2] and pointed out that any benefit received from whatever source, be it even a voluntary payment, falls to be taken into consideration. In Baker v. Dalgleish Steam Shipping Co.[3] Scrutton L.J. said[4]: "Just as in "assessing the loss by the death the probability of voluntary contribution destroyed by the death of the contributor may be included to swell the claim, so the probability of voluntary contribution bestowed in consequence of the death may be used to reduce the claim by showing what loss the claimant has in fact sustained by the death." In effect, Mr. McGougan says that the probability of voluntary contribution is here being crystallized and has become a certainty by the payment.

Mr. O'Connor, on the other hand, referred me to Redpath v. Belfast and County Down Railway,[5] which was decided in the courts of Northern Ireland, and which, though not binding on me, is a very persuasive authority. The matter came before the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland on a motion to compel the plaintiff in the action to answer certain interrogatories. After the plaintiff had been injured and a number of other passengers killed in a railway accident a fund came into existence, to which people subscribed from charitable motives, for the benefit of the relatives of the persons injured or the dependants of those killed. Interrogatories had been directed to ascertain the amount received by the plaintiff from that fund. Andrews C.J. held that the interrogatories were directed to a matter quite irrelevant to the issues in the action, and in a long, exhaustive judgment (in which he dealt with all the cases) he came to the conclusion that receipts from such a fund, which came into existence long after the death, and which was supported by voluntary subscriptions, was not to be taken into consideration in assessing damages. As he put it[6]: "The possibility of such a fund being formed is a contingency altogether too remote to enter into the calculation and assessment of damages."

It seems to me that each case must depend upon its own facts. It is quite clear that a payment must be taken into consideration even when it is made voluntarily and not as a matter of legal right. Equally, I would not venture to differ from the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland in saying that a fund brought into existence after the death, subscribed to by complete strangers from charitable motives, is a matter to be taken into consideration.

In the present case, even accepting for a moment that the plaintiff was unaware that on his wife's death he would get anything from the family, it is clear that as a result of her death his two step-children have parted with—and have in fact paid to him—part of the widow's estate. They have not collected subscriptions or used what was purely their earnings or savings. In those circumstances I cannot say that that payment is too remote to enter into the calculation of damages. It seems to me it is just one of the things which have to be brought into account.

PEACOCK v. AMUSEMENT EQUIPMENT CO. LD.

Starting with the financial loss as a result of the death, applying what I consider to be the appropriate number of years' purchase, and taking into consideration the payment from the children, I would assess the damages at a sum of £1,250. Accordingly, there will be judgment for the plaintiff for that amount.

Sunday. Licensing.

Notwithstanding section 6 of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, a search warrant issued by a magistrate under section 152 of the Licensing Act, 1953, authorizing the police to search premises to see if offences are being committed under the Act may be lawfully executed on a Sunday by virtue of section 102 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, which provides that "The issue or execution of ". . . a search warrant, shall be as effectual on Sunday as on any "other day."

CASE STATED by Birkenhead justices.

On November 6, 1953, a justice of the peace for the county borough of Birkenhead, after hearing evidence on oath, issued a warrant under section 152 of the Licensing Act, 1953,[1] authorizing the police for the county borough to search the premises of the Hamilton Social Club, Birkenhead, it being alleged that the club was being managed in a manner which would constitute a ground for striking it off the club register under section 144 (1) of the Act.

[1] By s. 152 of the Licensing Act, 1953: "(1) If a justice of the peace "is satisfied by information on oath "that there is reasonable ground for "believing that any intoxicating "liquor is sold by retail or exposed "or kept for sale by retail at any "place in the county or borough for "which he is justice, . . . he may "issue a search warrant . . . to a con-"stable authorising him at any time "or times within one month from the "date of the warrant to enter that "place, which shall be named in the "warrant, . . . and search the place "for intoxicating liquor. . . ."

The warrant was duly executed on Sunday, November 8, 1953, and as a result certain informations were laid against the appellant, John Magee, and other persons attending the club for various offences against the Act.

On January 14, 1954, when the justices were about to hear the informations, counsel for the appellant submitted a preliminary point that the proceedings were bad in that the police had no authority to execute the search warrant on a Sunday having regard to section 6 of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677.[2]

It was contended by the respondent that section 152 of the Licensing Act, 1953, authorized the police to execute such a warrant on a Sunday.

The justices were of the opinion that, having regard to section 102 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952,[3] and section 152 of the Licensing Act, 1953, the police had authority to execute the warrant on a Sunday. They adjourned the hearing of the informations and stated a case for the opinion of the court whether the police were acting lawfully and whether they could hear and determine the informations laid as a result of the execution of the search warrant.

C. J. Cunningham for the appellant.
Paul Wrightson for the respondent.

No cases were cited in argument.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by justices for the county borough of Birkenhead and raises the short point whether a search warrant issued under section 152 of the Licensing Act, 1953, authorizing police officers to search premises to see if offences against that Act are being committed, can be executed on a Sunday. Of course, if it could not be, it would be a charter to publicans and other sinners to commit every conceivable sort of offence on a Sunday, and there would be no means of proving it.

It is clear, in my opinion, that a search warrant can be executed on a Sunday because, whatever might have been the true interpretation of section 6 of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677, it is now provided by section 102 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952: "The issue or execution of any warrant "under this Act for the arrest of a person charged with an "offence or of a search warrant, shall be effectual on Sunday

[2] By s. 6 of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677: ". . . no person or "persons upon the Lord's day shall "serve or execute or cause to be "served or executed any writ, process, warrant . . . (except in cases "of treason, felony, or breach of the "peace), but that the service of every "such writ, process, warrant . . . "shall be void to all intents and purposes whatsoever. . . ."

[3] By s. 102 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952: "The issue or execution of any warrant under this "Act for the arrest of a person "charged with an offence, or of a "search warrant, shall be as effectual "on Sunday as on any other day."

"as on any other day." A search warrant is granted under various statutes. I see nothing in the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, to limit the class of search warrant to which the Act applies. Search warrants are issued in respect of the search of premises for stolen goods, in respect of obscene books, illicit stills, with regard to women or girls who are believed to be detained in brothels or immoral places and in a certain number of other cases. In every case a search warrant has to be granted by a magistrate, and there is no difference between one search warrant and another. They are issued under statute because a search warrant is not a thing known at common law. The permission of the particular statute enables the magistrate to issue it. Once he issues his search warrant as a magistrate, it is simply the authority given by him to a police officer to search. As section 152 of the Licensing Act, 1953, provides that the magistrates may issue a search warrant, it seems to me that section 102 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, applies, and that the warrant can be executed on Sunday as well as on any other day. This appeal, therefore, is dismissed.

Hilbery J. I agree.

Donovan J. I agree that reading the sections together, it is clear that this warrant can be executed on Sunday.

Costs — County court action — Counterclaim — Admission of claim by defendant—Litigation on counterclaim only—Defendant successful on counterclaim—Nominal costs only recoverable by plaintiff—Sum proffered by defendant and refused by plaintiff before action brought —Sum recovered by plaintiff on balance less than that offered before action brought.

A landlord brought separate actions against two tenants to recover the balance on accounts for rent and services. The defendants on the pleadings in each action admitted liability on the claim but counterclaimed for breach of covenant by the plaintiff.

In the first action, the county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim with costs of the claim and for the defendant on the counterclaim (though for a smaller sum than that counterclaimed) with costs of the counterclaim; but on a formal review of the registrar's taxation, the judge awarded the plaintiff only the nominal costs of his action. On appeal by the plaintiff:—

Held, that the judge had correctly exercised his discretion as to costs, since the only matter litigated had been the counterclaim on which the defendant had been successful.

Decision on order for costs in N.V. Amsterdamsche Lucifersfabrieken v. H. & H. Trading Agencies Ld. [1940] 1 All E.R. 587 applied.

Before the writ had been issued in the second action, the defendant had twice proffered and the plaintiff had twice refused a sum larger than that which he ultimately recovered on balance in the action brought by him, in which the defendant similarly admitted the plaintiff's claim but counterclaimed successfully. The county court judge, invited to exercise his discretion as to costs in favour of the successful defendant, held that he was bound to follow in all but exceptional cases the procedure laid down in Chell Engineering Ld. v. Unit Tool and Engineering Co. Ld. [1950] W.N. 146; [1950] 1 All E.R. 378, and to order that the plaintiff should have the costs on his claim and the defendant her costs on the counterclaim. On appeal by the defendant:—

Held, that the judge had wrongly decided that in exercising his discretion as to costs he was bound by Chell's case, which was distinguishable; that the court could accordingly exercise its own discretion as to costs; and that, having regard to the circumstance that the plaintiff had recovered a lesser sum than he had been proffered and had refused before action brought, the proper order was that the defendant should recover her whole costs on both claim and counterclaim.

Mrs. Blacker. The agreement in each case between the landlord and the respective tenants was for a payment of rent and a charge for services. In October, 1951, the landlord discontinued certain services. The tenants complained; and during 1952 they withheld part of the services charges.

In April, 1953, Mrs. Blacker, having made her own estimate of the value of the services which were not being provided, and having calculated that she owed the landlord £66 14s. 3d. on balance, sent him a cheque for that amount. The cheque was returned. Her solicitors then sent it again "in full settlement," but that, too, was returned on April 20; and on April 22 the landlord issued a writ against her, claiming the balance on account of the full amount of rent and services alleged to be due to him, namely, £100 18s. 6d. On April 23 Mrs. Blacker's solicitors tendered a banker's draft for £66 14s. 3d. to the landlord's solicitors, but that, too, was returned.

On May 29 the landlord applied for summary judgment against Mrs. Blacker under R.S.C. Ord. 14, but in an affidavit she submitted that she had an arguable defence based on her counterclaim; and the landlord's application was dismissed, the action being remitted for trial to the county court.

On October 13, 1953, the action appeared in the list, together with a similar action by the landlord against the tenant Gibson. In each case the landlord claimed the balance on the full amounts alleged to be due to him for rent and services, and the respective tenants, while admitting that the landlord was entitled to credit for the sum claimed, counterclaimed for breaches of covenant to provide services.

The case of Childs v. Gibson was heard first, and the judge gave judgment for the landlord for £153 6s. 0d. and costs on the claim, and for the tenant for £35 on the counterclaim (which was less than the tenant had counterclaimed) with costs on the counterclaim. The order made no provision for set-off. The taxation of the costs in Childs v. Gibson then went before the registrar, when it was submitted for the tenant that as he had always admitted the claim and had succeeded to some extent on his counterclaim, which was the only issue contested, the costs should be taxed in such a way as to give the landlord only nominal costs on the claim. The registrar accepted that submission and taxed the costs on the basis of the decision in N.V. Amsterdamsche Lucifersfabrieken v. H. & H. Trading Agencies Ld.,[1] allowing the landlord only formal costs. On the formal review of taxation before the county court judge, the landlord objected to the registrar's decision and sought the restoration of the original order of the judge awarding him the full costs on his claim. The judge upheld the decision of the registrar. The landlord appealed, asking for the restoration of the original order as to costs.

The second case—Childs v. Blacker—came on for hearing on November 24, 1953, the parties having agreed to accept the evidence and findings of the judge in Childs v. Gibson, so that all that remained for determination was (1) the amount of damages to be awarded to the tenant on her counterclaim, (2) the form of order to be made, and (3) the order as to costs. It was submitted for the tenant, inter alia, that the action was entirely unnecessary in that the tenant had admitted liability on the landlord's claim and had tendered the sum of £66 14s. 3d. before the writ had been issued. Judgment was given that the landlord should recover from the tenant the sum of £94 2s. 0d. and his costs of the action, and that the tenant should recover on her counterclaim against him the sum of £42 and her costs on the counterclaim. The net result of the proceedings would thus be that the landlord would recover £52 2s. 0d., namely, a sum less than that of £66 14s. 3d. which had been twice offered to and twice refused by him before he had taken any proceedings and which had been tendered after the issue of the writ and paid into court; but that on the order as to costs the successful defendant would be required to pay costs of £79. Counsel for the tenant therefore submitted to the judge that in the exercise of his discretion in awarding costs he ought to take that result into consideration. The judge, however, purporting to exercise his discretion, said that in this as in all similar cases where both sides succeeded to some extent, it was always difficult to adjust the costs, but that he saw no essential distinction between the present case and the decision of the Court of Appeal in Chell Engineering Ld. v. Unit Tool and Engineering Co. Ld.,[2] by which he was bound, and which in his view laid down the procedure to be followed, save in exceptional cases, and that that was the safest course even if it did not produce an ideal result; and he made the order for costs as set out above.

On the taxation of those costs, the registrar heard objections by the tenant, namely, that the substance of the action was the counterclaim on which the tenant had been wholly successful, and that there had been no need for the landlord to incur any costs in pursuing his claim after delivery of the tenant's defence and counterclaim admitting the claim, but that he had elected to take proceedings, and ought not to receive any costs. On the formal review of the order for taxation on January 21, 1954, the judge sustained the tenant's objection and made the order for taxation in accordance with the Amsterdamsche case,[3] awarding the landlord nominal costs only. Meanwhile the tenant had entered an appeal against the original order as to costs, and the landlord cross-appealed from the judge's order of January 21, 1954, asking for the restoration of the original order as to costs.

The tenant by her notice of appeal submitted that, on the facts admitted and found by the county court judge, he had failed to exercise his discretion as to costs, or alternatively that if and in so far as he had purported to do so he had exercised it on wrong considerations or had failed to take into account considerations which he ought to have taken into account in exercising his discretion judicially in that: (a) he had held himself bound to follow the decision and the order as to costs in Chell's case [4]; (b) he had wrongly held that case indistinguishable from the present case; (c) he had failed to take into consideration (i) that the result of the proceedings was that the landlord had recovered on balance £14 12s. 3d. less than was placed in his hands by the tenant and returned by him before action brought; (ii) that the landlord had chosen to proceed by action in the hope of recovering a larger sum, in which purpose he had been wholly unsuccessful; (iii) that on action brought the tenant had no choice but to pay the landlord a larger sum than was ultimately found due to him or to defend the proceedings and to counterclaim, which she had done wholly successfully; and (iv) that the substance of the case was that the whole of the litigation was on the counterclaim only and the judge had found in favour of the tenant on every issue of fact litigated. The tenant asked that the judge's original order as to costs should be reversed or varied by giving her the costs of the defence, or alternatively that there should be no order as to costs on the claim.

The appeals, being inextricably bound together, were heard together.

The cases cited in argument were all referred to in the judgment.

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts in Childs v. Gibson and continued: When the question of costs came before the registrar as the taxing officer of the court, he announced that he should tax the costs in accordance with the decision of this court in N.V. Amsterdamsche Lucifersfabrieken v. H. & H. Trading Agencies Ld.[1] The decision in that case is conveniently and concisely put in the headnote in these terms [1]: "In an action which was remitted "to the county court, the defendants in their defence admitted "the plaintiffs' claim. There was, however, a counterclaim, "which was the subject of dispute, the defendants ultimately "succeeding on the counterclaim, though for a smaller amount "than that claimed." That is exactly the position here. The headnote continues: "The order drawn up adjudged that the "plaintiffs should recover the amount of the claim and the costs "of the claim, and that the defendants should recover the sum "awarded on their counterclaim and the costs of the counter-"claim:—Held, by reason of the admission in the defence of the

"plaintiffs' claim, there were attributable to the claim no costs "which had to be divided or apportioned as between the claim "and the counterclaim. The plaintiffs' costs should have been "taxed on the principle that, after the admission of the claim, "the plaintiffs were not entitled to incur any costs relating to "the claim except those of setting down and obtaining leave to "proceed, and the costs of the defendants should be taxed upon "the principle that they were successful on the only matter "litigated, but this would not affect any costs given to either "party in any event."

That was the principle on which the registrar said he would tax. It seems to me that that case was binding on the registrar as it is binding on this court, and really, it is very good sense and very good justice. The matter was then taken before the judge by way of review of taxation, and the judge, who knew what the issues were that had been tried before him and obviously remembered all about the case, said that he had no doubt whatever that the whole of the litigation expenses resulted from the counterclaim; in other words, the only point that was litigated before the judge was the counterclaim, for the other point had been admitted; and therefore, having considered the Amsterdamsche case,[1] he came to the conclnsion that the registrar was right to follow it and dismissed the application to review. I think that the judge was right, as I think the registrar was right, to take that view. Moreover, it is perfectly clear that in this case the judge has exercised his discretion on grounds which were in the material before him, and there is no reason to interfere with his decision.

The other case, which is in form an appeal by the defendant, Mrs. Blacker, raises another and different point. [His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] The only question before the county court judge was how much Mrs. Blacker should get judgment for. She showed damage to the extent of £42, and the result was that the plaintiff recovered from her only £52 2s., which was less than the £66 that she had already offered.

It is said that there was some fault in pleading or some technical question, and that the plaintiff ought to have the whole of the costs of this case. In Mrs. Blacker's case, just as in Gibson's case, the only question that was fought was the question of the counterclaim for breach of contract. Whether one calls it counterclaim or set-off, it was in fact a counterclaim for breach of covenant, the defendant maintaining that she had an action for breach of covenant because the plaintiff had not performed his services.

It is then said that, although the plaintiff has recovered less than the sum that had twice been offered to him, he should have the whole of the costs of these proceedings, or substantially the whole of the costs of the proceedings, because if he gets the costs on the claim and the defendant the costs of the counterclaim, the general costs of the action will go to the plaintiff.

CHILDS v. GIBSON. CHILDS v. BLACKER. SAMB v. SAMB.
Lord Goddard C.J.

The judge made that order—that the plaintiff should have the costs of the claim and the defendant should have the costs of the counterclaim—which would result in the plaintiff getting by far the greater amount of the costs, while the defendant, who has in fact been successful in the matter which was litigated, would be left to pay very substantial sums of money both to the plaintiff for his costs, and, of course, her costs.

The judge seems to have thought and has said in terms that he made the order because he considered that the case was governed by Chell Engineering Ld. v. Unit Tool and Engineering Co. Ld.[2] In my opinion the judge went wrong in that respect. That case was on an entirely different matter. The only question which this court there decided was the application of section 47 of the County Courts Act, 1934, which concerned the question whether, where the amount recovered is under a certain amount, the plaintiff can recover High Court or county court costs. It is rather an involved story and it is not necessary to go through it in detail, but, having perused the case, I am quite clear that that was the real point that was decided in the case, and nothing else. Therefore, if the judge exercised his discretion based on that case, he was obviously exercising it on a wrong ground. He said: "I hold case covered by Chell Engineering Ld. v. Unit Tool and Engineering Co. Ld.[2]"; and we have a fuller note of the judgment by Mr. Percival, from which it appears that the judge said: "In this as in all similar cases "where both sides succeed to some extent, difficult in the "extreme to adjust the costs. I do not see any essential "distinction between this and the case of Chell, etc.[2] Chell[2] "did flow from a different situation. Procedure which ought "to be followed except in exceptional circumstances. Safest "course even if it does not produce an ideal result." The judge therefore thought that the Chell case[2] laid down the procedure to be followed except in exceptional circumstances. With all respect to him, Chell[2] did nothing of the sort. I think it would be a reproach to the law if in these circumstances the plaintiff were entitled to recover all or substantially all the costs of this action, because, in fact, he could have had his money without bringing any action at all. It had been sent to him by cheque, and, after he had returned that, by banker's draft. Instead of accepting that money he issued a writ; and when he had issued the writ and this case had been litigated at very considerable expense—as it turns out, a matter of £50 or £60—he recovered less than he had been offered before the writ was issued. In those circumstances it seems to me only fair that the defendant should have the costs of the action, and I think that that is the order which the judge, in the exercise of his judicial discretion, should have made.

This case may perform one useful purpose; it does draw the attention of county court judges once more to what Denning L.J. said in Chell's case,[2] and what I had said in a previous case, following what Lord Blanesburgh said in the House of Lords[3]: "that in most of these cases it is desirable that a judge "should consider whether a special order should be made as to "costs because the issues are often very much interlocked, and "the usual order of 'judgment for plaintiff on claim with costs "'and for defendant on counterclaim with costs' does not always "give a just result."

It is very easy in these cases to say that the plaintiff or the defendant is to have his costs less perhaps some small proportion. In this particular case, as the matter has come before us and as we are satisfied that the judge did not exercise a true discretion because he thought that he was bound by a case which did not in fact bind him, we can make the order which we think ought to be made: namely, that the defendant should have the costs of the action.

DENNING L.J. I agree.

on by the defendant alone. Clause 21 of the agreement provided that on the purchase by one partner of the share of the other partner pursuant to the provisions of the agreement, "the partner whose "share is purchased shall not for five years from such date directly "or indirectly carry on or be engaged or interested in any business "similar to or competing with the business of the partnership." The partnership having been determined, the plaintiff company became the purchaser of the defendant's share of the partnership business and clause 21 came into operation. Subsequently, a company was formed which began to publish a periodical similar in character and make-up to the publication of the partnership which was being published by the plaintiff company as purchasers of the partnership business. The defendant had been writing for the new publication which had featured his articles. The plaintiff company sought an injunction in the terms of clause 21 of the partnership agreement. Roxburgh J. granted an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendant, until judgment in the action, "from "directly or indirectly carrying on or being engaged in or interested "in any business competing with the business formerly carried on "by the plaintiff company" and in particular from writing or publishing articles in the new periodical. On appeal:—

Held, (1) that the words "carry on or be engaged or interested "in any business similar to or competing with the business of "the partnership" were apt, particularly in view of the word "engaged," to include a case where the party subject to the restriction took employment in a business of either of the kinds mentioned at a salary or wage, as well as to a case in which he embarked on such a business on his own account or in a partnership; and that, accordingly, assuming that the covenant was valid, that which the defendant had done was prima facie a breach of the provisions of clause 21;

(2) that the fact that the clause extended to prevent the defendant working as a salaried employee or at a wage in a business of either of the kinds mentioned did not of itself make the provisions of clause 21 too wide;

(3) that the argument that clause 21 was unreasonable, in that it was unlimited in point of area, would prevail, since it restrained the defendant from carrying on a similar business in any part of the world, unless it were possible to sever the covenant; that this being a case of vendor and purchaser it was possible to sever the covenant and to segregate the words "similar to or," so as to make the covenant read "shall not . . . carry on or be engaged or "interested in any business competing with the business of the "partnership or any business competing with the business of the "partnership"; and that the interlocutory injunction was justified.

Decision of Roxburgh J. affirmed.

Appeal from Roxburgh J.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Jenkins L.J.: The plaintiff company, Ronbar Enterprises Ld., was incorporated on November 28, 1951. The defendant, Isadore Green, had for some time previously been publishing a weekly newspaper known as "The Weekly Sporting Review and Show "Business" containing feature articles and general news about the sporting and entertainment business. The company was formed to enter into partnership with the defendant in his business, and to pay him £10,000 for a 40 per cent. interest. There was to be a partnership agreement under the terms of which the paper was to be carried on. An agreement dated December 5, 1951, provided that the partnership was to begin from December 1, 1951. By clause 7 of the agreement, the net profits of the business were to be divided as to 60 per cent. to the defendant, and as to 40 per cent. to the plaintiff company, and there were provisions in clauses 13 and 14 to the effect that the defendant should be managing editor of the partnership business and devote his whole time and attention thereto and, as such managing editor, that he should receive a salary at the rate of £1,000 per annum. The partnership was, apart from particular events, to be determinable by either partner giving to the other three months' previous notice in writing expiring on December 1 in any year after December 1, 1956, so that it was, in effect, to run for six years certain, unless cause for sooner determination arose.

Clause 19 provided that, in the event of either partner committing a breach of the terms of the agreement, the other party should be at liberty to give notice to the offending partner determining the partnership; and the partner giving such notice was to have the option of purchasing the share of the other partner and the capital assets of the business upon the like terms as were set out in clause 20. That clause provided for the purchase by a surviving or continuing partner of the share of a deceased or bankrupt partner at a valuation.

Clause 21 provided: "On the purchase by one partner of the "share of the other partner pursuant to the last preceding clause "hereof the purchase money shall be paid with interest thereon "at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date of deter-"mination or dissolution of the partnership within one year from "such date and the partner whose share is purchased shall not "for five years from such date directly or indirectly carry on or "be engaged or interested in any business similar to or competing "with the business of the partnership"—that was the business to be carried on under the partnership agreement under the name of the "Weekly Sporting Review and Show Business Publications."

The plaintiff company determined the partnership by reason of a breach of its provisions by the defendant. In lieu of the valuation as contemplated by the partnership agreement, the price to be paid by the plaintiff company for the defendant's share in the business was agreed at £7,000. On July 31, 1953, the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt.

In these circumstances the restrictive provisions of clause 21 of the partnership deed came into operation. It appeared that, after the defendant's connexion with the plaintiff company had been severed, a company known as Jocal Productions Ld. was incorporated on October 9, 1953, with a nominal capital of £100. The directors of that company were the defendant's wife, Mrs.

Ronbar Enterprises Ld. v. Green.

Ada Green, and a Mrs. Calvert, and it started publication of a periodical called "Sport and Show News." That paper was in character and make-up very much the same as the partnership's Show Business periodical, and it had been published at intervals since October, 1953. It was clear that the defendant had been writing for this paper and various issues of it contained notices of the fact of his so writing, and commending to readers of the paper his merits and reputation as a writer on sporting subjects.

The plaintiff company in this action sought an injunction to restrain the defendant from infringing the provisions of clause 21 of the partnership agreement and applied for an interlocutory injunction. Roxburgh J. held that the provisions of clause 21 were severable and that it was possible in the phrase "any business "similar to or competing with the business of the partnership" to segregate the words "similar to or," and he accordingly granted an interlocutory injunction limited to a competing business.

The defendant appealed.

T. M. Eastham for the defendant.
G. T. Hesketh for the plaintiff company.

The following cases were cited in argument in addition to those cited in the judgment: George Hill & Co. v. Hill[1]; Smith v. Hancock[2]; Rolfe v. Rolfe[3]; Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co. Ld.[4]

Jenkins L.J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Mr. Isadore Green, from an order of Roxburgh J., dated March 12, 1954, whereby the defendant was restrained until after judgment in the action or until further order from directly or indirectly carrying on or being engaged or interested in any business competing with the business formerly carried on by the plaintiffs, Ronbar Enterprises Ld., and the defendant in partnership, and in particular writing or publishing articles or other matter in a paper known as "Sport and Show News."

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The questions that fall to be determined are first whether what the defendant has been doing in relation to "Sport and Show News" is a breach of the restrictive covenant contained in clause 21 of the partnership deed, assuming it to be valid; and accordingly, if so, whether the restrictive covenant is valid. The clause provides: "The "partner whose share is purchased shall not for five years from "such date"—that is, the time of purchase—"directly or "indirectly carry on or be engaged or interested in any business "similar to or competing with the business of the partnership."

Mr. Eastham, on behalf of the defendant, argued that there had been no breach of that restrictive provision because, on its true construction, it did not extend to the rendering of services for a salary or wages as distinct from being engaged in business on one's own account. I do not agree. In my opinion the words "carry on or be engaged or interested in any business similar to "or competing with the business of the partnership" are apt, particularly in view of the word "engaged," to include a case where the party subject to the restriction takes employment in a business of either of the kinds mentioned at a salary or wages, as well as a case in which he embarks on such a business on his own account or in a partnership. In my view, therefore, assuming that the covenant is valid, what has been done does prima facie amount to a breach of it.

As to its validity, that was attacked by Mr. Eastham on these grounds. First, he said that if, contrary to his primary submission, it did extend to prevent the defendant working as a salaried employee, it was on that account too wide. In my view, that is not so. I do not think that it can be said that this covenant is too wide, merely because it would extend to cases of salaried employment, or employment at a wage in a business of either of the kinds mentioned.

Mr. Eastham next contends that the covenant is unreasonable as being unlimited in point of area. He says that a business similar to the business of the partnership might be carried on in any part of the world, and in whatever part of the world it was carried on it would be a breach of this covenant read in accordance with its terms. In my view, that argument must almost certainly prevail, unless it is possible to sever this covenant, so as to segregate the words "similar to or," and make it read "shall "not . . . carry on or be engaged or interested in any business "competing with the business of the partnership or any business "competing with the business of the partnership," the covenant being thus treated as imposing two distinct restrictions with respect to two distinct kinds of business—that is to say, a business competing with the business of the partnership, or a business similar to the business of the partnership.

On the question whether such a severance is allowable, we were referred to Goldsoll v. Goldman,[1] where there was a covenant in connexion with the sale of a business not to "carry "on or be engaged or concerned or interested in or render services "(gratuitously or otherwise) to the business of a vendor of or "dealer in real or imitation jewellery in the county of London, "England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, or any part of the United "Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Isle of Man or "in France, the United States of America, Russia or Spain" or certain other places. In that case, the business concerned was one confined to artificial jewellery, and not including real jewellery, and it was argued that the covenant was wider than was reasonably necessary for the plaintiff's protection as it extended

Ronbar Enterprises Ld. v. Green.
Jenkins L.J.

to a subject-matter, namely, real jewellery, which was not included in the business sold. It was also attacked as being too wide in point of area, owing to the long string of countries to which the restriction was expressed to extend; but it was held by the Court of Appeal that the covenant was severable both as regards the areas mentioned and also as regards the reference to real or imitation jewellery.

A similar view on a comparable question of severance was expressed in British Reinforced Concrete Engineering Co. Ld. v. Schelff.[2] In that case in connexion with the sale of a business concerned in the manufacture and sale of road reinforcements a restriction was imposed which restrained the person entering into it from being concerned or interested in the business of the manufacture or sale of road reinforcements in any part of the United Kingdom; and again it was held that the businesses to which the covenant related could be severed, and that, while the covenant would be unreasonable as regards a business in the manufacture of road reinforcements (in which the vendors had never been concerned), there would not be the same ground for holding it unreasonable in respect of the sale of road reinforcements. Accordingly, although in that case the particular restriction was held to be too wide on other grounds, the objection based on the fact that it applied to manufacture as well as sale was surmounted by means of severance.

We were also referred to Attwood v. Lamont,[3] which at first sight is inconsistent with the other two authorities that I have mentioned, in as much as it was a case in which there was a covenant not to carry on any of a long enumeration of different trades and businesses. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the covenant could not be severed so as to make it equivalent to a string of independent covenants each dealing with a different business.

The explanation of the different conclusion reached in Attwood v. Lamont[3] as compared with Goldsoll v. Goldman[4] and the British Reinforced Concrete case[5] appears to be that Attwood v. Lamont[6] was a case as between master and servant, whereas the other two cases were cases as between vendor and purchaser, as is the present case. I think that it can be regarded as settled that the court takes a far stricter and less favourable view of covenants in restraint of trade entered into between master and servant than it does of similar covenants between vendor and purchaser. In the case of a covenant between vendor and purchaser, the court recognizes that it is perfectly proper for the parties, in order to give efficacy to the transaction, to enter into such restrictive provisions as regards competition as are reasonable necessary to enable the purchaser to reap the benefit of that which he has bought; and restrictions of that kind are regarded as necessary, not only in the interests of the purchaser but in the interests of the vendor also, for they not only preserve the value to the purchaser of that which he buys but also enable the vendor to realize a satisfactory price. It is obvious that in many types of business the goodwill would be well-nigh unsaleable if it was unlawful for the vendor to enter into an adequate covenant against competition.

In this case, Roxburgh J. held that the covenant was severable, in the sense that it could be regarded as a twofold covenant, first, against carrying on, and so forth, any business similar to the business of the partnership, and secondly against carrying on, and so forth, any business competing with the business of the partnership; and, taking that view, the judge was of opinion that prima facie the covenant was not wider than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the plaintiff company; and, that being his prima facie view, he granted the interlocutory injunction to the terms of which I have already referred.

Mr Eastham has advanced all the arguments that could be advanced on behalf of the defendant, but I am not prepared to hold that Roxburgh J. came to a wrong conclusion in this case. It must be remembered that this is only an interlocutory proceeding, and that the result of this appeal in no way governs the result which may ensue at the trial. But, for the purposes of interlocutory relief, I find that what the defendant has been doing is plainly contrary to the terms of the restrictive covenant. I find further that prima facie the covenant, construed in the way that I have construed it, should not be held to be invalid. It follows that prima facie, and as a matter of interlocutory relief, Roxburgh J. was justified in granting the injunction under appeal. I am accordingly of opinion that this court should not interfere, and I would dismiss this appeal.

HODSON L.J. I agree. The plaintiff company was formed in November, 1951, with a view to entering into partnership with the defendant in his business, which was the publishing of a weekly newspaper known as "The Weekly Sporting Review and "Show Business," and the company paid to the defendant the sum of £10,000 for a 40 per cent. interest in his business. By an agreement of December 5, 1951, it was provided that, in the events which have now happened, the plaintiffs should become liable to pay for the balance of the business a further sum, which has been assessed at £7,000. By the agreement itself, so long as it was in operation, the defendant was entitled to expenses at the rate of £20 a week, and in addition to that a salary of £1,000 a year. Clause 21 of the agreement contains these words: "The "partner whose share is purchased shall not for five years from "such date directly or indirectly carry on or be engaged or "interested in any business similar to or competing with the "business of the partnership."

The first question to be determined is whether, on the construction of that clause, the defendant is in breach of his agreement by reason of the fact that he has been employed by a company incorporated on October 9, 1953—one of the directors being his wife—which is publishing in London a paper of the same kind as the one which he had sold to the partnership.

On behalf of the defendant, Mr. Eastham has contended that, being employed in that way, the defendant is not in breach of his covenant because he is not "carrying on" a business; nor, it is contended, is he "engaged or interested in any business similar "to or competing with the business of the partnership." I agree with my Lord that, on the true construction of that clause, the word "engaged" is apt to cover employment as a servant, as well as employment as a principal. That view is, I think, supported by the authorities, in particular by the opinion expressed, for example, by Swinfen Eady J. in Gophir Diamond Co. v. Wood,[7] where he used this language about another covenant: "The covenant departs materially from the common "form. It does not provide that the covenantor shall not be "'engaged or concerned or interested' in a similar business, but "merely that he shall not be 'interested' therein. Nor does it "contain the usual provision against accepting employment as a "servant in a similar business. If it was intended to prevent "the defendant accepting employment of that nature it would "have been quite easy to say so."

Mr. Eastham, I think, recognized that the authorities were not helpful to him on his construction of the word "engaged" as not being apt to cover employment as a servant; but he sought to argue that in the background of this case, the word "engaged" did not cover the facts, because his client had not been previously a servant, but a principal; and he argues, therefore, that the word "engaged" ought to be construed in the light of that background. Accepting the force of that argument, so far as it goes, I still think that the position remains the same and that the word "engaged" does comprise being engaged as a servant; and therefore, on the face of the language, assuming that the clause is valid, the defendant is in breach.

On the question whether the covenant was unreasonably wide, Mr. Hesketh conceded that, as it stood, the covenant was unreasonably wide because the words "similar to or" preceding the word "competing" would be unnecessary for the protection of the plaintiff company's interest. Recognizing that position, the judge has excised those words, and thereby severed the covenant; and the question principally argued on this appeal is whether it was legitimate so to do.

I have no doubt in my own mind that it is. It is quite clear that in a "vendor and purchaser case," in so far as matters of geography are concerned—as was pointed out by this court in Goldsoll v. Goldman[8] which has already been cited—it is quite legitimate to deal with the area by severance. Lord Cozens-Hardy M.R. referred to the judgment of Neville J. in the court below in this way [9]: "On the question of the space covered by "the covenant Neville J. has held, and I entirely agree with him, "that it is unnecessarily large in so far as it is intended to cover "not merely the United Kingdom and the Isle of Man but also "the foreign countries mentioned in the covenant. He has also "held, and his decision is consistent with a long series of autho-"rities, that the covenant can be severed as regards the space "covered by it. It is clear that part of the covenant dealing with "the area is reasonable, and the learned judge has limited the "injunction. . . ."

Mr. Eastham, as I understand it, accepts that, but he says that striking out the words "similar to or" is not a limitation of the area. In my judgment, it is, and as my Lord pointed out, it is really the only way in which in practice the area can be limited for the protection of the plaintiff company's business. In the case of a publication, which is said to be a rival publication, the competition of which is feared, it is, as I see it, impracticable to limit the area by drawing geographical lines upon a map; and the only way in which the area can be practically limited is in the way adopted by Roxburgh J., namely, by limiting the area to that covered by the words "competing with the business of the "partnership."

I agree with my Lord that this appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

HARMAN J. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. There seems no doubt, on the evidence as it stands, that there is a strong prima facie case that the defendant has broken the covenant. The only question on the motion is whether he ought to be restrained until the trial from continuing to do so.

The test, I think, is whether the covenant is necessary for the protection of the covenantee; that was stated by Lord Birkenhead in Fitch v. Dewes.[10] Protection against what?—protection against competition in a vendor and purchaser case. The covenant, as limited by the judge of first instance, protects the purchaser from that very thing, and in my judgment, therefore, is necessary for his protection.

Appeal dismissed.

Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction—Rent Act avoidance—Agreement in writing—Letting for twelve months—Consideration sum of £47 and weekly rent of 2s. payable monthly—"Thereafter (should "tenant be desirous of continuing tenancy) on monthly tenancy at "rent of 2s. per week"—Rent less than two-thirds of rateable value —Tenant holding over—Tenant's claim to protection of Rent Acts as statutory tenant—Evidence that written agreement did not accurately record the intention of the parties.
Contract—Construction—Extrinsic evidence.

By an agreement of tenancy it was provided that in consideration of a payment of the sum of £47 the landlord let to the tenant a cottage for a period of one year, at a rent of 2s. a week (less than two-thirds of the rateable value), payable monthly, and afterwards, if the tenant so desired, on a monthly tenancy at the same rent of 2s. a week. At the end of the year the tenant held over, paying the rent of 2s. per week, and the landlord served on him a notice to quit. The landlord claimed possession; the tenant claimed to be protected as a statutory tenant. There was evidence that the £47 was to be payable periodically over twelve months:—

Held, that the tenant having held over under the agreement and continued the tenancy at a rent which was less than two-thirds of the rateable value of the premises, the notice to quit operated on a tenancy to which the Rent Acts did not apply, and the landlord was entitled to possession.

APPEAL from Judge Archer, sitting at Chichester County Court.

By an agreement of tenancy dated October 6, 1952, it was provided that "In consideration of the payment by the tenant "to the landlord of the sum of £47 the landlord lets and the "tenant takes the cottage and appurtenances at East Ashling, "Chichester, in the county of Sussex, known as 3, Cobdens "Cottage, for a period of one year from the first day of October, "1952, at a rental of 2s. per week payable in advance on the "first day of each month, and thereafter (should the tenant be "desirous of continuing his tenancy) on a monthly tenancy at "the said rent of 2s. per week." At the end of the twelve months the tenant remained in occupation, and on December 22, 1953, the solicitors on behalf of the landlord served a notice to quit to take effect on February 1, 1954. The tenant refused to quit, claiming protection as a statutory tenant under the Rent Acts, and the present proceedings were brought in the county court by the landlord, who contended that as a rental of 2s. per week was less than two-thirds of their rateable value the premises were outside the Rent Acts. For the tenant it was contended that the real bargain was that the rent should be £1 a week, payable as to 2s. in money, and as to the sum of £47 in produce and not as a lump sum. The county court judge decided against the tenant, upholding the agreement, and made an order for possession.

The tenant appealed.

J. T. Plume for the tenant.
R. C. Chope for the landlord.

Cases referred to in argument: Regor Estates Ld. v. Wright [1]; Rush v. Matthews [2]; Alliance Property Co. Ld. v. Shaffer [3]; Maclay v. Dickson [4]; Insall v. Nottingham Corporation [5]; Stone (J. & F.) Lighting and Radio Co. v. Levitt. [6]

Somervell L.J., having read the clause in the agreement, said: Two shillings per week is below two-thirds of the rateable value and, therefore, if that had stood alone the landlord would plainly have been entitled to possession, because the tenancy would have been outside the Rent Acts. But it was sought to adduce evidence below, and in this court, to show that the agreement did not represent the real bargain between the parties. It was said that the real bargain was that the premises should be let for £1 a week. After trouble had arisen there was a letter from the landlord saying, "You made an offer of £52 per annum "and I accepted it for one year only." If the £52 represented the rent, whether paid at once or in weekly sums, that would have been more than two-thirds of the rateable value of the premises. It is clear, and admitted by both sides, that the basis of the negotiations was that the occupation should be for a year. The landlord made it clear that he did not want to part with possession of the premises for more than a year and whatever the agreement may be in law the tenant was accepting that basis. It is not the first example of a tenant who, having got into possession on an undertaking that he would surrender possession at a later date, when that date has come, seeks, sometimes successfully and sometimes unsuccessfully, to rely on the Rent Acts. The county court judge decided that this was a case in which there were no grounds for going behind the agreement.

Although it is unnecessary to come to a final conclusion on this first point, for reasons which will emerge, it is right to draw attention at this stage to the operative legislation with regard to premiums. It is now contained in section 2 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, which prohibits premiums on the granting or assignment of tenancies, but that prohibition does not apply where the rent reserved is less than two-thirds of the rateable value of the dwelling-house. If the proper construction of this agreement, with any admissible extrinsic evidence, were that the £47 was a premium and the rent, with any sums which could properly be treated as rent, was only 2s., then it is plain —and this was the view of the county court judge—that the landlord is entitled to an order for possession.

We were referred to certain authorities which have indicated that, particularly in this field of rent restriction, if the court is satisfied that the document purporting to set out the rights between the parties is a sham—and I am not attempting to define what a sham is—then the court will accept and consider evidence as to the real bargain between the parties. I see no ground, having had the evidence and the letters read to us, for regarding this agreement as a sham, whatever that may mean. It is clear that there was no trickery or anything of that sort. The landlord made it perfectly plain that he wished the transaction arranged in this way at this low rent because he did not desire to part with possession for more than a year. The tenant's replies and the letters indicate, as, indeed, counsel agreed, that that was well understood. Although there is nothing contrary to the Act in agreeing to a premium in the case of a tenancy where the rent is below two-thirds of the rateable value, the court would scrutinize a sum in such a case which was put forward as a premium.

The sum is not so described in the present case and there is no provision, as will have been realized from the clause, as to the time of payment or as to when it was to be paid. In my opinion, extrinsic evidence was permissible to deal with that. It is clear that it was never intended that that sum should be paid as a lump sum at or about the time the tenant went into possession. According to his evidence, he was to pay 2s. a week and the idea originally was that a balance of about 18s. a week should be satisfied in produce, and the letters show that that was how the matter started to be worked out. The produce was not satisfactory to the landlord, who then started demanding money on a periodical basis spreading the £47 over the twelve months. The tenant was advised that he was not liable to pay the balance of £47, and he got into arrears. I think evidence was admissible to prove the intention of the parties, that the £47 should be periodic, spread over the year, because that is what the evidence leads to. On that basis there was a strong case made on behalf of the tenant for submitting that the principle of Rush v. Matthews [1] was applicable, and that notwithstanding the distinction between the facts in that case and in the present there should be added to the 2s. a sum, not technically rent, but to be treated as rent for the purposes of the Rent Acts, which would have brought the rent, for the purposes of those Acts, above the two-thirds provisions.

Apart from contesting that point, however, in this court counsel for the landlord took a further point in support of the judge's conclusion. It was not necessary to take it, and it was not taken before the judge but, of course, in this court his conclusions can be upheld on grounds which were not taken below. The point is based on the provision in the agreement "should the tenant be desirous "of continuing his tenancy on a monthly tenancy at the said "rent of 2s. per week." The £47, even admitting the extrinsic evidence, was to be satisfied under the contract within the year and was in respect of the year. At the end of the year the tenant stayed on. It was submitted that he should be regarded as having stayed on as a statutory tenant, but he did not assert that position in any letter. I think that the proper conclusion from the fact of his remaining in possession indicated his desire to continue the tenancy, and the tenancy therefore continued at a rent of 2s. per week under the agreement, and that sum is less than two-thirds of the rateable value. The notice to quit, therefore, operated on a tenancy to which the sections of the Rent Acts do not apply and the landlord is entitled to possession.

As against that, Mr. Plume submitted that we should disregard that part of the written agreement which refers to the period after the year was over. That was based on statements in the letters that the intention was that the tenancy should be for a year. I do not accept that. I think that it is quite impossible, on ordinary principles, to admit extrinsic evidence to contradict that term of the agreement. It may have been inserted because it was thought that the tenant might go back on his undertaking and seek to stay on. The landlord may, for all I know, have foreseen this point and was desirous of meeting it. That does not entitle the tenant, who accepted and signed this agreement, to say that it should be disregarded. In fact, it enables the intention of the parties, as admitted by the tenant, to be carried out.

We were referred to some observations by Evershed M.R. in Foster v. Robinson[2] where a sitting tenant, who was an old retainer of the landlord, after he had ceased work was allowed to stay on rent free. It was held that that was a new agreement and that his dependants could not claim the right conferred by section 12 (1) (g) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. It was said, however, that where you are dealing with a person who is already in occupation and entitled under his existing personal agreement to claim the rights of the Rent Acts, the court should scrutinize with great care an offer by a landlord of an apparently attractive substituted agreement with a view to enabling him to deprive the tenant of the rights which, as it were, he had already acquired, on the ground that the new rent was less than two-thirds of the rateable value. But that is not the present case. It was all agreed at the beginning and the agreement was put before the tenant who signed it at a time when he was receiving legal advice. Once it is agreed, as Mr. Plume for the tenant submitted, that one can have a tenancy where rent is reduced so as to bring the two-thirds provision into operation, it is plain that such an agreement may be made, as here, in advance, and once one is clear that there is nothing in the nature of trickery and that the landlord is not taking advantage of his position against a sitting tenant, I can see no reason why the provision should not be enforced. For that reason I would dismiss the appeal.

Birkett L.J. I agree. The county court judge decided this case on the simple ground that here was a perfectly valid agreement which did not offend against any provisions of the Rent Acts. He said that in that agreement there were two separate and distinct things mentioned, one being the sum of £47 and a second being the rent of 2s. a week. The 2s. a week is clearly less than two-thirds of the rateable value and therefore it is not within the Act of 1920, and whether the £47 is called a premium or not it does not offend against the provisions of the Rent Acts. Upon that simple ground, having listened to the evidence, he said: "I shall give effect to the provisions of the agreement."

It is, of course, open to people, if they can, to avoid the Rent Acts applying to their particular transaction. Scott L.J. in Maclay v. Dixon,[3] dealing with the facts of that case said: "There was no shadow of deception practised by the landlord "upon the tenant. In my opinion, they were both entitled so to "arrange the matter, as not to attract the control of the Acts, or, "putting it positively, as to prevent the Acts from applying. If "the actual transaction was not within the Acts, it made no "legal difference that the parties had intentionally kept it out of "the Acts. It was argued that the intention to keep it out of "itself showed want of bona fides; but unless the court has "other material on which to hold that the whole thing was a "sham, that intention was irrelevant." In the present case the county court judge merely said: "Here is an agreement, per-"fectly legal, perfectly valid. It does not offend against the "Acts and I give expression to it and the tenant is not "protected."

In the grounds of appeal, the first contention was that the judge was wrong in holding that the tenant was not a statutory tenant of the premises under the Acts of 1920 to 1939. That argument was elaborated before us by Mr. Plume, who said that the agreement between the parties was for one year certain and at the end of that year the tenant was entitled to say that he had become a statutory tenant. The second submission was that the judge was wrong in deciding the case merely on the provisions of the agreement. He said that the judge ought to have inquired into the surrounding circumstances to ascertain whether that agreement was a mere sham which did not accurately record the bargain made between the parties. In a word, Mr. Plume was seeking to say that the agreement between the parties was one for a tenancy at £1 a week, and the agreement that was subsequently signed went out of its way in its terms to depart from the agreement made between the parties.

A third ground of appeal was that the judge was wrong in law in holding that the sum of £47 named in the agreement could not be regarded as rent, and further, that he was wrong in holding that he should not inquire into the facts of the case in order to ascertain the true nature of that sum. All that it is now necessary for me to say on those matters is that when one has a written agreement it is not competent to call oral evidence to contradict the terms of that agreement. It was said by Mr. Plume that he was not seeking to do that, but to show by evidence that the sum of £47 was not a lump sum but one which was, in effect, to be split up into periodic payments. That did not offend against the Rent Acts. He was anxious, in that way, if he could, to show that in truth the real agreement between the parties was at a rent which would enable the tenant to claim the protection of the Acts.

Quite late in the argument Mr. Chope, for the landlord, introduced another point. He said that at the time when the notice to quit was given, and at the time of the plaint in the county court, the tenancy which then existed was, in fact, a monthly tenancy and that it was at a rental of 2s. a week. That arises because by the agreement "the tenant takes the cottage "and appurtenances . . . for a period of one year from October 1, "1952, at a rental of two shillings per week, payable in advance "on the first day of each month, and thereafter (should the "tenant be desirous of continuing his tenancy) on a monthly "tenancy at the said rent of two shillings per week."

It was submitted by Mr. Plume that we ought to disregard that latter paragraph "and thereafter (should the tenant be "desirous of continuing his tenancy)." In my view, it is impossible to do that, and it seems to me that what emerges from the evidence and the documents, is that as far as the landlord was concerned, he regarded it as an agreement for one year certain. The tenant does not speak with the same assurance as the landlord did, but to Mr. Plume, he said: "I cannot say that "the landlord ever asserted positively that it was for one year "only," but it was quite clear that he never denied it. Indeed, when the landlord made this assertion in the correspondence, there is no word saying that it was wrong.

When we find that the agreement is not just for one year certain but the words "and thereafter (should the tenant be "desirous of continuing his tenancy) on a monthly tenancy at the "said rent of 2s. per week" are added, nowhere is it found in

1954
O'Connor v. Hume.
Birkett L.J.

the correspondence or, indeed, in the evidence, that the tenant said: "I desire to exercise that option and to continue." It is plain from his attitude and his conduct throughout that he did desire to remain, and therefore, must be taken to have remained on the terms which are set out in the agreement. As nobody doubts that 2s. a week is less than the rateable value, the tenancy is unaffected by the provisions of the Rent Acts if he did, in fact, hold under such a tenancy. Therefore the tenant is not protected and is not entitled to remain. Accordingly, in my view, this appeal should be dismissed.

Romer L.J. I also agree, and would only say a word on the alternative submission which Mr. Chope made to the effect that at the time when the landlord served the notice to quit, the tenant was not entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts. It seems to me that that was clearly so. The main way in which Mr. Plume sought to escape from it was to say that the court ought to look behind the language in which this agreement was expressed and find out what the true bargain between the parties was, and that if it did so it would find that the agreement was for a tenancy for one year only and that therefore the court should disregard the additional provision in the agreement that at the expiration of the first year the tenant should, if he were desirous of so doing, continue the tenancy on a monthly basis.

The obvious intention behind that submission was to ask us to look at the true nature of the bargain for the sole purpose of enabling the tenant to break it. I should not feel at all disposed so to do to achieve that object, even if the court were entitled to do it. I am satisfied that the court has no right to resort to correspondence and oral evidence for the purpose of striking out, for that is what it comes to, an important provision which the parties agreed upon and expressed in the agreement. The general rule with regard to extrinsic evidence is that such evidence is not admissible to add to, vary, modify, or contradict a written instrument. To that rule there are, of course, exceptions. The only exception which might be regarded as relevant—and I think indeed it was sought to rely upon it in effect—is if the written instrument is affected by illegality. I can see nothing illegal in the object which the parties sought to attain by entering into an agreement in this form. The bargain was, admittedly, that the tenant was to have occupation as tenant of the landlord's property for one year. The agreement was formed so as to give effect to that intention and to prevent the tenant from getting something additional to that for which he had asked and which the landlord had consented to give, namely, the additional status of irremovability which attaches to a statutory tenant. There is nothing illegal in that and it is wholly different from a case where a landlord attempts by contractual means or otherwise to deprive a statutory tenant of his rights, or to exact from a statutory tenant, either by way of premium or rent, something to which he is not lawfully entitled, having regard to the provisions of the Act.

Therefore one has got to treat this agreement as one finds it, and one finds that at the end of the initial year the tenant, if he was desirous of continuing his tenancy on a monthly basis could do so. One finds that he did remain on in occupation at the end of the year. He did not, as he could have done before the year came to an end, communicate with the landlord and say that he did not desire to continue his tenancy in the manner contemplated by the contract, but he intended instead to remain on as a statutory tenant. He chose simply to remain there, and inasmuch as the agreement does not require any notice either in writing or otherwise from the tenant to the landlord of his intention to continue his tenancy, the obvious inference, as I see it, is that as he did not communicate with the landlord at all, but simply stayed on, he was staying on under the contract and not in any other capacity.

Therefore I do not think that, either on the ground that one must ignore the monthly tenancy provision, or on the ground that he was remaining on not as a contractual tenant but as a statutory tenant, the tenant can get out of the point which was raised by the landlord, with the result that the notice to quit was a valid notice and the tenant, accordingly, cannot succeed. In this result, though perhaps for different reasons to those of the county court judge, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Duffin v. Markham (1918) 82 J.P. 281 distinguished.

Case stated by Loughborough justices.

On October 13, 1953, an information was preferred by John Henry Middleton, a police inspector, against the defendant, Jack Rowlett, alleging that on September 10, 1953, at Rothley, Leicestershire, he drove a motor-vehicle, namely, a motor-car, on Leicester Road in a manner dangerous to the public contrary to section 11 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. At the hearing of the information on October 28, 1953, evidence was given by the prosecution that on September 10, 1953, a green Riley motor-car was being driven on a road in Rothley; that it was third in a line of traffic proceeding in the same direction; and that when a vehicle in front started to pull out the Riley motor-car also pulled out to overtake when it was unsafe to do so. No evidence was tendered to identify any person as the driver, owner or passenger in the car at the time of the occurrence or at any other time. The solicitor for the prosecution then closed his case and counsel for the defendant submitted that no evidence had been adduced by the prosecution that the defendant was the driver of the car or was in any way connected with the offence charged and that, therefore, he had no case to answer.

The solicitor for the prosecution contended that the justices had a bounden duty to permit the case to be reopened so that evidence might be tendered to prove that the defendant was the driver of the car.

Counsel for the defendant contended that it was not competent for the justices so to do, or, in the alternative, that if the justices had a discretion, in the circumstances of the present case, they should refuse the application.

The justices, being of the opinion (1) that the omission of the prosecutor to prove who was at the material time the driver of the car was one of substance and not merely of form, and (2) that they had a discretion, which must be exercised judicially, whether or not to permit the case for the prosecution to be reopened and additional evidence called, refused in the exercise of such discretion to permit the prosecutor to reopen his case, and dismissed the information.

The prosecutor appealed.

R. E. Seaton for the prosecutor.

H. A. Skinner for the defendant.

The case cited in argument is referred to in the judgment.

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts and continued: The justices said that they exercised their discretion judicially, but the whole question is whether they did or did not; in other words, whether it is a judicial exercise of discretion to say: "We are "not going to allow the case to be reopened."

Mr. Seaton has relied on Duffin v. Markham,[1] but what it was sought to do there was really rather a different matter. It was a prosecution under a statutory Order, namely, the Bread Order, 1917, and the prosecutor, no doubt thinking that the Order proved itself or, rather, that the court had judicial notice of every Statutory Rule and Order as it had of every Act of Parliament, had not formally put in the Order before closing his case. The justices would not then allow the Order to be put in, and Avory J. said that the justices had a judicial duty to allow an adjournment in a case of that sort for the Bread Order to be found and produced. But this is a case in which the evidence falls short of proof. It is not the formal proof of a public document; it is proof of a fact which ought to have been proved in the case, indeed it ought to have been the first thing proved or proved at a very early stage. I do not think we could say that if the justices came to the conclusion that they were not going to encourage sloppiness and carelessness in prosecutions and that, therefore, they were not going to allow the case to be reoponed, that they were bound to allow it to be reopened. I think that it was a matter of discretion, and I do not think we can say that the justices who considered the case were bound to allow the case to be reopened.

It is rather a borderline case, and we do not need to lay down any particular rule on the subject beyond saying that we cannot say that the justices exercised their discretion unjudicially. There are many cases in which a prosecution is being conducted in magistrates' courts or even at the assizes or quarter sessions where somebody forgets to ask a material question. For instance, in a case of false pretences, as Donovan J. has reminded me, sometimes the question is not asked: "Would you, but for that "statement made to you, have acted in the way you did?" It may be a formal question, but it is a necessary one, and it is surprising sometimes when that question is put how witnesses will answer in a way which the prosecution least expects. If his attention has been called to it by a discussion which has taken place on a submission that there is no case to go to the jury, probably the witness will answer in the way he is expected to answer, and therefore one has to be careful in these matters. Although what has happened here is in some ways regrettable and although the court would not have interfered for a moment if the justices had exercised their discretion the other way, we cannot say that they were bound to exercise their discretion in favour of the prosecution. Therefore, this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

HILBERY J. I am of the same opinion. In this case those who were prosecuting the defendant for dangerous driving wholly omitted to give any evidence that he was the driver. That has only to be stated to be seen to be a most material step in establishing the prosecution's case against the defendant. It cannot be said that that was the omission of some merely technical matter. After the objection was taken at the close of the prosecution case that they had not proved that matter, the application was made to reopen the prosecution case and then to supplement it, one supposes, by evidence which would establish that fact. The justices, having to consider whether they would allow the case for the prosecution to be reopened, held quite properly that they had a judicial discretion, and the only question here is whether, in refusing in those circumstances to allow the prosecution case to be reopened, they exercised that discretion judicially. It is quite true that in Duffin's case,[1] speaking of the facts and circumstances of that case, Avory J. said that it was the duty of the justices to adjourn to allow the evidence which had been omitted to be given, but it has to be borne in mind that he was using those words in connexion with a case where a highly technical piece of formal evidence had been omitted. It was not a formal piece of evidence which in any way touched the substance of the matter under the consideration of the justices. Nothing could more materially touch the substance of the matter before the justices in the present case than proof of the defendant as the person who was driving the car which it was alleged was being driven dangerously. In the circumstances, therefore, I do not think that the matter is concluded by Duffin's case.[1] I think that the present case is easily distinguishable from Duffin's case,[1] and unless we were to say that in the circumstances of the present case the justices were bound to exercise their discretion one way, it is impossible to quarrel with what they did. I am clearly of opinion that, in the circumstances, they were not bound to exercise their discretion in the one way, and for these reasons I agree that this appeal fails.

DONOVAN J. I agree entirely with both judgments which have been delivered.

Appeal dismissed.

Negligence — Safe system of work — Fireman — Fireman injured while travelling to emergency in vehicle with unlashed jack — Necessary risk—Object of saving life or limb justifying taking of abnormal risks—Standard of duty of employers.
Fire Brigade. Volenti non fit injuria.

A fireman was injured by lifting-gear while travelling in a lorry not specially fitted for carrying the gear to an emergency where a woman was trapped under a heavy vehicle:—

Held, that though the fire authorities were under a duty to provide proper appliances and to take reasonable care to avoid exposing their firemen to unnecessary risks, they were not negligent in requiring the firemen to take abnormal risks which they were ready to take in order to save life and limb.

Per Denning L.J. In balancing the risk against the measures necessary to eliminate it, the risk must be balanced against the end to be achieved.

Dictum of Asquith L.J. in Daborn v. Bath Tramways Motor Co. Ld. [1946] 2 All E.R. 333, 336, approved.

Decision of Barry J., ante, 208; [1954] 1 All E.R. 141 affirmed.

APPEAL from Barry J.

Since 1939 the plaintiff had been employed by the defendants, the local fire authority, as a fireman at Watford fire station. On July 27, 1951, the plaintiff was on duty at the fire station when an emergency call was received that a woman was trapped under a heavy vehicle about 200 or 300 yards away. The sub-officer in charge immediately left the station in a pump-escape vehicle, but before going he gave instructions that the plaintiff's team should follow him to the scene of the accident transporting with them in a Fordson lorry heavy lifting gear, namely a large jack standing on four small wheels and weighing about two or three hundredweight. The jack was loaded into the back of the lorry and was accompanied by the plaintiff and two other firemen who steadied the jack. The lorry had a plain floor and sides and there was nothing to which the jack could have been lashed. Shortly after the lorry had left the fire station the driver had to apply the brakes suddenly; all three men were thrown off their balance, the men steadying the jack were unable to hold it, and it slewed forward, catching the plaintiff's ankle and causing him serious injures.

Three vehicles were in regular use at the fire station, a pump-escape and a water tender, which were both unsuitable for the carriage of the jack, and an Austin tender which was used as an emergency tender and which was properly equipped for the carriage of the jack, and in which it could be properly secured. The Austin tender was put to other uses and was out of the station and not available for the carriage of the jack during about 30 hours in the week; at the time that the emergency call was received it was not in the station. The Fordson lorry on which the jack was carried on July 27, 1951, was not one of the regular vehicles used by the fire authority at the Watford station, but had been lent to the station for the transport of training equipment only a few days before the plaintiff's accident. Emergency calls other than fire calls were fairly frequent at the fire station, but it was rare for the heavy jack to be required, and in the normal course, if the jack was required when the Austin tender was not available to carry it, another station would be notified and would answer the call. On the occasion in question it would have taken at least ten minutes for assistance to arrive from the nearest fire station.

The plaintiff claimed that the defendants, his employers, were negligent in that they (a) failed to load or secure the jack in such a way that it could not become dislodged; (b) loaded the jack in such a way that they knew or ought to have known it was likely that if the lorry pulled up suddenly the jack would become dislodged and cause injuries to any person riding on the back of the lorry; (c) permitted and/or caused the plaintiff to ride on the back of the lorry on to which the jack had been loaded; (d) caused or permitted the jack to be transported on the lorry which, as the defendants knew or ought to have known, was not provided with clips, straps, or other suitable means to secure it; (e) failed to provide any or any adequate supervision of the loading of the jack on to the lorry; and it was claimed that the plaintiff's accident was due to negligence and that he was entitled to recover damages against the defendants.

Barry J., on December 16, 1953, gave judgment in favour of the defendants, holding that it was not shown that they had been guilty of any negligence towards the plaintiff or towards their other employees.

G. G. Baker Q.C. and H. B. Grant for the plaintiff.
Lord Hailsham Q.C. and Roland Brown for the defendants.

The cases referred to in argument are cited in the judgment of Singleton L.J.

Singleton L.J. stated the facts, and continued: I am in complete agreement with the judgment of Barry J.[1] but it is right that I should state my reasons for having formed that opinion.

The fire service is a service which must always involve risk for those who are employed in it, and, as Mr. Baker on behalf of the plaintiff pointed out, they are entitled to expect that their equipment shall be as good as reasonable care can secure. An emergency arose, as often happens. The sub-officer who had given the order, was asked in re-examination: "From your point "of view you thought it was a piece of luck, with this unfor-"tunate woman under the bus, that the Fordson was available "and you could use it? (A.) Yes. It is recognized in the "service that we use our initiative at all times, and in doing so "any reasonable step you take is considered satisfactory if it is "a question of saving life. You have to make a sudden decision."

It is not alleged that there was negligence on the part of any particular individual, nor that the driver was negligent in driving too fast, nor that the sub-officer was negligent in giving the order which he did. The case put forward in this court is that as the defendants had a jack, it was their duty to have a vehicle fitted in all respects to carry that jack, from which it follows, I suppose, that it is said that there must be a vehicle kept at the station at all times, or that if there is not one the lifting jack must not be taken out; indeed, Mr. Baker claimed that in the case of a happening such as this, if there was not a vehicle fitted to carry the jack the sub-officer ought to have telephoned to the fire station at St. Albans and arranged that they should attend to the emergency. St. Albans is some seven miles away, and it was said that an extra ten minutes or so would have elapsed if that had been done. I cannot think that that is the right way to approach the matter. There was a real emergency; the woman was under a heavy vehicle; these men in the fire service thought that they ought to go promptly and to take a lifting jack, and they did so. Most unfortunately this accident happened.

What is the duty owed by employers? It has been stated often, and never more clearly than it was by Lord Herschell in Smith v. Baker & Sons,[2] in these words: "It is quite clear that "the contract between employer and employed involves on the "part of the former the duty of taking reasonable care to provide "proper appliances, and to maintain them in a proper condition, "and so to carry on his operations as not to subject those "employed by him to unnecessary risk."

The employee in this case was a member of the fire service, who always undertake some risk—but, said Mr. Baker, not this risk. Is it to be said that if an emergency call reaches a fire station the one in charge has to ponder on the matter in this way: "Must I send out my men with the lifting jack in these "circumstances, or must I telephone to St. Albans, seven miles "away, to ask them to undertake the task?" I suppose he must think about his duty; but what would a reasonable man do, faced as he was? Would the reasonably careful head of the station have done anything other than that which the sub-officer did? I think not. Can it be said, then, that there is a duty on the employers here to have a vehicle built and fitted to carry this jack at all times, or if they have not, not to use the jack for a short journey of 200 or 300 yards? I do not think that that will do.

Asquith L.J., in Daborn v. Bath Tramways Motor Co. Ld., said[3]: "In determining whether a party is negligent, the "standard of reasonable care is that which is reasonably to "be demanded in the circumstances. A relevant circumstance "to take into account may be the importance of the end to be "served by behaving in this way or in that. As has often been "pointed out, if all the trains in this country were restricted "to a speed of five miles an hour, there would be fewer accidents, "but our national life would be intolerably slowed down. The "purpose to be served, if sufficiently important, justifies the "assumption of abnormal risk."

The purpose to be served in this case was the saving of life. The men were prepared to take that risk. They were not, in my view, called on to take any risk other than that which normally might be encountered in this service. I agree with Barry J. that on the whole of the evidence it would not be right to find that the employers were guilty of any failure of the duty which they owed to their workmen. In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING L.J. It is well settled that in measuring due care you must balance the risk against the measures necessary to eliminate the risk. To that proposition there ought to be added this: you must balance the risk against the end to be achieved. If this accident had occurred in a commercial enterprise without any emergency there could be no doubt that the servant would succeed. But the commercial end to make profit is very different from the human end to save life or limb. The saving of life or limb justifies taking considerable risk, and I am glad to say that there have never been wanting in this country men of courage ready to take those risks, notably in the fire service.

In this case the risk involved in sending out the lorry was not so great as to prohibit the attempt to save life. I quite agree that fire engines, ambulances and doctors' cars should not shoot past the traffic lights when they show a red light. That is because the risk is too great to warrant the incurring of the danger. It is always a question of balancing the risk against the end. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

MORRIS L.J. I also agree. The accident in this case came about as a result of a somewhat unusual concatenation of circumstances. There had for a very long time been no call for the use of the jack. Any such call, according to the evidence, was extremely rare. It so happened that a call came at a time when the Austin vehicle which would normally have carried the jack was otherwise engaged. I do not think it can be said to have been unreasonable to have had the Austin vehicle for use in the way that was arranged. Had the station been a larger station, had there been unlimited resources, unlimited space and an unlimited number of vehicles, it might be that another fitted vehicle would have been available; but that was not reasonably practicable or possible. What happened was that when the call for the jack came the sub-officer had to decide what to do, and I do not think that it would have been in accordance with the traditions of the wonderful service with which we are concerned if he had said that he could do nothing other than call on St. Albans. What he decided to do was in accordance with the practice of the fire service.

I would refer also to what the assistant chief officer in the London Fire Brigade said in regard to this matter. He spoke about the provision of jacks, and pointed out that in London there are 29 sets of lifting gear, one being provided for every two stations, and then this passage occurs: "Can you always undertake that that one vehicle will be available for the transport of a jack? (A.) No. (Q.) In your view is it reasonably practicable for a fire service to adapt all of its vehicles for the transport of jacks? (A.) No, I would not think it was reasonable. (Q.) You have been a station officer, have you not? (A.) I have. (Q.) Supposing you found yourself in charge of a station, and supposing the equipment available was not that most suitable for the purpose, but you found that human life was in danger and you might save it by adopting a method not entirely suitable, what, in your view, would be your duty as a station officer? (A.) I have had that experience, and I did not hesitate to get the equipment there as quickly as possible."

As I have said, I think this sub-officer acted in accordance with the traditions of the service, and I cannot for one moment think that the employers can be held responsible as having failed in the performance of their duties. I agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.
Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

[1953 W. No. 69.]

Factory—Eyes—Protection—Provision of goggles or effective screens—Independent contractor using mechanical implement—Duty of normal occupier of factory to employee of contractor—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), ss. 49, 139—Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938 (S.R. & O. 1938, No. 654).
Factory—Sub-contractor—Duty to employees. "Occupier."

Section 49 of the Factories Act, 1937, provides: "In the case "of any such process as may be specified by regulations of the "Secretary of State, being a process which involves a special risk "of injury to the eyes from particles or fragments thrown off in "the course of the process, suitable goggles or effective screens "shall, in accordance with any directions given by the regulations, "be provided to protect the eyes of the persons employed in the "process."

The plaintiff was employed by H. who had contracted with the defendants to make fresh bed plates at their factory. While the plaintiff was breaking up old concrete under the contract by means of a pneumatic pick which was either the property of or hired by H., some broken concrete flew up and injured his eye. No goggles had been provided for the plaintiff by either H. or the defendants. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants alleging breach of statutory duty under the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938, made under section 49:—

Held, first, that the processes referred to in section 49 were those of the occupier of the factory and the words "persons employed in "the process" refer to employees of the occupier. In the present case the processes were not those of the defendants nor was the the plaintiff their employee and, therefore, the defendants were not in breach of section 49.

Held, secondly, that even assuming that there was a breach of section 49, the plaintiff was employed in connection with an implement moved by mechanical power which was either the property of or hired by H., and, by virtue of section 139, H. was deemed to be the occupier of the factory and not the defendants.

ACTION.

The plaintiff was employed by one Hanson, who had contracted with the defendants to make fresh bed plates at premises at Doncaster occupied by the defendants and admitted to be a factory within the Factories Act, 1937. On July 29, 1947, while the plaintiff was breaking up a concrete floor under the contract by means of a portable pneumatic pick, fragments of broken concrete flew into his eyes resulting in the loss of his left eye. The pneumatic pick was either the property of or hired by Hanson. No goggles had been provided for the plaintiff by either Hanson or the defendants. The plaintiff received payments of workmen's compensation from Hanson in respect of the injury. He brought the present action against the defendants claiming damages for their negligence and breach of statutory duty under the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938, by failing to provide suitable goggles or effective screens to protect his eyes.

J. F. Drabble Q.C. for the plaintiff.
Geoffrey Veale Q.C. and G. N. Black for the defendants.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Kerr v. Cook and Harland and Wolff Ld.[1]; Whincup v. Joseph Woodhead & Sons (Engineers) Ld.[2]; Lavender v. Diamints Ld.[3]; Olsen v. Magnesium Castings and Products Ld.[4]; Griffiths v. Evans[5]; Oliver v. *Nautilus Steam Shipping Co. STREATFEILD J. On July 29, 1947, the plaintiff John Whalley sustained an accident in the course of his work as the result of which he lost his left eye. On April 10, 1953, he issued a writ against the defendants, Briggs Motor Bodies Ld., claiming damages in respect of that injury.

The plaintiff was employed by a building contractor of the name of Hanson, who had a contract to make fresh bed plates for the machinery at the defendants' premises, where they carry on business as the makers of motor-car bodies. Hanson and his employees, including the plaintiff, had to break up some of the old existing concrete before it could be renewed in order to make bed plates. On July 29, 1947, he was operating a pneumatic pick which was either the property of or hired by his own employer Hanson. He was working it for some weeks before this date. He tells me that he had never worn goggles when he did so. Although he had asked his own employer for them they had not been forthcoming. On this particular date some of the broken concrete flew up and caused this injury to his left eye.

After his injury he was off work for 11 weeks. He then had to wait his turn to undergo an operation. He went back to work for some five months, but in the meanwhile he had drawn from his employer, Hanson, weekly payments which he described himself as being the compensation of workmen in lieu of wages, a slightly longer appellation than the well-known term of workmen's compensation. I am satisfied that the plaintiff had heard about workmen's compensation. Whether he was aware of his alternative legal rights or not, he did receive weekly payments for which he signed. The receipts in no way indicated that his acceptance of workmen's compensation was without prejudice. He went on working for a time when his compensation ceased. He had four operations and during the time when he was off work he received compensation. Eventually, in 1949, the efforts to save the sight having failed, he had to have the eye removed to save the possibility of the other eye being affected. Once more when he was off work he received workmen's compensation. Shortly after that he consulted a solicitor with a view to obtaining a lump sum settlement of his workmen's compensation and £200 was offered but, because of its inadequacy, it was refused. He then changed his solicitors and the writ in this action was issued. In the meanwhile, he had ceased to accept workmen's compensation.

It is in that state of affairs that he brings this action against the occupiers of the premises where he was working at the time of his injury, not against his employer. His form of action against these occupiers is that, by their negligence or breach of statutory duty, they failed to provide suitable goggles or effective screens to protect his eyes. The statutory provision upon which reliance is placed is section 49 of the Factories Act, 1937.[1] In pursuance of section 49, the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938, were made by the Secretary of State. Amongst the processes to which the regulation is to apply is the breaking or dressing of stone, concrete or slag.

Mr. Drabble, for the plaintiff, contends that this was a process of breaking concrete and was a process which was one involving a special risk of injury to the eyes from flying particles or fragments, and, therefore, the occupiers were under a duty to the plaintiff to provide him with goggles. It is admitted that no goggles were provided in the sense that they were available for his use, although the defendants provided goggles for their own employees. The defendants' answer, both to the allegation of breach of statutory duty under section 49 and the allegation of negligence in failing to provide goggles, is that section 49 and common law impose no duty upon the occupiers to provide goggles for the protection of the employees of a contractor who is on their premises to carry out this special operation of breaking up concrete.

Mr. Veale for the defendants has drawn my attention to a large number of other sections in the Factories Act, 1937, throwing light on the meaning of the word "process" and the words "persons employed in the process." He has drawn my attention, amongst others, to sections 12, 14 and 26, to mention three of them, and I have come to the conclusion, without going into an elaborate judgment on this point, that Mr. Veale's argument upon section 49 is correct. In my judgment, the processes which are referred to in section 49 are the processes of the occupiers of the factory and the words "persons employed "in the process," refer to employees of the occupier. In the present case, although it is true that it was on the premises of the defendants that these processes were being carried out, in fact they were not their processes and the plaintiff was not their employee. Under those circumstances I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Veale's first point, which really is a complete answer to this action, must prevail.

[1] Factories Act, 1937, s. 49: "In "the case of any such process as may "be specified by regulations of the "Secretary of State, being a process "which involves a special risk of "injury to the eyes from particles or "fragments thrown off in the course "of the process, suitable goggles or "effective screens shall, in accordance "with any directions given by the "regulations, be provided to protect "the eyes of the persons employed in "the process."

If I am wrong on that point, and for this purpose I will assume that there was a duty under that section, Mr. Veale goes on to argue that in any event section 139 [2] of the Act is fatal to the plaintiff's claim. Applying that section to this factory, although the defendants are the occupiers of the factory in the ordinary course of events, this being an accident which occurred to a man who was employed in connection with a machine or implement moved by mechanical power which was either the property of or hired by another person, then, for the purposes of that machine and any offence which may arise out of its use, it is the owner or hirer who is deemed to be the occupier and not the ordinary occupier of the factory.

Mr. Drabble contends that that argument is not open to the defendants in this case upon the pleadings by virtue of paragraph 1 of the defence, under which paragraph 1 of the statement of claim is admitted. Paragraph 1 of the statement of claim merely alleges that at all material times the defendants occupied for the purposes of their business as motor body builders and assemblers these premises which constituted a factory for the purposes of the Factories Act, 1937. That was admitted, but I do not think that that precludes the defendants from raising what is a pure point of law the moment the facts are established, and the fact is established that this was a machine or implement moved by mechanical power, and it was either the property of or hired by the plaintiff's employers other than the defendants.

I think that section 139 does apply, because, although in terms it says: "so far as respects any offence under this Act "committed in relation to a person who is employed in or about "or in connection with" the machine, by virtue of section 130, an offence is constituted if there is a contravention of the provisions of the Act. Therefore, it is not confined merely to prosecution for an offence as opposed to a contravention of the Act. In my judgment Mr. Veale's second point is also correct and is likewise fatal to the plaintiff's claim.

[2] Factories Act, 1937, s. 139: "Where in a factory the owner or "hirer of a machine or implement "moved by mechanical power is some "person other than the occupier of "the factory, the owner or hirer shall, "so far as respects any offence under "this Act committed in relation to a "person who is employed in or about "or in connection with that machine "or implement, and is in the employ-"ment or pay of the owner or hirer, "be deemed to be the occupier of the "factory."

If I am wrong about that, and if the defendants did owe a duty to the plaintiff and were in breach of it, the plaintiff would be entitled prima facie to damages, but the point has been taken against him that by virtue of section 30 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, his remedy against the defendants is now barred. Section 30 provides: "Where the injury for which "compensation is payable under this Act, or any scheme certified "under this Act, was caused under circumstances creating a legal "liability in some person other than the employer to pay damages "in respect thereof—(1) The workman may take proceedings "both against that person to recover damages and against any "person liable to pay compensation under this Act or such "scheme for such compensation, but shall not be entitled to "recover both damages and compensation; . . ."

It is to be observed that that section, like the corresponding section of the Act of 1906, differs from section 29, which deals with alternative remedies against the employer both under the Act and independently of it at common law. Under section 29 the workman in terms has an option to elect between two remedies. The words "at his option" are in that section but are absent from section 30. As it seems to me, and I think it is in accordance with authority, the matter to be decided under section 30 of the Act is whether the plaintiff has recovered workmen's compensation. If he has recovered it then his remedy against a third person for damages is barred. For that purpose, unlike the alternative remedies against his own employers under section 29, it seems to me that it is not a matter of inquiry whether the workman knew that he had an option between the two remedies, one under the Act and one at common law. Under section 29 he would not be barred unless he had, not only a knowledge of the nature of what he received, but also knew of his right to opt between two remedies. Under section 30 that is not a requirement and all that it is necessary to ascertain is whether he has in fact recovered compensation.

As has been pointed out in the cases to which my attention has been drawn, recovery of compensation does not necessitate the bringing of proceedings for that purpose. If in fact a man makes a claim and receives payment of compensation, and if he knows the nature of that compensation and receives it as such, then that is sufficient to constitute recovery of workmen's compensation under the Act.

In the present case I am satisfied that the plaintiff, although he may not have been aware of the fact that he might have had a remedy against some other party in 1947, nevertheless was fully aware of the nature of the compensation that he was receiving and signing for. I have come to the conclusion that, as a matter of fact, the plaintiff did receive workmen's compensation under the Act and, that being so, section 30 of that Act bars his remedy against the third person on whose premises he was injured. On each of those grounds, therefore, the plaintiff's claim fails and there must be judgment for the defendants.

JOHN COLEIRO . . . . . RESPONDENT.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL OF MALTA.

Malta — Limitation of action — Action, brought within time, raising invalidity of statute—Subsequent ad hoc action to test validity—Second action instituted out of time—Both actions forming one set of legal proceedings—Second action not time-barred—Customs Duty (Appropriation) Act, No. XIV of 1950 — Malta (Constitution) Letters Patent, 1947, s. 39.

Limitation of action.

On May 25, 1950, the Governor of Malta issued a proclamation that the Minister of Finance had given notice of a Bill to increase the import duty on wine. Thereupon and pursuant to the Revenue (Safeguard) Act, 1928, of Malta, the Collector of Customs immediately began to levy the increased duty. The Revenue (Safeguard) Act provided that if such a Bill was not passed into law within four months of the first sitting of the Legislative Assembly after notice of the Bill had been so given any sums collected and held on deposit should be refunded to the depositor. The respondent, an importer of wine, following on the proclamation paid the increased duties to an amount of £15,201 for a period from May 25 to September 24, 1950. The requisite four months having elapsed without the Bill being passed into law, the respondent accordingly issued a writ on October 14, 1950, against the appropriate officials representing the Government of Malta claiming repayment of the £15,201 with interest.

Two days later, on October 18, 1950, the Customs Duty (Appropriation) Act, 1950, was passed, appropriating to the Government all customs duties levied between May 25 and September 24, 1950, and enacting that that provision should have effect notwithstanding any claim or judicial proceedings made or begun before the commencement of that Act. Accordingly, the defendants to the plaintiff's action took the plea, inter alia, that the action was barred by the Act of 1950, and in reply to that plea the respondent alleged that the Act of 1950 was invalid and sought leave to institute an action ad hoc in order to obtain a declaration of the nullity of that Act, and on October 5, 1951, it was ordered that the further hearing of the respondent's action should be suspended sine die and the respondent be allowed a period of one month within which to institute the action of impugnment. On October 31, 1951, within the month allowed, the respondent began the second action by a writ of summons by which he sought, inter alia, a declaration that the Act of 1950 was null and of no effect. That second action was also brought against persons representing the Government of Malta, who took the plea that the demand for a declaration of nullity of the Act of 1950, which had been in force for one year on October 16, 1951, which was about two weeks before the respondent's second action was begun, was time-barred under section 39 of the Malta (Constitution) Letters Patent, 1947 (under which the Act of 1950 was passed), which provided: "The validity "of any law made under section 22 of these Letters Patent . . . "shall not be questioned in any legal proceedings commenced after "the expiration of one year from the date on which the law comes "into operation . . .":—

Held, that the issue of the validity of the Act of 1950 had been clearly raised by the respondent in the first action and its validity questioned within the meaning of section 39 of the Letters Patent, and it continued to be a live issue in that action until determined by the machinery of the second action. It was intended under the procedure adopted by the courts of Malta that that issue should be determined in the second action, and the first and second actions in that matter were so closely connected as to form one set of legal proceedings. The validity of the Act of 1950 was therefore questioned in legal proceedings commenced before the expiration of one year from the date of the Act coming into force, and the respondent was not barred from seeking his declaration of nullity by section 39 of the Letters Patent.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal of Malta affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 25 of 1953) by the Government of Malta against a judgment of the Court of Appeal Malta (February 6, 1953) by which it was held (reversing a judgment of the First Hall of the Civil Court of Malta (October 25, 1952)) that the respondent, John Coleiro, on behalf of the firm of Coleiro Brothers Ld., was not barred from prosecuting an action to have it declared that a certain statute of the Maltese legislature was null and of no effect.

The following facts are taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee: The present action was a sequel to an action initiated on October 14, 1950, by the present respondent (hereinafter referred to for the purposes of both actions as the plaintiff). The first action arose in the following circumstances. On May 25, 1950, the Governor of Malta issued a proclamation that the Minister of Finance had given notice of a Bill to increase the import duty on wine. Under a local statute known as the Revenue (Safeguard) Act, the Collector of Customs immediately began to levy the increased duty. The Revenue (Safeguard) Act provided that if such a Bill was not passed into law within four months of the first sitting of the Legislative Assembly after notice of the Bill had been so given any sums collected and held on deposit should be refunded to the depositor with interest at 3 per cent. The plaintiff, who was an importer of wine, following on the proclamation paid the increased duties to an amount of £15,201 to the Collector of Customs for a period from May 25 to September 24, 1950. Four months elapsed from the first sitting of the Legislative Assembly after the notice of increase of duty was given without the Bill being passed into law. Accordingly, the plaintiff filed a writ of summons which was issued on October 14, 1950, against the Collector of Customs, the Minister of Commerce, the Minister of Finance and the Treasurer to the Government of Malta, all as representing the Government, claiming repayment of the sum of £15,201 with interest.

Two days after that action began, on October 18, 1950, the Legislative Assembly passed an Act, No. XIV of 1950, the Customs Duty (Appropriation) Act, 1950, appropriating to the Government all customs duties levied between May 25 and September 24, 1950, and enacting that that provision should have effect notwithstanding any claim or judicial proceedings made or begun prior to the commencement of the Act. Accordingly, the defendants to the action, in their statement of defence and declaration filed on November 7, 1950, took the plea, inter alia, that the action was barred by Act No. XIV of 1950. To that the plaintiff replied that the Act was invalid and sought leave to institute an action ad hoc in order to obtain a declaration of the nullity of that law. The defendants submitted that the question should be determined in the then action. On October 5, 1951, Colombo J., considering "that although this issue may also be "argued and determined in these proceedings, nevertheless, "having regard to its delicate nature, it seems that it would be "better if the same be dealt with on a separate action and on its "own merits and not as a counter-plea to the plea of the "defendants," ordered that further hearing in the cause be suspended and allowed the plaintiff a period of one month "with-"in which, if he so thinks, he may institute before the competent "court the action of impugnment mentioned by him" and adjourned the cause sine die.

On October 31, 1951, that was within the month allowed by Colombo J., the second action was begun on a writ of summons filed by the plaintiff by which he sought, inter alia, that it be declared and adjudged that Act No. XIV of 1950 was, for various reasons specified, null and of no effect. That action was brought against the Prime Minister of Malta representing the Government of Malta, and for any interest they might have the Collector of Customs and the Treasurer to the Government of Malta. For reasons depending no doubt upon the different reliefs sought in the respective actions the personality of the defendants differed to some extent in the two actions, but that was of no materiality as they could all be taken as representing in one capacity or another the Government of Malta and were indeed so called as defendants. In their statement of defence, filed on November 24, 1951, the defendants took a plea that the demand for a declaration of the nullity of Act No. XIV of 1950 was barred under section 39 of the Malta (Constitution) Letters Patent, 1947.

Act No. XIV of 1950 was passed under those Letters Patent, and the relevant portion of section 39 of the Letters Patent ran as follows: "The validity of any law made under section 22 of these "Letters Patent or of any provision of such law shall not be "questioned in any legal proceedings commenced after the expira-"tion of one year from the date on which the law comes into operation. . . ." Act No. XIV of 1950 had been in force for one year on October 16, 1951. The second action by the plaintiff was not started till October 31, 1951. The sole question in this appeal was whether he was barred from obtaining his declaration of nullity by section 39 of the Letters Patent.

The First Hall of the Civil Court (Magri J.) had held that the respondent's claim in the second action was barred by section 39 of the Letters Patent. On appeal, that decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal of Malta (Camilleri C.J., Montanaro Gauci and Harding JJ.).

The following cases were cited in argument: Cilia v. Cuschieri[1] and In re Vexatious Actions Act, 1896, In re Boaler.[2]

May 11. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord Keith of Avonholm, who stated the facts set out above, and continued: Magri J., before whom the second action first came, found that the plaintiff was barred. On the only point which was argued before their Lordships, he held that the first action could not be considered as one and the same thing with the second action because (1) the subject-matter of the two actions was different; (2) although in the first action the plaintiff intimated his intention of impugning Act No. XIV of 1950, he did not in fact do so in that action; (3) when he impugned it in the second action the legal time available for the purpose had already expired.

This judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal in Malta, who held that the claim for a declaration of nullity was not barred and referred back the record to the first court for the hearing of this claim on its merits. They held that the issue of the validity of the Act of 1950 had been clearly raised by the plaintiff in the first action and its validity "questioned" within the meaning of section 39 of the Letters Patent. In their Lordships' opinion the Court of Appeal were fully warranted in arriving at this conclusion. Their Lordships find it unnecessary to examine the reasons given in detail. It is the view their Lordships would have reached on the material before them. The Court of Appeal further held that though the issue was raised in the other action it was being decided in this action as a matter of form for the reasons given by Colombo J. and already in part quoted by their Lordships. "As a consequence," they say, "the present cause "and the other one are so strictly connected that the other cause "is to remain in suspense until the present cause is disposed of "and until a solution is given to the point raised in that first "cause. In other words, the present cause is the form whereby "the point already raised in the former cause is brought for "judicial decision."

Their Lordships see no reason for interfering with this conclusion. The question appears to them to be largely one of domestic procedure in the courts of Malta with which their Lordships would be slow to interfere. If forms of process do not prohibit it, their Lordships see no reason why the second action should not be treated as ancillary to the first action in which the issue of validity has been raised and continues as a live issue until determined by the machinery of the second action. It was strenuously contended that there were two writs; that there could be no interconnexion between the two writs; and that, as the second writ was out of time, the issue of validity could not be determined in the action initiated by that writ. But the Letters Patent do not refer to a challenge of validity by the issue of a writ of summons. The words are "shall not be questioned in "any legal proceedings commenced after the expiration of one "year," etc. Though the first action was raised for recovery of a sum of money, when the defendants pleaded in defence Act No. XIV of 1950, the plaintiff contested the validity of that Act. The validity of the law was thus made an issue in the first action and it was intended, under the procedure adopted by the courts of Malta, that this issue should be determined in the second action. Their Lordships see no difficulty in holding that the two actions in this matter are so closely connected as to form one set of legal proceedings. The challenge of validity has been continuous since it was raised in the first action and accordingly, in their Lordships' opinion, the validity of the law in question was questioned in legal proceedings commenced before the expiration of one year from the date of the law coming into force.

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed and the judgment of the Court of Appeal be affirmed. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

Highway—Easement—Right of way. Easement.

The application for a declaration which may be made to quarter sessions under section 31 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act, 1949, by a land owner whose interests are affected by rights of way shown on a provisional map published in accordance with the provisions of the Act, is not by way of appeal, since the power to make declarations conferred on quarter sessions by section 31 is a new and original jurisdiction; and, therefore, the High Court has no jurisdiction to hear such an application on a case stated by consent under section 11 of the Quarter Sessions Act, 1849 (which section is concerned only with appeals).

Semble, that after the application has been heard and determined by quarter sessions, quarter sessions may state a case on a point of law for the opinion of the court.

CASE STATED by consent by order of Pearce J.

The respondents, the Worcestershire County Council, published, in accordance with section 30 (1) of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act, 1949, a provisional map and statement showing the public footpaths and bridle ways in their district. The applicants, the British Transport Commission, whose interests were affected by a certain public right shown on the provisional map, desired to apply for a declaration under section 31 [1] of the Act. The case in question was typical of a number of cases arising under the Act affecting the interests of the applicants, and both parties desired to obtain the opinion of High Court and were anxious to save time and expense. Accordingly, instead of an application being made to quarter sessions, the parties having given notice of application to quarter sessions, purported to state a case by consent for the opinion of the court under section 11 of the Quarter Sessions Act, 1849. The preliminary point was taken as to whether section 11 of the Quarter Sessions Act, 1849, gave the court jurisdiction to hear the case.

Sir Frank Soskice Q.C. and M. A. King-Hamilton Q.C. for the applicants.

J. P. Widgery for the defendants.

No cases were referred to in argument.

Lord Goddard C.J. The British Transport Commission and the Worcestershire County Council have purported to state a case by consent for the opinion of this court under section 11 of the Quarter Sessions Act, 1849.

The matter arises in this way: The National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act, 1949, lays down a fairly elaborate procedure which obliges county councils to prepare and publish maps showing public rights of way, footpaths and bridle paths within their district. I gather that once that provisional map becomes effective in the sense that no further objection to it or application to the court can be made, it is conclusive as to the existence of public rights of way within the county. The scheme of the Act is that county councils must prepare a draft map, and to do so they may get documents such as ancient terriers and ancient maps, conveyances and so forth, which they must disclose to the landowner whose land is likely to be affected. When the draft map has been prepared it must be made available, and there are certain matters on which the landowners and other people can appeal to the Minister. For instance, on an objection being made to a right of way shown on the draft map there can be an appeal to the Minister. When all the appeals or objections to the draft map have been disposed of, the county council must publish what is called a provisional map. That is the important map from the landowner's point of view because, if a right of way is shown over his land and he does not get a declaration in his favour that it does not exist, the right of way will exist for all time.

"the remedy is by such appeal, it "shall be lawful for the parties, "by consent, and by order of any "judge of one of the superior courts "of common law at Westminster, to "state the facts of the case in the "form of a special case for the "opinion of such superior court, and "to agree that a judgment in con-"formity with the decision of such "court, and for such costs as such "court shall adjudge, may be "entered on motion by either party "at the sessions next or next but "one after such decision shall have "been given."

[His Lordship read section 31, and continued:] I cannot think of anything more emphatic than subsection (2) of that section to show that the application for a declaration is not an appeal to quarter sessions. It is an original jurisdiction and one which quarter sessions never had before. The nearest approach to it is the jurisdiction under which quarter sessions can act in matters relating to the closing of highways under the Highways Acts, but this is a new jurisdiction which is conferred on quarter sessions, empowering them to make declarations. Quarter sessions make orders on appeal, as a rule in civil matters, from a magistrates' court, but I think I am right in saying that there was no such thing as quarter sessions making a declaration until this Act.

The Quarter Sessions Act, 1849 (Baines's Act), was passed to amend the procedure at quarter sessions generally. At the time when that Act was passed the administrative local government work of quarter sessions was very great because, until the Local Government Act, 1888, the justices of the country conducted the whole of the county business other than that done by guardians and overseers of the poor.

[His Lordship read section 11 of the Act of 1849, and continued:] The common form in appeals, whether they were rating appeals or appeals against such things as orders of removal, orders adjudging a settlement and matters of that sort, was to go to quarter sessions; and very often the facts were largely agreed, or quarter sessions found the facts, and used to give their judgment subject to a case, which would come before the Queen's Bench to be argued. Section 11 is an endeavour, I think, to leave out one particular hearing, the hearing before quarter sessions, of the appeal. But it is clear that the section only deals with appeals, and the administrative tribunals which are now so frequent were not known in the days when the Act was passed. It is equally clear, to my mind, that the proceeding under section 31 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act, 1949, is not an appeal; it is an original jurisdiction. Quarter sessions have the power, I think, although I am not expressing a concluded opinion about it, if the matter comes before them as a matter of their original jurisdiction, to state a case on a point of law for the opinion of this court, but that is by virtue of the terms of the commission which gives justices the power to consult the judges. As soon as the present matter is put before quarter sessions, they may agree—it will be entirely a matter for them—to state a case, and it may be in this form, but that must be the act of the sessions; I am satisfied that the jurisdiction given by section 31 to quarter sessions is an original jurisdiction. Section 11 cannot apply and we have no jurisdiction to hear this case.

Hilbery J. I, too, am of the opinion that we have no jurisdiction to hear this application. The Act of 1949 makes it plain that the jurisdiction given to quarter sessions is an original jurisdiction and is recognized as being such. That Act imposes a duty on the council of every county in England and Wales to make in consultation with the councils of county districts and parishes in their area, a survey in the county and prepare a draft map showing what they found to be footpaths, bridleways or rights of ways. That draft map and a statement has to be published and objection can be made to it, and on the objections being made the surveying authority can determine or modify the particulars contained in the map and statement either by the deletion of a public path or by the addition of a right of way. If an objection as to that deletion or addition is duly made to the authority, the authority is empowered to appoint a person to hear the objection, to hear both parties, and to decide whether to maintain or revoke the determination which has been made, and notice of that decision has to be served on the person to whom the representation or objection has been made. If that person is still aggrieved by that decision, the Act expressly gives him a right of appeal to the Minister. The Minister having determined the objection in accordance with the provisions in the Act, the county authority is then required to publish a provisional map. When the provisional map is published, unless objection is made to it, it becomes the final and conclusive evidence of the existence of the public right of way. But on the publication of the provisional map, if a person still objects to what it contains, probably as affecting his land or his rights, he has a specific right to make an application to quarter sessions to have certain declarations made. Section 31 (3) of the Act expressly uses the words "application "for a declaration." It does not anywhere use the word "appeal," though it is noticeable from what I have already said that where there has been a hearing and determination by a person appointed by the county council, the word "appeal" is used, and it is an appeal to the Minister. Section 31 does not give a right of appeal to quarter sessions, but it empowers the party to apply to quarter sessions for a declaration. Undoubtedly quarter sessions will have to determine the matter, and it may well be that then, as my Lord has pointed out, they may be asked to state a case and the matter can come before this court.

[His Lordship referred to section 31 (2), and continued:] It appears to me to be plain that this was intended to be an original jurisdiction conferred upon quarter sessions and that section 11 of Baines's Act, therefore, has no application.

Donovan J. I agree that the application to quarter sessions under section 31 (1) of the Act of 1949 cannot properly be called an appeal within the meaning of section 11 of Baines's Act. The application to quarter sessions is for the purpose, among other things, of a declaration that no public right of way existed: see section 31 (1) (a). It is not an appeal against any judgment or order or anything ejusdem generis. The language of section 31 (5) of the Act of 1949 should be contrasted with section 29 (5) of that Act, where a right of appeal is expressly given against "a determination of the surveying authority."

British Transport Commission v. Worcestershire County Council.

Donovan J.

It is urged, in effect, that in substance the proceedings are just the same in their nature as if they were called an appeal. They are an objection to what someone lower down in this administration hierarchy has decided. That may be so, but it is not enough. The Act of 1949 draws the distinction between proceedings by a person aggrieved by an order or determination and a person who simply thinks that a map is wrong. It calls the first an appeal, the second an application for a declaration, a distinction which recognizes the legal difference between the two.

The Public Rights of Way (Applications to Quarter Sessions) Regulations, 1952, para. 6, provides: "The provisions of section 5 "of the Quarter Sessions Act, 1949 (which relates to the costs of "appeals to quarter sessions), shall apply to any such application "as aforesaid as if the application were an appeal to which that "section applied." Clearly, if this were an appeal paragraph 6 would be unnecessary. For these reasons, I agree that we have no jurisdiction to entertain this special case.

County Court—Practice—Pleadings.

A tenant for life granted to the defendant a weekly tenancy of a dwelling-house for a term not exceeding three years. On the death of the tenant for life the plaintiff, an executor of the tenant for life's husband and a trustee of the settlement, claimed possession of the dwelling-house on the ground that a vesting assent had never been executed in favour of the tenant for life and she had granted the tenancy without the trustees' knowledge or consent. The defendant claimed the protection of the Rent Acts.

The county court judge, while holding that the letting by the tenant for life was within her powers under the Settled Land Act, 1925, felt himself bound by a statement in the judgment of Farwell J. in Kisch v. Hawes Bros. Ld. [1935] Ch. 102, 109, 110, that the onus of proving that the letting was at the "best rent" obtainable (section 42 of the Act) was on the defendant. The defendant, he held, had failed to discharge that burden and the plaintiff was entitled to possession.

That point had not been pleaded by the plaintiff, and had not been raised until after all the evidence had been called. On appeal:—

Held, that the point, not having been pleaded, and the defendant having had no opportunity of dealing with it, could not be raised by the plaintiff on appeal, and the appeal must be allowed.

Per Somervell L.J. I do not accept the suggestion that without such a point being raised on the pleadings a defendant must come into court with all the necessary evidence to show that all the conditions of the Settled Land Act, 1925, have been fulfilled.

Dictum of Farwell J. in Kisch v. Hawes Bros. Ld. considered.

Per Somervell and Romer L.JJ. The county court judge put a rather too wide interpretation on that dictum.

Per Romer L.J. I should be inclined to take the view that section 42 (5) of the Act of 1925 is a comprehensive code in relation to leases for less than three years.

APPEAL from Judge Bensley Wells, sitting at Marylebone County Court.

By virtue of section 19 (1) of the Settled Land Act, 1925, Mrs. Frances Eliza Oliver, on the death of her husband, Thomas Oliver, became tenant for life of a dwelling-house under a settlement within the meaning of the Act. A vesting assent was admittedly never executed in favour of Mrs. Oliver, but the defendant claimed that she had granted him a weekly tenancy of the dwelling-house for a term not exceeding three years. On the death of Mrs. Oliver the plaintiff, Walter Everett Davies, as an executor of Thomas Oliver and a trustee of the settlement, claimed possession of the premises. The defendant claimed the protection of the Rent Acts.

The plaintiff, by his pleadings, relied on the fact that a vesting assent had never been executed in favour of Mrs. Oliver, and alleged that she had let the premises to the defendant without the knowledge or consent of the executors and trustees.

The county court judge said that he was satisfied by the correspondence and other evidence that the letting by Mrs. Oliver to the defendant was within her powers as tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1925, except in one respect, namely, that there was no evidence that the rent obtained from the defendant was the "best rent" within section 42.[1] He had, he said, no reason to think that the rent obtained was not a perfectly fair and adequate rent, but in the absence of any evidence with regard to the matter he felt unable to say that the best rent was obtained. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The point on which the judge based his judgment had not been pleaded and was not raised until the evidence had been concluded.

The defendant appealed.

Ian C. Duthie for the defendant.
Michael Fox for the plaintiff.

SOMERVELL L.J. The plaintiff, who is executor and trustee of Thomas Oliver, deceased, sues for possession. It is common ground between the parties that there was a settlement within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1925, and that a Mrs. Oliver, now deceased, became tenant for life by virtue of section 19 (1) of that Act when her husband died. It is also common ground that there was no vesting assent, but the defendant claims, and is prima facie entitled to claim, under an agreement for a weekly tenancy granted by Mrs. Oliver. On the pleadings reliance was placed on the fact that a vesting assent had never been executed in favour of the life tenant, Mrs. Oliver. It is also alleged that

[1] Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 42: "(1) Save as hereinafter provided, every lease—(i) shall be by deed, and be made to take effect in possession not later than twelve months after its date, or in reversion after an existing lease having not more than seven years to run at the date of the new lease; (ii) shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, regard being had to any fine taken, and to any money laid out or to be laid out for the benefit of the settled land, and generally to the circumstances of the case; (iii) shall contain a covenant by the lessee for payment of the rent, and a condition of re-entry on the rent not being paid within a time therein specified not exceeding thirty days. . . . (5) A lease at the best rent that can be reasonably obtained without fine, and whereby the lessee is not exempted from punishment for waste, may be made—(i) Where the term does not exceed twenty-one years—(a) without any notice of an intention to make the lease having been given under this Act; and (b) notwithstanding that there are no trustees of the settlement; and (ii) Where the term does not extend beyond three years from the rate of the writing, by any writing under hand only containing an agreement instead of a covenant by the lessee for payment of rent."

"At dates unknown to the plaintiff and without his or his co-"trustee's consent the said Frances Eliza Oliver purported to let "a part, and later the whole, of the said dwelling-house to the "defendant, who went into possession of the same." The defendant seeks to rely on the Rent Acts, but it is said that the matters set out in the particulars of claim preclude him from doing so.

The points raised on the pleadings failed before the county court judge and were not pursued before us, but, according to the note, after the evidence had been called the point relied on before us was taken, which was: "Was there a disposition which was "authorized by the Act. If it was not a disposition which was "'authorized' it was not a 'purported disposition' within the "meaning of section 13," and then this is the point, "Submit "there is no evidence that the letting was at the 'best rent.' "Onus of proof is on defendant. See per Farwell J. in Kisch v. "Hawes Bros. Ld.[1]" It is common ground that there was no indication of this point in the pleadings and no question was put with regard to the rent to the defendant, who gave evidence.

The provision with regard to "best rent" is contained in the first instance in section 42 of the Settled Land Act, 1925. [His Lordship read the section, and continued:] The judge held that he was bound by a statement in the judgment of Farwell J. in Kisch v. Hawes Bros. Ld.,[1] to hold that the onus of proof was on the defendant in the circumstances of the present case and that, as the defendant had called no evidence, he must proceed on the basis that the rent was not the best rent. I have come to the conclusion in the first place that this point is not and was not open to the plaintiff, not having been pleaded. It seems to me plain that a matter of this sort must be raised by the party who seeks to raise it, because it is a question on which evidence would have to be called. I do not accept, wherever the onus may be, the suggestion that without such a point being raised on the pleadings, a defendant must come into court with all the necessary evidence to show that all the conditions in the Act have been fulfilled, although it may turn out that no challenge is being made by anybody. That would be to defeat the very object which Parliament had in mind.

That would be enough to dispose of the case but, as the judge based his decision—he would clearly otherwise have decided in favour of the defendant—on this statement in Farwell J.'s judgment, I would like to say a word about it though there are some points raised in it which it is unnecessary to consider or to express any opinion upon. The headnote to that case reads: "A tenant for life by deed granted a lease of certain premises to "the defendants to take effect more than twelve months after "its date. The grantor died, and her successor sued for posses-"sion of the premises. The defendants pleaded possession

"under Ord. 21, r. 21, but were allowed to amend their "defence so as to rely on the lease granted to them by the "plaintiff's predecessor and claim protection under section 152 (1) "of the Law of Property Act, 1925:—Held, that the plea of "possession denied plaintiff's title, and therefore that was a "forfeiture which entitled her to re-enter. Held, further, that "assuming there had been no forfeiture, it was for the defendants "to show that the lease granted to them was valid and within "the power of the then tenant for life to grant. This they had "failed to do, and the plaintiff was therefore entitled to the "relief claimed."

On the question of "best rent," section 110 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, provides: "On a sale . . . or other disposition, "a purchaser dealing in good faith with a tenant for life or "statutory owner shall, as against all parties entitled under the "settlement, be conclusively taken to have given the best price, "consideration, or rent, as the case may require, that could "reasonably be obtained by the tenant for life or statutory owner, "and to have complied with all the requisitions of this Act." From the argument as set out in the report it is quite plain that this point as to the best rent was taken with the other points. First, having said that the lease was, on the face of it, in contravention of the Act, it was then said in the argument of counsel "the defendants say the lease takes effect in equity, and it is "for them to show that the rent reserved was the best rent." The judge interposed: "The lease of 1919 was a lease which . . . "is, on the fact of it an invalid lease: the burden of proof is "therefore on the defendants." Then Mr. Nesbitt , for the defendants, relied on section 54 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, which was the predecessor of section 110 of the present Act.

Farwell J., having decided the case on the grounds set out in the headnote, went on to consider whether the other defects alleged were covered by section 152 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. After dealing with that he said: "Even assuming that, "the section, in my judgment, does not assist the defendants, "and for this reason. It is essential, in my judgment, for the "defendants to prove that apart from the fact that the lease is to "take effect more than twelve months after its date it is otherwise such a lease as Mrs. Ramus could properly have granted "on December 25, 1919, and in this respect section 54 of the "Settled Land Act, 1882, does not assist them."

I quite agree, substituting section 110 of the Act of 1925 for section 54, that if a party cannot get himself within the Act, section 110 does not prima facie apply to the transaction. I think the passage in Farwell J.'s judgment is difficult to follow and it may be that the various facts and admissions in argument, so far as this particular point was concerned, are not apparent, either in the judgment or in the argument of counsel as reported. All I wish to say is that I think it would be wrong to treat that sentence in Farwell J.'s judgment as of any general application.

The facts, I think, must have been very special to put the onus on the defendant. Prima facie, if one had to consider the question under the Act, section 110 could properly be relied on; and in any event prima facie it would be for the party who is attacking a disposition on this type of ground to produce at any rate a prima facie case to show that the disposition was defective. It is right to say that, because I think that the county court judge regarded this decision as laying down some general principle with regard to the onus of proof in this class of case which, I am quite certain, Farwell J. did not intend to do. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

BIRKETT L.J. I am of the same opinion. I do not wish to add anything to what my Lord has said about the judgment of Farwell J. in Kisch v. Hawes Bros. Ld.[2] It seems to me that the present case can be decided upon the one point on which the county court judge decided it. In his judgment he said: "I am "satisfied by the correspondence and other evidence put before "me that the letting by Mrs. Oliver to the defendant was within "her powers as tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1925 "(sections 41 and 42), except in one respect, viz., there is "no evidence that the rent obtained from the defendant was "the 'best rent.' I have no reason to think that the rent "obtained was not a perfectly fair and adequate rent, but there "is no evidence at all before me with regard to the matter and "in the circumstances I feel unable to say that I am satisfied "that the 'best rent' was obtained." He then says: "For "this reason, and for this reason only, I have come to the "conclusion that my judgment must be for the plaintiff."

It would appear to be plain also from the notes of the evidence before us, and, indeed, from the pleadings, that this particular point was not pleaded. It seems a singular thing that a county court judge should decide a case upon one point when that point was not pleaded. Furthermore, from an examination of the note of the evidence, while "best rent" was certainly referred to by counsel in connexion with section 110, it is clear that no evidence was tendered about it and, most important of all, the final submission about "best rent" was made for the first time when all the evidence was concluded. It is obvious that had people been forewarned "this is the crucial point of the case," they could have come armed and prepared to deal with it; but in the absence of pleadings and having regard to the way the matter was raised, they clearly had no opportunity of doing that. I, therefore, would content myself with the first matter which my Lord dealt with, that this matter not having been pleaded it was not open. I agree, therefore, with the judgment which my Lord has delivered.

Davies
v.

Romer L.J. I also agree. I have nothing to add on the question of the deficiency in the pleadings which plainly, as I think, disabled the plaintiff from seeking to impeach the letting which was granted by Mrs. Oliver, the life tenant, on the ground that it failed to reserve the best rent. Such a matter as that is clearly one of evidence and must be put in issue if anybody who is concerned to challenge the validity of a lease desires to attack it on that ground.

This morning, Mr. Fox for the plaintiff, suggested that the agreement to grant a tenancy by Mrs. Oliver was invalid on the face of it because it did not contain any provision for re-entry on failure of the tenant to pay the rent reserved. He relied on the terms of section 42 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, which prescribes the conditions on which a tenant may grant leases of the settled estate. Section 42 (5) is the provision which applies to the present case because the tenancy which Mrs. Oliver granted was a weekly tenancy and, therefore, was for a term not extending beyond three years.

Mr. Fox says that, notwithstanding those provisions the requirements which appear in paragraph (i) of section 42 (5) nevertheless must be observed, even in regard to tenancies for less than three years. One of them is that prescribed by section 42 (iii), that the lease "shall contain a covenant by the "lessee for payment of the rent, and a condition of re-entry "on the rent not being paid within a time therein specified not "exceeding thirty days." He says that the tenancy granted by Mrs. Oliver did not contain any provision for re-entry on non-payment of the rent and, therefore, is invalid on the face of it. The matter has not been very fully argued and no authorities have been brought to our attention on the point, but I should be inclined to take the view myself that section 42 (5) is a comprehensive code in relation to leases for less than three years, with the result that the requirement as to re-entry in regard to longer leases is not introduced into those short leases. Indeed, in regard to weekly tenancies, it would not be apt to have such a provision for re-entry, because the tenancy may be determined at any time on non-payment of rent at a week's notice. Be that as it may, for my part I can see no reason why, if in fact the agreement was open to criticism in that respect, the defect, if any, was not cured by section 152 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. I do not think, therefore, there is anything in that point.

I will add only one word regarding Kisch v. Hawes Bros. Ld.[3] Section 110 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, which was formerly section 54 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, applies only in favour of a lessee who deals in good faith with a tenant for life who has let the settled estate. In Kisch's case Farwell J. held that that section did not apply in favour of the tenant because the lease, on the face of it, was outside the powers of the tenant for life to grant. I think Farwell J. was accepting the argument of Mr. Morton, where he said[4]: "Under the Settled Land Acts "the tenant for life is a trustee and section 54 of the Settled "Land Act, 1882, does not assist the lessee where the lease on "the face of it is in contravention of the Act." It would follow from that that it would be of no avail to the tenant to cure the particular defect in that case, which arose from the fact that the lease was to take effect in possession more than twelve months after its date, if the lease was one which was invalid by reason of the best rent not having been received; because, although section 152 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, might cure the particular defect to which I have referred, there would still remain the question of whether it was a proper lease in the matter of rent.

If it was challenged, as it was challenged, then the tenant could not rely on section 110 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, because, as I have already said, it could not be said of him that he was a person acting in good faith, because on the face of it the lease was an improper one. Therefore, if the rent was challenged on the ground of insufficiency, he would have to prove, as a matter of fact, that the rent was a proper rent for the life tenant to receive. I do not think Farwell J. was going any further than that. Certainly I do not think that he was suggesting as a general proposition that where an attack is made on a lease which has been granted by a tenant for life for reasons other than insufficiency of rent, then the lessee cannot rely on section 110. In my opinion, he could, provided that he had acted in good faith. I think the county court judge put a rather wider interpretation on what Farwell J. said than the judge intended them to bear. I agree that this appeal must be allowed.

Patent.

The plaintiffs, the registered proprietors of certain British letters patent, entered into an agreement with the defendants that the defendants should be authorized to manufacture under the patents, subject to a quota. They were to pay a penalty or compensation on production in excess of the quota. As a result of discussions between the parties in or prior to 1942, the plaintiffs agreed to suspend enforcement of payments of compensation due after December 31, 1939, pending the formulation of a new agreement.

On July 17, 1945, the defendants issued a writ against the plaintiffs alleging that the original agreement had been induced by fraudulent misrepresentation and referred to an oral agreement for discontinuance of payments of compensation as being relevant to the amount of damages they would recover if successful in the action. The plaintiffs, by their defence, denied the agreement, alleging that since March 31, 1942, the defendants had not rendered accounts or paid sums due for royalties or compensation on the sale or use of "contract material," and counterclaimed an order upon the defendants to deliver accounts and an inquiry as to the sum due excluding payments of compensation between December, 1939, and the end of the war with Germany. The action was dismissed.

The plaintiffs then commenced the present action to recover from the defendants a sum of over £84,000 alleged to be due in respect of payments of royalties and compensation during the period January 1, 1947, a date some nine months after the delivery of the counterclaim in the previous action, to January 26, 1950:—

Held, that the restrictions on the power of a licensor to determine a revocable licence must depend on the circumstances of each case; where the circumstances are such that the determination would have far-reaching effects upon the licensee involving decisions of importance the licensee is entitled to an express and unambiguous notice of determination specifying either the date on which or a reasonable period after which the licence will cease to operate; the counterclaim in the present case did not satisfy these requirements and the plaintiffs' claim, therefore, failed.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 29. SOMERVELL L.J. I will ask Romer L.J. to read the first judgment.

ROMER L.J. The action is brought by the plaintiffs Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ld. (T.M.M.C.) to recover from the defendants Tungsten Electric Co. (T.E.C.O.) a sum of over £84,000, which they allege to be due to them in respect of the period January 1, 1947, to January 26, 1950, under the provisions of a deed dated April 2, 1938, and for an account and payment of further sums alleged to be payable under the same deed in respect of the period from January 26 to July 27, 1950.

This is the second action between these parties. In the first action, in which the writ was issued on July 17, 1945, T.E.C.O. and another company called Tungsten Industrial Products Ld. sued T.M.M.C. for damages for fraud and damages for breach of contract. Those proceedings, which came first before Devlin J., and subsequently before this court, have a bearing upon the present litigation, although the question which is now in issue between T.M.M.C. and T.E.C.O. was not in issue then.

I will confine myself to stating in the briefest possible outline the matters which are relevant to the particular point upon which I am of the opinion that this appeal should be decided in the defendants' favour.

In 1931 T.M.M.C. was incorporated in this country by Krupps of Essen, for the purpose of developing, as their subsidiary, certain patents which Krupps had acquired from the Osram Company in relation to tungsten carbide. Under these patents T.M.M.C. manufactured articles which were, in the main, machine tool tips, and they marketed them under the name of Wilmet. In or about 1934 T.M.M.C. brought proceedings against the British Thomson-Houston Company (shortly called in this judgment B.T.H.) for the infringement of their patents, but these proceedings were settled after two years' negotiation upon the terms of an agreement into which the parties entered. For present purposes it is only necessary to say that B.T.H. acknowledged the validity of T.M.M.C.'s patents (which they had previously challenged) and were granted an exclusive licence to manufacture under such patents in territory which included the United Kingdom. One result of this was that T.M.M.C. could only grant subsequent licences under the patents in this country with the consent of B.T.H. T.M.M.C. were, however, themselves entitled to continue to manufacture under the patents and it was in contemplation between the parties, in entering into the agreement, that they should co-operate in the exploitation of the patents in England.

Some little time later the activities of T.E.C.O., who were carrying on business in this country, came to the notice of T.M.M.C., who took the view that T.E.C.O. were infringing their patents. One Dr. Louis was at that time the head of Krupps' patent department and was a director of T.M.M.C. and controlled that company's policy in relation to patents. Dr. Louis was not minded to enforce a patentee's full rights against an infringer, but was content to permit T.E.C.O. to continue in business provided that terms could be arranged on a basis that would be mutually acceptable. After some negotiation a meeting accordingly took place on April 7, 1937, between Dr. Louis and others on behalf of T.M.M.C. and representatives of T.E.C.O. who included a Mr. McLeod, who was a shareholder and director of that company.

The result of the meeting was that Dr. Louis offered T.E.C.O. a licence more or less on the lines of the agreement between T.M.M.C. and B.T.H., and the broad effect of Dr. Louis' proposal was that T.E.C.O. should be authorized to continue to manufacture under the patents, but with a quota of 50 kilograms a month, and that T.E.C.O. should pay a 10 per cent. royalty and a penalty or compensation of 30 per cent. on production in excess of the quota in respect of material not supplied by T.M.M.C. B.T.H. gave their consent to the proposal and a further meeting was held on April 21, 1937, between Dr. Louis, Mr. McLeod and others, and it was at this meeting principally that Dr. Louis was alleged to have made the misrepresentations which formed the subject of the first action.

Following upon this further meeting a considerable amount of discussion took place between the respective parties. Ultimately, on June 1, 1937, heads of agreement to be made between T.M.M.C. and T.E.C.O. were signed. I do not propose to consider these heads of agreement, which incorporated the principal features of the offer which Dr. Louis had made, because they were in substance reintroduced into the more formal documents which were executed by the parties on April 2, 1938.

From June, 1937, to the end of March, 1938, T.E.C.O. continued in active production under the heads of agreement and made monthly returns of their output to T.M.M.C.. Such output was in every month considerably in excess of 50 kilograms and indeed for the last month (March) of this period amounted to 168 kilograms.

The formal documents of April 2, 1938, consisted of a licence and of a deed which was expressed to be executed contemporaneously therewith. Each of the instruments was made between T.M.M.C. of the first part, T.E.C.O. of the second part and Tungsten Industrial Products Ld. (who were T.E.C.O.'s distributing associate) of the third part.

So far as relevant the provisions of the licence were as follows. It recited that the grantors, T.M.M.C., were the registered proprietors of British letters patent, short particulars whereof were set forth in the schedule, and had agreed to grant to T.E.C.O. and T.E.C.O. had agreed to take a licence under such patents for the consideration and upon the terms and conditions thereinafter mentioned, and it recited that Tungsten Industrial Products Ld. were the distributors of the products of T.E.C.O. and that in the construction of the licence certain definitions were to apply. The first one was: "The United Kingdom of Great Britain, Northern Ireland and the Isle of Man shall be called 'territory A.'" The second one was that "territory B" should comprise the Dominions and certain other territories. The third definition was that hard metal alloys made in accordance with the inventions, the subjects of the said patents, or any of them, whether made before or after expiry of such patent or patents, should be called "contract material."

The licence continues: "Now this deed witnesseth as follows. "(1) In pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of "the execution by T.E.C.O. of a deed bearing even date herewith and made between the parties hereto and of the royalties "reserved by and the covenants on the part of T.E.C.O. contained in the said deed the grantors hereby grant unto T.E.C.O. "a non-exclusive licence under the said patents to import, make, "use and (subject as hereinafter provided) sell contract material "in territory A and also to sell contract material in or for export "to territory B upon and subject to the conditions herein and in "the said deed contained.

"(2) This licence shall commence as from June 1, 1937, and "shall continue until September 18, 1947, and thereafter until "terminated by either the grantors or T.E.C.O. giving to the "other six months' notice in writing terminating this licence, "provided that the grantors shall be at liberty to terminate the "same by giving to T.E.C.O. six months' notice in writing at "any time during the continuance of this licence or by giving "immediate notice in writing in the event of liquidation or insolvency of T.E.C.O. or unremedied breach by T.E.C.O. of the "terms hereof or of the said deed.

"(3) The licence hereby granted to sell contract material shall "only extend to cover: (i) The sale by T.E.C.O. directly or "through Industrial of contract material for use otherwise than "for drawing dies to the following companies so long as each "shall remain bound by the terms of the memorandum appended "to the said deed."

Then it sets out a number of named companies. "And "T.E.C.O. and Industrial shall not sell or otherwise dispose of "any contract material except to the person or companies aforesaid (hereinafter called 'T.E.C.O. customers') and for the purposes above mentioned (save that T.E.C.O. may sell to "Industrial for resale to T.E.C.O. customers)."

It was then provided that T.E.C.O. should impose on each of its customers certain obligations as therein set forth. Then in the schedule to the licence there are specified 15 letters patent with their numbers and their respective dates of sealing and their respective titles. Finally in the schedule there is set out one patent application with its date and title.

By the accompanying deed of the same date, after reciting that " T.E.C.O. have heretofore made and sold hard metal alloys " of a composition and by a process which (as the grantors allege " and T.E.C.O. and Industrial for the purpose only of these " presents and of the licence hereinafter referred to admit) fall " within the scope of " the letters patent therein mentioned, it was provided, so far as is material, as follows:

" (2) The grantors hereby waive all claims against T.E.C.O. " and Industrial and T.E.C.O. customers in respect of the sale " or use of contract material manufactured by T.E.C.O. prior " to June 1, 1937.

" (3) T.E.C.O. shall pay to the grantors in the manner herein- " after set forth a royalty of 10 per cent. on the net value of all " contract material sold or used by T.E.C.O. and/or Industrial " (other than contract material supplied to T.E.C.O. by the " grantors or any licensees under the said patents) during the " continuance of the said licence and made in accordance with " one or more of the said patents " (other than or in addition to " a certain letters patent " which is mentioned) " which shall " be in force at the date of sale or use thereof by T.E.C.O. and/ " or Industrial, such royalty being payable in the case of contract " material sold by T.E.C.O. to Industrial only upon its use or " sale by Industrial.

" (4) (a). The grantors shall from time to time after consul- " tation with T.E.C.O. fix minimum prices and terms and " conditions for the sale of contract material to the various " classes of customers in territory A and territory B. During the " continuance of the said licence T.E.C.O. and Industrial shall " comply and shall impose an obligation upon and shall cause " T.E.C.O. customers and " (a certain customer therein named) " to comply with the prices and the terms and conditions of sale " fixed as aforesaid.

" (b) During the continuance of the said licence the grantors " shall observe and shall cause their other licensees to observe " the same minimum prices and terms and conditions for sale " of contract material as are fixed pursuant to paragraph (a) of " this clause.

" (c) Should T.E.C.O. and/or Industrial at any time during " the continuance of the said licence place upon the market any " other hard metal alloy or alloys not being contract material " T.E.C.O. and/or Industrial shall inform the grantors forth- " with what other hard alloy or alloys is or are being so placed " upon the market and the provisions of paragraph (a) of this "clause shall apply to such alloy or alloys as if the same were "included in the definition of contract material."

Clause 5 is an important clause. "If in any month during "the continuance of the said licence the aggregate quantity of "contract material sold or used by T.E.C.O. and Industrial "(other than contract material supplied to T.E.C.O. by the "grantors or any licensees under the said patents) shall exceed "a quota of 50 kilograms T.E.C.O. shall, whether all or any of "such materials shall be subject to royalty hereunder or not, pay "to the grantors compensation equal to 30 per cent. of the sum "which represents the excess net value, that is to say, the "average net value per kilogram of all contract material sold "or used by T.E.C.O. and Industrial in the said month, multi-"plied by the weight in kilograms of all such contract material "as aforesaid sold or used by T.E.C.O. and Industrial during "such month in excess of 50 kilograms, provided that contract "material sold by T.E.C.O. to Industrial shall only be taken into "account for the purposes of this clause on the occasion of its "sale or use by Industrial."

Clause 6 defines the meaning of net value of contract material.

Clause 7 provides: "Within the 20 days next following the "first day of each month T.E.C.O. shall send to the grantors a "written report setting forth for each brand or kind of contract "material (distinguishing contract material supplied to T.E.C.O. "by the grantors or licensees under the said patents from other "contract material) sold or used by T.E.C.O. and Industrial "respectively during the preceding month the following informa-"tion." Then there is set out what the information is to be.

Clause 8 provides: "Within 40 days next following the first "day of each month T.E.C.O. shall pay to the grantors all sums "due in respect of the preceding month by way of royalty and "compensation."

Clause 9 provides for the keeping by T.E.C.O. and Industrial of books of account in England.

Clause 10 reads: "Neither T.E.C.O. nor Industrial shall at "any time hereafter dispute the validity of the said patents or "any of them or the novelty or utility of the inventions, the "subjects thereof, and shall not in any way assist any other "person so to do."

Clause 12 reads: "In the event that during the continuance "of the said licence the grantors shall become entitled to grant "licences under patents in territory A or territory B covering any "improvement upon or modification of the inventions the sub-"jects of the said patents or any of them the same shall be "regarded as included in the expression 'the said patents' for "the purposes of this deed and the said licence."

By Clause 15 there was a provision for terminating the arrangement between the parties if T.E.C.O. or Industrial committed any breach of their respective obligations and allowed the same to remain unremedied for 30 days.

Finally, by Clause 17 it was provided that T.M.M.C. should not grant any other licence under the said patents "without first "consulting with T.E.C.O. and Industrial and T.E.C.O. "customers as to the advisability of so doing."

As stated by Pearson J. in his judgment, the effect of the compensation or penalty provisions in Clause 5 of the deed, having regard to the respective lives of the various patents, was as follows: "June 1, 1937, to March, 1939: Both the iron grades "and the steel grades are protected by patents, and bear royalty, "and also bear compensation on the excess over the quota. For "the period March, 1939, to December, 1941, the iron grades "are still protected by the patent No. 4 in the schedule, they "do not bear royalty, but they bear compensation on the excess "over quota. The steel grades are still protected by patents and "still bear royalty and compensation on the excess over the "quota. In the third period, December, 1941, to July, 1947, "the iron grades are not protected by any patent (unless possibly "there might be some later patents under clause 12), they do "not bear royalty, but they do bear compensation on the excess "over the quota. The steel grades are protected by patents, or "at least one patent, and bear royalty and bear compensation "on the excess over the quota. Then there is the fourth short "period, July to September, 1947, and both the iron grades and "the steel grades are unprotected by patents (unless conceivably "there might be some later patents under Clause 12) and they "do not bear royalty but they do bear compensation on the excess "over quota.

"The overall rate of compensation on the total output, "including both the quota and the excess over quota, varies "according to the size of the output, steeply at lower levels, "gradually at higher levels. This is shown by the compensation "rate curve on the graph which was produced and proved by Mr. "Bateman. If the total output in any month is 100 kilograms "the overall compensation rate is 15 per cent. If such output "is 150 kilograms, the overall rate is slightly under 20 per cent. "If the output is 200 kilograms, the rate is about 22½ per cent. "If the output is 300 kilograms, the rate is about 25¼ per cent. If "the output is 500 kilograms, the rate is 27 per cent."

Shortly before the outbreak of war in 1939 arrangements were made and carried into effect for T.M.M.C. to shed its German control and to be taken over by Kleinworts; and soon after the war began the shares in T.M.M.C. were acquired from that banking house by A. C. Wickman Ld. (who had been T.M.M.C.'s distributors) and by Firth Brown & Co. in equal proportions.

In the meanwhile, Mr. McLeod, who had originally viewed the agreements of April 2, 1938, with some contentment, had discovered that the anticipation which he had formed that T.E.C.O.'s distributors would absorb the compensation or penalty rates which had been imposed was erroneous, and that these rates were bearing very hardly, as he thought, upon T.E.C.O. themselves. The company's production before the war was already in the order of 150 kilograms a month (in July, 1939, it was 180 kilograms), but the seriousness of the position, in Mr. McLeod's view, was greatly enhanced by the very considerable production which resulted almost at once from the outbreak of hostilities. Even before the war Mr. McLeod had complained to Dr. Louis of the impact of the penalty rates upon T.E.C.O. and a draft supplemental agreement had been prepared with a view to easing the position somewhat, but nothing came of it. When Mr. McLeod discovered the ever-increasing burden which accompanied the growing production which resulted from war-time requirements he renewed his complaints and, as Dr. Louis had vanished from the scene, directed them to Mr. Wickman, on behalf of A. C. Wickman Ld. Discussions ensued between these gentlemen and also other persons interested in the industry, all of whom had formed themselves into an association. As a result T.M.M.C., under its new control, decided that it would not continue to demand payment of the compensation under their licensees' agreements because it was clearly in the national interest that production of hard alloy material should reach the highest possible level; and in fact, T.M.M.C. did not enforce this payment throughout the war.

It seemed, however, desirable to Mr. Wickman and his associates that the principle of compensation should be preserved (subject to its suspension during the war) but that the sums paid should be distributed among the licensees themselves instead of going into the coffers of T.M.M.C. Mr. McLeod, however, refused to accept this new policy, but exacted, as he said, a promise from Mr. Wickman that, so far as T.E.C.O. were concerned, compensation should be "washed out" altogether. Draft agreements were eventually (sometime during 1944, I think) prepared to give effect to the new arrangement with regard to the compensation by the various licensees, but Mr. McLeod, on behalf of T.E.C.O., refused to accept the draft which was sent to them. Negotiations and discussions ensued, but ended in a deadlock, and on July 17, 1945, T.E.C.O. issued their writ against T.M.M.C.

The gravamen of their case as pleaded was that Dr. Louis, on behalf of T.M.M.C., had more than once represented to Mr. McLeod, and in particular at their meeting on April 21, 1937, that the terms which were subsequently embodied in the licence and deed of April 2, 1938, relating to royalty, quota and compensation were on a par with or were at least as favourable to T.E.C.O. as the corresponding terms of the licence which T.M.M.C. had previously granted to B.T.H. and that, having regard to that licence, were the best terms that T.M.M.C. were in a position to offer; that T.E.C.O. had entered into the licence and deed on the faith of such representations; and that the representations were false.

1954
Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ld. v. Tungsten Electric Co. Ld.

By paragraph 10 of their statement of claim T.E.C.O. alleged that they had paid certain sums for compensation under the said deed, and that "thereafter the plaintiffs and defendants agreed "that no sums should be payable in respect of compensation "after December 31, 1939, or alternatively, that the defendants "would accept the amount of the royalties in full satisfaction of "all sums payable under the said deeds as from December 31, "1939." T.E.C.O. claimed damages for fraud and also certain other relief in respect of alleged breach of contract which is immaterial.

T.M.M.C., by their defence, denied the charges of fraudulent misrepresentation and with regard to paragraph 10 of the statement of claim they denied the agreements therein alleged. In paragraph 8 they say: "Further the said agreements, if made "(which is denied), would be agreements not to be performed "within a year or alternatively variations of the deeds of April 2, "1938, which were agreements not to be performed within a "year either from the date thereof or from the alleged variation "thereof. There is no written memorandum of the alleged oral "agreements and the defendants will rely upon the provisions "of the Statute of Frauds. Further, if the alleged agreements "were made (which is denied), there was no consideration "therefor."

By their counterclaim (which was delivered with the defence on March 26, 1946), T.M.M.C., after setting forth clauses 3, 5 and 7 of the deed of April 2, 1938, alleged in paragraph 17 that since March 31, 1942, T.E.C.O. had sold and used contract material, some of which was made in accordance with the relevant patents but, in breach of their obligations under the deed, had not since that date rendered any accounts or paid the sums due for royalties or compensation. By the same paragraph they further pleaded: "The defendants do not desire to enforce pay-"ment of compensation in respect of deliveries made after "December 31, 1939, but before the end of hostilities with "Germany."

They claimed an order upon T.E.C.O. to deliver accounts of all contract material sold or used by either plaintiff since March 31, 1942, an inquiry as to the sum due from T.E.C.O. in respect of royalties during the period covered by the said accounts, and for compensation for the period since June 1, 1945, and an order on T.E.C.O. to pay to T.M.M.C. the sum found to be due on the said inquiry.

By paragraph 3 of their reply and defence to the counterclaim the plaintiffs pleaded that there was good consideration (which they specified) for the agreement which they had alleged by paragraph 10 of the statement of claim. They further pleaded that the said agreement had been part performed in that subsequent to its date T.E.C.O. had not paid any compensation and had received no complaint or demand from T.M.M.C. in respect of such non-payment. As to paragraph 17 of the counterclaim

T.E.C.O. admitted that they had not, since March 31, 1942, rendered accounts nor paid any sum to T.M.M.C., but save as aforesaid they did not admit the allegations contained in the said paragraph.

No rejoinder was delivered by T.M.M.C.

On these pleadings, then, the substantial issue as between T.E.C.O. and T.M.M.C. in the action was whether T.M.M.C. were liable to pay damages for fraudulent misrepresentation. T.E.C.O. had introduced into their statement of claim the alleged oral agreement for the discontinuance of compensation after December 31, 1939, only as being relevant to the amount of damages which they would recover if they were successful. They were not founding any claim to alternative relief upon it if they failed on the issue of fraud. Nevertheless, T.M.M.C. denied that the agreement had ever been made and this question accordingly became a direct issue between the parties on the counterclaim for an account and inquiry as to sums due for royalties and for compensation.

Devlin J. dismissed the action, being well satisfied that T.E.C.O. had failed to establish the charges of fraudulent misrepresentation by Dr. Louis which formed the basis of the plaintiffs' claim. With regard to the counterclaim the judge came to the conclusion that an arrangement was in fact made between Mr. Wickman and Mr. McLeod in or prior to 1942 for the discontinuance of the payment of compensation by T.E.C.O., and that such arrangement was a temporary one pending the formulation of different terms in the new agreement, that is, the agreement which was some time later accepted by T.M.M.C.'s other licensees but rejected by T.E.C.O.

In his judgment he summed up his conclusions on the matter as follows: "The result is, that I reject the view that there was "any agreement that was intended to continue, which was to "vary the original agreement. The agreement that was made "was, in my view, one of two things. I do not think there was "anything in it which could be said to limit its operation for the "duration of the war, although that may have been the intention "of the defendant company. But I think it fairly emerges, from "the language which Mr. Wickman was heard to use, that it "was intended to be a temporary modification pending the new "agreement. Accordingly, I think that when the new agreement "was presented to Mr. McLeod and was rejected by him the "temporary relief which he had been granted came to an end. "I do not mean that it came at once to an end. It is obvious "that it would be a reasonable provision that he should have "some reasonable notice in order to make the necessary altera-"tions. Compensation is now claimed from June, 1945, which "is some nine months after the new agreement was presented "to him, and I think that gives him sufficient time. If I should "be wrong about that view, then I should hold that it was a "temporary arrangement which was made subject to the right

1954
Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ld. v. Tungsten Electric Co. Ld.
Romer L.J.

"of the defendant company to terminate by giving reasonable "notice. I should regard the presentation of a new agreement "in such circumstances as amounting to a reasonable notice. I "do not think that in this type of case it is necessary that "the notice should be express. The rule that protects a party "in circumstances such as these is a broad rule of equity and "justice. It is not thought right that a man who has indicated "that he is not going to insist upon his strict rights, as a "result of which the other party has altered his position, should "be able to turn round at a minute's notice and insist upon "his rights, however inconvenient it may be to the party who "thought he was temporarily relieved. Equity requires that he "should give reasonable notice that he is going to resume his "strict rights. But all that is necessary to comply with that "broad rule of equity is that the notice should be such as to put "an ordinary person clearly in mind that the other party is "going to resume his strict rights. I think it is plain that when "a man is served with a draft of a new agreement which shows "that the compensation provisions are going to be set in force "again, he should understand from that that he must either "accept the new agreement or return to the strict position under "the old agreement."

In the result the judge gave judgment for T.M.M.C. on the counterclaim.

T.E.C.O. appealed to this court, both from the order of Devlin J., dismissing the action, and from the order in T.M.M.C.'s favour on the counterclaim. The court consisted of Somervell, Cohen and Singleton L.JJ., and argument was delivered on April 4, 1950.

The plaintiffs' appeal from the dismissal of their claim failed, this court agreeing with the conclusions at which Devlin J. had arrived on the issue of fraudulent misrepresentation. On the counterclaim the Lords Justices agreed with Devlin J. in holding that the arrangement for suspension of compensation at which Mr. Wickman and Mr. McLeod had arrived, whether legally enforceable or not, brought into play, in T.E.C.O.'s favour, the principle of equity which was enunciated by Lord Cairns in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.,[1] and was formulated by Bowen L.J. in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North Western Railway Co.[2] in the following terms: "It seems "to me to amount to this, that if persons who have contractual "rights against others induce by their conduct those against "whom they have such rights to believe that such rights will "either not be enforced or will be kept in suspense or abeyance "for some particular time, those persons will not be allowed by a "court of equity to enforce the rights until such time has elapsed, "without at all events placing the parties in the same position "as they were before."

It seemed clear to their Lordships upon the evidence that (in the words of Cohen L.J.) "there was the plainest possible "indication by the defendants that they did not intend for the "time being to claim compensation, and that they conveyed that "intimation in terms which amounted to an invitation to the "plaintiffs to continue to conduct their business on the basis "that until something was done, until notice was given, no "royalty would be demanded," and that that invitation was acted upon by T.E.C.O. in the various ways to which their Lordships referred, which included the basing by T.E.C.O. of their production policy on the footing that only the 10 per cent. royalty would be payable while the arrangement continued in force.

The next question, therefore, which had to be considered was the manner in which T.M.M.C. could terminate the arrangement, and whether (as Devlin J. had held), they had in fact terminated it by presenting the new draft agreement to T.E.C.O. The court held (differing from Devlin J. upon this point) that the presentation of this draft did not operate to determine the arrangement, and it is necessary to state the terms in which Somervell and Cohen L.JJ., respectively, expressed their views upon this matter.

Somervell L.J. said: "The question then is, when does the "arrangement come to an end? It is not suggested that the "promise covered the whole of the remainder of the contractual "period and, no doubt, the defendants hoped that everybody "would accept the new draft agreement which, after three and a "half years' labour, finally came to light. It is said, and this is "the view which Devlin J., I think, has taken, that the presenta-"tion of that draft terminated the position with regard to the "30 per cent. I find a difficulty about that. I do not see how "the presentation of the draft by itself could do so. You must "allow, as it seems to me, some time for negotiations. Drafts "are presented not as final documents but as documents to be "discussed, and, therefore, I find a difficulty in accepting that "conclusion. Then it is said: 'Well, when negotiations broke "'down.' I do not take that view. I take the view in this case, "having regard to the fact, as it seems to me, that Mr. Wick-"man throughout had plainly indicated that the defendants were "going to reorganize this business, the basis of the old agree-"ments in one way or another, as they had been entered into "for the licences by Krupps had really gone and there were very "good reasons for saying so. Here we were in a war, when "everybody, I should think, would be encouraged to produce, "anyway, as much as was wanted of these types of metal. I "think, against that background, the plaintiffs were entitled to "an express notice if the old terms were to be enforced again "according to their literal provisions. If you read the correspon-"dence, the plaintiffs wrote objecting to the agreement. There "was ample opportunity for the defendants to say: 'Well, you

1954
Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ld. v. Tungsten Electric Co. Ld.
Romer L.J.

"'know, if you do not like this agreement we shall withdraw "'our terms of not collecting the 30 per cent. and you will be "'back on the letter of the old pre-war contract.' They not "having done that, I do not think they can rely on anything "until we come to the counterclaim. That plainly indicates the "view that they were taking. I think the plaintiffs would be "entitled to a reasonable time after that. We were asked to say "what that reasonable time was, but I do not think we can do "that; it is not in issue in these proceedings, but the defendants "have already addressed their mind to this question when they "decided at what time after the new agreement had been served "they thought it proper to begin claiming their compensation. "I think it was about nine months. It may be that, on that "matter, they made a good guess, but it is impossible, I think, "for us to decide that as a matter binding on the parties in these "proceedings."

Cohen L.J. said: "That being the arrangement, I am unable "to agree, however, with Devlin J., that any reasonable notice "was given bringing to an end the temporary suspension of the "right to compensation until the counterclaim was delivered in "this action. As Somervell L.J. has said, the new draft licence "was not submitted until September, 1944; correspondence "ensued, and the last material letter was that written by the "plaintiff company to Mr. Bateman on November 7, 1944, which "starts with this paragraph: 'Have you by any chance overlooked "'the fact that we have been expecting a letter from you in full "'reply to ours of September 29 last?' and ending with the "paragraph: 'May I have your assurance, please, that these "'and the other matters referred to in our September 29 letter "'will have attention within some definite time?' I think "that the plaintiffs were clearly entitled to an answer to that "letter, and in so far as the correspondence before us goes, "they never got one. I think the plaintiffs were entitled not "only to expect a reply but to receive notice if the defendants "were proposing to enforce a right to compensation which had "been in suspense for five years or thereabouts. So far as I "can see, nothing equivalent to such notice was given before, "as I have said, the counterclaim was delivered, and, in my "opinion, therefore, compensation did not become payable until "a reasonable time after delivery of the counterclaim."

Singleton L.J. agreed with the judgments of Somervell and Cohen L.JJ., and did not deliver a separate judgment of his own.

A discussion subsequently took place on the question of costs, and as to the form of the order which would be appropriate to give effect to the decision of the court and, in the course of it, Cohen L.J. said: "I wonder whether it is possible to put that in. "You see, this is a declaration, is it not?" Mr. Beyfus said: "Yes." The discussion continues: "Cohen L.J.: 'Are not "'liable to account for compensation calculated in accordance "'with the terms of the said deed until the expiration of a "'reasonable time from the delivery of the counterclaim,' "because that is what we have decided. I do not know whether "it is desirable for that to go in. I was wondering whether we "could do what Mr. Roche suggested. Singleton L.J.: It was "not an issue. Mr. Beyfus: It was not an issue, my Lord." The order, accordingly, contained no declaration on the lines which Cohen L.J. had suggested, and was confined (so far as the present point is concerned) to striking out from the order made by Devlin J., the declaration that T.E.C.O. were bound to account for compensation as from June 1, 1945.

We have been supplied with the transcript of part of a discussion which took place upon an interlocutory application which was made to Devlin J. subsequently. On that occasion, Mr. Warshaw was appearing for T.E.C.O., and T.M.M.C. were represented by Mr. Barry. The shorthand note records the following: "Mr. Warshaw: If I might intervene for a "moment, it is perfectly true that one of the Lords Justices "expressed the opinion that the delivery of the counterclaim "would be such a notice as to bring the arrangement to a con-"clusion, the arrangement not to claim compensation, but the "matter was not argued by my learned leader, Mr. Beyfus, at "all, and we expressly reserved the right in any future proceed-"ings to maintain that the delivery of that counterclaim was not "and could not be a notice bringing the arrangement to an end. "Devlin J.: The Court of Appeal must have varied my order "in some way, must they not? Mr. Barry: I am going to draw "your Lordship's attention to the order in a moment. I entirely "agree that what my learned friend has said is correct. The "Court of Appeal did not formally decide any matters for the "future; they were not before the court. All that they held "was that, in fact, up to the date of the counterclaim no "notice requiring the payment of compensation had been made "and on the authorities, which your Lordship will remember "were cited by Denning J., as he then was, in the Central "London Property Trust Ld. v. High Trees House Ld.[3] on the "authority of those cases that we had not brought the "suspension properly to an end. In those circumstances, we "were not entitled to recover compensation on our counterclaim. "I am not suggesting that there is any binding decision that we "are entitled to recover it afterwards. That would be, of course, "a matter for argument in some future litigation."

In these circumstances it is, I think, quite clear (nor, indeed, has it been disputed) that T.E.C.O. were not precluded by the order of this court, or by anything that was said in the judgment of the Lords Justices, from contending in future proceedings that the arrangement which was concluded between Mr. Wickman and Mr. McLeod was not determined by the delivery of the counterclaim; and T.E.C.O. have so contended in the present action. By paragraph 4 of their defence they plead: "In or "about March, 1943, and on an occasion prior thereto, which "the defendants cannot now more particularly specify, the plain-"tiffs agreed to forgo the payment of compensation by the "defendants until a reasonable time should elapse after notice "given by the plaintiffs to the defendants to resume such pay-"ment. No such notice has been given to the defendants. "Alternatively, if such notice has been given to the defendants, "a reasonable time thereafter had not elapsed by January 1, "1947, or by any date during the currency of the 1938 deeds."

Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ld. v. Tungsten Electric Co. Ld.

These allegations are answered by T.M.M.C. in paragraph 5 of their reply as follows: "T.M.M.C. do not admit there was "any contract or agreement with T.E.C.O. to the effect stated "in paragraph 4 of the defence. Further, there was no considera-"tion therefor and T.M.M.C. will, if necessary, rely on the "Statute of Frauds. T.M.M.C. admit, however, that upon some "occasion between March, 1940, and March, 1943, which "T.M.M.C. cannot particularize, they had intimated to T.E.C.O. "that as a temporary measure they would not for the time being "enforce payment of compensation, and that the effect of such "intimation was to preclude T.M.M.C. from enforcing payment "of compensation until they had intimated to T.E.C.O. they "desired and/or intended to enforce payment, and until the "lapse of a further reasonable time after such intimation, or in "respect of any period prior to the end of such reasonable time. "Further, both parties are estopped by the judgment of the "Court of Appeal in the first action from contending that the "effect of the arrangements between them as to compensation "were otherwise than as stated in the last sentence. The "counterclaim in the first action was a sufficient notice or inti-"mation of T.M.M.C.'s desire or intention to enforce payment "of compensation, and the time between the delivery of the "counterclaim and January 1, 1947, was a reasonable time. "Alternatively, if such period was not sufficient, a reasonable "time had elapsed by some date (which T.M.M.C. will ask the "court to fix) between January 1, 1947, and the issue of the writ "herein."

In dealing with this issue, Pearson J. said that prima facie the judgments of this court in the first action appeared to decide that the suspensory arrangement came to an end on the expiration of a reasonable time after the delivery of the counterclaim in that action; but that it appeared to him that there was at least a real doubt whether the expressions of opinion in those judgments should be regarded as conclusive; and the arguments had accordingly proceeded on the basis that they were not. The substance of the arguments which Mr. Beyfus presented to the judge was, first, that the suspensory arrangement had to be determined by a notice of termination; secondly, that such notice must be a proper prospective notice; and, thirdly, that as the counterclaim satisfied neither of these requirements it could not, and did not, operate so as to determine the arrangement.

After considering these contentions and reviewing the authorities which had been brought to his attention, Pearson J. came to the conclusion, independently of the views which the members of this court expressed on the appeal in the earlier action, that the delivery of the counterclaim in that action effectively terminated the temporary, or suspensory, arrangement.

He expressed his decision upon this question in the following words: "The result of" the authorities "in my opinion is that, "where the rule of equity applies, the period of suspension comes "to an end when it is in all the circumstances equitable that "it should come to an end, and that is, normally, at any rate, "according to the circumstances, either at, or within a reason- "able time after, the termination of the state of affairs which "is the cause or basis of the suspension. It is not necessary that "the person whose legal rights have been suspended should give "a notice purporting to terminate the suspension, although, of "course, it would be fair and reasonable and advisable for him "to do so.

"In this case the state of affairs which was the cause or "basis of the suspension would have been, according to the view "taken in the court of first instance in the former action, the "continuance of the negotiations for new licensing arrangements, "but, according to the view of the Court of Appeal, the state of "affairs was, I think, the attitude of T.M.M.C. in not requiring "payment of the compensation for the time being. When that "attitude was reversed, a reasonable time for resumption of "compensation payments began to run. The making of the "counterclaim in the first action clearly involved a reversal of "the previous attitude, and, therefore, it started running a "reasonable time for resumption of compensation payments.

"Finally, having come to that conclusion on an examination "of the earlier authorities, I am entitled to pray in aid of that "conclusion the expressions of opinion given by the Court of "Appeal in the first action. Even if they must be regarded as "obiter dicta, these expressions of opinion must carry great "weight.

"On the question as to whether the nine months which "T.M.M.C. proposed to allow was a reasonable time in this case, "Mr. Beyfus elected to present no argument. As under the "deeds T.M.M.C. were entitled to terminate the licence by a "six months' notice, I hold that the nine months' period "proposed to be allowed was a sufficient period."

As a preliminary to considering further the decision of Pearson J. upon this issue, it would be convenient to say a word or two about the views which the Lords Justices expressed in relation to the matter in their judgments on the previous appeal. It has not been, and could not be, contended that the question constituted an issue as between T.E.C.O. on the one hand and

C. A.

T.M.M.C. on the other in the litigation which was then before the court. The issue on the counterclaim, as plainly appears from the pleadings, was whether, as T.E.C.O. alleged and T.M.M.C. denied, the obligation imposed on T.E.C.O. to pay compensation had been "washed out" (as Mr. McLeod said) by agreement with Mr. Wickman. Devlin J. held that it had not, but that the result of equitable intervention, upon the facts as proved, was to establish a suspensory arrangement which was determinable upon notice given by T.M.M.C. Such an arrangement had not in fact been pleaded by way of alternative defence to T.M.M.C.'s claim for an account. Devlin J. further held that such arrangement had been determined previously to the litigation, and the only question for decision by the Court of Appeal was whether this latter finding was right or wrong. This court held that it was wrong and gave effect to its decision by discharging the declaration which Devlin J. had made.

The alternative possibility that the delivery of the counterclaim in the action might have terminated the arrangement emerged, it seems, at some time during the hearing of the appeal, but was not argued by counsel on either side; indeed, so little was this point regarded as being before the court as an issue between the parties that I gather that at one stage of the argument Mr. Beyfus, for T.E.C.O., intimated by way of a casual concession, as it were, that the counterclaim might have had the suggested effect, although he formally reserved the rights of his clients on the matter on the following day.

It is true that the members of the court did in their judgments express opinions to the effect that the counterclaim terminated the arrangement, and that view would certainly seem at first sight to be the logical outcome of the reasoning which led them to their decision upon the issue which was before them. That those opinions were intended to be no more than provisional, however, necessarily follows from the fact that the question was not before the court and from the consequential absence of any argument upon it.

In my opinion, accordingly, Pearson J. was perfectly right in thinking that, in so far as the judgments in the previous appeal dealt with the counterclaim as a factor relevant to the ending of the suspensory arrangement, they should be regarded as no more than obiter.

As a result of the careful and elaborate arguments which have now been presented to us on this appeal, I have arrived at the conclusion that the arrangement for suspending payment of compensation by T.E.C.O. was not terminated by the delivery of the counterclaim in the previous action. I respectfully agree with the view of Somervell L.J. as expressed in his judgment on the former appeal, that T.E.C.O. "were entitled "to an express notice if the old terms were to be enforced "again according to their literal provisions." A return to the former policy of exacting compensation in accordance with the deed of 1938 would have such far-reaching effects on T.E.C.O.'s production policy and would involve decisions of such importance by those in charge of the management of the company that a notification by T.M.M.C. of their intention to revert to the old regime must at least be communicated in unequivocal terms. But, further than this, it appears to me to be consistent both with fair dealing and with authority that such notification should specify either some future date, or at least a reasonable period, from which, or on the expiration of which, the payments were to be resumed.

T.E.C.O. had been for many years past manufacturing and selling their products in quantities which by far exceeded the quotas laid down in the deed, and they had been doing so on the basis of the suspensory agreement. If the benefit of this agreement were to be withdrawn, T.E.C.O. would be confronted with the necessity of considering and ultimately deciding upon their future course of action. To continue their existing production in face of the reimposition of the penalty provisions might be quite impracticable commercially. Alternatively to such continuance, three, and perhaps more, ways of dealing with the problem might be open to them. First, they could decrease their production and sales. Secondly (and either alone or in conjunction with the first) they could increase the prices to their customers. But neither of these changes could be brought about without a reasonable period for discussion and planning and reorganization. Moreover, manufacturers frequently sell ahead which adds to the difficulties of putting into immediate effect such drastic changes of policy as alterations in production and prices. Finally, the company would have to consider whether the best solution might not be to terminate the licence, which they could only do on six months' notice to T.M.M.C.

In my opinion, although in many cases the equity, to which Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.[4] gave recognition and high authority, is satisfied by merely conforming to the terms in which Lord Cairns (and subsequently Bowen L.J.) formulated it, there are other cases where justice requires that the resumption of legal rights which have been suspended for a period must be preceded by a notification to the other party concerned specifying a fixed period of grace during which that party can put his house in order; and that in such cases a notification such as that will be a condition precedent to the valid reassumption of the owner's legal rights.

Such a case was Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King.[5] In that case the appellants had erected certain poles, carrying telegraph wires, on property which belonged to the Crown. Some of the poles had been erected between 1905 and 1910 without leave or licence; others had been erected in 1893 and 1911, in each case while agreements were in negotiation, though none was eventually concluded. In 1926 the Crown proceeded against the appellants for trespass and damages; and, in the alternative asked for a declaration of the appellants' rights, if any. The Privy Council held, on the facts, that at the date of the proceedings all the poles were on the property with the licence of the Crown.

On this finding three points then fell to be decided: (1) whether the licence was revocable; (2) if so, whether it had been revoked either before action or by the institution of the proceedings; and (3) if revocable, but unrevoked, how and in what circumstances the licence was revocable. On the first question the Judicial Committee decided, for reasons which are not material for present purposes, that the licence from the Crown was revocable. The next question then was whether it had been in fact revoked before action brought. This depended upon certain discussions and correspondence which had taken place between the parties concerned. In 1917 an agreement had been submitted to the appellants which was designed to regularize the position, but nothing effectual came of it and the matter was then allowed to lapse for six or seven years.

On March 20, 1924, Mr. Edwards (representing the Department of Justice of Canada) wrote to the appellants' President, Mr. Beatty, as follows[6]: "'I have been instructed by the "'Department of Railways and Canals to take up with you the "'question of certain lines of telegraph wires and poles belonging "'to you which are situate on the lands of the Canadian "'Government Railway, and which lines extend from the City "'of St. John to the City of Halifax; from Truro to Sydney, and "'from Painsec Junction to Point du Chene. I am instructed to "'inform you that all offers of settlement or otherwise, hereto- "'fore made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or to the "'Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company by the Government, or "'anyone on its behalf, are withdrawn and to say that the wires "'and poles must be removed from off the Government Rail- "'ways' lands, and that otherwise the said poles and wires will "'be removed. No time has been fixed within which you must "'effect this removal, but unless you agree to act at once in the "'matter, a date will be fixed by the Department of Railways "'and Canals.'"

After further negotiations Mr. Edwards, on January 29, 1926, wrote to the appellants' solicitor[7]: "'Referring to previous "'correspondence with regard to the demand of the Department "'of Railways and Canals that the lines of telegraph wires and "'poles operated by your company on the lands of the Canadian "'Government Railways be removed therefrom, or satisfactory "'arrangements made with the department for the rental thereof, "'I understand that certain negotiations have taken place "'between officials of your company and of the Government, but

" ' that it has not been found possible to reach an agreement, " ' and I am instructed therefore to inform you that it is the " ' intention of the department to at once proceed with the " ' action outlined in my letter to Mr. Beatty of March 20, " ' 1924.' "

Notwithstanding the peremptory and compelling nature of these letters from Mr. Edwards, the Privy Council held that they did not operate as a revocation of the licence. Lord Russell of Killowen, in delivering the judgment of the board, said that the first letter amounted at most to an intimation that a date would in future be fixed for the removal of the telegraph line, that is, it was an intimation that the licence would be put an end to at some future time; and all that the second letter did was to state the intention of the department at once to proceed with the action outlined in the first letter, namely, to fix a date, and no date was ever fixed.

Their Lordships' conclusion, therefore, was that the licence had not been determined prior to the action and the judgment then passed to the question whether the institution of the proceedings ipso facto determined the licence. This inquiry in effect formed part of the third question above referred to, namely, how and in what circumstances was the licence revocable? Upon this Lord Russell of Killowen said, in delivering the judgment [8]: " Whether any and what restrictions exist on the power of a " licensor to determine a revocable licence must, their Lordships " think, depend upon the circumstances of each case. The " general proposition would appear to be that a licensee whose " licence is revocable is entitled to reasonable notice of revoca- " tion. For this proposition reference may be made to Cornish " v. Stubbs [9] and Mellor v. Watkins,[10] in the latter of which cases " Blackburn J. states that a person giving a revocable licence ' is " ' bound to give the licensee reasonable notice.' When the exer- " cise of the rights conferred by the licence involves nothing " beyond, there can be no reason to urge against the existence " of a power to determine the licence brevi manu at the will of " the licensor. But the exercise of the rights may have involved " the licensee in obligations in other directions, which the deter- " mination of the licence would disable him from fulfilling, unless " the licence were determined after a notice sufficient, in point " of time, for the making of substituted arrangements. In such " circumstances the licensee would, their Lordships conceive, be " entitled to breathing space sufficient for this purpose. The case " before the board would appear to be peculiarly a case in which " grave injustice might ensue if the Crown were at liberty by the " mere initiation of legal proceedings to determine summarily the " rights of the appellant, and turn the appellant's occupancy " into trespass. For the appellant is not the only one concerned;

"the telegraph line is part of a system in the existence and continuance of which the public has a very considerable interest. It appears to their Lordships that this is a case in which the licence can only be effectively ended, after notice has been served upon the appellant determining the licence on such a specified date in the future, as will give the appellant an interval of time between the service of the notice and the specified date, sufficient not only to allow the removal of the poles and wires from off the property of the Crown, but also to enable the appellant to make arrangements for the continuance of the telegraph line by the erection of poles and wires elsewhere than on Crown property. Their Lordships are accordingly of opinion that the appellant's licence was not determined by the institution of the proceedings. . . ."

"Their Lordships feel little doubt that as between the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. and the Crown suitable contractual arrangements will be made which will obviate further litigation. If, however, this anticipation proves to be ill-founded, it will be for the Crown to determine the licence by service of a notice the suffciency of which, if called in question, will have to be decided, upon proper evidence, in subsequent proceedings. It will be for the Crown, at its risk, to fix the length of notice."

Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King[11] was considered by this court in Minister of Health v. Bellotti.[12] The headnote in that case reads: "To house the defendants and other persons evacuated from Gibraltar in 1940 for reasons connected with the war, large blocks of flats were requisitioned and furnished by the Commissioner of Works and then handed over to the Minister of Health who granted licences to evacuees to reside in them. Difficulties as to discipline having arisen, letters dated June 8, 1943, were sent on behalf of the Minister to the defendants requiring them to leave their rooms together with their dependants, taking all their possessions with them, within one week. Attempts to expel them having failed, the Minister commenced proceedings on September 11, 1943, for damages for trespass and an injunction:—Held, (1) that the Minister was entitled to bring such an action by virtue of section 7 of the Ministry of Health Act, 1919, although he held the flats for the Crown; (2) that, in the special circumstances, that the defendants had been brought away from their homes and friends and needed time to find rooms for themselves, their families and belongings, a week was not a reasonable time to allow them for leaving their rooms; and (3) that, although the time allowed was unreasonable the letters were valid notices revoking the licences, and as, by the time these proceedings were commenced, sufficient time had elapsed for the defendants to

Lord Greene M.R., in his judgment,[13] said that it was agreed that the defendants were in the position of licensees, though not gratuitous licensees, as, by the payment or contribution which they made under a scheme which was set up by the Minister, they were entitled to be regarded as licensees paying a consideration in money for the licence which they enjoyed. He then referred in some detail to the circumstances in which the defendants, who had been resident in Gibraltar, had been removed with their wives and families by governmental action and given accommodation in this country; and he said that it was unthinkable that in those circumstances the Government should act otherwise than under a very strong sense of responsibility for the care and welfare of the individuals concerned, and that the grant of the licence to use the accommodation provided was incumbent on the Minister.

The Master of the Rolls then said[14]: "I refer to that because "it appears to me that where a question arises as to the lawful "method of terminating a licence, the circumstances in which "the licence came to be granted are most relevant to consider. "Where a licence is granted under a contract, it may very well "be that the contract will make express provision for those "matters which must be observed, but what is to happen where "the contract is silent in that regard? I cannot take the view "that there is some cast-iron principle of law which lays down "for every type of contract, whatever the circumstances and "whatever the purposes for which it was entered into, some "rule which is always to operate. In my opinion, the true rule "is that the implications of the contract are to be determined by "regard to all the relevant circumstances of the case. Thus, in "the judgment of the Privy Council in Canadian Pacific Railway "Co. v. The King the following paragraph appears[15]: 'Whether "'any and what restrictions exist on the power of a licensor to "'determine a revocable licence must, their Lordships think, "'depend upon the circumstances of each case.' That is the "only proposition of general application which I find it possible "to extract from that authority; and although the case is not "binding on this court, the law there is, in my opinion, laid "down with complete accuracy."

Then the Master of the Rolls, after saying that the Minister's letters to the defendants requiring them to give up possession operated as a clear determination of the licence at the expiration of one week, said[16] that such operation was valid but that the time limit attached to it was too short, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the necessity of the defendants searching for and obtaining other accommodation.

Romer L.J.

He later returned to Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King[17] and again rejected the view that that case purported to lay down any general rule that in all cases of a revocable licence the licensor can only determine it by a notice specifying a reasonable date in the future for it to become effective and that if he fails to do so or gives insufficient time to the licensee the notice would be a bad notice. It was, he said, a special case and[18] "It "is clear to my mind that the judgment was directed only to "the special facts of that case, and is not of general application "as laying down a rule that in every case of licence the notice "to revoke must specify a time at the licensor's risk."

MacKinnon L.J. and Goddard L.J. did not express views upon this point which differed from those of the Master of the Rolls.

In Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King[19] the question was as to the revocation of a licence, but in my opinion there is no relevant difference for present purposes between a licence and a suspensory arrangement such as was brought into being in the present case. And, in my opinion, the reasoning and principles which the Judicial Committee applied are equally applicable to the position which existed between T.E.C.O. and T.M.M.C. after the arrangement between them was made. The Canadian Pacific Railway would have been subjected to the most grievous hardship by a sudden revocation of the licences which they had for so long enjoyed; and justice required that they should be informed with precision, and a reasonable time beforehand, of the date from which the enjoyment of those licences was to be forfeited.

So here, for the reasons which I have earlier explained, it was imperative that T.E.C.O. should be notified in advance of a reasonable period which would be available to them for decision and planning and reorganization before the strictness of their contractual obligations was reimposed upon them.

Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. The King[20] is not binding upon this court; and I have no hesitation in accepting the view expressed in Bellotti's case[21] that the principle upon which it was decided is not applicable to all cases. On the other hand, it was, if I may respectfully say so, quite rightly decided, in my judgment, upon the facts which founded the decision; and I think it clearly points the way to the decision of the present case.

On the assumption, then, that the counterclaim by T.M.M.C. could in other respects be regarded as notice of their intention to terminate the arrangement, it was not effectual for the purpose, in that it neither specified a date nor indicated a period (whether reasonable or unreasonable) from and after which the obligations of T.E.C.O. in the matter of compensation would once more be enforced.

[18] [1944] K.B. 298, 308.
[19] [1931] A.C. 414.
[21] [1944] K.B. 298, 307.

I do not think that, even apart from this deficiency in the counterclaim, it could be regarded as a notice to determine the arrangement; for, as I have previously indicated, such a notice must at least be express and unambiguous. All that the counterclaim did was to deny the agreement which T.E.C.O. had alleged for a suspension of the compensation arrangement and it cannot, in my opinion, be said that the denial operated as a notice (much less an express notice) of their intention to terminate the alleged suspension. I know of no authority for the proposition that a licence is ipso facto determined by the licensor's denial that the licence was ever granted. But, further than this, it is to be observed that the agreement which T.E.C.O. alleged and which T.M.M.C. denied was an irrevocable agreement and not the terminable arrangement which both Devlin J. and this court subsequently held it to be; that arrangement, which resulted from the application of equitable principles, was not pleaded by T.E.C.O. and could not, therefore, have been, and was not, denied by T.M.M.C. in their defence and counterclaim. It is, accordingly, difficult to see how on any view the denial of an irrevocable agreement can constitute notice of determination of a different and terminable arrangement which was not present to the mind of either party at the time.

It seems to me extremely difficult to hold, consistently with the rejection by the Privy Council in the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. case [22] of the arguments founded upon the institution of the proceedings and the letters which preceded them, that the delivery by T.M.M.C. of their counterclaim had ipso facto the indirect and vicarious effect of determining an arrangement to which it did not even refer. I have, accordingly, for the above reasons, reached the conclusion that the arrangement was not determined by the counterclaim, and as it was not determined in any other way previous to the bringing of these proceedings the action necessarily fails and should have been dismissed.

* STOCKBRIDGE MILL CO. LD. v. CENTRAL LAND BOARD.

Town and Country Planning—Development—Assessment of development value—Evidence—Particulars of agreed assessments of comparable land in same area—Admissibility—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 51), Part VI—Lands Tribunal Rules, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 2263), r. 31 (4) (ii).

In an appeal to the Lands Tribunal from a determination by the Central Land Board of the development value, for the purposes of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, of four parcels of land, comprising 7¾ acres, it was sought on behalf of the Central Land Board to put in evidence particulars of a number of cases, concerning what were claimed to be comparable lands in the same area, the development value of which had been agreed in negotiations by the same valuation officer. Objection was taken by the landowner, and the tribunal refused to admit the evidence, but stated a case for the opinion of the court whether the evidence was admissible:—

Held, that, notwithstanding that the register in which the development values were to be found was not a public document, the evidence was admissible, but it would be open to the claimant to show that the cases were not really comparable. It would then be a matter of weight, to which the tribunal would have regard in assessing the value of the evidence.

Pointer v. Norwich Assessment Committee [1922] 2 K.B. 471 applied.

Case stated by the Lands Tribunal, in a matter under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947.

The Stockbridge Mill Co. Ld. appealed to the Lands Tribunal against a determination by the Central Land Board of the development value of four parcels of land, comprising 7¾ acres, situate at Hornby in the county of Lancashire. The board had determined the development value at £1,230. On appeal the Lands Tribunal increased the development value to £1,920, being the difference between an unrestricted value of £2,880 and a restricted value of £960. Before the tribunal it was sought on behalf of the board to put in evidence a number of assessments which had been negotiated by one Collins, the district valuer, in respect of lands in Hornby and the neighbourhood, which were said to be comparable to the land in the present case. Objection was raised by the company to the admission of this evidence, and it was held by the tribunal to be inadmissible.

At the request of the Central Land Board the tribunal (Mr. J. L. Milne) stated a case, and submitted the following question for the decision of the court: "Whether in declining to admit the "particulars in the said exhibits as part of the evidence in chief "of Mr. T. A. Collins I came to a correct decision in point of "law?"

J. P. Ashworth for the Central Land Board.
B. S. Wingate-Saul for the appellant.

SOMERVELL L.J. This is a case stated by the Lands Tribunal in a matter under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The appellants, the Stockbridge Mill Co. Ld., appealed to the Lands Tribunal against a determination by the Central Land Board of the development value of an interest in land. The case is stated on the question of the admissibility of certain evidence. The development value under the Act is the difference between the present user with minor modifications, which is called the restricted value, and the unrestricted value as if the Act had not been passed. At the time when the Act was passed, though there have been modifications since, that was the basis of the claim which could be put forward to share in what has been called the global sum. Under the rules applicable to evidence before the Lands Tribunal certain documents, if it is sought to tender them in evidence, have to be sent to the registrar of the court and they are sent to the other side. One of the documents which was sent was a "Schedule of eleven claims under Part VI of the Town "and Country Planning Act, 1947, alleged to have been negotiated "by T. A. Collins (in his capacity as district valuer, Inland "Revenue) on behalf of the Central Land Board and to have been "agreed with persons, other than the appellants, in respect of "lands in Hornby and district," including lands in other districts which are set out. They were objected to as inadmissible. That objection was upheld and a case was stated on that issue.

Mr. Milne, who constituted the tribunal, has had this question before him previously in Mason v. Central Land Board,[1] when similar evidence had been tendered. It was objected to and he upheld the objection. I will read what he said: "There can be "no doubt that such proved facts as are relevant to an issue can "be received in evidence in chief, and that these may include "rents, sale prices, and the like, in transactions relating to "comparable lands which took place prior to the material date; "furthermore, particulars of any valuations agreed to by the "opposing party in the case would be receivable as being in the "nature of admissions. But none of the particulars which "were included in Mr. Woollaston's rejected documents were "said to be admissions by Mr. Mason. The particulars were of "valuations which were of the nature of admissions by persons "not parties to this case and that could not be a ground for "admitting them as evidence in chief, although they might well "have been admissible in re-examination if the cross-examination "of Mr. Woollaston had taken a certain line." He goes on to say what, of course, is quite true, that evidence of this kind in regard to comparable transactions or assessments, or whatever it may be, in respect of comparable land, is often of very little value. That is the view which he has taken and we are asked to consider whether it is right or not.

STOCKBRIDGE MILL CO. LD. v. CENTRAL LAND BOARD.

Subject to one exception which might be made, I think that the issue has been decided in principle by a previous decision of this court, Pointer v. Norwich Assessment Committee,[2] which is reported in the Divisional Court, and in this court on appeal. The headnote in the Court of Appeal reads: "On an appeal to "quarter sessions by a person who alleges that he has been over-"assessed in respect of his premises, evidence of the rateable "value of other similar premises in the same Union is in point "of law admissible; whether in any particular case such evidence "will be of any value when admitted must depend upon the "circumstances and the degree of closeness with which the two "sets of premises resemble one another."

Then there was a point which does not arise here whether notice ought to have been given to the occupiers whose assessments were said to be comparable and therefore relevant. One of the points which had been made in the Divisional Court, and also in the Court of Appeal, was that although evidence of actual rents paid for comparable premises was admissible the assessments, which was what was sought to be brought in in that case, were not admissible. Bankes L.J., who had some doubt on the matter, said[3]: "But although evidence of the rateable value of "such other premises is in the majority of cases of but little value, "I agree with the Deputy Recorder and the Divisional Court "that it cannot as matter of law be regarded as inadmissible." Scrutton L.J. agreed. Atkin L.J. said that in the first place the assessments could be regarded—in that case it was the ratepayer who was introducing them—as admissions against the assessment committee, but he says[4]: "And secondly, it may be the only "way in which you can get at the rent at which the appellant's "premises are worth to let by the year." Then he gives an example in support of that proposition: "It seems impossible to "say that the rateable value of the former houses"—that is the comparable houses—"which contain precisely the same accom-"modation, is not admissible as evidence of the rent which the "hypothetical tenant would pay for the house last built."

These determinations by agreement of development value seem to be in law in the same position, and I think that the point which Mr. Wingate-Saul took in the first part of his argument, having regard to that decision, goes plainly to weight and not to admissibility. He said, for instance, that many of those concerned would regard the claim based on development value as something like a windfall and would not bother very much about the amount.

[4] Ibid. 477.

That may be true with regard to some of the smaller sums, but we are asked to decide whether these determinations are inadmissible as such. One might well get a case where there was a large claim which had been dealt with at great length and in great detail between surveyors and so on. He also said, and I think rightly, that in some cases what the party is interested in is the difference between the two values and that the surveyor or other person acting for the claimant would not spend very long arguing about the absolute amount of the restricted value if he found that the surveyor for the development board, who had put it higher, was equally prepared to put the unrestricted value higher. But that goes to weight, I think, and not to admissibility.

There was one point which I think ought to have a word or two said about it. The rating and valuation list is a public document, and therefore if the rating authorities sought to rely on what they had agreed was the rateable value of comparable houses the other side would be able to look at the list and see if they could produce some cases which might help their case. The register in which these development values are to be found is not a public document. Again I think that that goes to weight and not to admissibility. I think it may well be that if the Central Land Board, having produced what they suggested were certain comparable figures, were unwilling to let the claimant see whether there might not be some other figures which he wanted to say were comparable, the court might well disregard altogether the figures which they sought to produce. Equally, if, having produced figures of this kind in a number of cases, they did not produce them in a particular case, it might well be that an adverse inference would be drawn against them if they put any difficulty in the way of the claimant looking at the register.

I do not think that that affects the question of admissibility. Once one comes to the conclusion—and I think that it is plainly right in principle—that actual transactions are admissible if sufficiently comparable, then agreed figures must be also admissible if the subject-matter of the agreed figures is comparable land. Of course, it is open to a claimant to show that these figures are not really comparable and throw very little light on the actual problem. In the present case Mr. Milne had the figures before him for the purpose of considering admissibility. I am not suggesting for a moment that he allowed them to influence his mind, but he was satisfied that there was sufficient other evidence to enable him to decide the present case. I think that he indicates —for what reason does not matter, possibly the distance of this land from some or other of the cases alleged to be comparable— that they would not have given him any real help in this case. It does not follow that they might not give another tribunal assistance in another case.

We were asked on that aspect of the matter by Mr. Wingate-Saul to say that, having decided the legal issue, we should not remit the award. I think, having decided the point of law, that we must remit the award. On the other hand, Mr. Ashworth indicated that what he was interested in was the point of law, and I think that he felt the force of the argument that it looked as if in this case the evidence rejected would not have affected the mind of the tribunal. It may be that although the case has to be sent back it will be disposed of without any further costs and without a further hearing and argument.

For these reasons I think that this point of law must be answered in the negative.

Birkett L.J. I am entirely of the same opinion. It is important to keep in mind that the only issue to be decided by this court is the question of admissibility, and considerations affecting the weight and cogency of the evidence are not really material for our consideration. I can quite see that many of the matters which have been raised by Mr. Wingate-Saul in this court affected the mind of the tribunal when deciding this issue. If one is to give in evidence figures relating to other land, the subject of agreement between the district valuer on behalf of the Central Land Board and other appellants, at first sight one would say: "That evidence must be considered with great care and great "circumspection." But, of course, it does not touch the question of admissibility.

The main ground upon which the tribunal proceeded was that the evidence was not admissible, quite apart from its cogency or weight, because it was not relevant. It was sought to put in a schedule of eleven claims under Part VI of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, which were negotiated by Mr. Collins in his capacity as district valuer for the Inland Revenue on behalf of the Central Land Board. It was said that those figures were agreed by negotiation between surveyors or chartered land agents and all the details of them were set out in the document which was produced. The land comprised in the eleven claims was land, some of it adjacent to Hornby, and it was said therefore that evidence of those claims could not be admissible because it was not relevant.

I think that we are bound in the present case by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Pointer v. Norwich Assessment Committee,[5] one of the strongest courts that one could imagine (Bankes, Scrutton and Atkin L.JJ.). The question in that case was concerned with a different subject-matter, namely, the rateable value of other similar premises in the same union, but it was there submitted that that was not admissible on the same grounds as it was submitted in the present case. In the Divisional Court Salter J. gave expression to his doubt largely based on many of the considerations urged here by Mr. Wingate-Saul. In the Court of Appeal Bankes L.J. said[6]: "The Deputy Recorder "admitted the evidence, but says he attached no weight to it, and

"one of the questions that we are asked is whether he was right "in so disregarding it. But that is not a question of law at all; it "is a question as to the weight of evidence, and that is a matter "with which we have nothing to do." A little later he said: "But the reason why it" this class of evidence "has been dis-"couraged"—referring to what Salter J. had said—"is not "because it is inadmissible, but because there are so many "circumstances to be taken into consideration that comparisons "of that kind are practically valueless." Then there is the passage which my Lord has already cited.

Atkin L.J. said [7]: "If the objection is to the incorrectness or "unfairness of the valuation of the objector's premises, it seems "to me plain that it is open to him to say that their valuation is "incorrect or unfair because certain other premises, which corre-"spond very closely to his, are assessed at a different value, "subject to this, that if he is going to complain that those other "premises are assessed too low he must give the occupier notice "of the intended objection;" Then a little later: "When the "Assessment Committee are considering the rent which the hypo-"thetical tenant would give for the appellant's premises, any "evidence which is relevant to that question is in law admissible, "and it must depend on the circumstances of the case whether "evidence of the rateable value of premises which are said to be "in approximately the same position as the appellant's premises "is worth admitting or not. It is a question of degree. I confess "I do not quite appreciate the view taken by Salter J., that while "you may give evidence of the actual rent paid for the other "premises you may not give evidence of their rateable value. In "my opinion evidence of the rateable value must be admissible, "and for two reasons."; and then he cites again the passage which my Lord has already cited.

The only other observation I wish to make is this: Mr. Ashworth relied upon the Lands Tribunal Rules, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 2263), and in particular rule 31 (4) (ii) of those Rules.[8] It is to be observed that the whole of rule 31 is dealing generally with expert evidence, and Mr. Wingate-Saul reminded us from the section of the Act of the extraordinary width of the questions which the tribunal has on occasion to deal with. For example, in this rule there are references to claims for compensation in respect of minerals or disturbance of business, and so on. The rule is concerned with the number of expert witnesses who should be called, the restriction on the number to be called, the special [8] Lands Tribunal Rules, 1949, r. 31 (4): "Where more than one "party intends to call an expert wit-"ness, each such party shall . . . circumstances in which more than one may be called, and if evidence is going to be given of other land the necessity of giving notice, and so on. He relied further on section 32 referring to the power which is given to the tribunal to view the land in question and comparable land.

I do not think that Mr. Ashworth's argument is advanced very far merely by a consideration of the Rules. I think that his stronger ground is the general law as laid down in the Court of Appeal. The weight and cogency are not for us and I observe that the tribunal in the present case said: "The evidence of the opinions "of value of the expert witnesses called before me by the appel-"lants and by the respondents respectively, when considered in "the light of the other evidence received and of my own inspection "of the land and its neighbourhood, would be adequate to enable "me to arrive at a proper determination as to the development "value of the said interest in land." I can quite conceive of cases where the Lands Tribunal would say: "We cannot say that "this evidence is inadmissible. Strictly it is admissible, but it "is going to give very little assistance to me in the determination "of this case." The parties would thereupon probably say: "Very well; we will dispense with it." It happens not infrequently in the ordinary courts that counsel wants to submit some particular matter and the judge says: "I cannot exclude "it, but I do not think it will help me very much," and counsel almost invariably says: "I will not proceed with it." That is an entirely different matter.

I have some sympathy with the submission made by Mr. Wingate-Saul that if we were to decide that the evidence was admissible the parties ought not to be put to much further expense by having the case sent back. My Lord has pointed out that the moment we decide that the evidence is admissible it is impossible to avoid the formal order sending the case back, but in view of what Mr. Ashworth said yesterday, that the real point of this appeal was the determination of the point of admissibility, and no more, I anticipate that Mr. Wingate-Saul need have no fear about additional expense being laid upon him because of our decision. For these reasons I agree with the judgment which my Lord has already delivered.

Romer L.J. I also agree. The only issues which were before the Lands Tribunal to determine were, first, the restricted value of the hereditaments in question, and, secondly, the unrestricted value of those hereditaments. Mr. Wingate-Saul quite rightly said that no evidence should be admitted unless it was relevant to one or other or both of those issues. He conceded, and rightly, that evidence of sales effected of comparable land in the district would be admissible; and, indeed, it is clear to me that evidence of contracts for sale which for some reason or other had not been carried to completion would be equally admissible, and for this reason, that provided that the land is comparable land, if two parties have for any purpose of their own agreed upon its value that fact would surely be admissible whatever the purpose might be. It is said that this case is different because here the several claims which were put forward were as the result of an agreement between a third party and the Central Land Board itself. I can see no principle on which it can be excluded for that reason, although, of course, it would be a matter of weight to which the tribunal would have regard in assessing the value of the evidence.

It is to be further observed that if the occupiers managed to secure claims of this character which the board possess, they, the occupiers, could themselves, as I think, put them in as admissions by the Central Land Board if they thought they were likely to help their own case. For these reasons, and those which my brethren have given, I am clearly of opinion that these settled claims are admissible in evidence and, indeed, I think that to hold the contrary would be to run counter to the reasoning both of this court and the Divisional Court in the case to which my Lord referred. It is, of course, plain that the question of what weight, if any—and I advisedly say "if any" because some of the claims may be of no assistance—is to be attached to the claims is one solely and exclusively for the tribunal itself. I agree with the order which my Lord has proposed.

Question answered in negative.

On a charge against a husband of arson of his wife's property the wife is a competent witness to give evidence against him, by virtue of section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882; the provision therein is not restricted to offences under the Larceny Act, 1916.

Regina
v.
Moore.

Preliminary point on a trial on indictment.

The accused, Harry Moore, was charged on an indictment by the first count with arson contrary to section 2 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, the particulars being that on November 20, 1953, he maliciously set fire to a certain dwelling-house, namely, 293, Mount Street, Bradford [the property of and] in the occupation of Annie Moore—James Moore, Ann Moore and Edith May Moore being therein; by the second count with arson contrary to section 3 of the Act of 1861, the particulars being that on the same date he maliciously set fire to the dwelling-house with intent to injure or defraud; and by the third count with arson contrary to section 7 of the Act, the particulars being that on the same date he maliciously set fire to certain curtains [the property of the said Annie Moore] in the dwelling-house under such circumstances that, if the building had thereby been set fire to, the offence would amount to felony. The words in brackets were added by way of amendment after the ruling of Pearson J. on the admissibility of the evidence of the wife of the accused.

When the wife was called to give evidence for the prosecution counsel for the defence submitted that she was not a competent witness against her husband.

J. S. Snowden for the Crown.
Barry Payton for the accused.

Pearson J. In this case there is a preliminary question as to the admissibility of the evidence of Mrs. Moore, the wife of the accused, as a witness for the prosecution. She was called as a witness before the magistrates, so that her deposition is available. The prosecution is for arson, and the charges are under sections 2, 3 and 7 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861. It is argued on behalf of the defence that her evidence is not admissible because she is neither a competent nor a compellable witness. The prosecution, while not contending or conceding that her evidence is necessarily essential to their case, ask that the question may be decided. I am invited to assume that it is common ground that the house property which was either set on fire or was in danger of being set on fire was in a sense the property of Mrs. Moore because she held the lease or tenancy of it, so that the house would be her leasehold property.

The starting-point is the general rule which I take to be correctly set out in Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, 33rd ed., p. 497: "At common law, as a general rule, "the husband or wife of a prisoner is not a competent witness "for the Crown against the prisoner." From that general rule there are, first, certain exceptions at common law which are set out in the same edition of Archbold (pp. 497 and 498), but none of those exceptions is relied upon here. There are, however, certain statutory exceptions under section 4 (1) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, as it has been amended by subsequent Acts, and either or both of two of those are relied upon by the prosecution as applicable to this case. The first is section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which provides: "Every woman, "whether married before or after this Act, shall have in her own "name against all persons whomsoever, including her husband, "the same civil remedies, and also (subject, as regards her hus-"band, to the proviso herein-after contained) the same remedies "and redress by way of criminal proceedings, for the protection "and security of her own separate property, as if she were a "feme sole, but except as aforesaid, no husband or wife shall be "entitled to sue the other for a tort." In my view, the question falls to be decided mainly upon the wording of that main clause. The criminal proceedings here are to punish an alleged act of arson in respect of the wife's own separate property, as I assume it to be, and clearly, in my view, unless the scope of the words is restricted by some later part of the section, the words "have . . . the same remedies and redress by way of criminal "proceedings, for the protection and security of her own separate "property" are wide enough to cover this case. Obviously her property requires to be particularly secured against arson as well as against other offences.

It is contended by the defence that the section does not apply because this prosecution was not by Mrs. Moore, but on the facts before me that appears to be incorrect, because I have a recognizance by Mrs. Moore, the conditions being that she is to appear at the assizes and prefer or cause to be preferred a bill of indictment against the accused in respect of the offence in question, which is arson. So that on the facts it seems that this is a prosecution brought by her. It is also contended that the scope of this provision is restricted to offences of larceny and possibly other offences under the Larceny Act, 1916. The matters relied on for that contention on the part of the defence are, first, derived from further words in section 12: "In any "indictment or other proceeding under this section it shall be "sufficient to allege such property to be her property. . . ." That is not in fact alleged in terms in this present indictment, but that can be cured by an amendment. Although the indictment does not use the word "property," it does refer to this house being "in the occupation of Annie Moore." Then the section goes on: ". . . and in any proceeding under this section "a husband or wife shall be competent to give evidence against "each other, any statute or rule of law to the contrary notwith-"standing: Provided always, that no criminal proceeding shall "be taken by any wife against her husband by virtue of this Act "while they are living together, as to or concerning any property "claimed by her, nor while they are living apart, as to or con-"cerning any act done by the husband while they were living "together, concerning property claimed by the wife, unless such "property shall have been wrongfully taken by the husband

v.
Moore.

Pearson J.

"when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, his "wife."

The defence stress the wording "unless such property shall "have been wrongfully taken by the husband," which certainly tends to suggest that the subject-matter finally contemplated is an offence under the Larceny Act, or some similar offence, because the wording is "shall have been wrongfully taken" and not "shall have been wrongfully taken or set on fire." That is an argument which I think has some merit, but I do not think that one can assume that the scope of the exception is necessarily the same as the scope of the main clause. Prima facie, one would expect it to be rather less wide than the scope of the main clause. My view on that is that the main clause should have its proper effect according to the meaning of the words and should therefore include this case of arson.

The other matters relied on in support of that contention are, first, section 36 of the Larceny Act, 1916, which refers only to offences under that Act, but the answer seems to me to be that any section of the Larceny Act, 1916, could refer only to offences under that Act. The point would have been much stronger there if there had been some other Act relating to arson which did not contain some provision similar to section 36 of the Larceny Act, 1916, but I am not aware of any such Act relating to arson and no such Act has been cited to me. The present action is brought under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861. Secondly, a passage was cited to me from Rex v. Creamer,[1] which in terms refers only to larceny. Darling J., delivering the judgment of the court, said[2]: "At common law a wife could not "commit larceny of her husband's property, but by sections 12 "and 16 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, it was for "the first time made possible to prosecute a wife for stealing her "husband's goods. Those sections have been reproduced in "section 36 of the Larceny Act, 1916, which provides that no "proceedings under the Act shall be taken by a husband against "his wife while they are living together, nor while they are living "apart as to any act done by the wife while they were living "together, unless the property has been wrongfully taken by the "wife when leaving or deserting or about to leave or desert her "husband." But that case was concerned with an indictment for receiving certain money well knowing it to have been stolen, and I do not think that that passage in the judgment of the court contains any implication that the provision of section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is necessarily limited to larceny and kindred offences.

There was also cited to me a passage from Eversley on Domestic Relations, 6th ed. At p. 171 it says: "A special "exception was created by the Married Women's Property Act,

"1882, and the Married Women's Property Act, 1884, enabling "husband or wife to give evidence against each other, on the "prosecution of the one by the other for larceny of his or her "property committed on desertion." That sentence would certainly seem to be, or perhaps seem to convey, an implication that the scope of the provision is limited to matters of larceny only, but it is only a short sentence, and, at any rate, section 36 of the Act of 1916 would apply to more than cases of larceny as such. Once more, I think that one should come back in the end to the wording of the section itself. As I have said, the main provision primarily governs the decision, and I think that this case falls within that main provision.

There is a further question raised by the defence under section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The proviso states ". . . that no criminal proceeding shall be taken by any "wife against her husband by virtue of this Act while they are "living together . . ." The contention of the defence was that they were at the material time living together, or, at any rate, it has not been shown that they were at that time separated. That, of course, is primarily a question to be decided on the facts. The only evidence before me at present is that on the depositions, and I must decide it on those depositions. The effect of the depositions on my mind is that on a particular date the parties did separate, either because the husband deserted the wife or by the husband and the wife agreeing to live apart from that time onwards. After that, it would appear that the husband wished to come back or wished the wife to come back to him, but she refused. The question is whether the consortium ceased on the earlier date I have referred to. On the evidence which is now before me, I hold that the consortium did cease and, therefore, that part of the proviso is not applicable.

The prosecution rely on another statutory exception to the general rule which I have mentioned, and that is under the First Schedule to the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, because the Act of 1898 as amended refers to that schedule. The First Schedule to the Act of 1933 mentions a number of other offences under various sections, and then there is a general clause at the end: "Any other offence involving bodily injury to a child or "young person." The argument is that the charge in the present indictment is that the accused set fire to a certain house in which three children were at that time. It was suggested, therefore, that the offence charged was one which involved bodily injury to a child or young person. The wording of that last item I have mentioned tends to suggest that perhaps it should be read to some extent ejusdem generis to the offences which have been previously specified. I have looked at the sections referred to, in so far as they can be found, in Archbold, but I did not get much help from them one way or the other. I therefore think that it is reasonable to consider whether, within the meaning of those words, the offence charged does involve "bodily injury to a child or young person."

Pearson J.

It seems to me that the answer is "No," for this reason. The prosecution have to prove under that count two things: (1) that the accused set fire to the house; and (2) that at the time he set fire to the house certain persons were therein. If those two facts are proved the offence is made out, and it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove the "bodily injury to a child or young "person," nor, in the circumstances of this case, was it to be expected that bodily injury would be inflicted upon a child or young person, and the prosecution would be entitled to succeed even if the defence were able to establish that it was impossible that any injury would be inflicted upon any other person. That being the situation, under the first count I hold that the charge is not one which involves bodily injury to a child or young person within the meaning of that schedule.

For those reasons, under section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and section 4 (1) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, I hold that the evidence is admissible.

[Leave was given to amend the indictment as indicated previously in this report. The witness Annie Moore, on being recalled, declined to give evidence. After all the other evidence had been heard and his Lordship had summed up the accused was found Guilty on the first count.]

PRACTICE NOTE.

Habeas Corpus — Writ — Application by prisoner serving sentence — Conviction and sentence by competent court—Applicant lawfully in custody—No grounds for issue of writ.

On April 23, 1954, the applicant, William Corke, was convicted by a Bow Street magistrate on a charge of being a suspected person loitering with intent, and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment. He did not appeal against his conviction, but while serving his sentence forwarded to the court an affidavit asking for a writ of habeas corpus, his complaint being that he was wrongfully convicted or convicted on perjured evidence.

LORD GODDARD C.J. It is as well that persons serving sentences passed upon them by a competent court of summary jurisdiction should understand that habeas corpus is not a means of appeal. If they complain that they are wrongly convicted, they should appeal to quarter sessions. A person convicted by a competent court of summary jurisdiction cannot apply for a writ of habeas corpus. The affidavit here shows that the applicant is in prison serving a sentence passed by the Bow Street Magistrates' Court under the Vagrancy Act, 1824. It has always been the law as it was laid down by Wilmot C.J., in giving his opinion on the writ of habeas corpus,[1] that the writ is a writ of right and not a writ of course. That means that, before a writ can issue or leave can be given to apply for a writ, an affidavit must be before the court showing some ground on which the court can see that the applicant may be unlawfully detained.

In the present case, it is clear that, unless the conviction was set aside on appeal (and the time for appeal has long gone by), the applicant is lawfully in custody, serving a lawful sentence; and his application for a writ of habeas corpus is, therefore, refused.

Application refused.

* STEVENS v. STEVENS.

Court of Appeal—Evidence—Transcript—Reading by members of court out of court—Alternative use of judge's note—Saving of costs—R.S.C., Ord. 66A, rr. 3, 4.

Practice and Procedure—Trial—Parties seen by judge privately—Seen separately—Undesirability. Divorce.

A wife petitioned for divorce on the grounds of her husband's cruelty. The commissioner who heard the petition, after the close of the wife's case when the husband was giving evidence, adjourned and saw the wife and the husband separately in his private room with their counsel's consent with a view to effecting a reconciliation between them. The parties were not reconciled and the commissioner, after a three days' hearing, dismissed the petition. On the wife's appeal a transcript of all the evidence was made. With the parties' consent and in order to save time and to prevent the appeal standing over for a substantial period part heard, the members of the Court of Appeal read the transcript of the evidence themselves in private:—

Held, that, on the evidence, the wife's petition was rightly dismissed.

Per curiam. On an appeal advantage should be taken in appropriate cases of rule 3 of R.S.C., Ord. 66A, and the judge's note used on the appeal and the evidence not transcribed.

It would not be right as a common practice for the court to adjourn and read the transcript of the evidence for itself. If that were done, it might be thought that, having read the evidence and conferred privately together, the court had reached conclusions which it would be difficult to change, so that the decision would be come to, not on argument addressed in open court but on what had happened behind closed doors.

Excluding matters relating to infants and custody, which were in a class by themselves, it was not desirable that a judge, at any stage of the trial, should see the parties separately and individually. Where the judge desired to see the parties apart from their legal advisers, he should see them together.

Appeal from Judge Rewcastle, sitting as special commissioner.

The petitioner, Sylvia Stevens, sought a divorce on the ground of her husband Ronald Stevens's cruelty. The commissioner who tried the action, after hearing the wife's evidence and when the husband was giving evidence, adjourned and saw counsel in his private room and, with a view to effecting a reconciliation between the parties, subsequently saw the wife alone twice and the husband once. The efforts at reconciliation failed and after a three-day hearing the commissioner dismissed the wife's petition.

The wife appealed. A transcript of all the evidence was made for the Court of Appeal. When the appeal was opened it became clear that if counsel for the wife read all the evidence the appeal would not be concluded next day and the appeal would have to stand over for a substantial period. In these circumstances their lordships, with the parties' consent, agreed to read the transcript to themselves.

The grounds on which the wife claimed a divorce based on cruelty do not call for report.

J. L. Elson Rees for the wife.
John Perrett for the husband.

EVERSHED M.R. Before I give my judgment in this case, I wish to refer to the terms of Order 66A, which are not (I believe) always borne in mind. That order was made part of the Rules of the Supreme Court in 1940 and provided for the taking of what is called an "official shorthand note" of trials in the High Court, the payment of the fees required for taking the notes being paid out of public funds. Rule 4 of that order provides that any transcript required for the Court of Appeal—that is, of the evidence or judgment—of which a shorthand note has officially been taken, "shall be paid for by the appellant in the first "instance, and the costs thereof shall, unless the Court of "Appeal otherwise directs, be costs in the appeal." There are provisions for special cases of hardship, where the court is entitled to say that the costs of providing transcripts shall be at the public expense—that provision having, of course, been made before the Legal Aid scheme came into operation. But by rule 3 of the same order: "If the judge intimates that in the event of "an appeal his note will be sufficient, the shorthand note of the "evidence need not be transcribed for the purposes of an "appeal"; and by sub-rule (2): "If the parties agree or the "judge is of opinion that the evidence or some part of the "evidence of any witness or witnesses would, in the event of an "appeal, be of no assistance to the Court of Appeal, the short-"hand note of such evidence need not be transcribed for the "purposes of an appeal."

The taking of a shorthand note and its transcribing are skilled operations, and the costs of preparing the necessary transcripts for the Court of Appeal of the evidence in a trial which had lasted many days are, naturally enough, not inconsiderable. A party who is not affluent may find the burden of those costs severe. It seems to me sometimes to be assumed that, in all cases in which there is an appeal on questions of fact, the whole of the evidence must be transcribed as a matter of course. I am carefully avoiding making any special case of legal aid cases. It is a principle of the Legal Aid scheme that a legally-aided litigant shall, so far as possible, be in exactly the same position as what is called a dives litigant. Therefore, in his case, the same course is followed—a transcript is made.

I venture to call attention to rule 3 and to express the hope that advantage will, whenever appropriate, be taken of that rule to save the considerable costs of making these transcripts of evidence; adding that which is quite obvious, namely, that the costs incurred are not confined to the making of the transcript, but include the added costs occasioned by the extended character of the hearing in the Court of Appeal when these transcripts are read.

I refer again to what occurred yesterday, when we came to the conclusion (and I pointed out carefully that this was not to be taken as a precedent) that we would adjourn in order that we might read carefully for ourselves the whole of the transcript of the evidence, in order to save the time which would necessarily be taken if, as Mr. Elson Rees intimated to us would otherwise be necessary, the whole of the transcript would have to be read to us in court. I add one thing and that is this: one powerful reason why we took that special course in this case (with the consent of the parties and for the convenience of everybody, including the parties) was because, had it been necessary for this transcript to be read, it is quite clear that this case could not have been finished by the mid-day adjournment today; and, if it had not been so finished, the case would, for certain reasons, have had to go over possibly for a long period. That special circumstance is to be emphasized, because I am far from saying that it would be right, as a common practice, for the court to adjourn and read the transcript to itself. If that were done, it might be thought that the court, having read the evidence and conferred privately together, had reached conclusions from which it would be difficult to move them; so that the decision would be come to, not on argument addressed in open court, but on what had happened behind closed doors.

[His Lordship reviewed the evidence, and continued:] Without pursuing the matter at greater length, it is sufficient for me to say that, having carefully read the whole of the transcript and the correspondence, I can see no possible ground upon which the Court of Appeal, not having seen these witnesses, would be justified in saying that, contrary to the commissioner's impression of the witnesses and their credibility, we ought to hold a case of cruelty proved. I need not take up time by expounding what I mean by "a case of cruelty." The judge referred to the well-known passages in Asquith L.J.'s judgment in Buchler v. Buchler.[1] In order to establish cruelty it is necessary to go much further than merely to prove the kind of rough and tumble (if I may use that expression) which to some degree must be attendant upon any cohabitation by husband and wife.

I pass, therefore, to the second matter which Mr. Elson Rees has raised, which is this: the wife gave her evidence and was cross-examined and re-examined, further cross-examined and further re-examined. She was then supported by two other witnesses, and her case concluded somewhere during the latter part of the second day. Thereupon, the husband went into the witness box, was examined by his counsel Mr. Perrett, and at the end of the day for a short time he was cross-examined by Mr. Elson Rees. Judging from what I read in the shorthand note, the judge (even at that stage) was more than a little anxious about his condition and suggested that he might sit down, an invitation which the husband did not accept. On the third day, after the cross-examination had been resumed for a relatively short period, it became quite plain that the husband would require a rest. The court accordingly adjourned. According to the official note, the case was adjourned at 11 o'clock and not resumed until 12.40. It may be that that period of an hour and 40 minutes comprehends a very short resumption which is represented by some three or four questions.

But during that period of time, these further events also took place: first, the commissioner appears to have seen the two counsel and indicated to them the desirability, if possible, of effecting a reconciliation. Counsel would, as I understand it, have gladly assisted to that end if and so far as they respectively thought it practicable. Then, with the consent of counsel, the commissioner saw, individually and separately and without the presence of any of their legal advisers, the wife and the husband. Having done that, he again saw counsel. Finally, he saw the wife for the second time; and at the end of that second interview the wife (according to Mr. Elson Rees, and I think Mr. Perrett agrees) was seen to emerge from the commissioner's room in tears, whereas she had retained, I gather, a phlegmatic composure during her examination and cross-examination in court. At some stage (and Mr. Elson Rees's recollection is that it was on the second occasion when the commissioner saw Mr. Perrett and himself) the commissioner intimated in unmistakable terms that, having heard as much of the evidence as I have indicated, he was clearly of opinion that he could not find cruelty—that is, could not grant the relief which the wife sought—and he also intimated, as regards a defence of condonation which had been raised, that he was also unprepared to find condonation.

Having expressed that view, suspicion is understandable that, when the wife went again to the commissioner's room and came out in tears, she may have been given to understand by the commissioner that, as her husband was ready for a reconciliation, it would be all the worse for her if she was not similarly ready herself, because she was not going to obtain a decree. Mr. Elson Rees has not suggested that the commissioner used any sort of improper pressure, and he has not therefore said that this commissioner was guilty of any irregularity in his conduct of the case; but he has said that the effect of his seeing individually and separately the wife and the husband inevitably led, in the mind of his foreign client, to the suspicion which I have mentioned.

I am bound to say that in cases of this kind—I exclude matters relating to infants and custody, which are always in a class entirely by themselves—it is not desirable that a judge, at any stage of the trial, should see the two parties separately, by which I mean not only separately from their legal advisers but each individually and separately; because, however regular, discreet and proper the judge may be—and one may assume that he will be—the losing party will always be liable to feel that something occurred, when the judge was seeing either that party or the other, the one behind the back of the other, and not in open court, which affected the judge's conclusion; and it is, of course, of the essence of our system of administration of justice that it should be done openly and that things should not be done, as is said, behind closed doors, and particularly that there should not be communications passing between the judge and one party of which the other knows nothing.

I quite see that, in a case of this very special kind, where the judge has got so far in the case that he feels quite clear in his own mind that he will not be able to grant the relief which the petitioner seeks, the petitioner's case being wholly concluded, he might well feel that no harm could be done and that it was just possible that some good might emerge; but, without intending to reflect in any way upon the obviously patient conduct of this case by this commissioner, I think it better that, if the judge desires (as he well may, in order to effect a reconciliation) to see the parties apart from their legal advisers, he should see them together. Particularly in such cases as this, where the petitioner is not English by birth, this incident may have caused a suspicion to arise in her breast of the way in which the commissioner treated the case, which is unhappy and unfortunate.

I have referred to that matter and treated it as I have because, in the end of all, I am quite satisfied that the commissioner, having heard the witnesses, was amply entitled to conclude, as he did, that the wife had failed to establish the case she set out to establish. That being so, the question of condonation, of course, never arose, and I do not propose to take up time by referring to it; as the commissioner found (and, as it seems to me, on the material which we have, justifiably found) no cruelty proved, the result is that the petition was rightly dismissed and, in my judgment, there is no ground upon which we could disturb that finding. For these reasons, I think that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Master and Servant — Wages — Holidays with pay — "Worker" — "Employer"—Contract of service—Independent contractor—Degree of control — Whether person employed "worker" entitled to holidays with pay—Wages Councils Act, 1945 (8 & 9 Geo. 6, c. 17), ss. 10 (1), 16 (1), 23 (1)—Cutlery Wages Council (Great Britain) Wages Regulation (Holidays) Order, 1952 (S.I. 1952, No. 957), Schedule.

An "outworker" (so described) occupied as tenant part of the premises of a company of cutlery manufacturers, by whom he was supplied with basic materials for further processing under contracts under which he used his own methods, employed and paid employees as he chose who were in no way controlled by the company, bought his own tools and working materials, was paid a price fixed on the basis of quantities processed, and was free to work for others:—

Held, that the "outworker" was not a "worker" within the meaning of section 23 (1) of the Wages Councils Act, 1945, since he did not work under contract with an "employer." "Employer" within that definition presupposed that the "worker" should be an "employee," and the outworker did not work as a servant under a contract with an employer, but as an independent contractor under a contract or series of contracts with a customer, so that he was not a "worker" entitled to holidays with pay under the Act and regulations.

WITNESS ACTION.

An action, in the nature of a test case, was brought by Westall Richardson Ld. against Joseph Roulson to determine whether the defendant was a "worker" within the meaning of the provisions of the Wages Councils Act, 1945, and whether he or any person employed by him was "in the employment" of the plaintiffs for any purpose of that Act, the question at issue being whether or not the defendant was entitled to holidays with pay.

The plaintiff company carried on the business of a manufacturer of cutlery at Sheffield.

Since January 12, 1953, the defendant occupied a portion of a shop forming part of the company's factory, under a verbal weekly tenancy, at a rental of £2 10s. per week, covering power, heat and light and the hire of machinery, the property of the company, which was installed in the portion of the premises occupied by the defendant. The defendant carried on in that portion of the shop a process known as mirror polishing of cutlery and for that purpose employed persons varying in number, but, at the date of the writ, numbering seven women and two men.

From time to time the company (among other manufacturers) supplied the defendant with basic materials, such as blades, with or without handles, and carving forks, both of which had already undergone certain processes, for further processing or finishing by the defendant, and entered into contracts with the defendant on the terms customary in the cutlery industry, which were to the following effect: (i) that the defendant should process the basic materials supplied by the company using his own methods; (ii) that the defendant might employ in such processing and was responsible for and paid as many employees as he chose and neither the defendant nor any employee of his was in any way controlled by the company—in particular there was no control with regard to the number of hours worked or the wages paid or the period or periods within which such work was done by the defendant or his employees; (iii) that subject to the payment of any statutory remuneration fixed by any wages regulation order made under section 10 of the Wages Councils Act, 1945,[1] and allowing his said employees the holidays and the holiday remuneration fixed by the Cutlery Wages Council (Great Britain) Wages Regulation (Holidays) Order, 1952,[2] also made under section 10 of the said Act, the defendant might make his own terms of employment with his employees and that the company had no voice in the fixing thereof; (iv) that the defendant might carry out the said processes at that part of the company's premises of which he was the tenant or at such other place as he thought fit and was at liberty to subcontract; (v) that the defendant bought his own tools and working materials; (vi) that the price paid by the company for processing work done by the defendant was fixed by the piece on the basis of quantities processed and was quoted and fixed by reference to dozens; (vii) that the defendant was free to work or carry out processes for persons, firms or companies other than the company and was not obliged to work or carry out processes solely for the company; (viii) that the defendant was not obliged to give to the company any priority in point of time or otherwise over other persons, firms or companies for whom he might work; (ix) that the defendant should process goods for the company when and in what manner he chose and according to his own production methods without any supervision by the company; (x) that the company was entitled to deduct the rent of the shop from the agreed price of the goods manufactured for it by the defendant; (xi) that the company should make payment for goods processed on delivery after making deductions as hereinbefore stated; and (xii) that the company did not require the defendant to supply parts or materials for incorporation in any articles processed by the defendant.

It was stated in the statement of claim, and not denied, that the defendant was not assessed to income tax on the basis of P.A.Y.E., but under Schedule D, and rates of allowances for expenses were agreed by him with the Inland Revenue authorities without any reference to the company. Further, the defendant was not eligible for unemployment pay under the National Insurance Act, 1946, but was treated for the purposes of that Act as an employer. The defendant was also a self-employed person for the purposes of the said Act and paid for his own stamps and was responsible for the stamping of the cards of those employed by him and he was not an insured person for the purposes of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946.

It was further alleged that differences had arisen between the company and the defendant as to whether the company was obliged to pay to the defendant holiday pay in respect of annual holidays under the Cutlery Wages Council (Great Britain) Wages Regulation (Holidays) Order, 1952 (S.I. No. 957), Sch., Part III.

The issue raised was whether the defendant and his employees were "in the employment" of the plaintiffs and "workers" within the meaning of the Act and regulations.

May 27. VAISEY J. This action is said to be in the nature of a test case. While I can, of course, decide it as an issue between the plaintiff company and the defendant, I am not sure that what I say will afford any very clear guidance in other cases where the facts are not so similar as to be indistinguishable from the facts here. However, though I am doubtful whether I can formulate principles capable of other than limited application, there must be a good many cases very like this, which may well be governed by the judgment which I am now delivering.

The matter is concerned with a custom or practice in the cutlery trade as carried on at Sheffield, and the matter in dispute is as to the effect, if any, on the respective positions of the plaintiff company and the defendant of the provisions of the Wages Councils Act, 1945, to which I will refer as "the Act."

The plaintiff company carries on an extensive cutlery business at Sheffield, with the assistance of some eighty or ninety "in-" workers" and four or five "outworkers," and the defendant is in relation to that business one of that class of persons who are described as "outworkers." That class, however, appears to include persons who carry on their activities not in a uniform manner, but under a variety of conditions. In particular, an outworker may sometimes have a business which, in the strict sense, is a one-man business; that is to say, a business in which he, or sometimes it may be she, works alone as an individual. In other cases, such as the present, the outworker is the head of what I understand is called a "team"; and I think there may be a difference between the outworker who works alone and the outworker who works as leader of such a team. Again, different considerations may apply to the case of an outworker who is, so to speak, a "tied" outworker, equivalent to an inworker working out, acting exclusively for one cutlery firm or company, as contrasted with an outworker who habitually works for more than one such firm or company and might be described as a "jobbing" outworker.

But the facts in the present case are those with which I have to deal, and they are not in dispute. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:]

The "usual terms" obtaining in the present case are set out somewhat more elaborately in the statement of claim, and there is no dispute about them between the parties. One further term is pleaded by the defendant, which is, that it is a customary and implied term of the bargain between the parties that the defendant was required, or at least expected, personally to execute some work and to use his own manual labour in carrying out some of the processes under his contracts. It is certainly very significant that the defendant is assessed to income tax not on the basis of P.A.Y.E., but under Schedule D to the Income Tax Acts, and rates of allowances for expenses are agreed by him with the tax authorities without any reference to the plaintiff company. Moreover, the defendant is not eligible for unemployment pay under the National Insurance Act, 1946, but is treated for the purposes of that Act as an employer. Similarly, he is regarded for the purposes of that Act as a self-employed person and is not an insured person for the purposes of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946. I understand also that he is regarded as a self-employed person for the purposes of the National Health Act, 1946.

Now the question is whether the plaintiff company is, with regard to the defendant, liable to provide him with holidays and holiday pay under the Act and the Cutlery Wages Council (Great Britain) Wages Regulation (Holidays) Order, 1952, to which I will refer as "the regulation."

I must now turn to the provisions of the Act. It seems to me that the question in this case largely turns, or, it may be, wholly depends, on the definition of "worker" in section 23 (1) of the Act. [His Lordship read the definition, and continued:] If the defendant is a worker within the meaning of that definition, I do not doubt that he is an "outworker" within the meaning of that word as used in the cutlery trade in Sheffield. The definition seems to me to be not very easy to apply to the facts of the present case or, alternatively, it is perhaps not easy to see whether or not it is applicable. Clearly the defendant is a person who has entered into and works under a contract, but is that contract made with an employer? In other words, is this a contract between employer and employee, for I think that "an "employer," in the definition, necessarily presupposes an employee. The case of Lecture League Ld. v. London County Council,[1] proves, if proof were needed, that the word "employ- "ment" is one of very wide significance. But the words "employer" and "employee" are much more restricted in their meanings. Thus, I may be said to "employ" my time or my talents without being in any proper sense an employer, and I may also be said to be employed in some pursuit or activity without being an employee. Therefore, I ask: is the defendant an employee? If he is not, he must be, I suppose, an independent contractor and not under a contract of service, though working under "a contract personally to execute" some "work or "labour," the last word being, in my judgment, a noun and not a verb, though the language appears to me to be not very elegant on either view.

The problem seems to be this: Is the outworker defendant an employee or is he an independent contractor? It may be, though I do not wish to go beyond what I have to decide for the purposes of the present case, that an outworker working on his own account and without a team and working exclusively for a particular cutler might well be an employee, although equally an outworker as well; but in the present case the defendant is not in that position. He is a member and the head of his team; and on the whole it seems to me that he works not under a contract with an employer, but under a contract or series of contracts with a customer. I can imagine many cases on the borderline where it may be doubtful whether a particular outworker is on the roll of employees of a manufacturer of cutlery,

Westall Richardson Ld. v. Roulson.

or whether he is one who contracts with that firm or company independently and at arm's length. In the case of the defendant, in my judgment, while there may be (and, indeed, I think there is) some element of service or servitude in his position, there is a far greater element of independence and freedom. In the case of other individual outworkers, the balance may incline the other way.

If that is right, there seems to be no point in my referring particularly to the subsections of the Act to which my attention was drawn. As to section 16 (1), I think it is sufficient to say that it only operates where one can find an individual who is both a worker and an immediate employer, and the defendant here is not, in my judgment, such an individual. Section 13 (1) is covered by the same comment that there must be a worker and an employer before it applies.

Similarly, the regulation can apply only to a worker who has an employer and, therefore, only to an outworker who has an employer. I do not doubt that the regulation may apply to cases in which the conditions of the contract between the parties involve the relationship of employer and employee, but it is necessary first to discover the existence of such a relationship before any attempt can be made to apply the regulation. I suppose that there may be cases where it is difficult to say whether a particular individual is an inworker or an outworker, but I find no such difficulty in the present case. The decision in Templeton v. William Parkin & Co. Ld.[2] is certainly closely analogous to the present case, though it certainly does not, in my judgment, govern it. The "little master" in the cutlery trade has a position similar to but not identical with the outworker, and that decision related to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, which contains a definition of "worker" in terms which are by no means the same as those with which the present case is dealing.

My decision must be for the plaintiff company. It seems to me to be unnecessary to incorporate in the judgment the detailed declarations asked for in the statement of claim, and that it will suffice for me to declare that the relationship between the plaintiff company and the defendant is outside and is not affected by the provisions of the Act.

Practice and Procedure — Trial — Right to open — Registered design— Action to restrain threats—Threats admitted by defendants—Defence of infringement—Counterclaim.

In an action to restrain the defendants from threatening proceedings for infringement of a registered design, the defendants, by their defence, alleged that the plaintiffs had infringed their copyright in that design and counterclaimed for an injunction restraining them from so doing. At the opening of the case by counsel for the plaintiffs counsel for the defendants intervened and conceded that the documents relied on as constituting threats were written by the defendants and amounted to threats. He then applied to the court for a direction that he had the right to open the matter arising on the remaining issues:—

Held, that the duty of the court, in dealing with an application of this kind, was to consider what was the fair mode of trying that which was shown to be the substantial matter, i.e. (having regard to the admissions offered on behalf of the defendants) the question of infringement; that complete freedom should be given to counsel for the plaintiffs to conclude his opening, so far as concerned the claim, and to direct the attention of the court to the appropriate order that should follow from those admissions made on behalf of the defendants; but that, in so far as any question arose about infringement, that was a matter on which counsel for the defendants would be entitled to be called on on their behalf.

ACTION.

In an action to restrain the defendants from threatening, by letters, circulars or otherwise, the plaintiffs, their customers or agents with proceedings for infringement of a registered design, the defendants by their defence, alleged that the plaintiffs had infringed their copyright in that design and counterclaimed for an injunction restraining them from so doing. At the opening of the case by counsel for the plaintiffs counsel for the defendants intervened and conceded that the letters relied on as constituting threats were written by the defendants and amounted to threats within the meaning of section 26 of the Registered Designs Act, 1949. Cases referred to in argument: Lewis Falk Ld. v. Jacobwitz *; Pontifex v. Jolly †; Pearson v. Holden.‡

Lloyd-Jacob J. At quite an early stage in these proceedings it becomes necessary to give a ruling as to the manner in which the future conduct of this case shall be determined. Mr. Mould, for the plaintiffs, was in process of opening his case on the pleadings, as they stand, when Mr. Shelley intervened and conceded on behalf of the defendants that the letters relied on as constituting threats, on which the action is based, were written by the defendants; and he also conceded that they amounted to threats within the meaning of section 26 of the Registered Designs Act, 1949.

In those circumstances, as I understand the matter, the plaintiffs would be entitled to invite me to enter judgment for them on the claim, though that judgment, of course, would not be effective until the matters raised in the remainder of the pleadings had been considered. Accordingly Mr. Shelley invites me to direct that the right to continue to open the remaining matters in dispute—namely, the counterclaim, and what I am told is a further counterclaim to the counterclaim—should rest in him.

Counsel have directed my attention to a number of authorities, and I will review them shortly. Precisely the same point appears to have fallen for decision before Morton J. in Lewis Falk Ld. v. Jacobwitz,[1] the only difference being, as I understand it, that the admissions as to the responsibility for the letters, and to the fact that they constituted a threat, were conceded in the pleadings and not at the bar; and Mr. Mould invites me to regard that as a sufficient differentiation to justify me in arriving at the contrary conclusion.

Mr. Mould referred to Pontifex v. Jolly,[2] a decision of Alderson B. That case has not been very fully reported, but it appears to indicate that in that action the defendant had relied on four grounds of defence, two at least of which could properly have formed the subject-matter of a counterclaim. When the action came on for hearing, the defendant made admissions as to the first two grounds (which he had alleged by way of defence) and claimed the right to begin, a right which could only properly vest in him if the court was prepared to treat the remaining paragraphs in the defence as substantial paragraphs in a counterclaim. Alderson B. refused the application, as I apprehend, for the very good reason that the court would not exercise its discretion to permit amendments of pleadings of that character merely for the purpose of assisting a party to procure an advantage such as the right to open the case.

In my view, that is not an authority which really helps me in the present case; and I find far greater guidance from an extract from the judgment of Brett L.J. in Thomson v. South Eastern Railway Co.,[3] which is quoted in the judgment of Wynn-Parry J. in Pearson v. Holden.[4] There that renowned Lord Justice puts the matter in a perfectly simple form. He says that the duty falling on the court is to consider "what is the fair mode of trying "that which is shewn to be the substantial matter." Having regard to the admissions offered by counsel for the defendants in the present case, the "substantial matter" before the court is the determination of the issues set out in the counterclaim, as to whether or not the plaintiffs have infringed the registered design of the defendants.

In those circumstances I think that my duty is to indicate that Mr. Mould, for the plaintiffs, has complete freedom to conclude his opening, so far as concerns the claim, and to direct my attention (if he thinks it useful at this stage) to the appropriate order that should follow from these admissions; but that in so far as any question arises about infringement, that is a matter on which Mr. Shelley would be entitled to be called on on behalf of the defendants.

Electricity — Regulations — Electricity supply — Fault in consumer's installation — Liability of suppliers — Failure to test earthing arrangements before commencing to give supply—Electricity Supply Regulations, 1937, reg. 27 (a).
Negligence—Dangerous thing.

An electrical contractor installed at the plaintiff's house an electric boiler together with a new circuit, but failed to provide a fully efficient earthing system for the circuit. The electricity board connected up the new circuit to their supply but before so doing, although they carried out certain tests, they did not test to ascertain whether or not the earthing system was adequate. About three months after its installation the insulation of the boiler became defective with the result that electricity escaped into the metal shell and gave the plaintiff's wife an electric shock from which she died. If there had been a proper earthing system no accident would have happened.

Sellars
v.
Best.

In an action by the plaintiff claiming damages as a result of his wife's death the first defendant was, on the facts, found to have been guilty of want of care in installing the boiler, but as regards the liability of the second defendants:—

Held, that regulation 27 (a) of the Electricity Supply Regulations, 1937, imposed no obligation on the second defendants to carry out any inspection or test of the new installation before commencing to give a supply of electrical energy; that, on the facts, they did not assume any obligation to the plaintiff's wife; and that to say that before carrying out the potentially dangerous operation of sending electricity into the new installation they should make sure that the electrical equipment was prepared to receive it would be carrying their tortious liability too far. Therefore, the second defendants were not liable to the plaintiff.

Action.

The plaintiff, Lawrence Sellars, claimed damages as administrator of the estate of his wife, Mary Sellars, deceased, against the first defendant, Lawrence William Best, under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, for the benefit of her estate for her diminished expectation of life, and under the Fatal Accidents Acts for her funeral expenses, and he also claimed for his own benefit damages for the loss of his wife's consortium, including her servitium. He alleged failure of the first defendant to exercise reasonable care and skill in carrying out a contract with the plaintiff to instal an electric boiler. Against the second defendants, the North Eastern Electricity Board, the plaintiff claimed similar damages under the same Acts for their negligence and breach of statutory duty under regulation 27 of the Electricity Supply Regulations, 1937.

The plaintiff's wife died through electrocution on August 11, 1952, when she received a violent electric shock from an electric boiler in the house at Newton-on-Rawcliffe near Pickering where she and the plaintiff lived. The cause of the accident was, first, the deficiency of the earthing system of the boiler and, secondly, defective insulation between the heating element and its metal shell which occurred about three months after its installation.

In May, 1952, the first defendant, who was an electrical contractor, supplied and installed the boiler on the plaintiff's instructions. He also installed a 15 ampere socket outlet with a three-pin plug for the boiler, together with a new circuit, but he did not connect this circuit to the electricity board's mains supply. In addition to two small holes to take the phase wire pins the socket contained a larger hole for the earthing arrangements consisting of an earthing line which, in the event of an escape of electricity, would carry off the electricity, causing the fuse to give way and so isolate the circuit in which the fault had arisen. The earthing line was run to a small stake about 18 inches long placed in the earth outside the front door of the house. Although in some weather conditions, if the earth was very wet, this earthing arrangement would be sufficient, in dry or very frosty weather it would be inadequate. The first defendant, although he made certain tests, did not make any test to ascertain the capacity of the earthing system. If there had been a proper earthing system no accident would have happened. In due course the board connected up the ends of the new circuit to their supply of electricity.

John McLusky for the plaintiff.

Ernest Ould for the defendant Best.

Geoffrey Veale Q.C. and G. Norman Black for the defendant board.

The following case, in addition to those quoted in the judgment, was cited in argument: Hartley v. Mayoh & Co.[1]

PEARSON J. stated the facts summarized above, considered the liability of the defendant Best and the Regulations for the Electrical Equipment of Buildings issued by the Institution of Electrical Engineers and the evidence of the practice in the district, and held that the defendant Best, in addition to his contractual obligation to the plaintiff to instal the boiler in a reasonable and proper manner so as to make it safe, also had a common law duty to use reasonable care to the plaintiff's wife, who would be a person likely to use the boiler. His Lordship continued: It must be held that the first defendant was liable for breach of contract to the plaintiff and also failed to perform the duty of care which he owed to Mrs. Sellars.

I pass to the more difficult problem as to the situation of the board in these matters. They connected up the loose ends, sometimes called "tails," to their own meter. It has been pointed out that the board is a seller of electricity, and the delivery of the electricity is effected at the terminal or supply points, which are situated approximately at the meter. Up to those supply points everything belongs to and is under the control of the board. Beyond that point, generally speaking, everything belongs to and is under the control of the consumer. The board carried out a test for leakage, but they did not test to ascertain whether the earthing system was adequate or not. It is reasonably plain that if they had done so they would have found that the system was inadequate, steps would have been taken and this accident would not have happened. The whole problem is whether they owed an obligation to Mrs. Sellars to make sure that the earthing system was adequate.

The board's obligation to give a supply of electricity is contained in section 27 of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, which has been applied to the board by a provision of the Electricity Act, 1947. It is sufficient to say that section 27 imposes an obligation on the undertakers to give a supply upon being required to do so, although that is subject to certain conditions.

Sellars v. Best.

Pearson J.

Regulation 25 of the Electricity Supply Regulations, 1937, provides: "(a) The undertakers shall be responsible for all electric "lines and apparatus placed by them on the premises of a "consumer and either belonging to the undertakers or under their "control (whether forming the whole or part of the consumer's "installation or not) being installed and maintained in a safe "condition and suitable for their respective purposes and being "so fixed and protected as to prevent so far as is reasonably prac-"ticable leakage to any adjacent metal." That regulation tends to suggest that there is not the same responsibility for electric lines and apparatus which have been placed on the consumer's premises by someone else or which do not either belong to the undertakers or come under their control. So the ordinary principle that responsibility is based upon ownership or control seems prima facie to apply here.

Regulation 26 provides: "The undertakers shall not per-"manently connect a consumer's installation with their electric "lines unless they are reasonably satisfied that the connection, "if made, would not cause a leakage from the consumer's instal-"lation exceeding [a certain fraction]." The wording there is to impose a definite prohibition. Under that regulation, if the undertakers do make the connection without being reasonably satisfied, they commit an offence, as appears from regulation 39, and they would be liable to a penalty for default. When we come to regulation 27 the wording is changed. That regulation provides: "(a) The undertakers shall not be compelled to "commence or, subject to the provisions of regulation 32, to "continue to give a supply of energy to any consumer unless they "are reasonably satisfied in respect of the consumer's installa-"tion—(i) That all conductors . . . are constructed installed and "protected so as to prevent danger so far as is reasonably "practicable; . . . (ii) That every distinct circuit is protected "against excess energy by means of a suitable fusible cut-out. . ."

Regulation 32 provides for the "Discontinuance of supply in "certain circumstances," and paragraph (a), sub-paragraph (v) provides: "Where in pursuance of this regulation the undertakers "have discontinued the supply of energy to the consumer's instal-"lation or any part thereof, the undertakers shall not recommence "the supply of energy until they are reasonably satisfied [in "certain respects]." It seems clear that regulation 27 (a) has been very carefully drawn and that it would be wrong to assume that the variation in the opening words of that regulation as compared with regulations 25 (a), 26 and 32 (a) (v), is merely per incuriam. The effect of regulation 27 (a) is simply this, that the obligation to supply which was imposed by section 27 of the Act of 1899 is here being made subject to a condition that, although under section 27 they would be normally under obligation to supply, this regulation is saying that they shall not be compelled to commence or continue to give a supply unless they are reasonably satisfied. If they do give a supply without being satisfied they commit no offence under this regulation. If they commence to give a supply or continue to give a supply having satisfied themselves with a merely cursory inspection they still commit no offence. It seems to me that there is no obligation under this regulation to carry out any inspection or testing at all. Their power is only to refuse to give a supply. Strictly speaking, they have no power to insist on inspecting and testing any apparatus. It is open to the consumer to say: "I do not wish to have "my installation inspected and tested by you. I will not take any "supply. I will provide my own supply." If the consumer says that, then there is no power under regulation 27 to insist upon an inspection to test it. I feel that regulation 27 is drafted with a view not to impose upon the board a responsibility in respect of what the occupier by himself and his contractors and other agents may have done or omitted to do to his own chattels upon his own premises, because that form of wording is very noticeable—"The "undertakers shall not be compelled . . . to give a supply." So that it seems to me that the regulations afford no cause of action to the consumer or to the consumer's wife.

Interesting arguments have been presented by Mr. Ould on behalf of the defendant Best, but in effect supporting the plaintiff against the board, and by Mr. McLusky for the plaintiff, seeking to impose upon the board an obligation towards Mrs. Sellars. It is not at all, in my view, like the cases in which the board have themselves antecedently done something wrong, such as mixing up the two wires, putting the neutral wire where the phase wire should be and vice versa. They have not at any stage done anything wrong as regards the installation. The only omission relied upon is the omission to test for the adequacy of the earthing system. That case could be put in a different way. The plaintiff could say that he relies on the fact of the board having supplied electricity for use in this boiler without having first taken all reasonable steps to satisfy themselves that it was in a fit state to receive an electric current safely. The question is whether it is right to assume that the board undertake any such obligation towards, not merely the consumer, but some other person who is likely to use the electrical equipment in question.

One of the arguments is that the board indicate that they are going to test the equipment, because the contractor, according to the usual system of the board, gave to the board a notice to test the installation. The form was produced addressed to the board and signed by the contractor, giving the board notice that a certain installation was now complete. It states: "Please "inspect and test the same" on a certain date. It may be that the consumer should be deemed to know what his contractor has done and that the board have been asked to and do test the installation. That still leaves unspecified how comprehensive the test is going to be and what it is going to be a test for. There is the obligation on the electricity suppliers, in this case the board, under regulation 28 not to connect the consumer's installation

v.
Best.

with their electric lines until they are satisfied that the connection would not cause an undue leakage from the consumer's installation. But there is nothing in this form to show what kind of test that is. Equally, having regard to the evidence as to the board's practice in the area in which this house was comprised, there is nothing to show that they would carry out a comprehensive test. On the contrary, the evidence is the other way, that they did not carry out what may be a comprehensive test in this district.

There is this further difficulty. If the case is put on the ground of the board having undertaken or assumed to carry out testing, and thereby they misled people into thinking that their test would be comprehensive and adequate to ensure against any unsafe feature of the installation, the question then arises: To whom did they undertake? To whom did they make that assumption? It is founded upon some sort of assumpsit, using the technical phrase. It still remains to inquire to whom it was made. It might have been made to the plaintiff, as the intending consumer and the person asking for the supply, but there is no evidence that Mrs. Sellars knew anything about what the contractual arrangements were as between her husband and the suppliers.

On those two grounds I am unable to see how liability can be possible for the reason that they did in fact carry out some sort of test. The argument was that they must either do it in whole or not at all. If they do not carry out any test then they are not responsible, and if they carry out a test they are bound to carry out a complete and adequate one. That begs the question, "What is the test for; what is it meant to do?" It may be only a test under regulation 26. Without more evidence I do not think that it is possible to say that any obligation was assumed by the defendant board towards Mrs. Sellars.

The other way of putting the argument is that the board, as it is said, unleash this dangerous substance, electricity, by sending it along their wires and through the connection which they have made in this house into the installation which is there. Before they carry out that potentially dangerous operation they should make sure that in fact it will be safe, because the electrical equipment in the house is fully prepared to receive it. That is a possible argument, but I think that it is too difficult to define the obligation, where it begins and where it ends, because the supply of electricity is a continuing operation. It may go on for years, and it is difficult to see any reason why it can be confined to the moment of first giving the supply. Is it sufficient for the electricity board to be satisfied at the moment when they commence to supply electricity, and then do they cease to have any responsibility for the subsequent maintenance? It is difficult to define it in a different respect. How far does it go? Must they re-do all the work which the electrical contractor has done—dig up the wires to see that they are sound, test the steelwork of the boiler and test the insulation and test everything? Is it possible to confine the so-called comprehensive test within any reasonable bounds at all? I think that there is too much uncertainty there, and the more reasonable principle is that the board are responsible for what they themselves do and what they themselves have control over.

The board are responsible for bringing the electricity along their own lines, and for making and continuing to have, it may be, a proper connection at the terminal supply points. Then, if they have installed and they still have control of some electrical equipment on what is called the consumer's side by virtue of that installation and continuing control they would be responsible for that also. It seems to me too much to say that the board are responsible for what the occupier by himself and his contractors and agents may have done or omitted to do to his own chattels on his own premises. That is carrying the kind of tortious liability which is envisaged in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1] too far, and it cannot be held to apply here. For those reasons I hold that the board are not liable to the plaintiff, but I hold in favour of the plaintiff against the first defendant.

As to the measure of damages under the first head under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, I award the sum of £400. Under Lord Campbell's Act the agreed sum is £30 6s. With regard to the claim for breach of contract by the plaintiff against the first defendant in respect of the loss of consortium of the wife there was no evidence here to show any actual pecuniary loss or expense arising to the husband by reason of his wife's death. I have had regard to what was said in Best v. Samuel Fox & Co. Ld. [2] in the House of Lords. I am not sure whether in those circumstances the proper result is that there should be merely nominal damages in the sense of a sum of 40s., or whether it is permissible and right to award something more than that by way of mere general damages for loss of consortium. I think that the second is the true view; but although no large sum should be awarded in the absence of proof of financial damage I think that the proper view is that it can be more than a nominal sum, and I award £100.

Judgment for the plaintiff against the first defendant for £530 6s.
Judgment for the second defendants against the plaintiff.

Ecclesiastical Law — Faculty — Armorial bearings — Royal arms — Introduction into church—Whether consent of bearer necessary.

On the hearing of unopposed petitions for the grant of a faculty for the introduction into the church of various forms of decoration including a number of heraldic devices:—

Held, (i) that the introduction of the royal arms, signifying the royal supremacy, was a matter within the discretion of the consistory court, and that so long as the Crown claimed supremacy in the established church, it was unreasonable that the Crown should object to the badge of that supremacy being displayed: In re the Parish Church of West Tarring (post, p. 923) followed;

(ii) that the use for decorative purposes of the first quarter of the royal arms as a device signifying the kingdom of England involved different considerations, and that the consent of their bearer, the Sovereign, should be sought;

(iii) that the arms of the borough of Battersea and of the London County Council could be introduced, both bodies having consented to such use;

(iv) that no consent was necessary for the use of either the arms of the diocese or the arms of the province, or St. George's Cross, signifying the Church of England.

Unopposed petition for a faculty.

The churchwardens and secretary of the parochial church council sought a faculty to cover a number of items connected with the decoration of the church, the proposals having the support of the whole of the parochial church council and of the diocesan advisory committee. The only matters which came to be considered in open court were the proposals to introduce certain heraldic devices, namely, the royal arms signifying the royal supremacy, to be displayed on the organ loft, and six decorative shields to be displayed in the chancel, three on either side of the altar.

The petitioners appeared in person.

Garth Moore Ch. stated the facts, and continued: One of the proposals is to place the royal arms on the organ loft in a place associated by tradition with the display of such arms, signifying the royal supremacy. It is also proposed to place in the chancel six decorative shields displaying the following arms:—The arms of the kingdom of England, by which is meant what is now the first and fourth quarter of the royal arms, but was once borne alone by the Sovereign; the arms of the Church of England, by which is meant St. George's Cross; the arms of the borough of Battersea wherein the church is situated; the arms of the county of London, of which Battersea forms part; the arms of this diocese of Southwark, and the arms of this province of Canterbury. With this variety of subjects the case presents a convenient opportunity to consider the principles on which faculties should be granted for the introduction of heraldic emblems into a church.

So far as royal arms are concerned, I should have granted a faculty without more ado had it not been for the attitude adopted by the Home Office towards such applications. On April 2, 1953, that department circularized all diocesan registries claiming that the royal arms, the royal crown and the royal cypher are the personal emblems of the Sovereign and may not be reproduced without the Queen's consent, and that application for that consent should be made to the Secretary of State for Home Affairs. That circular began a considerable correspondence between the Home Office and various persons, including myself and Chancellor Macmorran; but, since the Crown is not represented here today, I intend to say no more about it, save that at no time has the Home Office produced any authority in support of its claim.

As I am aware, however, of the attitude of the Home Office, I have made it a practice of this court that notice of every petition to introduce the royal arms should be given to that department, so that the Crown may have an opportunity of entering an appearance and arguing both its right to appear and, if that is granted, the substance of its claim. That course has been taken in this case, but neither in this case nor in any other has advantage been taken of this opportunity, and no argument in support of the contentions of the Home Office has been presented to the court. These are judicial proceedings and the petitioners are entitled to have their case heard on its merits in open court, and as that case is unopposed I must decide it as best I can. Although unassisted by argument I have considered carefully the principles on which applications for armorial bearings should be treated.

There is in England—though not, I believe, in Scotland—so far as I know no legally recognized proprietary right in heraldic emblems. I carefully refrain from stating the matter more dogmatically than that, for it may still be a matter for argument before the Court of Chivalry. But, on that assumption, no one has an absolute right to prohibit the use of his arms, and it is a matter of discretion for the consistory court whether or not to grant applications for the introduction of heraldic emblems.

In general, I should be slow to grant such an application where a reasonable objection could be made by or on behalf of the bearer of those arms, and I shall in future normally require notice of any petition for the introduction of heraldic emblems to be given to the bearers of those emblems, at any rate where it appears to me that an objection could be reasonably entertained. In the present case, I have a number of emblems to consider and I do not think that any single principle covers them all.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, BATTERSEA, In re.

Garth Moore Ch.

First, there are the royal arms, not as pure decoration, but to be so placed as to signify the royal supremacy. The royal arms have been so displayed in churches now for about four centuries. There is ground for thinking that their introduction has sometimes been enforced at the instigation of the Crown. The matter has always been within the faculty jurisdiction of the consistory court and has never till 1953, so far as I know, been treated as the concern of the Home Office. But, in any event, their presence in a church, in the manner desired in this case, seems to me to be on a par with their presence in a court of law. In both cases it signifies the highest temporal authority. So long as the Crown claims supremacy in the established church, it seems to me to be unreasonable that it should object to the badge of that supremacy being displayed. It is as though a principal were to seek to disavow his agent while actively taking all the advantages which that agency confers. For this reason, though for a time at least I shall continue the practice of requiring notice of these applications to be served on the Home Office so that the Crown may continue to have an opportunity of appearing and arguing its case, until some valid argument is presented which will persuade me that these applications should not be granted, I shall in the absence of special circumstances grant them as I grant this one.

This is what I have done in the past and I am fortified in my view by the recent judgment of Macmorran Ch., delivered in the consistory court of Chichester, in In re the Parish Church of West Tarring,[1] where identical considerations arose. I adopt the reasoning of that judgment, with which I respectfully agree.

With regard to the so-called arms of the kingdom of England, however, different considerations arise. It is true that they are the arms of the Sovereign and part of the royal arms commonly borne by the Sovereign today. But the petitioners do not seek their introduction in order to signify the royal supremacy, nor are they in this form commonly associated with that signification. They are in this case sought as part of a general decorative scheme. Their use in the circumstances strikes me as harmless and appropriate, but the consent of their bearer, that is, the Sovereign, has not been given or, indeed, sought, and on the principle which I have enunciated, I think that this should be a condition precedent to their introduction. I shall, therefore, adjourn this part of the application so as to enable the petitioners to seek the permission of the Sovereign through the proper constitutional channels. They will have liberty to apply again to this court and, if the Sovereign's permission is given, I shall include these arms in the faculty which will issue. If permission is refused, I shall sympathetically consider any application, whether for consequential variation or otherwise, which the petitioners may make.

With regard to the arms of the borough of Battersea and of the London County Council, both those bodies have sensibly and reasonably signified their consent to the use of their arms and I give leave for their introduction.

With regard to the arms of the diocese and the arms of the province, no permission for their introduction has been sought; but the church is part of the diocese and of the province, and I cannot conceive the refusal of consent or any reasonable grounds on which such refusal could be based. I, therefore, grant permission for their introduction.

With regard to St. George's Cross these arms, so far as I am aware, do not in any sense belong to anybody. Among other uses to which they are put is that of signifying the Church of England. I see no reason, therefore, why they should not be introduced and I give permission for their introduction.

I hope that what I have said may be of assistance to others in the diocese as an indication of the principles upon which, as at present advised, similar applications will be considered by this court; but it should be remembered that this petition concerns only the introduction of armorial bearings into a church. I am expressing no view about what might happen in different circumstances. The flying of flags or the display of banners, for example, may well call for a different treatment, and what that treatment should be still falls to be decided.

Faculties decreed accordingly.

Ecclesiastical Law—Faculty—Armorial bearings—Royal arms—Introduction into church—Whether permission of Her Majesty necessary before issue of faculty.

Petition for a faculty.

On March 30, 1953, the rector and churchwardens of the parish of West Tarring in the diocese of Chichester issued a petition asking for a faculty to authorize the display of the royal arms over the vestry door in the parish church. The petition was supported by the unanimous resolution, dated March 5, 1953, of the parochial church council, and on April 10, 1953, was approved by the diocesan advisory committee. A citation in the usual form was issued from the registry on May 5, and duly returned on May 11. No appearance in opposition was entered.

The petitioners appeared in person.

WEST TARRING (RECTOR AND CHURCHWARDENS), In re.

KENNETH MACMORRAN Ch. stated the facts, and continued: The present petition is for the display of the royal arms on the wall of the church. It is not a proposal to use the arms or any other royal emblem for mere artistic embellishment, as for example, in a stained glass window. It is simply to implement the desire to display the royal arms as such, and it is stated that the petition is the outcome of a loyal desire on the part of the petitioners to commemorate Her Majesty's coronation.

The petition is dated March 30, and the registrar received a circular letter from the Home Office, dated April 2, 1953, in the following terms: "Dear Sir, An instance has recently come to our notice of the reproduction of the royal arms in a new stained glass window in a church, and we have reason to believe that the position regarding the reproduction of the arms and other royal emblems may not be fully appreciated. The position is that the royal arms, the royal crown and the royal cypher are the personal emblems of the Sovereign and may not be reproduced, in whole or in part, without the Queen's consent; such consent is also necessary in the case of emblems of past sovereigns. The Home Secretary is the Minister who advises Her Majesty on such matters, and application for permission should be made to him. Permission is, in fact, granted only in very exceptional circumstances, but where, for example, it is desired to instal a stained glass window in a church in commemoration of a particular Sovereign or of a State occasion such as a coronation, it may be possible for the Home Secretary to recommend the grant of permission to reproduce the personal cypher of the Sovereign. . . . We would mention also that the rules governing the reproduction of royal emblems apply equally to the special versions drawn by Mr. Milner Gray for the Council of Industrial Design for use on coronation souvenirs."

I wrote a letter to the Home Secretary on April 20, to which I had a reply dated May 29, expressing the Home Office view as follows: "The Home Secretary appreciates that the arms of previous Sovereigns are displayed in many parish churches, and he would not wish to raise any objection to the renewal or restoration of existing coats of arms. It appears, however, that the practice has very largely fallen into desuetude during the past hundred years, and the Home Secretary does not feel that the existence of this practice should be regarded as overriding the general consideration that since the royal arms and other emblems are personal to Her Majesty, it is only proper that her consent should be obtained for their reproduction in any form. It is observed that the applications to which you refer in your letter of May 4 both relate to proposals to place the royal arms in churches in commemoration of the coronation, and the Home Secretary feels that in these circumstances the application ought to be dealt with as applications for a new use of the royal arms rather than as a revival of the practice of exhibiting royal arms in churches." It seems to me that the view expressed in the earlier circular letter has been modified, as the point is taken for the first time that the long-established custom to which I had referred "has very largely fallen into desuetude during the past hundred years."

I am therefore confronted with the claim by a government department that the royal arms may not be displayed in a parish church without the Home Secretary's consent, in spite of the fact that, as I read the law, the authority to decide whether any furniture or ornament is to be admitted to consecrated buildings is the ecclesiastical court. In my view, therefore, the opinion of the circular letter I have quoted above is an unwarranted interference by a department of State with a court of competent jurisdiction.

Nevertheless, I have been anxious throughout these proceedings that the view expressed by the Home Office on the merits of the case should be fully investigated and, accordingly, I caused to be served on the Home Secretary on March 12, 1954, a copy of the original citation in this case, with an intimation that if he wished to oppose the petition and would enter an appearance, I was prepared to hear him on the question whether he had such an interest as entitled him to appear, and, if that question was decided in his favour, on the merits of the case. On March 19 a letter in reply was addressed to the registrar in the following terms: "With reference to your letter of March 12, regarding the proposal to "display the royal arms in West Tarring Parish Church, I am writing "to say, that as you will appreciate, the question of the issue of a "faculty is not one which concerns the Home Secretary, who is, however, "responsible for advising the Queen on applications for permission to "use Her Majesty's personal arms." The petition in this case, therefore, remains what it has always been, an unopposed petition; and I must decide it as best I can.

The textbooks are not particularly helpful, but I may quote as an example Cripps, Law Relating to Church and Clergy (7th ed., p. 406), where the following passage occurs: "Thus there can be no doubt as to "the legality of the following: Galleries erected in the church, bells "other than that necessary to ring to church and to toll at funerals as "before mentioned, organs, clock chimes; the king's arms which are "very commonly set up in churches, pulpit cloths, houseling cloths, "cushions or mats, furniture for the vestry, prayer and hymn books." This statement, which has the authority of the late Chancellor Lawrence and the late Sir Stafford Cripps, is reproduced in the eighth edition edited by myself, and there are similar statements in other of the earlier textbooks. I am informed by the Chancellor of the Diocese of Southwark that in a case in his court, the Home Secretary was given the opportunity to appear but did not avail himself of it, and that in that case the faculty was granted.

I now come to consider the merits of the case. The royal arms may, it is said by the Home Office, be lawfully displayed to mark the presence of the Sovereign. That may be a confusion with the use of the royal standard with which at present I am not concerned, but the arms are certainly displayed to mark her authority, witness the use of them in the courts of secular justice, and, indeed, on the letter paper of the Home Secretary himself; but the display in churches, which certainly goes back to the time of Henry VIII, marks the royal supremacy "over all "causes and persons as well as ecclesiastical and civil within the realm."

It is stated by Mr. Marcus Whiffen in his book Stuart and Georgian Churches (1947), p. 6: "Royal arms either painted or carved constituted "another standard ornament of churches during our period. Sometimes "they were set up over the Commandments; Professor Sykes (Church "and State in England) quotes an early eighteenth century writer who "explains that this position was chosen 'to satisfy all those who trod "'the courts of the Lord's House and are diligent in the performance of "'their duty, agreeable to the contents of those grand rules of the "'Christian religion, (viz. the ten commandments, the Lord's Prayer "'and the creed) that they shall meet encouragement and protection from "'the State.'" The placing of the royal arms in churches did not become compulsory until 1660, but the practice dated back to the reign of Henry VIII. The illustrations in this book show the arms displayed in the following churches: on the chancel screen, Abbey Dore, Herefordshire, 1634; Ingestre, Staffordshire, 1673; Derby All Saints, 1725; Staunton Harold, 1720; and on the communion rail, Weston, Staffordshire, 1710; and Castle Bromwich (undated).

In "The Old Church Gallery Minstrels," by Canon K. H. MacDermott (1948), there is a reproduction of a painting in Ifield Church in this diocese about the year 1840, showing the arms displayed on the west wall, and a photograph of the western gallery in Hampton Gay Church showing them on the face of the gallery itself.

In "The Architectural Setting of Anglican Worship" by Addleshaw and Etchells (1948), it is stated at p. 101, that the best known form of decoration of the nave was the royal arms. The practice grew up during the Reformation. "It is a practice not peculiar to the Church of "England or reformed Christianity. Royal arms used to adorn the "churches of France and Spain. In the reign of Mary Tudor the royal "arms which had been set up over the rood screen were only placed "elsewhere so as to make room for the restored rood and not turned out "of the church. It is a matter for regret that the Anglican reformer "should not have found some place for them other than that once "occupied by the rood, thereby exposing themselves to the taunts from "malicious latinists that they should set up a lion and dog in place of "Our Lady and St. John, the lion and the greyhound argent being "supporters of the royal arms of Elizabeth. They (the arms) expressed "a fervid loyalty, which at times swept the country, like the royal arms "set up at the Restoration with the inscription 'God Bless Charles the "'Second and send him long to Reign.'" They represented a royal "supremacy, but the royal supremacy did not mean an authority "external to the church. The arms were not those of a purely secular "person, because the Sovereign is the centre of a society which is both "the church and State. He is himself what seventeenth century lawyers "call, 'a spiritual person capable of jurisdiction in spiritual things, "'though not, of course, of exercising pastoral and priestly powers.'"

The churchwardens' accounts at Yatton, in Somerset, record the payment of a guilder for guilding the royal arms, 1541–1542, and in this same book there are illustrations showing the church of Deptford St. Nicholas built in 1697, and now destroyed by enemy action, with the reredos crowned with the royal arms of William III, and of Ackerman's aquatint, 1825, of St. Martin-in-the-Fields showing the royal arms in the ceiling over the chancel arch, and similarly in the church at High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire.

A remarkable instance occurs in three Acts of Parliament during the time of George III, under which five churches were built by trustees between the years 1819–1831. All these five churches are furnished with a royal coat of arms with supporters of exactly the same pattern, cast in iron, and with the shield of Hanover in the midst.

Recent cases where the royal arms have been introduced are very numerous, but the following may be taken as representative: Eversley, Hants; Chatton, Newcastle; Willingdon, Sussex; Stanton, Glos.; Bledlow, Bucks; Littlehampton, Sussex, and St. Mark's, Marylebone, and St. Paul, Stratford, London.

It seems to me, from what I have stated above, that the practice with which I am dealing has a continuous existence from the reign of Henry VIII to the present time, always excepting the short reign of Queen Mary Tudor, and the suggestion that the custom has fallen in desuetude cannot be sustained for a moment. I am satisfied that the present proposal is a lawful proposal and, accordingly, I decree that a faculty shall pass the seal as prayed.

Faculty granted.

Evershed M.R., Denning and Hodson L.JJ.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Discretion—Exercise—Review by appellate tribunal — Sanctity of marriage — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 4.
Divorce—Practice—Undefended petition—Leading questions.

The parties were married in 1929, and in 1936 the wife left the husband and shortly afterwards contracted an association with another man with whom she had lived ever since and by whom she had had two children. Subsequently, the husband began an association with a single woman and had by her four children. The wife petitioned for divorce on the ground of the husband's adulterous association and at the same time she asked the court to exercise its discretion in her favour. The wife gave no evidence of the reason why she left her husband. The commissioner refused to exercise his discretion in the wife's favour and dismissed her petition, primarily on the ground that she was the party who had broken up the marriage. On appeal:—

Held that, the Court of Appeal could not substitute its discretion for that of the judge, unless he had failed to exercise his discretion judicially, as by misdirecting himself in some material particular; that the commissioner had not misdirected himself in taking into consideration the circumstances in which the marriage had broken down in the first instance; and that the manner in which he had exercised his discretion should not be interfered with.

Observations of Lord Simon L.C. in Blunt v. Blunt [1943] A.C. 517, 525; 59 T.L.R. 315; [1953] 2 All E.R. 76 applied.

APPEAL from Judge Kingsley Griffith sitting as special commissioner at Kingston-upon-Hull.

The wife, Mrs. Jessie Moor, petitioned for the dissolution of her marriage with Harry Moor on the ground of his adultery, and asked the court to exercise its discretion in her favour in respect of her own adultery. The commissioner dismissed the petition, refusing to exercise his discretion in the wife's favour since, on the evidence before him, she was the party responsible for the break up of the marriage. The facts are more fully stated in the judgment of Evershed M.R.

The wife appealed against the commissioner's refusal to exercise his discretion in her favour. The husband was not represented on the appeal, but he wrote to the court stating that he did not wish to oppose the appeal.

F. S. Laskey for the wife. Neither counsel nor solicitors who represented her in the present appeal were in any way concerned in the court below.

The following cases were cited in argument: Blunt v. Blunt [1]; Hinkins v. Hinkins [2]; Redman v. Redman [3]; Sanders v. Sanders.[4]

Moor
v.
Moor.

Evershed M.R. This was a petition presented by a wife in 1953 for the dissolution of her marriage, celebrated in December, 1929. At the date of the marriage the wife was about 18 years old and the husband a little over 20. Seven years later, in 1936 (according to the only evidence which is before the court), as a result of protracted quarrelling, the wife left the matrimonial home. No explanation of her decision and conduct was given by her, except that there had been a series of quarrels. By a question, with the rather ominous number of 13, which was in a form so leading as to be quite inadmissible, she was asked, "Did you suspect that your husband was having relations with "someone else?" to which she gave the expected answer, "Yes." But having regard to the form of the question, the answer carried no weight and was of no value, the more so because it was not thought proper to make any inquiry whether she had any basis for those suspicions, and, if so, what it was. Having left her husband, so far as the evidence goes, she made no attempt to return, to effect a reconciliation, or to make any application to him to support her.

The subsequent history briefly is as follows: The wife, after a short interval of time, being young, contracted an association with a single man of the name of Ford, and they have lived as man and wife together ever since, and she has had by him two children. It appears that, so far as she is concerned, she has remained faithful to Ford, though she has, of course, been unable to marry him.

In like manner, the husband, after a certain interval, began an association with one Miss Mary White, and they likewise have lived together as husband and wife ever since. From that association there have been no less than four children. It is also the fact that the association of the husband with Miss White started rather later than the association of the wife with Ford.

The petition of the wife, which was based on the adulterous association of the husband with Miss White, was accompanied by a discretion statement in the course of which the wife said: "As "the result of many quarrels between my husband and myself . . . "I left him . . . some time in 1936." She then referred briefly to her association with Ford.

From time to time, this court, and I think the President also, has drawn attention to the way in which, in cases of this character, evidence is given by a series of leading questions, which every experienced advocate knows to be quite irregular, and which have the effect of making the answers either not at all impressive or far less impressive than they otherwise would be. In spite of the attention which has been drawn to this matter, nobody, so far as I can see, has paid the slightest regard to what has been said, and I do not forget that the judges who try these cases might, I should have thought in all conscience, be expected to have stopped this irregularity.

The impression left upon my mind by the present case is one of a most casual presentation of the case: a few leading questions are asked and then the matter is put before the judge with the suggestion that there was really nothing in it, and that he would be bound to exercise his discretion in the petitioner's favour. But the judge refused so to exercise his discretion. The material passage in the transcript reads: "The question is whether this "woman can come to this court and ask me to exercise my "discretion in her favour, she being the party who began it"—meaning thereby, she being the party who first left and broke up the marriage, or alternatively, who first started an adulterous association, or perhaps both. "She left her husband and formed "another association. It seems to me that, if I exercise a "discretion in a case like this, discretion becomes a rubber stamp "and it ceases to have any meaning whatever because it follows "in an undefended case, or almost follows, that since the husband "has not troubled to defend he is also anxious that the marriage "should be dissolved, and, therefore, in any undefended case "there is no discretion if I apply the principles you ask me to. "No, I am refusing to exercise discretion."

It is not in doubt that this court cannot substitute its discretion for the discretion exercised by the judge, unless it is made plain that in some way the judge has not exercised his discretion judicially, as by misdirecting himself in some material particular. By section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, the discretion is committed to the judge at the trial.

I cannot help feeling that if rather more care had been taken in presenting her case, the wife might have been able to give evidence which would have supplied the commissioner with a firm basis upon which he might have exercised his discretion in her favour. As it was, I think the commissioner spoke truly when he said that all he had got was the fact that this wife had first broken up the marriage, had gone off, had left her husband, and started shortly afterwards an adulterous association without any explanation whatsoever of the circumstances which led up to it.

Counsel for the wife drew attention to the fact that there had been no children of the marriage, and that she, the wife, had had two children and had lived as man and wife with Ford. She omitted to prove that Ford was willing to marry her, though I assume from what Mr. Laskey has told us that that could have been established. But no emphasis was laid on the circumstances of the husband, though the commissioner pointed out, with some justice, that possibly the husband (who had been deserted) might, if he was really anxious to regularize his own liaison with Miss White, himself present a petition.

Sympathy for the wife and an extreme distaste for the way in which this case was presented and conducted seem to me to be an insufficient basis for substituting for the commissioner's discretion this court's discretion.

Moor
v.
Moor.
Evershed M.R.

I felt inclined, during the course of Mr. Laskey's argument, to say that there was sufficient unsatisfactory conduct of the case to justify us in ordering a new trial, but, on the whole—and in this matter I have been guided by my two brethren, whose experience is much greater in these cases than mine—it seems to me that that would be merely a disguised way of indicating to some other commissioner that we thought that the discretion might be exercised in another way. Indeed, I am not at all convinced on this evidence that there is enough to induce me to say that I should have so exercised it. It may be that this wife could satisfactorily explain why she left her husband, but, on the other hand, it may be that she could not—I do not know. At any rate, the commissioner had, I think, no information before him which would entitle him to take the view that the conduct of the wife, which alone was proved, was not a most serious obstacle in her path.

It is clear that the commissioner had Blunt v. Blunt [1] in mind. In effect, he referred to it because he said: "I think I "remember a case in the House of Lords which said that the "maintenance of marriage as an estate is just as strong a ground "of public policy as the happiness of the individuals concerned." That is a reasonably accurate reference to the well-known passage in the speech of Lord Simon L.C., where he said [2]: "To these four "considerations I would add a fifth of a more general character, "which must, indeed, be regarded as of primary importance, "namely, the interest of the community at large, to be judged "by maintaining a true balance between respect for the binding "sanctity of marriage and the social considerations which make it "contrary to public policy to insist on the maintenance of a "union which has utterly broken down." It is sometimes assumed that the utter breakdown of the union is so strong an element in the matter that the discretion ought always to be exercised in the petitioner's favour whenever that has occurred; but I cannot accept that view. Indeed, it seems to be in conflict with what Lord Simon says, that that consideration must be "balanced" against the public policy which upholds the sanctity of marriage.

I ask the question which I think the commissioner asked: If the wife says, "We had a lot of quarrels, the marriage was a "failure, so I walked out and started association with somebody "else," is this court then to say, "It is a long time ago, the "marriage has broken down, I will exercise my discretion"? I cannot say that the commissioner was wrong when he said: "No, I will not. If I do, I am just putting a rubber stamp on "this discretion."

I repeat that I feel sorry for the parties and for the six children who are the issue of these two associations; but the commissioner drew attention to the fact that the husband (who apparently has tried to support this appeal, though not being a party to it) may himself present a petition, and, as the commissioner indicated, in the circumstances, he might well succeed in getting a decree. The costs, if he starts proceedings, would be no greater than if the court ordered a retrial of this petition. But, on the appeal, though I confess with no little hesitation and with a feeling of uneasiness which has been mainly caused by the way in which the case was conducted, I have come to the conclusion that it would not be right or in accordance with well-established principles for the Court of Appeal to substitute its discretion for that of the commissioner on no ground other than that we might think that, if we had tried this case and heard this evidence and no more, we might have granted a decree. In my judgment, the appeal fails.

Denning L.J. I agree. The decision of the House of Lords in Blunt v. Blunt [2] marked a turning-point in the way the court exercised its discretion in divorce cases. Whereas previously discretion was exercised in comparatively few cases, since that decision it has been exercised in most of the cases in which it has been sought. But it is important to remember that Lord Simon L.C., in delivering the unanimous judgment of the House of Lords, required the courts to maintain "a true balance" between the sanctity of marriage on the one hand and the other social considerations on the other hand.

In applying that ruling in recent years, I am afraid that the fact that the marriage "has utterly broken down" has weighed heavily in the balance, whereas the sanctity of marriage has weighed light in the scale. That is not the correct method of approach. A true balance must be kept. It is most important that the court should emphasize the sanctity of marriage.

In the present case, the commissioner found that it was the wife who was the one at fault in the first instance—she left her husband and formed another association. If the commissioner thought, as he did, that he could not in her case exercise his discretion because of his feeling that the sanctity of marriage must be maintained, I do not think that this court should interfere. For these reasons, I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

Hodson L.J. I also agree. If this court were to interfere with the discretion of the commissioner, it would be substituting its discretion for that of the court to which the discretion has been entrusted.

The commissioner in one paragraph of the transcript sums up the case in this way: "The question is whether this woman can "come to this court and ask me to exercise my discretion in her "favour she being the party who began it. She left her husband "and formed another association. It seems to me that, if I "exercise a discretion in a case like this, discretion becomes a "rubber stamp and it ceases to have any meaning whatever "because it follows in an undefended case, or almost follows, that "since the husband has not troubled to defend he is also anxious "that the marriage should be dissolved, and, therefore, in any "undefended case there is no discretion if I apply the principles "you ask me to." He previously had directed himself by reference, although not by name, to the decision of the House of Lords in Blunt v. Blunt.[3] He clearly had in mind the observations of Lord Simon L.C. with regard to the maintenance of marriage as an estate.

Lord Simon L.C., in his speech, confirmed the considerations which had been recognised by the court from the time at least of the presidency of Sir Henry Duke, but he added a fifth consideration, which has lately given rise to debate, by these words: "To these four considerations I would add a fifth of a more "general character, which must, indeed, be regarded as of "primary importance, namely, the interest of the community at "large, to be judged by maintaining a true balance between "respect for the binding sanctity of marriage and the social "considerations which make it contrary to public policy to insist "on the maintenance of a union which has utterly broken down." Nowhere did Lord Simon L.C. say that it is irrelevant to consider the circumstances in which the marriage breaks down in the first place, or which of the parties was the original wrongdoer, and I think it cannot be fairly urged against the commissioner's judgment that in mentioning that matter, as a matter which impressed him, he had misdirected himself.

The court will not lay down rules of an exhaustive character as to the exercise of discretion. Nor am I seeking to say that in no case can a party, who is the original wrongdoer, rightly appeal to the court for the exercise of discretion.

The circumstances of the original parting in the present case are circumstances which have given me (and I think all of us) anxious consideration, because this case was not properly presented to the court. The circumstances of the original parting were not dealt with by examination of the wife in such a way as to give any assistance to the court. These are the questions which were asked relating to the period in 1936 immediately before the separation: "(Q.) Did you suspect that your husband "was having relations with someone else? (A.) Yes. (Q.) As a "result of those suspicions did you leave your house in October, "1936? (A.) Yes, Sir." The matter was left there and no ground for suspicion was sought to be established. The commissioner was left with the fact that on the wife's own evidence she had left her husband without any just cause, and had not made any claim for maintenance against him, coupled with the statement of the husband which had been put in as a confession of his adultery: "My wife left me in October, 1936." The case having been presented in that way, the commissioner, having had those facts put before him, exercised his discretion without, I think, showing that he acted on any wrong principle, or misappreciated the facts as disclosed to him in evidence. Therefore, I think, this appeal must be dismissed.

Criminal Law—Plea—Guilty—Application to withdraw plea before sentence—Matter within discretion of trial judge.

The question whether a prisoner may withdraw his plea is one entirely within the discretion of the trial judge, but the court has no power to allow a plea to be withdrawn after judgment.

Rex v. Blakemore (1948) 33 Cr.App.R. 49 disapproved.

Rex v. Plummer [1902] 2 K.B. 339; 18 T.L.R. 659 followed.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, Thomas McNally, was indicted with a number of other men, only one of whom, called Stubbs, pleaded not guilty, on a charge of warehousebreaking and housebreaking. The pleas were taken on the first day of the Manchester Winter Assizes before Jones J., but sentences were not pronounced until after the trial of Stubbs, when the appellant and the other accused were brought up one by one to be sentenced. When brought up the appellant told the judge that he wished to change his plea from guilty to not guilty. The appellant, who had several previous convictions, had been caught red-handed by the police, and had pleaded guilty without any qualification, and he had also pleaded guilty before the magistrates. The judge did not ask him why he wished to change his plea but told him that he only wanted to give trouble, and refused to allow him to change his plea. He was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment.

His ground of appeal was that the judge should have asked him the reason for wishing to change his plea, and that in failing to ask this question the judge had not properly exercised the discretion vested in him whether or not to accede to the appellant's request, and that, accordingly, the court should grant a venire de novo.

T. R. Fitzwalter Butler for the appellant.

Sir Noel Goldie Q.C. and Sidney Smith for the Crown.

The following cases, not referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Regina v. *Clouter and Heath; Rex v. Grondkowski.†

Lord Goddard C.J. We only put this case into the list as an appeal—Hilbery J. gave leave—in order that this court might have an opportunity of stating what is the position with regard to a prisoner who desires to change his plea after arraignment. The question whether a plea may be withdrawn or not is entirely a matter for the trial judge. If the court came to the conclusion that there was a question of mistake or misunderstanding, or that it would be desirable on any ground that the prisoner should be allowed to join issue, no doubt the court would allow him to do it. For example, it has been known for a prisoner charged with receiving stolen goods to acknowledge that he received them, and to plead guilty, adding "but I did not know that they were "stolen." In such a case the trial judge might well allow the prisoner to change his plea, but it is entirely within the discretion of the judge.

In our judgment, Rex v. Blakemore [1] ought not to be followed. In that case Byrne J. allowed, in exceptional circumstances, a plea of guilty to be withdrawn after judgment; but once sentence has been pronounced there is no power in the court to allow the plea to be withdrawn: see Regina v. Sell,[2] where the Common Serjeant referred the question to several of the judges.

In Rex v. Plummer,[3] Wright J., who delivered the principal judgment of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, stated categorically that a plea cannot be changed after judgment. In the present case, it is true, the appellant asked for permission to withdraw his plea before judgment was given, but we cannot say that the judge did not properly exercise the discretion vested in him. The most that can be said in the appellant's favour—and the court is indebted to Mr. Fitzwalter Butler, whom we asked to represent the appellant so that we might have the relevant authorities brought to our notice—is that the judge did not ask the prisoner on what grounds he wished to withdraw his plea. It is perfectly obvious that he had no grounds. In his notice of appeal he did not suggest that he had any grounds, nor has his counsel been able to put before this court the grounds on which the appellant wished to withdraw his plea. He had, in fact, admitted his guilt before the committing justices.

We are quite satisfied that the judge did exercise his discretion. He had all the relevant facts before him. He knew all about the prisoner, and he could see that there was no ground for allowing the prisoner to withdraw his plea. Accordingly, this appeal fails and is dismissed.

Sale of Goods—C.I.F.—Bank guarantee—Provision for bank guarantee by buyers to sellers on first presentation of documents—Repudiation by sellers before receipt of guarantee—Event guaranteed—Time when guarantee to be provided.

Arbitration—Case stated—Findings of fact—Duty of parties to arbitration.

A contract made on August 11, 1952, for the sale of Canadian barley c.i.f. Antwerp-Hamburg range provided for shipment during October/November, 1952, payment to be net cash in London upon first presentation of documents, the buyers to give the sellers through their London bank a guarantee that the documents would be taken up on first presentation. No time was stipulated in the contract as to the date of the guarantee. On September 10 the sellers purported to cancel the contract alleging that they were entitled so to do as the guarantee had not been received. On September 10 the buyers' London bank informed the sellers that an irrevocable letter of credit had been opened by the buyers in favour of the sellers, but the sellers maintained their refusal to carry out their obligations under the contract and on September 16 the buyers referred the matter to arbitration.

It was found that the buyers' obligation was to provide the guarantee within a reasonable time before the first shipment date, namely, October 1, 1952; that such reasonable time had not arrived by September 10; that the sellers had wrongfully repudiated the contract; and that the buyers accepted that repudiation on September 16 and were entitled to damages accordingly:—

Held, that the same principles applied in this respect to a bank guarantee as to a confirmed irrevocable letter of credit to which it was analogous; that it must be provided within a reasonable time measured in relation to the event guaranteed; that, as its purpose in the present case was limited to guaranteeing the first presentation of documents, the buyers were under an obligation to provide the guarantee within a reasonable time only of the first shipping date, October 1, 1952; and that the award must be upheld.

It is the duty of parties to an arbitration who desire to raise questions of law for the decision of the court to make plain to the arbitrators all the points on which they wish the facts to be found for the purpose of arguing the question of law.

On August 8, 1952, an English company, Oilcakes and Oilseeds Trading Co. Ld., obtained approval from the Bank of England Foreign Exchange Control under the terms of a notice "Merchanting Trade-Resale of Dollar Raw Materials to E.P.U. countries" (F.E.C. 461) to purchase in America for resale in Western Germany a quantity of Canadian Barley c.i.f. for a sterling return of £580,000. On August 11, 1952, Oilcakes and Oilseeds Trading Co. Ld., entered into a contract with an American corporation, Sinason-Teicher Inter-American Grain Corporation, whereby they agreed to buy and the American corporation to sell 9,500 tons, 1,016 kilos. each No. 2 Canadian barley for shipment during October–November at a price of U.S.$75.15 per 1,000 kilos. net, in bulk, delivered weight, c.i.f. Antwerp–Hamburg range, buyers' option, discharging expenses for sellers' account. Payment was to be net cash in London on first presentation of documents, the buyers to give the sellers through their London bank the guarantee that the documents would be taken up on first presentation. The contract incorporated the conditions of the London Corn Trades Association Ld. The contract was part of a switch transaction and the German firms to which the goods were ultimately to be sold guaranteed "the ordered liquidation of the above contract." A number of organizations were concerned in the switch transaction which was organized by the Commission Internationale Futtermittel G.m.b.H. of Frankfurt-Main, who also acted as agents for the American sellers. The English buyers' agents were a German firm, Lichtenstein and Mannheimer, Hamburg. The terms of the guarantee required by the sellers were communicated to the buyers on August 12. On August 19 the sellers sent their contract of sale dated August 11 through their agents to the buyers, having previously been informed that the buyers' guaranteeing bank in London was Hambros Bank, but that the bank guarantee called for by the contract could only be established after the German bank guarantee had been obtained. The sellers did not mention to the buyers at that stage, nor was any insertion made in the contract, of a date by which the bank guarantee was to be supplied. On August 31 the sellers informed their agents that they expected the guarantee to be supplied by September 2, and on September 4 they informed the German buyer that they would extend this date to September 9. This information was passed on to the buyers' agents.

Meanwhile, the buyers concluded the formalities required by the Bank of England by submitting, on September 8, 1952, the required sterling transfer forms and the firm contracts for the bank's approval. On September 9 Hambros Bank cabled the sellers stating that they had been instructed by the buyers to issue a guarantee in the sellers' favour subject to Bank of England approval. On September 10 the sellers communicated with their agents, referring to the cable from Hambros Bank and stating that they were compelled to cancel the sale by reason of the failure of the buyers to furnish the guarantee in time, and requesting them to inform the buyers accordingly. This message was duly communicated to the buyers' agents. Also, on September 10, Bank of England approval having been received, Hambros Bank cabled to the sellers the terms of an irrevocable letter of credit opened by the buyers in favour of the sellers, the terms of which were substantially the same as those required by the guarantee provided for by the sellers. On the same day the sellers informed the buyers by cable that as the cable received from Hambros Bank on September 9 had not contained the payment guarantee the "deadline" for supplying the "performance "guarantee" had expired without performance and they had "cancelled the deal" that night. Thereupon, the buyers informed the sellers that no deadline had been received or accepted, and that as the guarantee had already been sent in the form of a letter of credit they insisted upon the execution of the contract. The sellers repeated that they considered the sale cancelled, and did not reply to further communications made to them by the buyers. On September 15 the buyers asked the sellers for a declaration that delivery would be executed within twenty-four hours, and no reply being received, referred the matter to arbitration.

At the hearing by the appeal committee of the London Corn Trades Association Ld. of an appeal by the sellers from the umpire's decision awarding damages to the buyers for the wrongful repudiation of the contract, it was contended for the sellers inter alia (1) that the buyers through their agents had agreed that the date for the opening of the guarantee should be September 1, and also to the extended date of September 9; (2) that if there was no agreed express date then the buyers' obligation under the contract was to secure that the guarantee was given as soon as reasonably possible, that they did not do this, and that, therefore, they were in default, and the sellers were entitled to treat the contract as at an end; and that it had been properly determined. on September 10, 1952; (3) that the letter of credit dispatched by the bank was too late and its terms immaterial in law, but that if it were material the document did not comply with the contract because it was not a bank guarantee.

It was contended for the buyers (1) that it was not a term of the contract that the buyers should cause the bank guarantee to be opened at any date prior to September 10; (2) that the buyers' obligation in relation to the bank guarantee was to cause it to be available to the sellers by the first shipment date under the contract, namely, October 1, 1952; or, alternatively (3) within a reasonable time before the first shipment date, and that such reasonable time had not arrived by September 10; (4) that the sellers having repudiated the contract before the arrival of the letter of credit opened by the buyers were not entitled to rely on the matters complained of in relation thereto as justifying repudiation; (5) that the opening of a letter of credit was a proper and customary compliance with the buyers' obligation under the contract; and (6) alternatively, that if it were not so, that non-compliance did not evince an intention on the part of the buyers to repudiate the contract.

The committee found, inter alia, that, although the sellers purported to require the guarantee by September 9, the buyers had never agreed to any fixed date nor had they authorised their agents so to do. In so far as it was a question of fact they found, and in so far as it was a question of law, they held (1) that the buyers' obligation was to provide a bank guarantee within a reasonable time before October 1, 1952, being the first shipment date, and that such reasonable time had not arrived by September 10, 1952; (2) that as Bank of England approval was not obtained until September 9, the buyers were entitled to a reasonable period of time after that date to obtain such guarantee, and that such reasonable time had not elapsed by September 10. They found further that the letter of credit opened by the buyers was a sufficient compliance with the contract, and that the sellers did not object to its form, but repudiated the contract before its receipt and maintained that repudiation thereafter. They therefore awarded that the sellers had wrongfully repudiated the contract on September 10, 1952, which was accepted as a final breach by the buyers on September 16, 1952, and awarded damages to the buyers.

The question of law for the court was whether, on the true construction of the documents and the facts as found, the sellers were entitled to treat the contract as determined.

[There was also a dispute before the appeal committee as to the actual date of the contract, which the committee found was August 11, 1952, and asked for the opinion of the court as to the correctness of this finding, but it was conceded at the trial that August 11 was the actual date of the contract.]

T. G. Roche for the sellers.

E. W. Roskill Q.C. and R. A. MacCrindle for the buyers.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Devlin J. stated the facts, and continued: The question of law which is submitted in the case is whether the sellers were entitled to treat the contract as terminated. That raises a short point which can be put in this way: There is no time expressed in the contract as to the date upon which the guarantee was to be furnished. Therefore, it follows (and both sides are agreed on this) that the guarantee must be furnished within a reasonable time. The question is how a reasonable time is to be measured. It is upon that point that the parties differ.

The sellers' contention as stated before the committee and repeated here is as follows: The buyers' obligation was to secure that the guarantee was given as soon as reasonably possible. The buyers' contention was put in the alternative. First, they submitted that "the buyers' obligation in relation to the said "bank guarantee was to cause it to be opened so that it should "be available to the sellers by the first shipment date under "the contract, namely, October 1, 1952," and they relied as support for that submission on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Pavia & Co. v. Thurmann-Nielsen.[1] Alternatively, they said: "The buyers' obligation in relation to the said bank guarantee "was to cause it to be opened so that it should be available to "the sellers within a reasonable time before the first shipment "date, namely, October 1, 1952, and that such reasonable time "had not arrived by September 10, 1952." Those two contentions are based on the submission that a bank guarantee is to be treated for this purpose as being in the same position as a letter of credit, and that the obligation upon a buyer to provide a London guarantee is to be measured, so far as time is concerned, by the same principles as those which would apply to a letter of credit.

In Pavia & Co. v. Thurmann-Nielsen[1] the question was whether a buyer was entitled to wait until he had some reasonable notice or some reasonable ground for thinking that the seller was about to ship, or whether he was obliged to open the letter of credit by the first date of the shipment period provided for in the contract. The Court of Appeal held that the latter was the true view, and that a buyer was not entitled to say, once the shipping period had begun, that he was not going to open his letter of credit until there was a reasonable possibility or some notification by the seller that he was going to ship. Accordingly, upon that basis, the buyers in the present case framed their first contention that the bank guarantee need not be opened before October 1, 1952, that is, the first date of the period of shipment.

I do not think that the Pavia case[1] really determines the question of whether the first date of the shipment period is the last date by which the credit has to be opened. It may very well be argued, for example, that if the first available date for shipment is October 1, the sellers are entitled to tender any bill of lading which bears the date October 1. That means that it may well be actually loaded on the ship before that date. It means certainly that it will have to be brought down to the docks before October 1, and it might be said that a seller was entitled to know before he embarked upon those operations which led directly to the performance of his obligations under the contract that his payment was secured by the credit for which he stipulated. I do not think the Pavia case [2] decided that point one way or the other. No doubt it was with that in mind that the buyers framed their contention in the alternative and said that, at any rate, they were not obliged to give a guarantee until within a reasonable time before the first shipment date.

In view of the findings of the committee that September 10 was a reasonable time, it is unnecessary for me to determine which of the two views is correct. The alternative contention in this case is quite sufficient for the buyers.

I shall proceed upon the alternative contention of the buyers that makes clear the difference between the two parties as to the method which they propose should be adopted for settling a reasonable time. The sellers want to count forward from the date of the contract. They say that the obligation upon the buyers in a contract of this sort is to arrange the bank guarantee as soon as possible: the buyers must have a reasonable time within which to do it, but the reasonable time should be counted from the date of the contract when the obligation to obtain the guarantee arose. The buyers, on the other hand, say that one should count back from the date of the event which the guarantee is intended to cover; that the guarantee is one for payment upon presentation of documents and a buyer would not be obliged to furnish the guarantee until that date draws reasonably near.

It is to be assumed that the guarantee is not going to be of service to the seller until he really begins to need it, and he does not begin to need it until a reasonable time before the first date of shipment. The buyers rely on the decision in the Pavia case,[2] and submit that the bank guarantee in this contract is exactly the same as a letter of credit, that the best sort of bank guarantee which could have been obtained would have been an irrevocably confirmed letter of credit, and that, if that had been given, the principle on which the beginning of the period is to be determined has been settled by the Pavia case.[2] I think that the buyers' view is the correct one.

Mr. Roche has argued that a bank guarantee is essentially different from a letter of credit, and that the sellers wanted the guarantee to give them security. They wanted to know at the earliest possible moment that, when they tendered documents, payment would be secured or that they would have the protection of a bank guarantee in respect of it. It is not merely a question of arranging to put the goods on board. They might want to make arrangements to buy the goods or they might have opportunities to sell them more profitably to someone else and, therefore, they would want to know at the earliest possible moment that they were secured against any possible default by the buyer. That is tantamount to saying that the guarantee which was to be supplied by the bank was what might be described as a performance guarantee. I think that the answer to the question lies upon a consideration of the terms of the contract. One must consider whether the bank is intended to supply a performance guarantee. I do not think it is.

Mr. Roskill has pointed out the different language used in the contract in relation to the guarantee to be given by the bank and that used in relation to the guarantee given by the German guarantors which was plainly a performance guarantee. It was described as a guarantee for the orderly liquidation of the contract. The guarantee to be furnished by the bank was a much more limited thing. It was a guarantee which did not go to the whole performance of the contract but only to one part of it, namely, that the documents would be taken up on presentation.

Mr. Roche submits, and I have no doubt that he is right, that as a matter of law a bank guarantee is not the same as a letter of credit. Under a letter of credit the bank itself undertakes to pay against documents which are to be presented to it. If it is an irrevocably confirmed letter of credit it creates a direct relationship between the bank and the seller, and the bank becomes directly liable to the seller for the fulfilment of the obligations it has undertaken in the letter of credit. Under a bank guarantee, looked at legally, the bank becomes liable only indirectly or secondarily as a guarantor if the buyer fails to fulfil his obligation. The contract does not provide for the documents to be presented to the bank, it provides for the bank's guarantee that the documents will be taken up on the first presentation. Those distinctions are perfectly true, but commercially speaking, it seems to me that the two documents should be treated in the same way, and what is a reasonable time for tendering the documents is a question of fact to be measured in the light of commercial considerations and the commercial purpose of the contract. A confirmed irrevocable letter of credit fulfils all the purposes of a bank guarantee, and far more, but I think that a bank guarantee is sufficiently analogous to a letter of credit for it to be said that the same principles ought to be applied in measuring its effect.

One might look at it in another way. Having taken the view which I have, that the bank guarantee is not a general performance guarantee, but only a guarantee of a limited performance, one asks oneself what the event is which is being guaranteed. That event is that the documents will be taken up on first presentation. Plainly, the guarantee must be there before the documents are presented. Equally it can be argued that it is not enough to tender, say, the day before. It still must be, in measuring time, a time which gives effect to the event guaranteed, that is, the first presentation of the documents. One may take it a few steps back and say that the guarantee must not be there immediately before the documents are presented; it must be before some event, such as the shipment, which obviously leads up to the presentation of the documents. One may go back along the chain as far as it is commercially proper to go, but the relation between the time of tendering the guarantee and the event which is guaranteed must still be measured in that way.

It is not, therefore, in my judgment, a guarantee which is measured by the fact that the contract is to be entered into. It is to be measured in relation to the event which is guaranteed, and that is the measure for which the buyers have contended, and I think rightly. Accordingly, their construction of the contract is the right one and the committee were right when they accepted it, and, prima facie, their finding of fact and their conclusion of law disposes of the matter. They said: "In so far "as it is a question of fact we find, and in so far as it is a matter "of law we hold, that the buyers' obligation was to provide a "bank guarantee within a reasonable time before October 1, "1952, and that such reasonable time had not arrived by Sep-"tember 10, 1952." That, I think, was a correct conclusion, and I would therefore answer the question addressed to me by saying that the sellers were not entitled to treat the contract as determined on September 10, and, accordingly, the award should be upheld.

But Mr. Roche, in the course of his final address, produced a second point. He said that, in fact, and it is indeed a fact found by the case, although upon this view the sellers wrongfully repudiated the contract on September 10, the buyers did not accept the repudiation until September 16. Accordingly, the true question is not whether working backwards from the first date of shipment one should go as far back as September 10, because September 10 becomes irrelevant. He said that the true question was whether a reasonable time had elapsed if the time were calculated from September 16. He submitted that there is no finding of fact on that point, and it might very well be that the committee would have held, if, for example, a guarantee had been tendered on September 15, that that was too late, as it had run the shipment date too close.

I think there are two answers to that point. First, it is plain that the point was not taken below in the sense that the committee's attention was never directed to the question whether they should apply their minds to consider what was a reasonable date on the basis of September 16. They applied their minds entirely on the basis of September 10. It is important that people who are going to argue points of law before the court should get the facts found which they want found for the purpose of arguing the point of law which they want to submit to the court. Arbitration has great advantages and it also has some disadvantages. Splitting up questions of fact and of law may be one of the disadvantages, but nothing can be more unfortunate than for cases constantly to go back from the court to the arbitrator because there is found to be some fact which the arbitrator has not found in the case stated which he might have found. Lay arbitrators cannot be expected to realize for themselves all the facts to which a point of law might conceivably give rise. It would be very unfortunate if applications to send cases back on those grounds were likely to be entertained.

Mr. Roche has plainly argued that on September 10 he was entitled to rescind the contract. If he wanted to put forward the alternative case, namely, that if he was not entitled to rescind on September 10, then he was entitled to rescind on September 16 as no guarantee had been tendered by that date, it was his duty to tell the committee that alternatively he argued that he was entitled to repudiate on September 16. It is then for him to satisfy the committee that by September 16 the document had not been tendered and that, therefore, he was entitled to repudiate as at that date. It is plain that the committee thought that the only material date was September 10.

The buyers made their contention, saying that on September 10 they still would be in time to tender the documents, and it is plain that the tribunal was never asked to say whether on September 16 they would also be in time. It is plain also, from their finding, that had they been asked they would at any rate have said that the time had not expired by September 10, and that it plainly lasted some days after that. That is implicit from what they say, but whether it would have lasted so long as September 16 is not plain. The whole contention put forward by the sellers was that they were entitled to treat the contract as determined on September 10. If they wanted the matter raised, it was their duty to raise the question clearly and to say that they were entitled to treat the contract as determined on September 10, or, alternatively, on September 16. If that had been done, the attention of the arbitrators might have been directed to the importance of making another finding of fact. I do not, therefore, think that upon any view I could go into this point, nor would I be prepared, for the reasons which I have given, to send the case back to the arbitrators.

I am slightly fortified in that conclusion by the fact that it would be a bad point anyway, because if the sellers had contended before the arbitrators that, alternatively, they were entitled to rescind on September 16, and that the buyers ought to have tendered the guarantee before that date, the buyers' answer would have been that up to September 10 they were not obliged to tender a guarantee because it was too early, and that between September 10 and 16 they were not obliged to tender a guarantee because the sellers intimated quite plainly that they would not accept one if tendered. That is shown to be the true position by the facts annexed to the case.

It is no doubt true that if one party repudiates a contract, as the sellers did on September 10, the other party, the buyers in the present case, is not obliged to accept it. One party can keep the contract alive, and if they do so they keep it alive for the benefit of both parties. If, therefore, the sellers on September 15 had changed their minds and said, "We think we were

Devlin J.

"quite wrong about time, it ought to be worked backwards and "not forwards: now tender," it would have been no answer for the buyers to say, "You have already repudiated." The buyers had kept the contract alive, but it does not mean that if the buyer chooses to keep the contract alive he is obliged to behave in precisely the same way as if the seller had not repudiated. That is to confuse two things. It is plainly established by Braithwaite v. Foreign Hardwood Co.[3] that that is not the case. If the seller's repudiation is such that he displayed an attitude which showed that he was, in effect, saying to the buyer, "Although you are keeping the contract alive you can take up or "perform your next obligation whatever it may be, tender your "documents as much as you like, I cannot accept them," the buyer is relieved from the obligation of making an empty and formal tender. He may, if he wishes for his own purposes, keep the contract alive and still claim that he is relieved from the obligation of making an empty and formal tender. The attitude of the sellers as shown in their cables was plain. They were not saying to the buyers in the period that elapsed between September 10 and 16: "If you tender your document now we "will look at it and see if it is all right." What they were saying was: "We have cancelled on September 10 and we stand on the "fact that we cancelled on that date." That made it plain that they were waiving any obligation on the buyers' part to trade during that period. The result is that I answer the question in the negative and uphold the award.

Practice Note.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Practice—Trial—Right to begin—Desertion alleged—Just cause as defence.

A husband by his petition prayed for a decree of divorce on the ground of desertion, alleging that his wife had left him; the wife by her answer admitted leaving the husband but alleged that she had just cause for doing so. It was submitted on her behalf that her counsel had the right to begin:—

Held, that the burden of proof remained upon the petitioner, who sought a decree, and the husband's case should therefore be heard first in the usual way.

Petition by husband for divorce.

The husband prayed for a decree of divorce on the ground of desertion; the wife did not dispute that she had left him, but she alleged that she had had just cause for doing so by reason of the husband's conduct. When the case was called,

H. B. Grant, for the wife, said that it was admitted that the wife had left, and intended to leave, the husband, and that there was, accordingly, only one issue: had she just cause for doing so? The burden was upon him (her counsel) to prove this, and he submitted that he therefore had the right to begin.

KARMINSKI J. referred to section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (which concerns the duty of the court in the presentation of a petition), and said that it was for the petitioner to prove his case.

Grant. But the whole burden does not rest upon the petitioner: although that part of the case upon which a decree, if granted, must be founded, must be proved to the satisfaction of the court, it does not follow that the burden of establishing all issues is upon the petitioner. In the present case, the real issue upon the pleading is whether the wife had just cause for leaving.

H. S. Law (D. R. Ellison with him) submitted that since the burden of proving the allegation of desertion to the satisfaction of the court was on him, if relief were to be granted, he should begin. Hewitt v. Hewitt,[1] a restitution case, was to be distinguished. The burden upon a petitioner for divorce was of a different nature.

KARMINSKI J. I think that the ordinary course should be followed. I have no doubt that the burden of proof is on the husband in view of section 4 of the Act of 1950, and he should therefore begin.

Semtex Ld.
v.
Gladstone.

Where a master employs a servant to drive a motor-vehicle on the highway on his, the master's, business, while it is an implied term in the contract of service that in relation to each such excursion there shall be in force an insurance policy sufficient to comply with section 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, no term can be implied that the master must go further and keep up a policy to indemnify the servant against any damages awarded against him at the suit of a party injured by his negligent driving.

The defendant, who was the plaintiffs' servant, was employed, inter alia, to drive some of his fellow-employees to and from their work in a shooting brake belonging to the plaintiffs. The shooting brake was at all material times insured by the plaintiffs in compliance with the Road Traffic Act, 1930. Due solely to the defendant's negligence the shooting brake was involved in an accident in which one of the passengers was killed and others were injured. Those injured and the representatives of the deceased sued and were awarded damages against both the plaintiffs and the defendant. In an action by the plaintiffs for an indemnity or for a 100 per cent. contribution from the defendant:—

Held, (1) that, whether the claim was for an indemnity at common law, based on an implied term in the contract of service that the defendant would perform his duties with reasonable care and skill, or whether it was for a contribution, brought under section 6 (2) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, the plaintiffs, being themselves in no way to blame for the accident, were entitled to recover from the defendant the full amount of the damages awarded against them; and (2) that no term could be implied in the contract of service that the plaintiffs would keep up a policy of insurance to indemnify the defendant against the consequences of his negligent driving.

The plaintiffs, being flooring and decking contractors, employed the defendant as a supervisor for the laying of rubber floors. The defendant was required to oversee work which was being done away from the premises of the plaintiffs, and among his duties he was expected to drive a shooting brake, the property of the plaintiffs. In March, 1951, the defendant was supervising the laying of floors at premises in Nottingham. The work was being done by workmen from 7 o'clock at night until 7 o'clock in the morning. The lodgings provided for the workmen proved unsatisfactory and it was arranged that the defendant should carry the men in the shooting brake to and from Nottingham and Birmingham each day.

On March 7, 1951, as the defendant was driving back a number of workmen, he was involved, due solely to his own negligence, in a serious accident, in which one of the workmen was killed and several others injured. These workmen and the representatives of the one who was killed brought an action against the plaintiffs and the defendant and recovered damages and costs totalling some £9,360.

The plaintiffs now sued the defendant for an indemnity or for a contribution of 100 per cent. under section 6 (2) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, alleging that the accident was caused solely by the negligence of the defendant. The defendant pleaded in reply that "it was an implied "term of the contract of employment between the plaintiffs and "the defendant that the plaintiffs would effect and/or keep in "force a policy of insurance which would indemnify the plaintiffs "and the defendant against liability which may be incurred by "him in respect of the death of, or bodily injury to, any person "caused by, or arising out of, the use by him in the course of "his employment of the shooting brake on the road"; and that the claim of the plaintiffs was contrary to, and in breach of, this implied term.

It appeared that the plaintiffs carried two insurance policies, each with different insurers: one an employer's liability policy, under which the plaintiffs were the only insured, and the other a motor policy complying with section 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930,[1] under which the plaintiffs were the primary insured and the actual driver was the secondary insured subject to certain conditions. The motor insurers had stated that they did not regard these conditions as fulfilled in this case, though they did not specify which conditions had not been complied with, and that they did not consider themselves bound to indemnify the defendant if he should be required to pay all or any part of the damages awarded in the above-mentioned action.

Semtex Ld.
Gladstone.

April 9. Finnemore J. stated the facts and continued: I take it to be clear that in our law a master can sue his servant for negligence. There is no special law which allows a servant to be negligent about his master's business and then to claim that he was exempt from an action by his master. There is authority for that, although it hardly needs authority.

The next question is whether the master can sue the servant if the servant has not directly injured the master, or his property, but having injured other people in such a way that his master is called upon as being responsible for the torts of his servant to pay large sums of money. The principle which I believe to be the true principle, is summarized in Salmond on the Law of Torts, 11th ed., p. 92: "It would seem clear on principle that in all "cases of true vicarious liability the person held vicariously liable "for the tort of another should have a right of indemnity as "against that other. Thus, a master who has paid for the negli-"gence of his servant should be able to sue that servant for "indemnity. That this is generally so cannot be doubted, pro-"vided that the negligence of the employer himself or one of his "other servants has not contributed to the damage." This paragraph is a little different from the one which appeared in the 10th edition, which was referred to in Jones v. Manchester Corporation.[1] If that is a proved expression of the law on this matter then, so far, the plaintiffs would be clearly entitled to recover. The master here, the plaintiffs, has paid for the negligence of the servant, the present defendant, and no one suggests, or could suggest, that any negligence of the employer, or any other of his servants, has in any way contributed to this damage.

This matter was considered recently in Jones v. Manchester Corporation.[1] In that case the action was brought against the hospital board of the Ancoats Hospital in Manchester and the doctor who administered the anaesthetic which unfortunately resulted in the death of the person whose administratrix was bringing the action. That case shows quite plainly that in a case where a master and his servant are jointly concerned in a tort they can, under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, bring an action for contribution. Hodson L.J., in a dissenting judgment in which he held that neither the hospital board nor any other of their servants had been negligent, put the matter on a rather different basis. He said that in his view the negligent servant is under an implied term in his contract of employment to exercise reasonable skill according to his calling. He cited a passage of Willes J. in Harmer v. Cornelius,[2] and then he cited a passage from Weld-Blundell v. Stephens,[3] in which Warrington L.J. said[4]: ". . . it may well be "that if a servant by his negligent act inflicts an injury on a third "person who recovers damages therefor from the master, the "latter may recover the amount from the servant in an action "against him for breach of his duty. But in such a case the "right of action against the master and his legal liability them-"selves result from the servant's negligent act, and but for that "act would not have existed."

I confess, if I were free and if it really mattered, I would prefer the way in which Hodson L.J. puts this kind of case—that is as a breach of the contract of service between the master and his servant—to some other ways in which it has been put. For some reason that I have never been quite able to understand, the master who is vicariously responsible for his servant is referred to as, and apparently treated as, a joint tortfeasor. This point was elaborated by Denning L.J. in Jones v. Manchester Corporation.[5] I could never see why an employer, whose only liability is the vicarious liability of being responsible for what his servant does, should be called a joint tortfeasor, which should mean a person who took some part in the tort which is the subject of the action. However, I do not think that in the present case it really matters, because it is clear that, if one has to regard the employer as a joint tortfeasor with his servant, who alone committed the tort, then by reason of the Act of 1935 he can claim contribution and that contribution can be as much as 100 per cent. This was illustrated by Ryan v. Fildes.[6] In that case Tucker J. made an order for a 100 per cent. contribution although he did draw attention to the fact that under that Act of Parliament, there being joint tortfeasors, contribution is a matter in the discretion of the court in the circumstances of each case, and the court might order no contribution, or might order a contribution up to 100 per cent.

It seems to me that where the negligence concerned is entirely the negligence of the one party—in the present case the servant—it would follow really, if one applies the ordinary principles of justice, that the contribution should be 100 per cent. Certainly, in my opinion, in this case, whether I treat it as a matter of breach of contract of service, as Hodson L.J. put it in Jones v. Manchester Corporation,[7] or whether I treat it as a case of contribution, as it was put by Denning L.J., and probably by Singleton L.J., I think the result would be the same. In my view, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover the whole of the damages which they have had to pay in this case owing to the negligence—and owing only to the negligence—of the defendant.

What is the answer to that? If I understand the defence, putting it shortly, it is this: owing to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, which introduced what we called "compulsory insurance" for vehicles on the road against damage being done to third parties, the whole system has been changed. Indeed, Mr. Ryder Richardson put it in these actual words: "The whole matter is now "changed because of motor insurance." I propose to deal with that in a little more detail in a moment, but I want to say that I have come to the conclusion that it does not in any way change the law of this country. All that the Act of 1930 did in regard to this matter was to say that it was an offence to drive a vehicle on the road, or cause it to be driven or permit it to be driven, without having in force a contract of insurance according to the requirements of that Act. I do not think that it in any way interferes with what I might describe as the general law existing between master and servant with regard to the control of a motor-car.

I notice that in the original defence which was served in this case, all that was raised was a denial of negligence by the defendant and, secondly, a general denial, without any reason given, that the plaintiffs were entitled to indemnity or contribution, costs or expenses. After that the matter was further considered and an amended defence was served, drawn, if I may say so, obviously by a pleader of considerable skill and ingenuity. It is with that amended defence that I now have to deal.

Paragraph 1 has been amended to add: "The wages of the "defendant were at all material times £365 per annum." That is interesting but, it seems to me, a quite irrelevant piece of information, but obviously some weight is attached to it because more than once Mr. Ryder Richardson pressed on me the consideration that this was an action by a subsidiary company of a very great commercial concern against one of their employees earning £9 per week, and he drew what was intended to be a very harrowing picture of this unfortunate man having his house—if he has one—sold over his head, he being driven with his wife and children into the gutter and forced into bankruptcy. Of course, it is obvious to anyone who uses his eyes in this court, apart from the evidence that was given, that in the result this is a contest between much more seasoned warriors than even Semtex Ld. or the defendant. Behind the scenes are two very well-known insurance companies, and I think that both the facts that the defendant is a man of small means and that, ex hypothesi, the insurance companies are people of very large means, are quite irrelevant. The rights of the plaintiff do not depend on the ability or inability of the defendant to satisfy any lawful judgment that is given, nor does a judgment given depend in any way on the fact that one party, or both parties or no party, has or have in the background an insurance company on which they can rely. The fact that people are insured in respect of this or that risk does not in the least alter the principles which the court has to apply in deciding, first of all, what the law is.

The second paragraph in the defence reads: "It was an implied "term of the contract of employment between the plaintiffs and "the defendant that the plaintiffs would effect and/or keep in "force a policy of insurance which would indemnify the plaintiffs "and the defendant against liability which may be incurred by "him in respect of the death of or bodily injury to, any person "caused by or arising out of the use by him in the course of his "employment of the shooting brake on the road." I am not sure whether, if that be true, it would really make any difference, because I think that this case still has to be decided apart from the question of insurance except to the extent which I will deal with later on. As pleaded I think that paragraph is wrong. I do not think that it can be any implied term of the contract of his employment that a particular policy of insurance to indemnify the driver must be in force. There may be of course—I think there is—implied in a contract a term that the law will be observed and that the driver will not be called upon to do an unlawful act: in other words, that the employer will have taken the steps which he is bound to take under the Road Traffic Act, 1930. This is made plain in Gregory v. Ford,[8] where Byrne J. held that section 35 of the Act of 1930 did not cast on the employers any duty in relation to their servant to insure against third-party risks a vehicle driven by the servant, but he did hold, secondly, that there was an implied term in the contract of service that the servant should not be required to do an unlawful act, and, accordingly, there was an implied term that the employers were to comply with the provisions of section 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930.

Byrne J. pointed out that it was necessary to consider the object of the statute and he quoted Goddard J. in Tattersall v. Drysdale,[9] as having said: "[The Road Traffic Act, 1930,] was "aimed at the protection of the public by providing that there "should be a body of insurers behind every driver of a car." Byrne J. said[10]: "With that observation I respectfully agree. "Monk v. Warbey[11] is authority for the proposition that a person "who is injured by the negligent driving of a motor car which is "not the subject of insurance against third-party risks can sue "the owner of the motor car for breach of statutory duty, but, so "far as I am aware, there is no authority for the proposition that "section 35 (1) casts on the employer a statutory duty in relation "to his servant, and, having regard to the object of the statute, "I do not think that it does." He then held that there was an implied term that the employer would observe the conditions of the Road Traffic Act and that the driver in that case—where there was, in fact, no policy in existence—was entitled to succeed on that implied term.

Byrne J. added[12]: "A servant is, of course, liable at the suit "of his master for damage which is the result of the servant's "negligence, but in this case, although the third defendant was "negligent, it is owing to the breach of statutory duty by the "first and second defendants that the damages in respect of "which they claim indemnity fall on them. For that reason, in "my view, their claim fails." It is wrong, therefore, to say that one can imply in the defendant's contract of employment here a term that he is to be indemnified against liability, but there is to be implied a term that the owners would carry out the obligations laid on them by the Act of 1930. I have to couple up with paragraph 2, paragraph 8 of the amended defence where it says that the claim of the plaintiffs was contrary to and in breach of the said implied term of contract of employment between the plaintiffs and the defendant. If the contract was that the defendant was not to be put under any liability and was to be protected in that sense, that might be so, but if the implied term is only the one with which Byrne J. deals, that is to say, to carry out the terms of the Act of 1930, it seems to me to be not so.

Paragraph 9 reads: "Further, or alternatively, the plaintiffs "in breach of the said implied term failed to effect, or keep in "force, a policy of insurance which indemnified the defendant "against liability in respect of people in this case who brought "their actions." The answer to that is that, prima facie, they seem to have done that very thing. Two contracts of insurance were put in, both called for by the defendant. It appears, first, that the plaintiffs had an employers' liability policy of the Midland Employers' Assurance Ld., which covered everybody under a contract of service or apprenticeship who might be injured, or fall ill, arising out of and in the course of their employment, so that, if that happened, the plaintiffs and nobody else would be insured against liability. Secondly, there was a contract for insurance with the Cornhill Insurance Co. Ld. which was a motor-car policy. Under that policy the shooting brake which was concerned in this matter was covered. It contains the term that the company will indemnify any person driving the insured car on the orders of the insured or with the insured's permission, provided such person is not entitled to indemnity under any other policy and that the terms, expense and conditions apply to him as far as possible. It is issued in the names, I notice, of Semtex Ld. and/or representatives. It is one of those contracts designed, I think, to cover the requirements of the Act of 1930. There is a primary insured, a company, and there is a secondary insured, that is the actual driver, and they undertake to indemnify him provided he was driving on the order, or with the permission, of the insured, as, of course, the defendant was. What I fail to see is how that makes any difference to the legal position between master and servant. It may be a very comforting thing for the defendant if, indeed, that insurance policy indemnifies him when he makes a claim against the insurers. Whether it does that or not, all I need say at the moment is that, prima facie, it is such a contract as would satisfy the requirements of the Act of 1930, and it was in force on March 7, 1951.

A letter was also put in by the defendant dated July 13, 1953, written to him by a firm of solicitors acting for the Cornhill Insurance Co. Ld. in which the opinion was given that the insurers were not liable to indemnify him. No hint is given in that letter on what ground the Cornhill Insurance Co. Ld. would disclaim liability to the driver. I have not in fact been told what it is. It may be—I do not know—that if, in due course, when the proper steps have been taken, it should turn out that that policy is a bad one, or ineffective for some reason, there might then be questions to be decided between the plaintiffs and the defendant, but at the moment all I have is that policy put before me, and it seems to me a complete contradiction of the defence put forward here that they failed, in effect, to keep in force a policy of insurance which indemnifies the defendant against liability in respect of the death of this one man and the injuries of the others. But again I say that the duty of the employers is, in my view, limited to their duty under the Road Traffic Act. One cannot imply in the contract of employment any other term because, if the servant wants any term further than the one which is part of the public law of the land, it must be the subject of an express agreement.

I will come to the other points of the defence. Paragraph 10 is that he is under no duty at common law to indemnify or to make contribution to the plaintiffs. I have already indicated my view. Whether the master must be treated as a joint tortfeasor and it comes under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, or not, the defendant is, in my view, quite plainly liable at common law to his masters. If he is negligent and causes damage to them by his negligence, they are entitled to recover. It is said that the plaintiffs are in breach of " the said " implied term " contrary to law and natural justice. I do not think it is in breach of the said implied term, whatever that term was. The defendant has his rights, whatever they are, under this contract because there is an express provision for indemnifying him and, indeed, the policy goes further than the requirements of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, because it appears to preclude the death of or injury to people who were in the vehicle in the course of employment.

The final plea is that, in any event, acting under section 6 (2) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, the court should, as it has power to do if that is the right way to put this case, exempt the defendant from liability to make any contribution. I cannot see any possible ground for exercising that power and I see every possible ground for doing the exact opposite. That an employee who is negligent and causes grave damage to his employers, should be heard successfully to say that he should not make any contribution to the resulting damage, is a proposition which does not in the least commend itself to me and I do not see why it should be so. I find that justice, as we conceive justice in these courts, says that the person who caused the damage is the person who must in law be called upon to pay damages arising therefrom.

v.
GLADSTONE.

Finnemore J.

I want finally to refer to a case which, it seems to me, is extremely near the present case, not only in law but even, if one may be so bold as to say so, in the idea of natural justice that the defence has been rather pressing on the court. That is Digby v. General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ld.,[13] which caused a great deal of litigation. The short facts were that Miss Merle Oberon, the well-known actress, was injured in her car while being driven by her chauffeur. The car collided with another car. She brought an action against her own chauffeur and the driver of the other car. The court held that both vehicles were to blame and that meant, in the blank statement of the law, that Miss Oberon was able to gain her judgment only against her own chauffeur and that she did to the amount of £5,000. I have no reports of that original trial, but it is plainly an authority for this: that an employer and owner of a car can sue the driver employed by him for injuries caused to the owner by the negligent driving of that car. The matter then went to arbitration because the driver claimed indemnity on a policy which, as far as I can see, appears to be indistinguishable from the Cornhill policy in the present case. The umpire, Mr. Maxwell-Fyffe K.C., decided that the driver was entitled to be indemnified. The matter then went to Atkinson J., who agreed. It went to the Court of Appeal which, by a majority, disagreed. Finally, the matter went to the House of Lords which, again by a majority, agreed with the original decision, and held that the driver was able under the policy taken out by his employer, the owner of the car, to claim indemnity from the insurance company for the damages which he was liable to pay to the owner.

It is true that the dispute in that case was on the question whether the policy-holder should be considered as a third party for this purpose, and that question is irrelevant in the present case because I am not dealing with that proposition. That case illustrates strikingly, however, that the owner was able to sue her own chauffeur and driver and to recover damages, although there was in force a policy which she had taken out covering what is required to be covered by the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and which, as the House of Lords subsequently held, in fact gave protection to the driver himself. The only difference I can see between that case and the present is that there the employer was suing the servant for injuries which his negligence had caused to her physically. In the present case the plaintiffs are claiming against the servant for damages they have had to pay to people injured by the driver's negligent driving, and as I think in our law a master is entitled to sue his servant for damages he has been called upon to pay to others, as well as for injuries directly caused to him, I think the principle is the same. With the other part of the case I am not concerned, except that it does serve to show that in the absence of something which has yet to be disclosed and argued, the defendant may be able to take considerable comfort in that the Cornhill policy may well cover him even against his own employers. This principle was illustrated again in Richards v. Cox,[14] but I do not think that more need be said about that with regard to the present case. For these reasons I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in the present action and, accordingly, they will be entitled to the relief for which they ask.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The following statement of the facts is taken in substance from the judgment of Vaisey J.

The testator, Thomas Sampson Brace, described in his will as "of 25 Apton Road, Bishop's Stortford, Hertfordshire," made that will on March 19, 1950, and, after appointing the plaintiff, Walter George Bobs Gurton, his executor, declared: "I give and "bequeath unto my daughter, Mrs. Irene Clements, of 25 Apton "Road, Bishop's Stortford, Herts, my house at 25 Apton Road, "Bishop's Stortford, together with the contents of the same "and any possessions I may have, on condition that she will "always provide a home for my daughter, Doris Mary Brace, at "the above address."

On August 8, 1953, the testator died. He was a widower with five children, all defendants to this summons, namely, Irene, Doris Mary, Eva, Netta and Nellie. Irene, Eva, Netta and Nellie were all married. Doris Mary was a spinster of about 38 years of age, who was and had since early childhood been mentally afflicted, and appeared in these proceedings by the Official Solicitor as her guardian ad litem. She had no means or possessions of any kind. Irene, both before and after her marriage in 1940, resided with the testator at 25 Apton Road, which was also the home of Doris Mary. For many years Irene had looked after and cared for her father, the testator, and her sister, Doris Mary, and fully intended and wished to continue to act towards her sister with the same kindness and consideration as formerly, whatever might be the legal effect of the will.

The testator's estate consisted of 25 Apton Road, which was freehold, and of an estimated value of £1,500, some furniture and personal effects worth about £50, cash on deposit at a bank £210 1s. 1d., the proceeds of an insurance policy £20 3s. 2d., and arrears of a pension, £1 15s. 3d.

By this summons the executor asked, inter alia, (1) whether the contents of the house and any possessions that the testator might have included the whole of his residuary personal estate, and (2) whether the condition that Irene should always provide a home for Doris at the house was valid, or was void for uncertainty, or for any other reason.

D. H. McMullen for the executor.
Raymond Walton for Irene.
W. F. Waite for Doris.
A. J. Balcombe for the remaining daughters of the testator.

All cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

VAISEY J. stated the facts, and continued: The first question which arises is, What is meant by the words "any possessions "I may have"? In my judgment, they include all the items which I have enumerated, so that Irene is entitled to the whole of the testator's estate, and for this Fleming v. Burrows [1] is sufficient authority. I will make a declaration accordingly.

The more difficult question is as to the validity and meaning of the condition that Irene is to provide a home for her afflicted sister. The condition is, of course, a condition subsequent, applicable not only to the house, but to the whole and every part of the estate. The question is whether on the true construction of the will Irene has no more than a conditional property not only in the house but in the various moneys which go to her with it, or whether she takes all absolutely, treating the conditional words as merely hortatory and precatory and expressive of the testator's expectation and belief that she will carry out his plainly declared wishes.

The latter alternative is not easily justified by the words, and the real difficulty to my mind is whether the condition is phrased with sufficient clarity and certainty to enable the court to give effect to it as a valid and binding condition subsequent.

I confess to feeling a very grave doubt whether the conception of one person A providing a home for another B is susceptible of any such clear and definite significance as to enable anybody to say what it means or what obligations it entails. Obviously, the provision of a home would involve giving shelter from the elements; but, if board and lodging, clothing, food, and so forth, have to be provided, on what scale or by what standard is the obligation to be imposed? Another way of stating the difficulty is to ask whether providing B with a home includes or implies maintaining him. I cannot read "provide a home for" as equivalent to "maintain and provide a home for"; had those been the words, I might not have felt any difficulty.

In re Richardson [2] is, at first sight, very like the present case, and was cited to me as almost, if not quite, conclusive of the present case. Unfortunately, however, the question of the certainty or uncertainty of the condition was never argued in that case, and there are two very substantial differences between that case and the present. The headnote reads: "A testatrix gave her "residuary estate, in the events which happened, (1) to her niece "C. on condition that she resided in the testatrix's house during "the life of the testatrix's sister M., and provided there a home "for M. so long as she wished; (2) in the event of C. not "complying with the condition, to another niece upon the like "condition; (3) in the event of neither niece complying with "the condition, upon trust for M. for life with other trusts over "on her death. At the date of the testatrix's death M. was a "lunatic not so found, confined in an asylum, and was not "expected to recover her faculties. Upon a summons by C. under "the Settled Lands Acts: Held, that C. was a person having "the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, "1882; that the condition as to providing a home was void so far "as it prevented C. from exercising her power of sale; and that "she was entitled to sell the house and keep the proceeds "absolutely."

First, it is obvious that it did not matter in that case whether the condition was good or bad, because the sale was about to be effected; but the second point to which I wish to call attention is that the words which I have read from the headnote are incomplete, and what was said in the will was that the niece was to provide "there," that is in the house in question, "a home free "of cost or charge of any kind." Those words certainly give much more guidance on the meaning of "providing a home" than do the perfectly colourless words in the present will. The other most important difference between the cases is this, that in In re Richardson,[3] there was a definite, positive and plainly expressed gift over. Here there is no such gift over, and that seems to me to point very strongly to the conclusion that the testator never contemplated anything in the nature of a forfeiture of estate or interest; because, if the condition in this will is treated as binding, Irene would not be able to spend one penny of the money in the bank, or to deal with one stick of the testator's furniture as her own. That seems to me a very unlikely intention to attribute to the testator. The absence of a gift over seems to me to point quite strongly to the conclusion that these words were not intended to be anything more than precatory.

What is meant by "providing a home," without any reference, as in In re Richardson,[4] to costs and expenses? It seems to me to be an expression with a certain general significance applicable in various contexts and having in each case a very different meaning. Of a negligent mother, for example, it might be said that none of the children were at school, and that she did not really "provide a home" for them, in the sense that she allowed them to run loose, with that sort of idea of "providing a "home." That is not like "providing shelter" and "allowing "them to reside" or anything of that sort, but it is "providing a "home"; and "home" is a word, in my judgment, of an extremely wide and varied significance.

I have been referred to many cases dealing in recent years with this difficult question of conditions subsequent. The first in order of date is In re Talbot-Ponsonby's Estate,[5] before Crossman J. There the condition was that the devisee of the estate was to make the same his home. I should have thought that an extremely vague expression, but, at any rate, it seems to me an expression of far greater certitude than saying that someone is to provide a home for someone else. If the owner of an estate makes that estate his home, he is clearly to reside there in the ordinary way and treat the place as his ordinary place of residence.

I may observe that In re Talbot-Ponsonby's Estate[6] has been cited in cases before higher authority, and I very gravely doubt whether, having regard to those cases, it could now stand.

I was next referred at length to Sifton v. Sifton.[7] The crux of the whole matter is summed up in the quotations from earlier cases which appear in the judgment, and the case reminds the profession and reminds us all of the necessity for extreme caution in framing conditions subsequent, and I wish to refer to some wise words of Lord Wright in Clayton v. Ramsden.[8]

Lord Wright, who agreed with most, but not all, of the statements of the other learned Lords, began his speech with these words: "My Lords, a testator who wishes to leave an estate or "interest subject to a defeasance clause must be very careful, or "his lawyers must be very careful, how the clause is expressed. "Lord Eldon L.C., in 1823, in Fillingham v. Bramley,[9] said: "'There is great difficulty in saying that a forfeiture was incurred, "'when the court cannot see clearly what it was the testator "'meant.' Later, Lord Cranworth more precisely, in Clavering "v. Ellison,[10] said that 'where a vested estate is to be defeated "'by a condition on a contingency that is to happen afterwards, "'that condition must be such that the court can see from the "'beginning, precisely and distinctly, upon the happening of "'what event it was that the preceding vested estate was to "'determine.'"

Then Lord Wright continued: "Lord Cranworth treats the "matter as one to be decided as it were in vacuo, simply on the "construction of the clause. 'The question,' he said,[11] 'is . . . "'whether you can predicate on reading the will, what it was "'that was to defeat the vested estate?'"

In this case the testator has tried to leave an estate or interest subject to a defeasance clause, and I ask myself: has he been very careful how the clause is expressed? Is the court able to see clearly—those are the words of Lord Eldon—what it was the testator meant? For the reasons which I have already given in part, I do not think that this testator has indicated that.

I should like to read next In re Gape,[12] where the reference was to "permanent residence in England," and it was held by the Court of Appeal "that it is not essential for the validity of a "condition subsequent that the words of the condition shall be "of such a character that the question whether a forfeiture has "or has not occurred, or would or would not be incurred, can be "ascertained not only with certainty but with perfect ease." The clause in that will was, according to the Court of Appeal, "sufficiently precise and definite to give it validity." The words in the will there, putting them quite shortly, were that the beneficiaries should take up permanent residence in England, and again there was a gift over. I quote these words from the judgment of Evershed M.R.[13]: "It is quite clear to me," he said, "that Lord Romer, in his phrase[14] 'can see from the beginning "'precisely and distinctly upon the happening of what events,' "etc., was but restating in his own language the same principle "which Parker J. and Fry J. had stated; in other words, it is not "necessary that the words of the condition should be of such a "character that the question whether forfeiture has or has not "occurred or would or would not be incurred can be ascertained "not only with certainty but with perfect ease. Sometimes, no "doubt, it is a matter of some difficulty to say whether, having "regard to the particular events which have happened (and, as "all the world knows, sometimes the actual events are of a most "unusual and unforeseen character) the forfeiture has, according "to the true construction of the document, been incurred. But "that aspect of the matter is not essential to the validity of the "condition, as is illustrated by Bromley v. Tryon,[15] a decision "of the House of Lords. That was a case of a shifting clause "under a will whereby certain settled estates became divested "upon the happening of certain rather complex events," and then there is a quotation from the speech of Lord Simonds L.C. in that case, which is the last to which I shall refer.

Reading with care those words of Evershed M.R., I of course agree, with great respect, that it may often be a matter of some difficulty to ascertain whether a forfeiture has occurred; but my trouble in this case is that I do not know what the original condition means. It is not a question of endeavouring to find out whether the forfeiture has occurred; I must first decide what the devisee Irene must do to protect her estate. As I have said, I think the expression "provide a home" not only extremely vague but quite devoid of any intelligible signification. It is not a difficult expression; but, I think, an unintelligible one. I agree that in many cases a man may be said to be "providing a "home" for someone, if, for example, he feeds him, gives him board and lodging, entertains him and gives him pocket-money and so forth. That, of course, would be a case in which a home would be provided for the person in question to the fullest extent; but what if the pocket-money be stopped, the food reduced, if he be compelled to wear shabby clothes whilst the other man is handsomely dressed? All such questions seem to me to introduce an element of uncertainty into this conception of "providing a home," so that no real attention can be paid to that expression in so far as it is alleged to create legal obligations.

Bromley v. Tryon,[16] in the House of Lords, was, as Evershed

M.R. pointed out in In re Gape,[17] a complicated case. Really, however, the only difficulty was what was meant by the "bulk" of a settled estate where the estate was subject to alterations in size, character, value and so forth, and might be partly land and partly capital moneys. As the House of Lords concluded that the expression meant anything over half, and that, accordingly, the clause was not void for uncertainty, I should have thought that that was a case in which the doubtful word "bulk" could be construed by the court. The court would say that "bulk" meant the greater part, 51 per cent., just over half. After that conclusion, there would not, in my view, be any uncertainty at all about the matter and, although Lord Simonds L.C. reminded us that the principles of Sifton v. Sifton[18] and Clayton v. Ramsden[19] must be applied with caution, I do not think that there is anything in his speech or his decision which really helps those who are trying now to clarify a wholly unintelligible condition subsequent.

At the conclusion of his speech Lord Simonds said[20]: "In "deference to the argument of learned counsel who sought to "illustrate the alleged obscurity of the relevant words by refer-"ence to the facts of the present case, I will only add this. "It does not follow because the words of a defeasance clause "are sufficiently clear to give the clause validity that there may "not be cases in which its application is difficult, and I appre-"hend that, if there is a real doubt, the court will show the same "favour to a vested estate in applying the clause as it does in "construing it. But in the present case I do not find in the facts "as proved, whether as illustrative of the difficulty of construc-"tion or of application, anything which would lead me to a "conclusion favourable to the appellants." Then he said that he saw no sort of ambiguity in those words, though the result of them might be capricious.

For myself, I think that nobody can say that the expression "providing a home" for a person as a condition subsequent is free from ambiguity. I should have thought that it is not merely ambiguous, but of no ascertainable significance at all.

In Clayton v. Ramsden,[21] in the course of the argument, one of their Lordships, I think Lord Romer, said that a condition subsequent must never be a condition in which a standard has to be applied. Any attempt to introduce standards into the condition subsequent will create difficulty, and I have often thought of those words; if one has to apply a standard and is not told what standard to apply, the condition is not one which can be properly imported into the conditions. In the present case, what sort of "home" do the words "provide a home" mean? How comfortable is it to be? Is it to be a mere shelter from the elements or a place where, so to speak, one feeds with the family or eats one's meals below stairs or what? Nobody can tell; it is all entirely unqualified. Joyce J., in In re Richardson,[22] had at any rate this guidance, that the person for whom the home was to be provided was to have it free of all costs or charges of any kind whatsoever. I agree that, even then, that left a good deal to be worked out. Was he to have his clothes provided? I should have thought that it was a case of board and lodging. There are not, however, any such words in this case, and I feel bound to hold that the condition is void for uncertainty.

There are other points, on which I shall not enlarge at any length. Nowadays some allowances are made for assisting the maintenance of persons afflicted, as this unfortunate woman is; and it may be a matter of some importance to know whether she has or has not a legal right to maintenance under the terms of the will. In any case, I think that I should make it perfectly clear that I cannot in this case do anything save hold the condition void. I am not quite certain how the condition could be defeated. It is, I suppose, admitted that, even if it were valid, Irene's legal rights would become indefeasible if she chose to grant a lease of the property to her husband. There, again, however, I cannot believe that the testator contemplated that Irene, the eldest daughter, would not be able to handle any of his money or treat as her own one stick of his furniture, but would have to live in constant anticipation of some elaborate inquiry being instituted whether or not she was complying with the legal condition.

In my view, in the absence of an express gift over, the proper way of construing these words is to regard them as precatory, merely a guide to what the testator's aim and object was in choosing this one daughter as the recipient of his bounty, although the words themselves, I agree, are not expressed in the form of a request but are drafted as a condition. For the reasons which I have tried to explain, I think that they must be construed not as a condition, although in form that would appear to be their result.

I shall accordingly declare that the condition is void for uncertainty, and that Irene takes the whole of the estate beneficially.

Declarations accordingly.

Certificate — Sale of goods — Engineer — Secondhand machines to be supplied with "Hunt Engineering Certificate that they have been "fully reconditioned to their satisfaction"—Inspection by Hunt Engineering Company on seller's instructions—Hunt reports to seller tendered as certificates—Breach of contract—Certificates in rem—Certificates in personam—Position of certifier—Whether duty not to influence certifier — Implied standard of quality — Meaning of "fully reconditioned."

A seller had let out earth-moving plant and machinery on hire to contractors by a contract which provided that "on the completion of the hire each machine will be . . . reconditioned by "you" [the contractors] " . . . under the supervision and to the "satisfaction of the Hunt Engineering Company and the hire will "cease on . . . the issuance of their certificate that the machines "have been satisfactorily overhauled on a fully reconditioned "basis." The Hunt Engineering Company, whom the seller instructed to act on his behalf under that contract, was a company which inspected and reported on machinery and whose "certificate" was universally recognized as the mark of a good machine. While the work of reconditioning was being carried out under the supervision of Hunts and before their final reports had been made the seller sold the machinery by a contract of sale which provided that "All these machines are to be supplied with the Hunt Engineering "Certificate that they have been fully reconditioned to their satisfaction." Both parties thought that Hunts had an "A" standard which was the equivalent of 85 per cent. new, but in fact their notion of 85 per cent. was incorrect and Hunt's standard, though high, varied for different parts of the machine and was subject to instructions received from their client, and the company did not regard themselves as certifying but as reporting to their customer for whom alone their report was intended. The final reports on each machine forwarded by Hunts to the seller, and tendered by the seller to the buyers as certificates under the contract of sale, were headed "Inspection report" and stated, inter alia, that the unit "was accepted as reconditioned to the "required standards." The reconditioning of the machines was subsequently found to be unsatisfactory and the buyers claimed damages against the seller for breach of contract:—

Held, (1) that on the construction of the contract of sale the parties contemplated that the certificate to be issued by Hunts would be a certificate in rem, that was, a certificate certifying a standard of quality extraneous to the contract, either the certifier's own standard or one taken from some public or independent source, as opposed to a certificate in personam dealing only with a particular contract and addressed only to particular parties and which, although it might be a certificate of quality, did not carry the same meaning to all the world but might have to be interpreted in the light of particular contractual requirements or of information known only to the addressees; that there were, accordingly, implied provisions in the contract (a) that the machinery would be fully reconditioned up to Hunt standards; (b) that a valid certificate by Hunts in the terms prescribed was conclusive that the machinery had been fully reconditioned up to that standard; and (c) an undertaking by the seller to supply such a certificate.

(2) That since Hunts did not certify in rem for the benefit of all who might be concerned but in personam for the benefit of a particular contract (in this case the contract of hire) and a particular customer who knew what his contract was, the words "accepted as reconditioned to the required standards" in the documents put forward as certificates must, on the construction of the documents, be interpreted as "the standards you" [the seller] "required us to adopt"; that a certificate to satisfy the contract of sale must contain a binding decision upon the quality of the machines and be unambiguous and readily understandable and in the terms of the contract; and that it followed, therefore, that the "inspection reports" were not a compliance with the contract of sale and were not conclusive as to the standard of reconditioning, and the seller, accordingly, was in breach of contract.

Held, further, that as the parties had contracted in relation to a standard of quality set up by Hunts that was the standard to be applied by the court in assessing damages.

Equitable Trust Co. of New York v. Dawson Partners (1927) 27 Ll.L.Rep. 49 applied.

Observations on the implication from a contract of a duty not to influence a certifier.

The first defendants, Traps Tractors Ld., owned earth-moving machinery, tractors and plant, which it let out on hire to contractors. The second defendants, Plant Sales and Exchange Ld., bought and sold such plant. In April, 1952, the third defendant, one Francis Gaster, who owned substantially all the shares in and was the only active director of both companies, put the first defendants into voluntary liquidation, intending to sell all the company's plant. On June 4, 1952, the plant in question, six D.8 caterpillar tractors advertised as new 1950 complete with P.C.U. and Le Tourneau scrapers, and four T.D.14 tractors, also with Le Tourneau scrapers, was advertised for sale in "The Contract Journal." The advertisement was put in by the second defendants who owned a 43 R.B. [Ruston Bucyrus] excavator (not relevant to this report) which was also advertised for sale. The advertisement stated that all the plant was "in the finest "condition" and the tractors were advertised as being sold with "Hunt A certificate."

In February, 1950, Gaster had entrusted the management of the six D.8 tractors to Joe Beaton Ld. of Hatfield, and in March, 1951, he contracted with Richard Costain Ld. for the hire of all six for a minimum period of 54 weeks. The contract required Costains to maintain the machines in first-class condition, and further provided: "On the completion of the hire "each machine will be overhauled and reconditioned by you "[Costains] at your cost under the supervision and to the "satisfaction of the Hunt Engineering Company and the hire will " cease on the date of the issuance of their certificate that the " machines have been satisfactorily overhauled on a fully " reconditioned basis." The contract also provided that if, during the hire, for the convenience of the operators, fractures or breakages had been welded before delivery, the welded parts would be replaced with new parts, or with secondhand parts if such were acceptable to Hunts; that, in relation to new parts generally, only standard parts would be fitted if they were available, but if not available, British made parts could be substituted if acceptable to Hunts, and that the tyres fitted to the scrapers should, on redelivery be " passed by the Hunt Engineering Company as not " less than 90 per cent. new and free from gashes, which would " lessen this percentage."

The Hunt Engineering Co., referred to in the contract, was the Robert W. Hunt Co., an American corporation carrying on business as consulting engineers, with its head office in Chicago. It had a branch office in London under the management of one Lockwood with a staff of about a dozen inspectors. Its main business was the inspection and certification of new machinery, which it did in all parts of the world, and its certificates were said to be universally recognized as the hallmark of a good machine. In 1952 part of its business was the inspection of and making reports on secondhand machinery. The "Hunt " 'A' certificate" mentioned in the advertisement of June 4 referred to the Robert W. Hunt Co. Gaster had had many dealings previously with Hunts. He had consulted Lockwood about the wording of the clause in the Costain contract and his formal instructions to them to act on his behalf under the contract were given on April 13, 1951.

The Costain contract came to an end in March, 1952, and Costains then began the work of fully reconditioning the tractors under the supervision of Hunts. Towards the end of 1951 the four T.D.14 tractors were sent to Joe Beaton Ld. for reconditioning, and on February 18, 1952, Gaster wrote to Lockwood in relation to these tractors: " We should like them to be recon- " ditioned to your standard so that your fully reconditioned " certificate can be issued on completion of the work." Hunts issued two reports in respect of the T.D.14 tractors, one dated April 21, and the other April 28, 1952. The report on one tractor stated " the completed unit is accepted as reconditioned to the " required standard " and the report on the other described it as " fully overhauled and reconditioned."

In March, 1952, Lockwood wrote to Gaster: " In order to " conserve spare parts it is proposed by the contractor to build " these parts up and re-machine to the caterpillar standard." [Welding.] " The resultant repair will, in our opinion, be satis- " factory and acceptable to us." Gaster at first instructed Hunts that the contract must be rigidly adhered to and that replacement by new parts must be undertaken; but after it had been pointed out to him that the special provision in the contract related only to fractures and breakages and not to worn parts he withdrew his instructions, informing Lockwood that his contract did not "prohibit the building up of worn parts by welding to your satis-"faction. . . ."

At the end of April Gaster received from Hunts several reports concerning two of the D.8 tractors with their accompanying scrapers. The reports were based on "final inspection," and stated that the machinery had been "reconditioned to the "required standards and to our satisfaction," but they also stated that it had not been repainted and did not state that the tyres were 90 per cent. Gaster spoke to Lockwood about these points and Lockwood said they had not yet issued final reports, and they would see that the machines were painted and the scraper tyres made 90 per cent. Further progress reports were made during May, but nothing final.

On June 9, 1952, the plaintiffs, who were investment brokers with experience in the commercial handling of earth-moving machinery, and who had seen the advertisement in "The Contract "Journal," arranged a meeting with Gaster. They met him again on June 11 when a deal was made for the sale to them of two D.14 tractors with scrapers and equipment for £4,000 each, and three D.8 tractors with their scrapers and other equipment for £12,000 each.

Both parties agreed that Hunts had an "A" standard which was the equivalent of 85 per cent. new, or virtually new, and on June 12 a letter confirming the sales was written by the liquidator of the first defendants, in which the machines were said to be sold "as and where lying," and which expressly stated: "All "these machines are to be supplied with the Hunt Engineering "certificate that they have been fully reconditioned to their satisfaction." In the final paragraph of the letter, the liquidator stated that the final certificates had not yet been received from Hunts. He enclosed such reports as Gaster then had and said: "The balance of the reports have been promised shortly and you "may take this as my assurance that you will receive them within "the next week or so."

On the following day, June 13, and also on June 19 and 23, Gaster received further reports relating to the three D.8 tractors and scrapers which had been sold on June 12, and also to one other D.8 tractor. The reports described them as "used "reconditioned," specified, as Gaster had required, that painting had been carried out, and stated in conclusion that the tractor "is considered to be satisfactorily reconditioned for normal "service with the usual care and maintenance required by this "class of equipment." The scrapers were described as being "reconditioned under our inspector's supervision." It was noted that they had been painted, it was stated that tyres had been removed and examined for interior defects and refitted, and the conclusion in each case was as follows: "The scope of the "inspection made, limited owing to it not having been possible "to give any load working trials, has proved to our satisfaction "that this Le Tourneau scraper unit has been reconditioned to a "satisfactory standard and it is accepted as a unit suitable for "immediate service."

Shortly after the sale Gaster asked Lockwood to send up their inspector so that he could have the final certificates. He was told that an inspector was not available and that the only thing that he was needed for was the tyres. Gaster was aware that no tyres had been removed for inspection, and as a result of conversations Hunt's inspector noted in his report on June 19: "The contractors are taking responsibility for inside of tyres to "be examined by them . . . the tyres are considered acceptable "for a good period of life but are not 90 per cent. new. . . ." In fact, the true condition of a tyre, whether 90 per cent. or 70 per cent. (Hunt's standard) cannot properly be ascertained without internal examination.

On about June 23 Gaster received word that the blade of one of the scrapers attached to a D.8 tractor sold on June 12 required a new cutting edge, and he wrote to Lockwood on June 24 asking that particular attention be paid to all blades and cutting edges. By the following day he had read through the reports on the scrapers and he wrote to Lockwood as follows: "I "notice that there is an apparent discrepancy in the description "of the condition as compared with some of your other reports. "I think I have mentioned this before, but as you know, the "arrangements were that these tractors and scrapers were to be "'. . . reconditioned under the supervision and to the satisfaction "'of the Hunt Engineering Company to enable them to issue "'their certificate that the machines have been satisfactorily "'overhauled on a fully reconditioned basis' and I do feel that "all your certificates should bear that phraseology, and not that "they have been reconditioned to a satisfactory standard, as "that may cover anything."

Later in the day, he receive some more details about the new cutting edge which gave him a very severe shock. He wrote again on June 25: "You will remember that the whole basis of "the reconditioning of these machines was that they would be "'. . . reconditioned under the supervision and to the satisfaction "'of the Hunt Engineering Company to enable them to issue "'their certificate that the machines have been satisfactorily "'overhauled on a fully reconditioned basis,' and I mentioned "when I saw you last that I was a little afraid that the super-"vision of the scrapers was not being undertaken on this basis, "as the reports on these valuable pieces of equipment which cost "nearly £4,000 each today showed what appeared to be the result "of only a cursory examination. This means that the machines "would be handed back to us with your certificate with Costains "free from any further liability, but with the machines not

"overhauled on a fully reconditioned basis and we would then, "most probably, have to bear the cost of the further repairs "required. Two or three days ago—on June 23—your report was "issued that this scraper has been reconditioned to a satisfactory "standard and was acceptable for immediate service. Already "this morning I have written you a note drawing your attention "to what I consider to be the inadequacy of this standard of "certificate, as it did not include the wording '. . . satisfactorily "'overhauled, on a fully reconditioned basis,' and I have now "ascertained that this machine was booked, with a tractor, for "hire with Wimpeys, but when their inspector went up a day or "so ago, he immediately pointed out that it required a new "cutting edge. . . .

"The result of this is that the machines cannot go out on "hire, which involves considerable loss, but worst of all that this "very obvious defect has been passed by your inspector even "after we have asked you to be specially careful to see that "nothing was missed in the reconditioning. I have asked "Costains to proceed with the necessary work which they are "doing, but I do feel that some explanation is necessary, "especially as there are still three more scrapers and three more "tractors to pass. If I may, I would again emphasize that every "final certificate of yours bears the stipulated wording '. . . satis-"'factorily overhauled on a fully reconditioned basis,' and if you "are unable for any reason to give this certificate, then the "supervision cannot have been carried out adequately as was "agreed by you when accepting our instructions."

On June 26 Lockwood replied about the cutting edge, suggesting the possibility of an error in the number of the scraper. On the same day he replied also to Gaster's longer letter of complaint. He wrote: "Your remarks have been carefully noted "and we feel it incumbent to point out that the reports on these "particular units had perforce to be moderated from a fully "reconditioned basis owing to the agreement with your good selves "that the contractor was to be given full permission to remove, "examine and refit all tyres without our inspector being given "the opportunity of examining them internally. This point was "expressly emphasized in our progress report No. 25185 of "June 19 in relation to these three units. In view of this we so "framed our final reports on these units so as to omit covering "the inspection of any parts not actually examined by our "inspector and for which we, of course, can accept no respon-"sibility. We trust that this explanation makes clear to you "the reason for the variation in phraseology mentioned in your "letter."

On June 27, 1952, Gaster offered the three remaining D.8 tractors and scrapers to the plaintiffs at the price of £10,000 each. At a meeting with the chairman of the plaintiff company the plaintiffs finally bought the three tractors for £8,000 each, on the same terms as the sale of June 12, the sale being confirmed by letter on June 30; but nothing was said by Gaster about the difficulties which had arisen over the wording of the Hunt certificates. Only one of the tractors sold on June 27 had by then been reported upon by Hunts, and Gaster had not as yet supplied under either of the contracts any documents which he tendered as certificates. On July 4, he wrote to Lockwood: "I have been reading through many of the reports which have "been sent, and to put it frankly I am a little perturbed . . ." and he asked for an interview. A meeting took place on July 8 when Gaster said that he wanted the wording "fully recon-"ditioned" to be on the certificates, as that was the wording in the Costain contract. Lockwood, seeing no material difference between that term and any other term used in the reports such as "reconditioned to a satisfactory standard" offered no objection to the words "fully reconditioned" and on July 10, he wrote to Gaster enclosing twelve reports, "duly revised," a separate one for each D.8 tractor and scraper. They were all clearly described as "revised" and as "inspection reports," not as certificates, and all in the form of the one set out below.

"ROBERT W. HUNT COMPANY, Engineers.

London, June 19, 1952.

"L.O. 41882.

INSPECTION REPORT No. R. 25186 (REVISED).

"Clients.	Messrs. Traps Tractors Ld., 93 Lancaster Gate, London, W.2.
"Place of "Inspection.	Widdrington, Northumberland.
"Date of "Final "Inspection.	June 15, 1952.
"Equipment "Inspected.	One—Used and fully reconditioned caterpillar tractor, model 2 U. No. 7965, complete with Le Tourneau winch No. P.34966 R.6.F.US.7 and hydraulically operated angledozer equipment.
"Tests.	The above tractor and equipment have been subjected to operational tests carried out under 'No Load' conditions and the engine, gears, transmissions, brakes, clutches and hydraulic gear found to operate satisfactorily for normal use.
"Inspection.	Supervision of the reconditioning of the caterpillar tractor and equipment has been carried out to ensure the adequacy of the work and that the workmanship is to the required standard.

MINSTER TRUST LD. v. TRAPS TRACTORS LD.

After completion of the operational tests a thorough and careful visual examination was made of the whole unit and power control together with the angledozer equipment to verify the general condition of the unit which was found to be satisfactory for service under normal conditions.

" Conclusions. The inspections made during the course of the reconditioning of the caterpillar tractor No. 7965 and the trials run after reconditioning have proved that this unit has been overhauled in a workmanlike and satisfactory manner and the completed unit is accepted as reconditioned to the required standards.

" Remarks. In view of the fact that this is a second-hand vehicle the obligation assumed by us in furnishing inspection reports on this class of material extends only to the client for whom the report is made, which report represents our opinion on the day of inspection only, based entirely upon the reports of our inspectors, all of whom we endeavour to select with due care. We believe their reports are accurate, but the conclusions reached by them are matters of opinion, the accuracy of which we do not guarantee, and we shall not be responsible for damage or loss of any kind which may be connected in any way with our inspection or reports.

" DB:OMC.

Respectfully submitted,
ROBERT W. HUNT COMPANY
(Sgn.) Lockwood."

The six reports for the scrapers were done in the same way as for the tractors, each scraper being described as used and fully reconditioned. Each of the six contained only one operative paragraph headed " Inspection," which was in these terms: " The Le " Tourneau scraper, subject of this report, has been reconditioned " under our inspector's supervision to ensure that the work " carried out was adequate and the workmanship is to the required " standard. All working parts have been examined and accepted " as being in good condition for further service. New pulley pins " and link pins have been fitted where necessary. The hopper " plates have been reconditioned and are free from buckling and " dents. New rubbing plates as required have been welded " into position. The main frames are sound. Tyres have been " removed and examined by the contractor for interior defects, " and refitted. The whole unit has been painted in the standard " yellow colour. The inspections made during the course of the " reconditioning of the Le Tourneau scraper No. s.28788-LP-F-SP " proved that this unit has been reconditioned in a workmanlike

"and satisfactory manner, and the completed unit is accepted as "reconditioned to the required standards."

The liquidator forwarded those reports to the plaintiffs on July 16, 1952, and those reports with the exception of the April reports on two tractors sent to them following the first sale, were all that the plaintiffs saw in relation to the D.8 tractors.

Some of the D.8 units were sent out to work by the plaintiffs; tyres had to be replaced and the operators were dissatisfied with the condition of the machines. In the result, Gaster suggested that the machines be examined by an independent engineer. The examination was duly carried out and the engineer reported that the standard of reconditioning was not such as they would expect if the machines had been fully reconditioned to 85 per cent. of new.

The plaintiffs claimed damages against all three defendants for breach of contract and/or warranty and/or duty in and about the sales to them of the machinery, alleging, inter alia, breach of oral warranties as to quality given by Gaster personally and on behalf of the first defendants. They contended that there had been a breach of a term, or of an implied term, of the contracts, in that none of the tractors had Hunt "A" certificates, nor, alternatively, had they been fully reconditioned to the satisfaction of Hunts. They further contended that the first defendants, acting by Gaster, had influenced or affected Hunts in relation to the standard of reconditioning required, and in relation to the wording of their certificates.

The first defendants denied liability. They contended that they had fully performed the terms of the contracts by supplying Hunt certificates and/or reports such as were intended between the parties.

The plaintiffs' action against the second defendants related solely to the R.B.43 excavator and is not material to this report.

Sir Hartley Shawcross Q.C., Eustace Roskill Q.C., Michael Kerr and R. A. MacCrindle for the plaintiffs.

Kenneth Diplock Q.C., C. G. Armstrong Cowan and Gordon Hodgson for the defendants.

The following cases not cited in the judgment were referred to in argument on the issues relevant to this report: Lord Forres v. Scottish Flax Co. Ld.[1]; Johnston v. Chestergate Hat Manufacturing Co. Ld.,[2] and Dean v. Prince.[3]

Cur. adv. vult.

Gaster did not enter into any personal liability in respect of any of the contracts and that the action against him personally failed, and continued: The action against the first defendants, Traps Tractors Ld., depends upon the allegations relating to the Hunt certificates.

Before considering these certificates, I shall seek to determine what is meant by "fully reconditioned." The term is said by the plaintiffs to have a meaning that is well understood in the trade, as distinct from "reconditioned" simpliciter, which some witnesses thought was meaningless. I do not think there is strong enough evidence to establish for "fully reconditioned" a trade meaning in the strict sense; but also I do not think that its meaning as understood in the trade is really any different from its natural and popular meaning. "Recondition" is not a word to be found in the dictionary, but it obviously means "to put "back into condition"; not, of course, into brand-new condition, but to renew the machine in the sense of giving it a new lease of life. It means more than overhauling or repairing. In any machine there are some parts which are intended to last as long as the machine itself lasts, and the other parts which have a shorter life and need to be renewed from time to time. Reconditioning requires, I think, that the machine should be thoroughly examined—usually that means "stripping down"—to see what renewable parts are worn, and all such parts which are substantially worn should be renewed. To insist that every slightly used part should be scrapped would be absurd. But any part that is left must, I think, have most of its life still in front of it, so that the machine, as a whole, is given, as I say, a new lease of life. When the parties talked of the plant, as they did in this case, as being made 85 per cent. new, their idea was, I think, that it would be as good as if only 15 per cent. of its working life had gone. Inevitably, the decision whether a worn part should be retained or renewed must vary according to the standard exacted by the person responsible, some standards being stricter than others. Hunts had a reputation in the trade for exacting a high standard.

I do not think that "fully" adds much to "reconditioned," but it does add something. The reason why "reconditioned" by itself is distrusted in the trade is, I think, because the word has been seized upon by people who smarten up a machine with a new coat of paint and sell it as reconditioned. "Fully" is thought necessary to exclude that practice. In truth, I think that if a machine was sold as "reconditioned" without qualification, it would not be enough to prove that part of it was reconditioned. But I can see that qualifications might be implied. If, for example, a car was sold as "reconditioned," it might be suggested that the term was intended to apply only to the engine, or something of that sort. The advantage of "fully" is that it expresssly excludes qualifications of this sort. I am satisfied, therefore, that there is a difference which is thought in the trade to be important, and that a certificate of reconditioning simpliciter is not accepable in a contract which calls for full reconditioning.

I can now consider the effect of the certificate clause and the points that are taken on it. It is undisputed that if each of these machines is covered by a valid certificate testifying to Hunts' satisfaction that it is fully reconditioned, the plaintiffs' case must fail, inquiry into the real condition of the machine being then irrelevant. The plaintiffs contend that the inspection reports tendered by the defendants are not certificates within the meaning of the contract, and that, if they are, they are invalid because Lockwood (Hunts' London manager) was improperly influenced by Gaster. The defendants deny any improper influence, and say that in any event nothing short of fraud (which is, of course, not alleged) will invalidate the certificates.

It is convenient to consider first the issue raised by the last contention, for I think that that consideration opens the way to the true interpretation of the certificate clause. There is no general rule of law prohibiting the influencing of certifiers. Apart from fraud, a duty not to influence can only be imposed by an implication arising from contract. Such an implication must, in accordance with settled principles, be both reasonable and necessary, and the contract must be examined to see what it yields in this respect. There is, after all, nothing to prevent a party from requiring that work shall be done to his own satisfaction. He might then choose to act upon the recommendation of an agent. If an agent is named in the contract, it may be plain that he is to function only as the alter ego of his master, and then his master can tell him what to do: see Ranger v. Great Western Railway Co.[1] per Cranworth L.C.,[2] and Lord Brougham.[3] Whether it be the act of the master or the servant, there may be a question (again depending upon the implication to be drawn from the contract) whether the dissatisfaction must be reasonable, or whether it can be capricious or unreasonable so long as it is conceived in good faith. A number of cases on this point are cited in Benjamin on Sale, 8th ed., p. 582. The tendency in modern cases seems to be to require the dissatisfaction to be reasonable.

What has to be ascertined in each case is whether the agent is or is not intended to function independently of the principal. The mere use of the word "certificate" is not decisive. Satisfaction does not necessarily alter its character because it is expressed in the form of a certificate. The main test appears to be whether the certificate is intended to embody a decision that is final and binding on the parties. If it is, then it is in effect an award, and it has the attributes of its arbitral character. It cannot be attacked on the ground that it is unreasonable, as the opinion of a party or the certificate of one who is merely an agent probably can. On the other hand, it must be made independently, for independence is the essence of the arbitral function. If two parties agree to appoint an arbitrator between them, it would be, I think, implied in the contract in order to give it business efficacy (it is not now in practice necessary to consider the point because of the control over the arbitrator which the Arbitration Acts give to the court) that neither side would seek to interfere with his independence. If a party to a contract is permitted to appoint his agent to act as arbitrator in respect of certain matters under the contract, a similar term must be implied; but it is modified by the fact that a man who has to act as arbitrator in respect of some matters, and as servant or agent in respect of others, cannot remain as detached as a pure arbitrator should be.

There is another distinction between certifiers. If work under a contract has to be completed to the satisfaction of a certifier, it may mean that his duty is merely to see that the requirements of the contract are met, or it may mean that he is entitled to impose a standard of his own. It may be that his standard is that to which the parties submit and that it constitutes the only provision in the contract about quality; or it may be that his standard is an added protection, so that performance under the contract must satisfy both the contract requirements and the certifier. Examples of the latter are to be found in Newton Abbot Development Ld. v. Stockman Bros.[4] and Petrofina S. A. of Brussels v. Compania Italiana Transporto Olii Minerali of Genoa.[5] So far as I am aware, there is no case in which a certifier who has to certify only according to his own standards has been held to be an arbitrator. It is not, however, possible under this head to draw a hard and fast line between the two categories. There must always be some room for the discretion of the certifier, however tightly the contract may be drawn. Even if he has to certify only whether an express term has been complied with, there must be room for the exercise of his judgment. Cammell Laird & Co. Ld. v. Manganese Bronze and Brass Co. Ld.[6] is a case in which it was held that the satisfaction of a third party operated only within the requirements of the contract; that is to say, it was not permissible for the third party to put upon the seller obligations as to quality outside the contract. Lord Wright said[7]: "It is true that the clause cannot be intended to deal with "matters outside the scope of the respondents' obligations under "the contract, or to enlarge these obligations except in so far as "these are enlarged because there is super-added the judgment "of a third party."

Allied to this, there is a distinction between a certificate that is given only for the purposes of a particular contract and one that, although it may be called for by a particular contract, is not particularly related to that contract. The certifier may not then be an agent of either party. That is so in the case of a Lloyd's certificate or of a certificate by a public analyst, or others that may be obtainable on a fee. It has now become quite common to include among documents which have to be tendered against payment a certificate of inspection or of quality. Certificates of this sort are addressed to all the world or to all who may be concerned. If the phrase is not used as more than a label, they might be called certificates in rem, as compared with certificates in personam, which concern only particular contracts and are addresssed only to particular parties. The former carry the same meaning to all who read them. The latter may have to be interpreted in the light of particular contractual requirements or of information known only to the addressees. A certificate in rem certifies a standard of quality extraneous to the contract. It may be the certifier's own standard or it may be taken from some public or independent source. A certificate in personam may be based on the certifier's own standards or on standards prescribed by the contract. It may be a certificate of quality or a certificate that a contract has been carried out.

Finally, there is a distinction between a certifier whose function has been completed before the contract is entered into and one who has a function to perform under the contract. In the latter case there is room for an implied undertaking that he will not be improperly influenced. In the former case there can be no room for an undertaking that relates to the future. If anything is to be implied, it must be a warranty about the past. There may be grounds for implying a warranty that the certifier has not been improperly influenced, but, so far as I know, the point has never been decided. All the leading cases on the topic, such as Hickman & Co. v. Roberts [8] and Compania Panamena Europa Navegacion v. Leyland (Frederick) & Co. Ld.,[9] concern certifiers whose duties arose out of the contract. It seems clear that there cannot be the same necessity for implying a warranty in respect of the past as there is for implying an undertaking for the future. If a building owner makes the obligation of payment conditional on his architect's certificate of quality, he must not, for example, instruct his architect not to be content with less than three coats of paint, for he has impliedly undertaken that he will leave his architect free to judge independently, either by reference to the contract requirements or to his own standards of quality, whichever the case may be, how many coats of paint are required. But if he sells a completed house and agrees to supply with it his architect's certificate of quality, does he thereby warrant that he has not told his architect to be content with two coats of paint? It may be argued that there is no necessity for an implied warranty of that sort, and that the buyer is

Devlin J.

sufficiently protected by the fact that the seller would, in his own interests, have been concerned to get the best quality he could.

These are the sort of points that have to be answered, and the answers depend upon the construction of the clause, which is common to all the contracts: "All these machines are to be "supplied with the Hunt Engineering certificate that they have "been fully reconditioned to their satisfaction." In form, the clause does no more than require a certain document to be supplied. Apart from what is inherent in it, there is not in the contract any express term about quality. It is, of course, to be assumed that the seller will not be able to obtain Hunts' engineering certificate unless the goods are in fact of a certain quality, but the contract does not directly provide that they should be so. It is, however, manifest that such a provision is implicit. The defendants do not argue that, if the certificate is invalidated, the contract is one for machinery "as and where "lying" with no terms about quality in it. Both sides are agreed that the contract is for machinery of a quality that is described as fully reconditioned. They differ in this detail, that the plaintiffs argue that, in the absence of a certificate, it is for the court to fix, in the light of the evidence, what is a reasonable standard of fully reconditioned quality, while the defendants contend that it is fixed by the contract itself as the Hunt standard. For reasons which it is more convenient to give later, I prefer the defendants' contention. The plaintiffs do not argue that the clause is severable into two independent parts, the first being a term as to quality, and the second a term that Hunts are to be satisfied, so that the seller must comply with both. I think that is right; that is to say, the clause must be construed as a whole, and it was not intended that quality could be questioned if a valid certificate was supplied; the certificate is not merely an "added "protection." The result is that, if the defendants supply a certificate in accordance with the contract, it is conclusive that the goods are of the contract quality. If they do not, that question is left open for determination in the ordinary way. On the other hand, the defendants do not (and I think could not) argue that they have an option either to supply a certificate or to tender goods that are in fact of the contract quality. They have undertaken to supply a certificate, and the consequences of their failure to do so will not be merely that the question of contract quality is left open, but also that they have broken a term of the contract which might, of itself, and irrespective of actual quality, sound in substantial damages, for uncertified goods are not as saleable as certified goods, even if both are of the same quality. I say "might" sound in substantial damages, but in fact it is not alleged in this case that the mere lack of a certificate has resulted in anything more than nominal damages. The claim for substantial damages is based on the defective quality of the machinery.

I conclude, therefore, that there is expressed or implied in the clause three provisions as follows: (1) as to quality, the machinery is to be fully reconditioned up to the Hunt standard; (2) a valid certificate by Hunts in the terms prescribed is conclusive that the machinery has in fact been fully reconditioned up to this standard; (3) an undertaking by the seller to supply such a certificate.

It may be objected that there is nothing in the written part of the contract, at any rate, about the Hunt standard, and that the first of the three provisions that I have set out above introduces an unwarranted interpolation. I do not think so. I think it can be justified even on the written term, if it is construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. Under that term, Hunts have to express their satisfaction. They cannot do so without applying either a standard of their own or some other standard. In other words, the distinction is between the certificate of standard quality and the certificate of contract requirements. I think it is quite plain from the evidence by the parties of what was understood in the trade and discussed between them that the former was intended. It was commonly understood in the trade that Hunts had a standard of full reconditioning. If the parties, when they contracted, had been asked: "What is it that "Hunts have got to be satisfied about? Have they got to be satis-"fied that the machinery has been fully reconditioned according "to their own standards, or that it has been fully reconditioned "according to the requirements of a contract made by Gaster, "or that it has been fully reconditioned according to Hunts' own "standards as modified in agreement with Gaster?" the parties would all have agreed that Hunts were intended to certify in relation to their own standards. The other two alternatives would render the certificates valueless, unless one knew what Gaster's requirements were, or what modifications to Hunts' standard had been agreed. No doubt the plaintiffs were aware, if they thought about it, that the work of reconditioning had been done under a contract. But they were not concerned to know, and were not told, who had done the work of reconditioning. Nor were they concerned with the relationship between Hunts and Gaster. It was obvious that Hunts must have supervised the work of reconditioning, but whether they had done so as agents of Gaster or of the reconditioners was irrelevant to the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants. All that Gaster had to do was to supply a Hunt certificate. If his contract with the reconditioners had been that they were to supply him with a Hunt certificate, he could have fulfilled his contract of sale by passing the certificate on.

This was not, therefore, a case in which Hunts were being put forward as the agents of the seller and being endowed by common consent with certain arbitral functions to perform under the contract of sale. They were certifiers, and nothing else. So far as the contract of sale is concerned, there is no need to suppose that they were the agents of Gaster. All he had undertaken to do under the contract was to procure and deliver their certificates. In short, the type of certificate the parties were contracting about is what I have called a certificate in rem. This was not disputed in argument, so I shall merely summarize the evidence that illustrates the point.

Devlin J.

The plant was advertised by Gaster as being sold with Hunt A certificate, it being thought by Gaster, and some others, that Hunts had an "A" standard; Ferguson [chairman of the plaintiff company] thought something similar to A.1 at Lloyds. This standard, the parties agreed, was the equivalent of 85 per cent. new or virtually new. The evidence on this point was common ground, and, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, most of it was obtained from them in cross-examination in order that the defendants might establish (as, in my judgment, they did) that the plaintiffs were really relying throughout upon the Hunt certificate. Thus, Ferguson said that it was a common thing to buy plant on Hunt certificates, and, for example, that people hiring plant often rang up and said: "Has it got an A "certificate?" Hill [a director of the plaintiff company] said that he knew of the Hunt standard as being a hallmark, that everyone in the trade knew of it, and anyone buying or selling equipment would attach great importance as to whether or not it had a Hunt certificate showing that it was up to the Hunt standard. Garrett accepted the term "hallmark," said that the certificates were well known in the trade, and that no one would hesitate to buy on a Hunt certificate. Billingham [an official of the plaintiff company] said that it was a well-known standard, and that the greatest reliance had been placed upon it in the trade of buying and selling. Gaster also said that Hunts' standard was well known in the trade. When, in cross-examination, he was asked whether he knew the distinction between reconditioned and fully reconditioned, he answered: "I only know all my life, "that is Hunts' certificate, that is Hunts' standard." Asked again about the Hunt certificate, he said: "It is done to their "own standards in their own way. They do not have a variety of "standards." Davis said that the Hunt standard or the Hunt certificate was well known in the trade and highly thought of.

All this evidence seems to me to make it abundantly plain that what these parties were contracting about, and what the contract called for, was a certificate of quality supplied by persons who were thought by the trade to fulfil the same sort of function as the Classification Societies fulfil in shipbuilding and surveying. The root of the trouble in the present case is that Hunts do not in fact fulfil any such function. Their main function, as I have said, is to issue certificates recording their examination of new plant. A specimen form of certificate in use for this purpose was put in. This does not certify any quality, but only that the material "has been accepted under the instructions provided."

It is clear that Hunts' reputation must be based upon the fact that they receive or accept instructions to inspect only high quality material, coupled with the fact that no doubt they usually exercise a high degree of care in carrying out their inspections. Except upon this assumption, the certificate is worthless to anyone who does not know what are "the instructions provided." It is, therefore, plain that, even in relation to new material, Hunts do not certify "in rem" for the benefit of all who may be concerned. They certify "in personam" in relation to a particular contract, and for the benefit of a particular customer who knows what his contract is.

In respect of second-hand material, they not only refuse to act, except for a particular customer, but they do not certify at all. In these circumstances, I cannot refrain from observing that it is unfortunate that they have done nothing to stop the impression getting about in the trade in this country in second-hand plant that there is a Hunt certificate; and, indeed, that they have regularly accepted, as in this case, instructions to issue certificates. The expression "Hunt A certificate," Mr. Lockwood blandly observed at the beginning of his evidence, "is quite "unknown to us, except by hearsay: we have heard it; but, of "course, we disregard it." He said that Hunts did not issue certificates, but reports. When he was taxed with the fact that, in respect of the T.D.14s, he had accepted instructions to issue a fully reconditioned certificate, he said: "It is a word that has "been very, very loosely used."

If Lockwood's denials involved only a question of terminology, it would not matter. But it is plain that they go much deeper than that. It would be going too far to say that there is no such thing as a Hunt standard. In one sense, there is. Hunts do not usually undertake any work of inspection unless the machinery is stripped down. That must mean that they do not usually concern themselves with anything except full reconditioning. In deciding what parts are sufficiently worn to require replacement, Hunts have a set of standard rules which they apply to different parts of the machine and which are common to all their inspectors. The notion of 85 per cent., which the parties to this contract thought was their standard, is in fact incorrect, and, as Lockwood said, meaningless. You cannot have a universal standard for all parts. There have to be different standards for different parts. Thus, as I have already mentioned, Hunts take a standard of 70 per cent. for tyres. Another example given by Lockwood is that they allow a crankshaft up to two regrinds. These are examples of individual parts where there are fixed requirements. In other cases, the inspector must often have to fix his own requirements according to his experience, which is, of course, in the Hunt organization, a pooled experience. This body of requirements constitutes what may be called a Hunt standard. No doubt it is a high one, and Hunts have acquired a reputation for care in seeing that it is complied with. But, if it were really a standard of quality, in the sense of being a hallmark, it would be necessary for Hunts never to depart from it. In fact, it is no more than the standard which Hunts apply, subject to any instructions which they get from their client. If the client prescribes a modified standard, Hunts will apply it, for they do not regard themselves as certifying anything, but merely as reporting to their customer, who is nearly always the buyer, upon the quality of the goods he is getting, or of the work that is being carried out under contract with him. Lockwood put it: "We establish our own standard, but if our customer requires us "to exceed it or diminish it we do so in accordance with his "instructions and report accordingly." In the particular case of the Costain contract, he regarded himself as modifying the Hunt usual standard in respect of tyres. In relation to welding, he thought the decision to accept it or not was a matter of principle and was taken in agreement with Gaster. In relation to painting, he spoke of being "instructed to defer final release "until such time as they had been painted."

The reports are intended only for his own customers. The final report is not intended as a complete embodiment of any conclusion. All the reports are to be read cumulatively. If there has been a modification from Hunts' usual standards, the report may contain a reference to it; or, on the other hand, if it is a matter that is well known to the customer, it may not be referred to. Thus, one D.8, tractor 65, was noted by Costains on delivery to them as having a cracked and welded frame for which they would not be responsible when reconditioning. This was known to Gaster and therefore not mentioned in the Hunt report; but it could not, of course, be known to a purchaser from Gaster. It is thus quite plain from this account of Hunts' practice that Lockwood was not quibbling or playing with words when he was insistent that he provided reports and not certificates.

The evidence of what Hunts were actually thinking and doing does not, of course, throw any light on the true effect of the contract. I have set it out here, perhaps a little prematurely, so as to bring out into the open the nature of the misunderstanding that has, I think, prevented the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants from working in the way in which it was intended to work. But I must now return to the contract and consider whether the documents which have been tendered under it are certificates within the meaning of the clause. The clause, as I have said, calls for a certificate from Hunts that the machines have been fully reconditioned up to their standard. Whether it has been broken depends upon the character of the documents supplied by Hunts and not upon what Hunts thought they were supplying or intended to supply.

Mr. Diplock has pointed out that until a very late stage of the case the plaintiffs never appeared to doubt that what they got were certificates which apparently conformed to the contract; their case has been that the certificates were improperly procured.

The documents were sent on July 17 and were acknowledged by Billingham without comment on July 23. They appear to have been filed away without study or discussion with Ferguson or Hill. It seems to have been thought that any bit of paper with Hunts' name on was good enough for the contract. Billingham said that he had never seen a Hunt certificate or report before, that he had no idea what it was, that they purported to be a Hunt certificate and he accepted them as such and nobody studied them very carefully.

The point that is now taken is that these documents are not certificates at all. In the course of the trial I ruled, though not without hesitation, that the point was open on the pleadings. I gave leave to amend the defence so that the defendants could set up an estoppel. They contend that the plaintiffs represented that they were satisfied with the certificates and that the defendants were thereby induced to refrain from seeking to obtain further certificates. I think that this plea fails. There is no material from which I can imply any representation; and, if the defendants had sought to obtain from Lockwood further certificates, I do not think that they would have got them. I summarize later the evidence from Lockwood, which shows that he would never have given an unqualified certificate. The plaintiffs' conduct, of course, precludes them from rejecting either the certificates or the machines, but I cannot see how it can affect their right to damages.

As I have said, the certificate under this contract has a double function. It is a hallmark which (a) the seller has undertaken shall be put upon the goods, and which (b) is conclusive that the goods are of the contract quality. The fact that the seller has accepted the goods without the hallmark does not preclude him from contending that the goods are not in fact of the contract quality and from claiming damages accordingly. Such a contention has to be determined by the court on its merits unless the seller produces a document which contains a binding decision upon it. If, in truth, the document relied upon does not contain such a decision, I see no evidence that the plaintiffs represented to the defendants that it did. I must therefore examine these documents to see what they amount to, and I shall take first the reports relating to the D.8s.

The first point which the plaintiffs take is that they are not in form certificates; they are not so described and do not in terms certify anything. This is not a point to be brushed aside. I doubt if, for example, a bank paying out money under a letter of credit requiring presentation of a certificate could be expected to accept a document in this form. A document which has to be handled in commerce must be in a form which leaves no reasonable doubt about its nature. But on the facts of this case the plaintiffs' conduct makes it at least difficult for them to rely upon objections of form, at any rate if they stood by themselves. The plaintiffs may not have studied the documents, but they saw what they were and can now hardly contend that they expected something which was labelled as a certificate. I think also that the evidence that Hunts' " certificates " were well known in the trade, combined with Hunts' own evidence that they only issued reports, leads to the inference that the documents that were current in the trade were documents in the form of reports.

I proceed, therefore, to consider the substance and effect of the documents. Their language does not follow the wording of the contract; there is no statement in terms that the machinery had been fully reconditioned to Hunts' satisfaction. I think that the only words that can be regarded as words of certification are in the conclusion that " the completed unit is accepted as " reconditioned to the required standards." What is meant by " the required standards " ? Are the standards those required by the certifier or by the client to whom the report is addressed and for whom presumably the work of reconditioning has been done? Of course, to the plaintiffs themselves and to Gaster, who assumed, though wrongly, that Hunts certified only according to standards of their own, from which they never departed, the words might very well mean " the standards required by us." On the other hand, to one who knew the true facts and the conception that Hunts themselves entertained of their function, the words would mean " to our standards as modified where necessary to meet your instructions." Construed simply from what appears on the face of the document, and without recourse either to the assumed or to true facts, I should interpret the words as meaning " the standards you required us to apply." " Require " is not the natural word to use if all that is meant is " our standards." Upon this construction, I hold that the certificates are not a compliance with the contracts.

On any view, I think that the language used is ambiguous. On the face of it, there are the two possible meanings I have noted. A reasonable man in the position of the plaintiffs (and that is the test I must apply) might well, if he were looking for greater certainty, turn back to the April reports which the defendants had sent on June 12 but expressly not as final certificates. He would find that they contained the phrase " reconditioned " to the required standards and to our satisfaction." He might ask himself whether the later omission of " to our satisfaction " was accidental or deliberate. He might note that the " required " standards " seem to have been satisfied although it was expressly noted that the machines had not been painted, and that there was a defective tyre to be replaced and the replacement had not been examined.

I think that a certificate of this sort must, to satisfy the contract, be unambiguous and readily understandable. When a document is tendered under a contract, the recipient has often to make up his mind whether he is going to pay out money upon it or to accept or reject goods; he has no right and may not have time to cross-examine the certifier or to ask him to clear up doubts. In Equitable Trust Co. of New York v. Dawson Partners,[10] the contract called for "a certificate of quality to be "issued by experts who are sworn brokers." The plaintiffs tendered a certificate issued by only one expert. Viscount Sumner said[11]: "There is no room for documents which are almost the "same, or which will do just as well. Business could not proceed "securely on any other lines." This was a case of documents tendered under a bankers' credit and there is no doubt upon the authorities that such tenders have to be strictly scrutinized. But I do not think that the principle is peculiar to bankers' credits; I think it applies to any sort of commercial dealings where documents of this sort pass under a contract of sale.

Similarly, if the document is looked upon in its character of a final determination upon the quality of the goods, it is equally important that it should be unambiguous. The seller has the advantage of being allowed to supply a document which, if effective, shuts out all further inquiry into the condition of the goods. It is not unreasonable to demand that such a document should be clear and substantially in the terms for which the contract calls. Even if it were established that all Hunts' reports which hitherto have circulated in the trade were in as vague language as this one, it would still not, in my judgment, avail the defendants. What is commonly accepted in the trade can be a guide to the form of document which the parties must be supposed to contemplate, but whether in substance it complies with the contract must depend upon the terms of each particular contract and the terms of each particular certificate. If the contract calls for a document which contains a specified statement, no amount of evidence that other parties to other contracts have been content with looser statements can modify the obligation.

As I have said, the intent of the certifier cannot affect the construction of the certificate except in so far as it is expressed therein. But it may have another bearing on the position. If the defendants could show that the ambiguity was unintentional and could easily be resolved by the grant of another certificate in a proper form, they might be able to contend that the damages were nominal; or the point might help them in their plea of estoppel. I think the evidence shows clearly not only that Lockwood did not intend to issue a certificate in any form, but also that he did not intend to express in his reports his unqualified satisfaction with the reconditioning. I have already summarized the evidence in which he agrees that he departed from Hunts' standards in respect of the tyres certainly and, perhaps, also the welding. He wrote the letter which I have already quoted, in which he says that he does not take responsibility for any unexamined part. His evidence put the matter beyond doubt. He said: "It has never been the policy of "our company, nor is it accepted in any inspection organization,

Devlin J.

"to certify the quality of second-hand machinery. It is only "being reported upon, factual reports. It was never our intention "to accept or to issue a certificate." Again he was asked: "You do not accept the responsibility of certifying between two "different parties, a vendor and purchaser, as to what the con-"dition of second-hand material may be?" and he answered, "No." He said that if he had been told that the reports were required for the purposes of a contract of sale with a third party, he would not have issued them, still less have altered them. Later he was asked about the reports generally, and it was put to him: "If you were asked now, on the basis of these documents, "to make a report that it was fully reconditioned to your "standards, you would not be able to do so, would you?" He answered, "No."

I conclude, therefore, that these documents are not certificates in form, in substance or in intent, and, accordingly, that there has been a breach of contract in respect of the D.8s. I have reached my conclusion by holding that the sort of certificate which must be supplied is what I have called the certificate of quality given in rem, and that nothing else will do. It may be said that one can reach the same conclusion without trying to classify or define too closely the nature of the certificate for which the contract calls, but by simply implying a warranty that, whatever sort of certificate is supplied, it must be the result of the uninfluenced and independent judgment of the certifier applying his own standards.

It may be so; but there are difficulties about this which I have not been able to resolve to my own satisfaction. I prefer to obtain the result by the construction, in the light of all the circumstances, of the clause which the parties have used, rather than by the implication of a warranty. I have already indicated my doubts about the implication of a warranty relating to the past. I think there would be a difficulty also about defining the limits of such a warranty. Does the seller warrant absolutely that the certifier will apply his own standards? If so, is he liable for error or for negligence on the part of the certifier, although he (the seller) in no way contributes to it? Or is it merely a warranty that he has not himself effectively interfered in the process of certification? If the implied duty not to interfere only comes into existence upon the creation of the contract, how should it be applied in a case such as this, where the contract contemplates that the question of certification is already settled and in fact it is not? Must it be proved that the seller intended to influence? Is it enough to show that he did an act which was reasonably calculated to influence the certifier, or must there be something in the nature of fraud or unfairness? I shall not attempt to answer any of these questions. On the view I have taken, they do not arise; and I have, I hope, found such facts as will enable them to be answered if they should arise hereafter.

There is, however, one point upon which I think that I ought to express my finding precisely, in case it should be material. I am satisfied that there was not, on the part of Gaster, any conscious intention to influence Lockwood or to deflect him from his duty or to do anything underhand. No charge of moral turpitude was made against Gaster, but I think I ought to expand my finding so as to cover some of the suggestions that were made.

It was suggested to him, on the basis of an entry in his diary, that on May 26, 1952, he had sent for Berthon, one of Hunts' inspectors, to come and see him at his office. He had no recollection of any such interview, and I am not satisfied it took place. He did, I think, give instructions to Lockwood in relation both to welding and to the inspection of tyres. I am satisfied that he thought that in so doing he was merely waiving the benefit (in the case of the welding he had satisfied himself there was no special benefit) in the provisions of his contract with Costains, and had no thought of getting Hunts to depart from the enforcement of their usual standards.

Much emphasis was placed on the final paragraph of his letter of June 25, in which he told Hunts that their certificate must bear the stipulated wording and, if they were unable for any reason to give it, their supervision could not have been carried out adequately. I can see nothing wrong in this. He had a contract with Hunts and he was entitled to see that it was carried out. He was entitled to insist that he got the sort of certificate that they had undertaken to give, if in fact they were able to give it; and to point out that, if lack of the supervision which they had contracted to give rendered them unable to give it, they were in breach of their contract. It is really only pointing out the obvious.

I have said already that I think Gaster became increasingly aware that there was something wrong with the reconditioning. It may be that his suspicions were half formed by the time he had his interview with Lockwood on July 8. That may have been why he thought it necessary to protect himself by getting certificates that, so far as he could see, were watertight in their wording. But I do not think that there was anything improper in that. He was not thereby extricating himself from a difficulty, for to all appearances he was adequately protected whichever way the matter went. If Hunts gave their certificate, he could pass it on to the plaintiffs; for it was they, and not he, who, under the terms of his contract with them, had taken the risk of an error by Hunts. If Hunts would not give their certificate, he had his remedy either against Costains or against Hunts themselves if it was due to their failure in supervision. But he had to know where he stood.

I do not think the situation was such that honest dealing required him to cross-examine Hunts and demand that they disprove any suspicions that he may have had. He was, I think, entitled to take the view that they must judge for themselves whether they could give the certificate for which he asked. I do not think he was trying to put pressure upon them, or that he thought they were the sort of people upon whom pressure could successfully be put. Even if he thought that Hunts, in order to protect themselves, were willing to give a certificate in a form which they ought not to give it, and he was willing to stand by and take advantage of that, I am not sure that it would be enough: see Neale v. Richardson.[12] But I do not think that in fact there was anything of this sort. Indeed, the suggestion could not be made without impugning also the credit of Lockwood. It may be that if Gaster had studied as carefully as I have Hunts' reports and Lockwood's letter of June 26, particularly the penultimate paragraph, he would have realized that there must be a good deal which Hunts could not really be in a position to certify. But the full significance of this letter does not start out from the page on a cursory reading. I think the whole truth is that Gaster and Lockwood where imbued with contrary ideas. Gaster thought that Hunts had a standard which was incapable of modification and beyond the reach of influence, and that the only question was whether or not they were prepared to say, in the form for which his contract called, that their standard had been satisfied; while Lockwood regarded himself as obliged to follow his client's instructions, so long as he pointed out the matters for which he was not prepared to accept responsibility.

Minster Trust Ld. v. Traps Tractors Ld.

Devlin J.

The plaintiffs advanced two alternative contentions on the D.8 certificates. As they do not require any further findings of fact, I need not do more than note them. The first is that, in relation to each of the units, there is a series of reports and that, if the series does embody a certificate, it is contained in the series and not in the final or in any individual report. The series was intended to be read cumulatively, and unless the whole series was delivered, which it was not, there is no proper delivery of the certificate.

The second point is that each series contains contradictions and inconsistencies, so that, as a certificate, they are bad on their face. The plaintiffs also argued that the revised reports were not valid certificates, because Hunts had already issued final reports to Gaster and so were functus officio. In my judgment, that principle does not apply to this case.

I turn now to the T.D.14 certificates. As I have said, Hunts delivered only two documents in respect of them, and there is no question of their being invited to modify those documents or of their being given any instructions as to how they were to inspect. The plaintiffs' case, therefore, rests solely on the point that the documents delivered were not certificates. In my judgment, they were not, and the reasoning which I have already set out in relation to the D.8s applies a fortiori.

The two reports are not in the same form. In the case of 9120, the formula "the completed unit is accepted as recon-"ditioned to the required standard" is adopted, but there is not anywhere in the report a description of the unit as fully reconditioned. The report on the 7630 describes it as "fully overhauled "and reconditioned," but there is not any statement anywhere which can be construed as an expression of satisfaction by Hunts with the reconditioning. Moreover, when these documents were delivered to the plaintiffs, they were expressly described as not being final certificates but only as latest reports.

Mr. Diplock contends that the description is immaterial, unless it is alleged to amount to an estoppel, and that the court must find on the facts whether the documents are certificates or not. I do not think that it is necessary for the plaintiffs to invoke the doctrine of estoppel. Delivery under a contract does not involve merely a physical act. A seller does not deliver goods by depositing them in the buyer's backyard in the middle of the night. They must be tendered under the contract. These documents were not tendered as certificates. It is not good enough to send some documents described in effect as interim reports which the buyer might put in the wastepaper basket, and then say a year or so later that they really were intended to constitute certificates after all.

In my judgment, there has been a breach of contract in relation to all the machinery except the R.B.43 excavator, and I have now to consider damages. The measure relied upon by the plaintiffs is the difference in value between machinery fully reconditioned in accordance with the contract and machinery in the state in which it was delivered. This is the prima facie measure laid down in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 53 (3), and it is not disputed that it is the right measure to apply in this case.

In its application, four questions arise: first, what is meant by fully reconditioned in accordance with the contract; secondly, whether there is any evidence that the machines were not so reconditioned; thirdly, how the value of properly reconditioned machines is to be assessed; fourthly, how the actual value of the machines delivered is to be assessed.

I have already drawn attention to the controversy about the meaning of fully reconditioned under the contract, and have stated my conclusion that it means fully reconditioned up to the Hunt standard. I think this conclusion necessarily follows from my view that the parties were contracting in relation to a standard of qualifying set by Hunts, and that Hunts' duty was not that of certifying that a particular contract of reconditioning had been satisfactorily carried out according to its terms. If I had adopted the latter view, then I think it would be for the court now to determine whether the contract of reconditioning had been properly carried out or not and, for that purpose, to arrive at its own standard of what the contract required. Hunts being disqualified from acting, it would not be relevant to inquire what view they would have taken of the requirements of the contract. But the view I have taken of the contract, for reasons already given, is that Hunts come into it in two ways. First, the quality of the full reconditioning is to be Hunts' standard, which was thought to be a particularly high one; and, secondly, Hunts' statement that their standard has been complied with is to be conclusive. The second limb necessarily disappears with the disappearance of Hunts as certifiers, but that does not, in my judgment, affect the first.

Devlin J.

One may get at the matter in another way. In deciding upon what would be the appropriate standard to take for full reconditioning, the court must have regard to what the parties appeared to contemplate, even if they did not put it into the contract. In this case they clearly contemplated the Hunt standard. It might very well have been—and, indeed, I think the parties thought it was—that the Hunt standard assured a higher standard of reconditioning than was usual. If that were in fact true, and if Hunts' certificate was not supplied, perhaps because the seller refused to take the necessary steps to obtain it, I should not be able to see why the buyer should have to put up with the usual and lower standard of reconditioning.

I do not mean, of course, that the views of any individual inspectors of Hunts would be material or evidence as to their attitude admissible. I mean that where there is a recognized Hunt standard, the sort of which Lockwood gave one or two examples, that is the standard to be applied; where there is not, the court will have to apply such standard as it thinks reasonable. In some cases, as in the case of wearing down of the grip bars, Hunts have an upper and a lower margin. In such a case, I think, it would be right to give effect to the view that the parties evidently entertained, that Hunts' standard was an exceptionally high one, by taking the higher margin.

A particular question has been argued, namely, whether, on the Hunt standard, welding ought or ought not to be accepted. I have already stated that Hunts' practice in 1952 was to accept it faute de mieux. If new parts had been reasonably available, they would not have accepted it; but the general scarcity in 1952 of spare parts, whose purchase was dependent on dollars, was such, Lockwood says, that the practice of welding was universally adopted, and so they were not calling for new parts from reconditioners like Costains. His evidence shows, I think, that if he had been satisfied in any case that spare parts could reasonably be obtained, Hunts would have required them. I think that the Hunt standard that should be applied is that welding ought to be accepted, except in any case in which the plaintiffs can satisfy the referee (as they could have satisfied Hunts) that a spare part could be got.

The next question is whether there is any evidence that the units were not fully reconditioned. In the ordinary way, I should have to determine to what extent they were not fully reconditioned before I could begin to assess the damage. It has, however, been agreed that that task should in the main be discharged by a referee. But Mr. Diplock submits that, as there is no evidence at all to justify the conclusion that the units were not fully reconditioned at the time of sale, the damages can only be a nominal figure for the failure to supply certificates. I shall decide whether or not substantial damage has been proved; and it has been agreed that I shall deal with one substantial matter only in relation to each unit, leaving it to the referee (if I find substantial damage proved) to go into any other matters which the plaintiffs rely upon, and to fix the proper figure for the whole.

[His Lordship, having considered the evidence relating to the condition of the machinery, held that all the tractors had not been fully reconditioned, and that the failure to do so, in the case of the D.8 units was substantial, and continued:] I think I have now covered all questions of principle, and those major questions relating to the assessment of damage which were discussed before me. The hope was expressed on both sides that, once these questions were settled, it might be possible for the parties to agree on a round figure as the appropriate compensation, if any is due. I am sure that it will be in the interests of both sides if that hope can be fulfilled. As I have said, I am satisfied that, in the end, no examination of detail, however meticulous, will of itself produce the right answer, which will have to be arrived at on a broad estimate. There is, however, further detail which, if necessary, will have to be examined to provide a satisfactory basis for such an estimate, and that will have to be done before a referee who will report to me. If, therefore, the parties cannot agree upon a figure, I shall ask counsel to consider what form the order for a report should take and mention the matter again to me.

Meanwhile, and subject to hearing counsel further on the form of the judgment and on costs, I think the most convenient course would be that I should now direct judgment to be entered for the second and third defendants against the plaintiffs, and for the plaintiffs against the first defendants for a declaration that the first defendants have broken the first and third contracts referred to in the statement of claim by delivering thereunder machinery which was not fully reconditioned in accordance with those contracts, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid as damages such sum as shall, upon further inquiry, be determined to represent the difference between the actual value of the machinery and the value which it would have had if fully reconditioned.

Judgment accordingly.

* CHEETHAM v. CHEETHAM.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Practice—Answer—Amendment—Petition by husband—Adultery and desertion alleged in answer—Application to amend answer by striking out allegation of adultery—No affidavit filed—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1940), r. 15 (3).

A husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of desertion. His wife in her answer alleged that the husband had been guilty of adultery and desertion by leaving the matrimonial home and she asked to have the marriage dissolved. After service of the answer to the petition, the wife's solicitors applied to have the allegation of adultery struck out of the wife's answer. The reason for the application was that they did not consider the evidence of the husband's adultery sufficient. No affidavit was filed in support of that application but the registrar struck out of the answer the allegation of adultery. The husband did not proceed with his petition. The commissioner rejected the wife's prayer for dissolution on the ground that, since the allegation of adultery had been withdrawn, and he had no explanation why it was withdrawn, there was no evidence of desertion. On appeal:—

Held, (1) that, on the evidence, the wife bona fide and reasonably believed that the husband had committed adultery, and the departure of the husband from the matrimonial home was equivalent to a determination on his part to put an end to the marriage relationship. The wife therefore was entitled to a divorce on the ground of desertion.

Per Hodson L.J. Rule 15 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, which requires that an application for leave to amend a petition after service shall be supported by an affidavit, applied by analogy to the wife's answer. The fact that no affidavit had been filed when the wife's answer was amended had misled the commissioner, since the facts were not fully before him.

APPEAL from Judge Fenwick Q.C. sitting as special commissioner.

The petitioner, Fred Cheetham, sought the dissolution of his marriage with the respondent, Edith Cheetham, on the ground that she had deserted him. She in her answer denied desertion and sought the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of the husband's adultery and desertion. The husband did not proceed with his petition. The commissioner dismissed the wife's answer. The wife appealed. The facts are more fully stated in the judgment of Evershed M.R.

G. M. Vos for the wife.

The husband did not appear.

No case was cited in argument.

EVERSHED M.R. This case was tried not upon the petition of the husband, but on the answer of the respondent wife. That answer originally alleged desertion, and, secondly, adultery on the part of the husband.

In reference to the possibility of proving adultery, it is relevant to note that during the evidence the wife produced a letter written by the husband and found by the wife in the husband's pocket. It was addressed to the woman with whom the adultery alleged in the answer was alleged to have been committed. It was in these terms: "I don't know why I am doing this but as soon as "I got home on Wed-night I sat down to write this letter to you. "I want you that much I keep on thinking about you, and I don't "know where to put myself sometimes. I hope you don't think "I have suddenly gone crackers for writing a letter like this but "I must open my mind to you. I have had some good times in "my own way, but never like I am having them with you, and "I don't want nobody but you. I hope you will always remember "that. I love you that much that I sometimes wish I did not. "You have given me everything that a woman can give to a man, "and if I had a wife like you would make I should never want "to be away from you. I am only sorry that I can't give and "do more for you, because if it was in my power to do so I "certainly would. If you want to keep this letter by all means "do so. How I wish I was with you always, it is now 11.30 p.m. "so I will have to go to bed so will close with all Love." On that letter, one thing needed no emphasis, and that is that it was as good evidence of an adulterous association with the woman to whom it was addressed as could possibly be imagined.

However, the answer having been put in in August, 1953, in the following December, on the application of the wife's own solicitor, unsupported by any affidavit, an application was made to the registrar in the Barrow District Registry for leave to strike out the charge of adultery in the answer, and the registrar struck it out. It is plain that charges made in matrimonial proceedings cannot be struck out in quite the same way as they can be in other proceedings—that is, merely because the party in question desires the withdrawal. There is a public interest involved and there is in cases of this sort an obvious possibility that the reason why the party seeks to have the charge struck out is an improper or collusive one. He or she might have been offered some consideration for doing it; therefore, generally speaking, it requires an affidavit to show that the application is not the result of any collusive conduct.

The reason which the solicitor gave to the commissioner, as we have been informed by counsel today, was that the husband, after leaving the wife, had gone to live in the same building as this woman to whom the letter was addressed. At first sight that would appear to add considerable force to the charge to which strong impetus had already been given by the letter. It was then discovered, however, that the building was divided into wholly separate dwellings, and the woman concerned and the husband lived in separate apartments. For that reason, the solicitor—I do not question his discretion and, of course, as he is an officer of the court, still less his complete integrity—decided that his client should withdraw this allegation, and he made this application for that purpose.

I observe, however, that the application was after the date of the answer by some months. The relevance of that is that desertion, when charged, must be for a continuous period up to the date of the answer. On the evidence, it seems clear that, when the husband left, it was because, at the end of a series of quarrels, which arose to no little extent from the husband's habit of going out and drinking, the wife, who had this letter, confronted him with it and required him to give up the woman to whom it was addressed. In effect, it may be fairly said that he was told that he must decide to give the woman up or go. In my judgment, if at that time the wife bona fide and reasonably believed that the husband was having an adulterous association with this woman, she was justified in putting that alternative, and, the husband having elected to go, she would be justified in taking him before the court on the ground that his departure was the equivalent to a determination on his part to put an end to the marriage relationship.

In the circumstances, I should have thought that the wife had established the case she set out to prove. I think that the commissioner was also inclined to that opinion, but what troubled him was that, without any explanation, he felt that the abandonment on the part of the wife of the charge of adultery made it, for practical purposes and as a matter of common sense, difficult for him to say that at any material date she really believed in the adulterous association between the husband and this woman. Unfortunately, the commissioner was not informed, as we have been, of the unusual circumstances in which it came about that the charge of adultery was withdrawn. If he had been, I think it might have satisfied him that, whatever he might think himself of the necessity or the wisdom of giving up the charge, it did not in any way qualify the inference to be drawn from the letter which was in the wife's possession. I think also that the commissioner had perhaps forgotten that the letter was from the husband to this woman, because he appears to have called it a love-letter from another woman. I think that does again make some difference.

In the light of the circumstances as they are now explained, I think this is not, as the commissioner felt, nothing more than a separation by consent. In other words, it was, in the circumstances, conduct by the husband which was equivalent to desertion, that is to say, unequivocal conduct on his part showing that so far as he was concerned the marriage relationship was at an end. For these reasons, I think that the appeal ought to be allowed, and that the wife was entitled to a decree upon her answer. A decree should be pronounced accordingly.

DENNING L.J. It is a chapter of accidents which has brought this case to this court. I can understand the solicitor feeling that if he had only the letter and nothing more, perhaps the court would require stricter proof. So he had the allegation struck out. But it is an unfortunate thing that the commissioner did not know the reason why it was struck out. Owing to those two accidents, a decree was not granted, which, I am sure, the commissioner would have made if he had known all the circumstances. Therefore, I agree with my Lord that now, as the circumstances have been explained, it is a proper case in which a decree nisi should be pronounced.

HODSON L.J. I think that the wife proved her case. I have considerable sympathy with a commissioner who is left in this position. He was told the charge of adultery brought by the wife had been dropped and he then found, having received no explanation of that, that he could not accept that she had at any time reasonably believed in the adultery which was really the basis of the case of desertion. The husband having left the house because he had refused to give up another woman to whom he had written a letter, in effect, admitting adultery, the wife established a case of reasonable belief, belief in the husband's adultery, which was not disputed during a period of three years preceding the petition. The fact that the solicitor went before the registrar and obtained an order for striking out the allegation of adultery appears to have come about because the solicitor thought that the evidence of the husband and this woman living under the same roof was not sufficient for him to be able to establish adultery, although the husband's own letter was strong evidence that he had committed adultery.

The whole affair was wrapt in mystery, because, in my judgment, sufficient attention was not paid to rule 15 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, which reads as follows: "An application for leave to amend a petition after service or for "leave to file a supplemental petition shall, unless otherwise "directed, be supported by an affidavit by the petitioner verifying "the new facts alleged and shall, unless otherwise directed, be "served on every opposite party who has entered an appear-"ance." By analogy, I think that applies to the answer in this case which, in fact, is the petition upon which the court was asked to pronounce. It appears from that rule that, for obvious reasons, an affidavit is required in support of applications to amend because there may be at any rate a tendency for charges of adultery to be bought off. There was no affidavit in this case. It is true that the requirement of an affidavit is not absolute, because the court may otherwise direct, as, for example, in cases where a paragraph is struck out in default of compliance with an order for particulars. If the rule to which I have referred had received the consideration it ought to have had, the commissioner would not, I think, have been left in the dark in the way in which he was. I agree with the order proposed.

Appeal allowed.

* SIMPSON v. SIMPSON.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Practice—Petition within three years of marriage—Exceptional hardship or exceptional depravity—Evidence—Consideration of respondent's affidavit—Discretion of judge—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 2.

An application under the proviso to section 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, by a wife for leave to present a petition within three years of the marriage was acceded to. The judge stated that it was not for him to consider the possibility of the petitioner's allegations being untrue. The husband appealed:—

Held, (1) that the judge was not limited, when exercising his discretion under the proviso, to considering only the petitioner's case, but was also entitled to take into account the husband's answer which might throw doubt on the truth of the allegations made by the petitioner.

Dicta of Goddard L.J. in Winter v. Winter [1944] P. 72, 75, and Tucker L.J. in Charlesby v. Charlesby (1947) 176 L.T. 532, 534, applied.

(2) That leave to present the petition should be refused as the evidence showed that the wife's allegations might not be true and also that there was a possibility that the parties might be reconciled.

Decision of Sachs J. reversed.

APPEAL from Sachs J.

The petitioner, Vilma Helena Elizabeth Simpson, sought leave, in February, 1954, to present a petition for divorce, on the ground that her husband, John William Simpson, had been cruel to her, within three years of the marriage under the proviso to section 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.[1] The parties were married on December 11, 1952. The petition alleged acts of physical violence and threats to kill the wife, and it was not disputed that if the petition was accepted at its face value there was a case of exceptional hardship to the wife or exceptional depravity by the husband. In reply to the petition the husband denied the alleged acts of cruelty and exhibited letters in affectionate terms written by the wife to him after the date of the alleged acts of cruelty. For example, on March 18, 1953, at a time when, according to her petition, she had already been treated with violence on three occasions, she wrote a letter to him beginning "My dearest darling husband," saying: "You "are always kind and very good to me," and "To me you are "all my life needs and all I want," and "I still love you just "like I used to write." She went on to use expressions of great affection and described how she missed him whenever he was away, and ended, "I love you my darling Johnnie always, Baby "Vil," followed by symbols for kisses. In November, 1953, at a time when, according to her petition, most of the acts of cruelty had already taken place, she wrote an affectionate letter to him, sending him all her love, followed by symbols for kisses.

The application was heard by Sachs J., and on May 7, 1954, he gave leave to present the petition although three years had not elapsed since the marriage. The husband appealed.

Bernard Lewis for the husband.
Robert Hannay for the wife petitioner.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment the following case was cited in argument: Bowman v. Bowman.[2]

DENNING L.J. stated the facts, and continued:—The question that has arisen for decision is whether the petition has to be taken at its face value, or whether the court is entitled to look at the affidavit sworn by the husband in answer to it. The husband has sworn an affidavit to which he exhibits two letters written by the wife which contain statements apparently inconsistent with the allegations of cruelty. [His Lordship referred to the two letters summarized above.] Section 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, provides that a judge may allow a petition to be presented within three years of the marriage on the ground that the "case" is one of exceptional hardship or of exception depravity. Sachs J. read that as meaning that "the case as made in the petition" must be one of exceptional hardship or exceptional depravity. He said that it was not for him "to enter into the possibility of the allegations being

". . . the question whether there is "a reasonable probability of a recon- "ciliation between the parties before "the expiration of the said three "years."

"untrue," or "to go into the likelihood of the case being established." He thought that he could only look at the petition of the petitioning wife and her affidavit in support of it, and he could not have regard to the husband's affidavit in answer. In my opinion, that is not a correct interpretation of the section. The observations of Goddard L.J. in Winter v. Winter [1] and of Tucker L.J. in Charlesby v. Charlesby [2] show that there can be no doubt that a judge, when considering one of these applications, is not confined to the petition and the affidavit in support, but he can also look at the affidavit in answer. If the affidavit in answer is destructive of the petitioner's case, the judge will dismiss the application. Even if it is not altogether destructive of the petitioner's case, but only throws doubt on it, the judge is entitled to have regard to that doubt in coming to his decision whether to grant leave or not. It seems to me, therefore, that the judge was wrong in his ruling in point of law. He should have exercised his discretion upon the affidavits as a whole. He did not do that.

In these circumstances, the judge not having exercised his discretion, and all the material being before us, it is for this court to exercise its discretion. In exercising our discretion, we must have regard to the letters which the wife wrote, and we must also consider the question of reconciliation. In all applications of this kind the possibility of reconciliation is a most important aspect of the case. The letters show that at one time the wife was very much in love with her husband. The husband says that her complaints are largely hysterical and may respond to treatment. He says that if she were treated it would be possible for them to resume a normal married existence. In those circumstances, it seems to me that there is a possibility of reconciliation, and it is not one of those cases where we should give leave to present a petition within three years.

It was suggested that we might send the case back so that the wife might supplement her affidavit by further material. That is not a course which we should encourage. These applications are not meant to be preliminary trials. They are meant to be dealt with simply and inexpensively. There should be an affidavit on each side, but there should not be affidavits piled upon affidavits. We ought not to send the matter back for the filing of further affidavits, but we ought to decide it on the material before us.

I think this appeal ought to be allowed, and the application to lodge the petition within three years should be refused.

HODSON L.J. We are asked to review the exercise of the discretion of the judge on an application by the wife for leave to lodge a petition for divorce within three years of the marriage. Section 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, provides: "No

"petition for divorce shall be presented to the court unless at "the date of the presentation of the petition three years have "passed since the date of the marriage: . . ." But there is a proviso which enables the court, in its discretion, to give leave for a petition to be presented before that time on the ground that the case is one of "exceptional hardship" suffered by the petitioner or of "exceptional depravity" on the part of the respondent. In the same proviso there is a further reference to "the nature "of the case." The judge, in my view, has put too narrow a construction upon the proviso in emphasizing the use of the word "case" and "the nature of the case" as being only the case set forth by the petitioner in her petition and affidavit.

It is of course true, as was made clear by this court in Winter v. Winter,[3] that in deciding what constitutes "exceptional hard-"ship" or "exceptional depravity" a judge is entitled to act on the prima facie evidence in the affidavits filed with the application, and if, in the proper exercise of his discretion, he grants leave to present the petition, his decision will not be reviewed by the Court of Appeal. That proposition, however, does not involve that the judge, who is to exercise his discretion, is limited to the affidavit or affidavits put forward on behalf of the proposed petition. It is conceded by the parties in this case that the judge was persuaded that he was so limited.

There is no transcript of his judgment but a note was taken on each side. On the one hand, it was thought that he said that he could not consider the possibility of the wife's case not being established. On the other hand, it was thought that he said he could not enter into the likelihood of the wife's case not being established. I think that the judge felt that the position was a difficult one, and, indeed, no doubt having that in mind, he gave leave to appeal. But his attention was not drawn to Winter v. Winter,[3] in which Goddard L.J. said[4]: "In my opinion, the "words mean that the judge has come to a conclusion that "the allegations made in the affidavits filed on the application "are such that, if proved, they would amount to exceptional "hardship or depravity, though of course he may take into "consideration the affidavits, if any, filed in opposition to assist "himself in forming a conclusion as to the likelihood of the case "proving to be of that character." I think that Scott and du Parcq L.JJ. said nothing inconsistent with that. In case it should be thought that Goddard L.J. was confining himself to the consideration of whether the affidavits of the opposition threw light on the exceptional hardship and depravity, as opposed to the proof of the case, I think some assistance is to be gained from the judgment of Tucker L.J. in Charlesby v. Charlesby[5] because he was referring to the judgment of Goddard L.J. in Winter v. Winter.[3] He said, paraphrasing Goddard L.J.:

SIMPSON v. SIMPSON.
Hodson L.J.

"No doubt it is the duty of the judge to deal with the affidavits "of the petitioner as prima facie correct, but at the same time "as part of the material of the case, and in judging whether he "should exercise his discretion or not, he would have regard to "the affidavit sworn by the respondent." I think "the affidavit "sworn by the respondent" is part of the material at which the court must look if any affidavit is filed in opposition. That is clearly laid down by proper appreciation of the judgments to which I have referred. If it were otherwise, it would seem to be futile, except possibly on the question of the prospect of reconciliation, for a respondent to file any affidavit at all.

These applications are matters which are determined judicially after hearing both sides. Rule 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950,[6] provides the machinery, including machinery for an affidavit or affidavits, to be used in support of the summons, it does not exclude those sworn by the respondent, which would be utterly useless unless the court were entitled to pay attention to those affidavits.

Having said that the judge had misdirected himself in the way which I have mentioned, that does not dispose of this appeal, because the judge went on to consider what the position would be if he were wrong in his approach. Then he added: "The "letters," which have been referred to, "did raise in his mind "certain doubts as to the truth of the petitioner's case," though he added: "These doubts could be resolved of course "because the letters might be capable of explanation."

It is conceded by Mr. Hannay, on behalf of the wife, that there must be cases in which the affidavit of the respondent can be looked at, and the full rigour of the rule laid down by the judge cannot be maintained; but he distinguished the cases in which the wife's or the petitioner's case is not destroyed but merely rendered doubtful. However, the judge, I think, was not exercising his discretion in the light of the husband's affidavit, which in his view did throw doubt on the wife's case.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence summarized above, and continued:] Taking into consideration all these matters, and the doubts which the judge has entertained, and which are entertained by this court, as the material here is the same as that which was before him, it seems to me that this is a case in which we ought to express our own view on the matter and that we should dismiss the wife's application.

Mr. Hannay has argued that it would be right to give her a further opportunity of supplementing the evidence which she had previously given. I have considered that matter, and I have come to the conclusion that that would not be right. It is not desirable for the parties to be encouraged to put before the court a mass of material, because the court would find itself then in even greater difficulty than it necessarily now is in reaching a prima facie conclusion on contradictory affidavits. Nor, I think, is it contemplated that the contradictions in the affidavits are to be resolved at this particular stage. The wife has had the opportunity of putting forward her case, and the husband's affidavit has been filed in answer. The material thus before the court, I think, ought to be treated as the material on which this court can properly act. For these reasons, as well as those given by my Lord, I think this appeal should be allowed, and the wife's application dismissed.

Appeal allowed, petition to be taken off the file, wife to have her costs up to the amount of security agreed at £25.

Criminal Law — Obscenity — Obscene libels—Seizure—Onus of proof—Publications seized from respondents' premises—Respondents summoned to show cause why the publications should not be destroyed —Magistrates' functions—Obscene Publications Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 83), s. 1.

A number of books and postcards having been seized from the respondents' premises, the respondents were summoned to show cause why the publications should not be destroyed under the provisions of the Obscene Publications Act, 1857, s. 1. It was submitted that the appellant's refusal to indicate passages in the books which were alleged to be obscene, or to indicate in what respects the postcards were alleged to be obscene, or to state the nature of any innuendo relied upon, meant that the respondents could not properly or adequately deal with the questions in issue and thereby could not have a fair trial. It was also submitted that as the appellant had not by evidence or otherwise specified the nature of the complaint, or shown a prima facie case that books and postcards were obscene, an order should be made directing the publications to be restored to the respondents. The magistrates were of the opinion that the respondents' contentions were well founded and ordered the return of the publications. On appeal:—

Held, that the justices took a wrong view of their functions. It was not for the prosecution to read out particular passages unless the justices asked them to point out some particular thing. It was for the justices to look at the publications and come to their own decision and, if they were satisfied that the publications were obscene, to order them to be destroyed unless they were required as proof in other proceedings.

Per Lord Goddard C.J. It only confused justices to mention innuendos in connexion with postcards. If any innuendo only were relied upon then prima facie the thing would not be obscene.

Per Hilbery J. The Act made an exception to the general rule that the prosecutor who affirms must discharge the burden of proof for that which he affirms.

CASE STATED by Swindon justices.

On January 14, 1954, on the adjourned hearing of a summons calling on the respondents, Chain Libraries Ld., to show cause why certain books and postcards, seized and brought before the court by the appellant, John Rennie Thomson, should not be destroyed under the provisions of the Obscene Publications Act, 1857, the justices ordered that the books and postcards should be returned to the respondents.

On the hearing of the summons on December 3, 1953, the respondents by their solicitors asked for an adjournment, which was granted. The chairman of the bench said that although the justices had read and considered the books and were ready to proceed, they would adjourn the hearing for six weeks.

On the adjourned hearing the following facts were proved or admitted:—The respondents were the occupiers of certain shop premises in Swindon. On complaint made by the appellant on oath to two justices for the borough of Swindon, they granted a special warrant under the provisions of section 1 of the Obscene Publications Act, 1857.[1] On September 18, 1953, the appellant,

[1] Obscene Publications Act, 1857, s. 1: "It shall be lawful for . . . any "two justices of the peace, upon com- "plaint made before . . . them upon "oath that the complainant has "reason to believe, and does believe, "that any obscene books, . . . pic- "tures, drawings, or other represen- "tations are kept in any . . . shop, "room, or other place within the "limits of the jurisdiction of any "such . . . justices, for the purpose "of sale or distribution, . . . lending "upon hire, or being otherwise pub- "lished for purposes of gain, which "complainant shall also state upon "oath that one or more articles "of the like character have been sold, "distributed, . . . lent, or otherwise "published as aforesaid, at or in con- "nexion with such place, so as to "satisfy such . . . justices that the "belief of the . . . complainant is "well founded, and upon such . . . "justices being also satisfied that any "of such articles so kept for any of "the purposes aforesaid are of such "character and description that the "publication of them would be a mis- "demeanour, and proper to be prose- "cuted as such, to give authority by "special warrant to any constable or "police officer into such . . . shop, "room, or other place, . . . to search "for and seize all such books, . . . "pictures, drawings, or other repre- "sentations as aforesaid . . . , and to "carry all the articles so seized before "the . . . justices . . . ; and such . . . "justices shall thereupon issue a sum- "mons calling upon the occupier of "the house or other place which may "have been so entered by virtue of "the said warrant to appear within "seven days before . . . any two "justices in petty sessions for the "district, to show cause why the "articles so seized should not be "destroyed; and if such occupier or "some other person claiming to be "the owner of the said articles shall "not appear within the time afore- "said, or shall appear, and such . . . "justices shall be satisfied that such "articles or any of them are of the "character stated in the warrant, and "that such or any of them have been "kept for any of the purposes afore- "said, it shall be lawful for the . . . "justices, and . . . they are hereby "required, to order the articles so "seized, except such of them as . . . "they may consider necessary to be "preserved as evidence in some fur- "ther proceeding, to be destroyed "at the expiration of the time here- "in-after allowed for lodging an "appeal, . . ."

under and by virtue of the warrant, seized from the respondents' premises four postcards and twelve books. On November 26, 1953, the postcards and books were duly laid before one of the justices who thereupon issued the summons. The books and postcards appearing in court were those seized in accordance with the warrant. In the books certain pages were marked with cellophane tape, but no evidence was adduced before the justices as to how such marking was introduced or as to what it was intended to mean. The books and postcards were kept on the respondents' premises for the purpose of sale or distribution for gain and certain of the books had been lent on hire for gain.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that, in the premises, the onus lay on the respondents to show cause why the books and postcards should not be destroyed and in reliance on such contention, and the books and postcards being then in court in the justices' custody, the solicitor appearing for the appellant did not put the books or postcards in evidence and did not invite or draw the court's attention to any one of the books or postcards, or to any particular passage in any books which he relied on as obscene nor did he, as regards either the postcards or the books, specify in what respect such alleged obscenity existed nor was any evidence called as to any such matters. It was also submitted that the appellant having seized the books and postcards and carried them before the magistrate in accordance with the warrant had discharged his duty.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents and on behalf of the publishers and owners of three of the books that it was for the appellant to satisfy the court that the books and postcards were obscene and to show a prima facie case by putting the books and postcards in evidence, and by indicating passages in the books which were alleged to be obscene, and by indicating in what respects the postcards were alleged to be obscene and where an innuendo was relied upon indicating the nature thereof. It was also submitted that the refusal of the appellant to indicate passages in the books which were alleged to be obscene, or to state the nature of any innuendo relied upon meant, having regard to the large volume of printed matter concerned, that the respondents could not properly or adequately deal with the questions in issue or put forward argument for the court's consideration on any particular innuendos alleged, and thereby, the respondents could not have a fair trial of the matters in issue; that as the appellant had not, by evidence or otherwise, specified the nature of the complaint or shown a prima facie case that the books and postcards were obscene, an order should be made directing the books and postcards to be restored to the respondents.

The justices were of the opinion that all the respondents' contentions were well founded and they accordingly ordered that the books and postcards should be returned.

THOMSON v. CHAIN LIBRARIES LD.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices' determination was correct in law and if not what should be done in those premises.

Robert Hughes for the appellant.
Gerald Draycott for the respondents.

The following cases were cited in argument: Cox v. Stinton [2]; Reg. v. Truelove.[3]

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by the justices for the Borough of Swindon, who seem to have got into rather a tangle with regard to what is to be shown or done in prosecutions under the Obscene Publications Act, 1857. That Act, as I have said on a previous occasion, in Cox v. Stinton,[1] is an Act which contains in itself its own particular code. It is an Act designed as a measure of preventive justice; it is to prevent the dissemination of filthy literature, pictures, etc. It is not an Act which in itself contains any penalties, except for the destruction of obscene publications.

The procedure is: first, an information has to be laid by someone, generally the senior officer of police, stating on oath that there are in the justices' jurisdiction some obscene publications which are being sold or distributed. If the justices are satisfied that the complaint which is laid before them constitutes a proper case for action, they issue a warrant, which is, in effect, a search warrant. Armed with that warrant the police officer or other person can go to the premises where he believes these obscene publications are and seize them. He then brings them before the justices, and if the justices, after having looked at these books, decide that they are not obscene, they will not do anything, but if they decide that they may be obscene they then issue a summons.

Here again the issuing of the summons is a procedure of its own, and it calls on the persons summoned to show cause why the publication should not be destroyed. [His Lordship read the relevant part of section 1 of the Obscene Publications Act, 1857, and continued:] The section is perfectly clear. When the return day for the summons arrives, the justices have to be satisfied that the books are obscene. The only way that they can be satisfied of that is by reading them and looking at them. It does not require evidence to satisfy the justices either that they are or are not obscene; the justices must look at them for themselves.

With regard to the postcards, exactly the same position prevails, and it is only confusing the justices to have anything said to them about innuendos. "Innuendo" means a secondary meaning; a meaning because of something which is known to particular people is an innuendo. If a thing has a secondary meaning I should say, prima facie, that it would not be obscene.

[3] (1880) 5 Q.B.D. 336.

[1] [1951] 2 K.B. 1021.

A thing is either obscene or it is not obscene, but the justices should look at it and must look at it.

In the present case the justices, when an application was made for an adjournment, apparently said that they had read and considered the books and were ready to proceed. If they had read and considered the books, I do not know why, when the case came on after the adjournment, they did not give their decision.

If the justices would read the section which I have read just now, they would see exactly what they have to do; they have to be satisfied that the books are obscene. It is not for the prosecution to proceed to read out particular paragraphs unless the justices ask the prosecution to address them or to point out some particular thing. It is for the justices to look at the publications themselves. I do not say that they need read every word of the publications; of course, it may be that the police or other informant would mark certain passages which would show the justices at once that the books were obscene, or they could see whether the books were obscene. At any rate, it is for the justices to look at the books in order to come to their own decision. Then, if they think that the books are obscene, they must order them to be destroyed. They are required to do that, except where it may be necessary to keep them for use in other proceedings. What the Act is obviously contemplating is that the owners of these books could be prosecuted, and there was such a case at the Old Bailey a session or two ago, for publishing obscene literature.[2] These books may have to be kept for the purpose of proof.

The justices took a wrong view of their functions in the present case, and the case must go back to them with an intimation that it is for them to say, having read and looked at the books themselves, whether the books are obscene or not. If they are obscene and if they are satisfied, there seems no question about it but that it is their duty to make an order for their destruction.

HILBERY J. I am of the same opinion. The code, as was pointed out in Cox v. Stinton[3] under the Act of 1857, is a special code. It is urged before us that that is a criminal proceeding, and the general rule in a criminal proceeding is that the prosecutor who affirms must discharge the burden of proof for that which he affirms, but, as this court pointed out in Cox v. Stinton,[3] this Act provides a special procedure and makes an exception to the general rule. It is important, I think, to remember that it is for the justices to satisfy themselves that the books or articles complained of are obscene; the books are under the procedure, and when the procedure is adopted under which the complaint is made and brought before the court, once those books are brought before the court the justices have to be satisfied that they are obscene. As my Lord has pointed out, if obviously they are books which could not be considered as obscene the magistrates would not issue a summons. If, prima facie, those books are obscene when they are brought into court, the justices issue a summons, as they did in this case. The Act provides that such summons is to call on the occupier of the house or other place which may have been so entered "by virtue of the said warrant to "appear within seven days before such police stipendiary Magis-"trate or any two Justices in Petty Sessions for the district to "show cause why the articles so seized should not be destroyed."

That plainly, in the particular circumstances, throws the onus on the person who has been the occupier of the premises where the obscene literature is on sale to show cause why those articles which are before the court should not be destroyed.

The fact that the Act goes on to say, ". . . such magistrate "or justices shall be satisfied that such articles or any of them "are of the character stated in the warrant" does not mean that the justices are there and then called upon, in the court at the hearing of that summons, to go through the books. If they have already read them—the books having been brought into the court—and they say as they said here that they have read them and are ready to proceed, as they are the persons to decide on whether they are obscene or not, they have done all that is necessary as the preliminary which has to be observed before the occupier of the premises discharges the burden which is then put upon him, that is to say, to show cause why they should not be destroyed.

I think that the justices have been misled here by this talk about what ought to be proved and shown by the prosecution. What the prosecution had done here was all that it was required to do by the statute. I am satisfied that the order should be as my Lord has said.

DONOVAN J. I entirely agree. Mr. Draycott complains that there was no indication that the justices had read or looked at the books. They did in fact say that they had at the first hearing when the case was adjourned and when Mr. Draycott was not there. He also says that there was no evidence that they had read or looked at the postcards; he might have asked them that.

Maintenance of Suit—Common interest—Unincorporated association—Libel actions against officers and members of central council—Defendants' costs paid out of association's funds.

Tribunal—Domestic—Control by courts—Unincorporated association—Council empowered to be sole interpreters of rules—Jurisdiction of court—Association of weightlifters. Arbitration—Ouster of jurisdiction of courts.

An unincorporated association recognized as being the authority controlling weightlifting in the United Kingdom, by its rules vested the government of the association in a central council consisting of the officers and a number of members. It empowered the central council to be the sole interpreters of the rules and to act on behalf of the association regarding any matter not dealt with by the rules, the decision of the council to be final in all cases and in all circumstances. Following disagreements between the members, two libel actions were brought against certain officers and members of the central council, the first by a professional coach who the council had refused to appoint as coach to an Olympic weightlifting team, and the second by a member of the association in respect of the publication of an allegedly defamatory article in a magazine and its republication in the association's news-sheet. The central council authorized the payment of two sums of £100 to solicitors out of the association's funds in respect of the defendants' costs in each action, and the sums were duly paid.

In an action by a member of the association against the officers and members of the central council for a declaration that the use of the funds for such a purpose was improper:—

Held, (1) that the provision in the rules giving the central council the sole right to interpret the rules was contrary to public policy and void.

Held, (2) that there was no power under the rules for the central council to authorize or the officers to use the funds for the purpose proposed; and further, that even if the rules had so permitted, the use of the funds for such a purpose would be unlawful and would constitute maintenance, since the defendants had no legal common interest in the actions and were therefore intermeddling in litigation in which they had no concern.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Harry Baker, was a life member of the British Amateur Weightlifters' Association (hereinafter referred to as BAWLA), an unincorporated body recognized as the authority controlling the sport of weightlifting in Great Britain. The defendants W. E. Jones, John Charles Lavender, Frederick Taylor and Edward James Stone were the president, chairman, honorary secretary and honorary treasurer respectively of the association and there were in addition 34 other defendants who were present and past members of the central council of BAWLA. The association itself was not a party to the action.

1954

The "Constitution (General Rules of the Association)" by which the members agreed to be bound provided, inter alia: Rule 2. "The object of the BAWLA is as follows: "To promote weightlifting as a sport and weight-training as a "means of physical improvement. In furtherance of this object "the BAWLA to hold displays; British, county and other "championship meetings wherever possible and practicable; "grant diplomas for world, British, county and other 'special "'records' as may, from time to time, be determined; to "encourage the practice of weight-training through the provision "of qualified instructors." Rule 34: "The government of "BAWLA shall be vested in a Central Council which shall "consist of the officers of the Association and sixteen other "members. . . ."

By rule 40 (vi) the council were empowered "to make such "regulations for putting into effect the rules of the BAWLA as "they may deem desirable from time to time" and by sub-rule (vii) "to be the sole interpreters of the rules of the BAWLA "and to act on behalf of the BAWLA regarding any matter not "dealt with by the rules"; and by sub-rule (viii), "The decision "of the Central Council, in all cases and in all circumstances, "shall be final." Rule 43 provided that cheques should be signed by the honorary secretary and honorary treasurer, and rule 44 provided that no rule should be amended, added to or cancelled except at an extraordinary General Meeting called for that purpose or at an Annual General Meeting.

During or before 1951, differences of opinion arose between one of the defendants, Percy Frederick Cranmer, a life member and president of the association from 1926–50, and the defendants Lavender and Taylor, with regard to the appointment of one William Pullum as professional coach for the British Olympic Weightlifting team at Helsinki in 1952, Cranmer being anxious that Pullum should be appointed and Lavender and Taylor preferring the claims of one Al Murray who was in fact appointed by the central council. After the appointment had been made, as a result of views expressed by Pullum to Cranmer, Cranmer submitted a memorandum to the central council at its meeting on December 15, 1951, as a result of which it was resolved "That "the chairman be authorized to seek legal advice as to any neces-"sary action to protect the interests of the association and its "honorary officers in connexion with the matter." No action was taken following the resolution.

On January 1, 1952, Cranmer resigned the presidency of the association and his membership of the central council, but retained his membership of the association. Between December 28, 1951, and March 31, 1952, seven other members of the central council also defendants in the action resigned, being replaced by others of the defendants named in the proceedings. On March 19, 1952, Pullum started proceedings against the honorary secretary, Taylor, and two other members of the central council, the defendants Hartnell and Watkins, claiming an injunction and damages for libel, slander and malicious conspiracy to injure him in his position and business. A month later Cranmer commenced libel proceedings against the defendant Lavender, who had become chairman of the central council, Stone, the honorary treasurer, and Barrs, the editor of a magazine "Vigour" in respect of an article written by Lavender published in the March issue of "Vigour" and republished in the BAWLA news-sheet. There was no resolution of the central council authorizing publication of this article, although Stone was authorized to issue a news-sheet to various societies and others affiliated to or members of BAWLA. On April 28, 1952, the solicitors acting for the defendants in both actions requested Taylor to send £100 on account of the defendants' costs in the Pullum action and also requested Lavender to send £100 in respect of the defendants' costs in the Cranmer action. On May 1, 1952, a cheque for £100 drawn on the BAWLA account was sent to the solicitors, signed by Stone and countersigned by Taylor who was informed by Stone that the cheque was sent "as authorized by Mr. Lavender pursuant to the "decision of the central council at their meeting on December 15, "1951." The cheque was duly paid out of the association's account. In the meantime, Lavender and Stone had sent their own cheques for £50 each in respect of their own costs as defendants in the Cranmer action. They were subsequently reimbursed by cheques drawn on the BAWLA account after a meeting of the central council on May 17, 1952, at which it was resolved that the association should pay their legal charges in the action. No mention was made in the central council's report to the Annual General Meeting of BAWLA held on March 21, 1953, of either action or any payment in respect thereof or any liability for the defendants' costs thereof, the only reference to the matter being an entry in the financial statement entitled "Deposit on account "of Legal Costs."

On June 10, 1953, the plaintiff issued a writ against the defendants, claiming a declaration that they were not entitled to spend the money of the association by paying it to solicitors in respect of the legal costs relating to the two actions; that the payment of £200 referred to in the balance sheet as a deposit on account of legal costs was improper and illegal and contrary to the rules of the association and that a resolution, if any, purporting to authorize such payment was ultra vires and illegal. He also claimed an injunction.

BAKER
JONES.

At a central council meeting on September 12, in an attempt to safeguard the defendants' position and defeat the plaintiff's claim, a series of resolutions were passed and recorded to the effect that, in the view of the central council, it was in the interests of the promotion of weight-lifting that the defendants Taylor, Hartnell and Watkins (the defendants in the Pullum action) and the defendants Lavender and Stone (the defendants in the Cranmer action) members and officials of the central council, should be supported as to their costs as defendants in those actions; that neither of such matters were dealt with by any of the general rules of the BAWLA; that the payments of £100 in respect of the defendants' costs in each action were approved and confirmed by the central council so far as they had power to approve and confirm them; and that the central council desired to make further similar payments as and when it might desire or consider it necessary so to do and intended itself and authorized all its officials to take the necessary steps to justify the payments made and to establish the right and power of the central council to make such similar payments thereafter. On September 16, pursuant to leave of the court, the plaintiff added as defendants all the present members of the central council and those who had resigned between December 28, 1951, and January 11, 1952.

The plaintiff contended that the payments made by the defendants in respect of the legal costs of the two actions were improper and illegal as constituting the common law misdemeanor and tort of maintenance; that it was contrary to the rules of the association and an improper use of the funds by the defendants.

The defendants Jones, Lavender, Taylor, Stone and fourteen other defendants denied (in the first defence) that the payments could or did constitute the tort or crime of maintenance, alleging that they had been made by the central council for the benefit of its servants or officials or agents who were persons for whom the council was liable. They also relied on the terms of rules 34 and 40 of the constitution and the decisions of the central council made on December 15, 1951, May 17 and September 12, 1953, and contended that the payments were properly made. They counterclaimed for a declaration that the central council had always been and was entitled to spend the money to pay the legal costs of the defendants in the actions.

The defendant Cranmer and seven other defendants admitted (in the second defence) that the payments were improper and illegal and contrary to the rules as alleged by the plaintiff, but expressly alleged that they neither singularly nor collectively authorized the payments and denied responsibility for the matters alleged in the statement of claim denying that they were members of the central council at the material times.

June 4. LYNSKEY J. stated the facts and continued: The first question which I have to consider is whether the members of the central council of the association are entitled to use or authorize the use of the association's funds in paying the legal costs of some of its members in defending proceedings for tort brought against them in their individual capacities.

The plaintiff says that the members of the central council are not so authorized because the rules do not authorize it. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that not only do the rules authorize them so to use the association's funds for this purpose, but also contend that their decisions cannot be challenged in the courts. The defendants rely particularly on rules 34 and 40 (vii) and (viii). Rule 34 vests the government of BAWLA in the central council. Rule 40 sets out what those powers are. By sub-rule (vii) they are empowered "To be the "sole interpreters of the Rules of BAWLA and to act on "behalf of BAWLA regarding any matters not dealt with by "the rules." Sub-rule (viii) provides: "The decision of the "Central Council, in all cases and in all circumstances, shall "be final." The defendants say that the rules contain no provisions as to how the funds of the association are to be applied and that the central council are the sole interpreters of the rules, and that they have interpreted the rules as authorizing them to use the association's funds in payment of their members' legal costs and that their decision must be accepted as final. The defendant's contention, no doubt, would be right if their rules are valid and binding on the plaintiff, but I have to consider whether the rule which makes the central council the sole interpreters of the rules and their decision final in all cases is valid and binding on the plaintiff.

BAWLA is an unincorporated association. It has no legal entity. The relationship between its members is contractual. That contract is contained in, or to be implied from, the rules. The courts must consider such a contract as they would consider any other contract. Although parties to a contract may, in general, make any contract they like, there are certain limitations imposed by public policy, and one of those limitations may be that the parties cannot, by contract, oust the ordinary courts from their jurisdiction (Scott v. Avery).[1] The parties can, of course, make a tribunal or council the final arbiter on questions of fact. They can leave questions of law to the decision of a tribunal, but they cannot make it the final arbiter on questions of law. They cannot prevent its decisions being examined by the courts. As Denning L.J. said in Lee v. Showmen's Guild of Great Britain[2]: "If parties should seek, by agreement, to take the law out of "the hands of the courts and put it into the hands of a private "tribunal, without any recourse at all to the courts in case of "error of law, then the agreement is to that extent contrary to "public policy and void." With this statement of the law I respectfully agree. The interpretation of the rules is a question of law which the courts will examine. In my view, therefore, the provision in the BAWLA rules, making the central council the sole interpreter of the rules and their decision in all cases final, is contrary to public policy and void.

It then becomes necessary for me to consider whether the central council's interpretation of the rules is correct in law. The rules contain no express power authorizing the use of the association's funds in paying the costs of its individual members. Sub-rule (vii) of rule 40 in its second limb does authorize the central council to act on behalf of BAWLA regarding any matters not dealt with by the rules. Although this rule, by its terms, gives the central council very wide powers, it seems to me that it must be read in conjunction with rule 2 of the association's rules which defines the association's objects. The central council cannot use the association's funds for purposes not within the objects.

The defendants contend that it was and is in the interests of the promotion of weight-lifting as a sport, and reasonably incidental thereto, that the costs of the defendants in the Pullum action and the Cranmer action should be paid and, therefore, within the objects of the association. The argument is that all the defendants in these two actions are sued because of what they are alleged to have done or said whilst officers or central councillors of the association and their costs should be paid, as it is in the interests of the sport that officials and members of the association should speak their opinions freely without fear of having to pay their own costs if they are sued. In my view this argument is unsound and one cannot construe rule 2 as making it one of the objects of the association, or a purpose reasonably incidental thereto, that its funds should be applied in paying the personal costs of some of its members in defending proceedings brought against them in their personal capacity. The association, being an unincorporated body, could not be liable for the tortious acts either of its officials or council members. The members of the association, individually, would not be liable for such tortious acts, except in so far as they had individually authorized such acts.

There was, in my opinion, no power under the rules for the central council to authorize, or the defendants Taylor and Stone to use, the funds of the association in making payment on account of the costs of the defendants Taylor, Hartnell and Watkins in the Pullum action, or the defendants Lavender and Stone in the Cranmer action, or to pledge the association's funds for further costs to be incurred by these defendants and the defendant Barrs.

This is sufficient to dispose of this action, but the plaintiff takes a further point that, even if the rules did authorize these payments, such payments are unlawful as amounting in law to the crime or civil wrong of maintenance. This question has been argued fully before me and it may be desirable that I should express my view upon it.

Maintenance in earlier days was a far-reaching and important branch both of civil and criminal law. The common law does not approve of the intervention of any man in the litigation of another with which he had no lawful concern, whether that litigation is well founded or not. In these days, however, of insurance policies giving an indemnity against both damages and costs to wrongdoers, trade unions whose rules provide for paying the legal costs of their members, and the Legal Aid Acts, maintenance is not now regarded with the same repugnance as it was by the old common law. The offence and tort of maintenance, however, still exist, and the common law rules, although much modified and, as some say, almost atrophied, still must be applied.

If an unincorporated body chooses to finance an action in tort in which one of its officials or even one of its servants is concerned, in which it has not a common interest, that may amount to the crime or tort of maintenance, and the court will restrain the members or committee of the unincorporated body from using its funds for that purpose and may compel them, if the funds have been used or received for that purpose, to replace the funds. (Oram v. Hutt,[3] and Alfin v. Hewlett.[4])

It was suggested in the case before me that the defendants had a common interest with the defendants to the Pullum and Cranmer actions in the result of those actions. They clearly had an interest in the pleas raised in those actions, but that is not sufficient. The law, as I understand it, requires that there should be a legal interest; that is, the judgment in the action itself must affect the rights of the persons encouraging or financing the litigation. (Alabaster v. Harness,[5] Alfin v. Hewlett,[6] and Oram v. Hutt.[7]) In the present case I am satisfied that there was no such legal interest.

BAKER v. JONES.

It was further contended, on behalf of the defendants, that it would not have been open to Pullum or Cranmer to bring an action for maintenance against the defendants as, until these actions are decided, the plaintiffs in these actions could not prove that they had suffered any damage by the defendants' intermeddling. If both Pullum and Cranmer failed in their proceedings they would be unable to prove that the defendants' intermeddling had caused them any damage, and proof of such damage is a necessary ingredient in an action for maintenance. (Neville v. London Express Newspaper Ld.[8] and Wiggins v. Lavy.[9]) This, no doubt, is correct so far as proceedings by Pullum and Cranmer for damages are concerned, but so far as the defendants are concerned they are intermeddling in litigation in which they have no concern. This is unlawful and will be restrained by injunction at least upon the application of a member of an unincorporated society whose funds are being used for this unlawful purpose. (Oram v. Hutt,[10] and Alfin v. Hewlett.[11])

In the result, in my view, even if the rules had permitted the application of the association's funds, for the purpose for which it is alleged they have been used or were intended to be used, the use for such a purpose is unlawful as being the tort or crime of maintenance.

There is a further question which I have to consider, and that is how far the defendants who resigned from the council before March 31, 1952, are liable, if at all, for what I have decided is a misapplication of the society's funds. There was no misapplication of these funds before April 30, 1952. In the affidavit filed on behalf of the original four defendants to this action it was alleged that the cheque for £100 dated April 30, 1952, was drawn and paid to their solicitors on the authority of the resolution of the council meetings of December 15, 1952, and it was for this reason that Cranmer and the other defendants who resigned on or before March 31, 1952, were joined as parties to these proceedings. It is therefore necessary for me to consider whether the resolution of December 15, 1951, can be construed as authorizing the drawing and payment of this cheque for £100 to the solicitors for the costs of the defendants in the Pullum action.

The resolution reads: "The chairman be authorized to seek "legal advice as to necessary action to protect the interests of the "association and the honorary officers in connexion with the "matter in question."

At that time no proceedings had been commenced by Pullum. In my view, giving the words their widest possible meaning, the resolution did no more than authorize the chairman to seek advice as to any necessary action. Before the chairman could act on that advice he would require further authorization from the council. It is quite impossible to construe that resolution as an authority to the treasurer and secretary to apply the association's funds in paying the costs of the defendants Taylor, Hartnell and Watkins, in the action brought against them personally by Mr. Pullum. The result is that Cranmer and the defendants who resigned on or before March 31, 1952, cannot be held responsible for what was done on and after April 30, 1952.

Declaration (1) that the payments out of the association's funds were not authorized by the rules of the association and were unlawful; (2) *that the resolutions of the central council purporting to authorize or confirm these payments were ultra vires and void. Order that the sums paid out be repaid to the funds of the association. Plaintiff to recover his costs from defendants named in first defence. A dry dock is not an "opening" in a floor within section 25 (3) of the Factories Act, 1937.

The deceased was employed by the defendants in work on the side of a dry dock on a ledge or "altar" some 2 feet 2 inches wide which was unfenced; and the nature of his work made it obligatory for him to work with his back to the drop. While returning to his place of work, instead of using a concrete bridge a few yards away from the altar, he stepped over an open culvert, fell on to the edge of the altar and thence to the bottom of the dock, some 40 feet below, and was killed:—

Held, (1) that the dock itself was not an "opening" in a floor within section 25 (3) of the Factories Act, 1937, and that, accordingly, there was no statutory duty to provide fencing;

(2) that the concrete bridge provided a safe means of access and that, accordingly, there was no breach of section 26 (1) of the Act;

(3) that the defendants were in breach of their duty at common law in that they ought to have foreseen the possible danger to a workman obliged to carry out his work on this narrow platform with his back to the drop, and had failed to provide adequate fencing to meet this contingency.

Decision of Gorman J. affirmed on one ground.

Appeal from Gorman J. sitting at Winchester Assizes on March 10, 1954.

The deceased, who was employed at Southampton docks by the defendants, was engaged with another man in reconcreting the sides of a dry dock. This work involved an operation known as "shuttering," which is the placing of a timber support parallel with the side of the dock, and thereupon pouring liquid concrete into the resulting cavity. Work was carried out on a ledge or "altar," some 2 feet 6 inches wide reduced by about 4 inches by reason of the timber framework. The altar was unfenced and the deceased worked on it with his back to the drop.

At the time of the accident the deceased was returning to his place of work. Instead of proceeding by way of a concrete bridge a few yards away from the ledge, he stepped over an open culvert, stumbled, fell on to the altar and thence over its edge to the bottom of the dock, some 40 feet below, and was killed.

His widow, and another administrator of his estate, brought an action for damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, against the defendants, in which she alleged breaches of section 25 (3)[1] and section 26 (1) and (2) of the Factories Act, 1937, and negligence at common law.

Gorman J. found for the plaintiff under both heads of claim and awarded £4,600 damages (reduced on appeal to £3,600).

The defendants appealed.

[1] Factories Act, 1937, s. 25: "(3) "All openings in floors shall be se- "curely fenced, except in so far as "the nature of the work renders such "fencing impracticable."

S. 26: "(1) There shall, so far as "is reasonably practicable, be pro- "vided and maintained safe means of "access to every place at which any "person has at any time to work."

The following cases were cited in argument: Taylor v. R. & H. Green and Silley Weir Ld.[2]; Street v. British Electricity Authority[3]; and Adsett v. K. and L. Steelfounders and Engineers Ld.[4]

SOMERVELL L.J. stated the facts and the findings of the trial judge and continued: The trial judge decided that all those claims succeeded, that there was a breach of the Factories Act, or at any rate of section 25 (3) and section 26 (1), and also negligence at common law. With respect, I have come to the conclusion that there was not a breach established here of section 25 (3) of the Act. The general nature of a dry dock is familiar. It is a large excavation with built-up sides of concrete into which a ship can float and the water is then pumped out and work can be done on the ship. It seems to me quite impossible to regard the excavation which constitutes the dry dock as an opening in the floor. I do not think that I can add much on that point. One is sometimes tempted to construe perfectly familiar words, but if they are, as these words are, perfectly familiar, all one can do is to state whether or not one regards them as apt to cover or describe the circumstances in question in any particular case. I cannot myself regard this dry dock into which this man fell as an opening in a floor.

With regard to the second point, whether a safe means of access was provided within section 26 (1) there is, I think, a certain difficulty in discovering what the judge had in mind when he considered that issue. If it had been suggested that this open culvert constituted a means of access which was unsafe it could be pointed out with some force by the defendants that there was a few yards further along from the place where this man was working a concrete bridge which a man could cross without having to step over the culvert. On the other hand, if the judge had in mind the necessity of protective fencing, which I will consider in connexion with the question of negligence at common law, another question arises which I will determine later. With regard to section 26 (2) which concerns the provision of secure footholds and hand-holds, in my view it has not been established that this place came within the ambit of that subsection. I think that there may have been both secure footholds and hand-holds, and even if there were not it may be that a claim under this head would fail on causation.

But I have come to the conclusion that the judge was right in holding that there was here a failure to take due care at common law. I think that the failure was this, and it does raise the question of the application of section 26 (1) and also the question of causation. This first step on which the men were working, from which there was a steep descent with other steps, the first drop being about 6 feet down into the dry dock, was only 2 feet 6 inches in width. That width was lessened to some extent, about 4 inches, by the shuttering which the men were putting up. It was therefore a narrow platform above a big drop and the men would be working with their backs to the drop. The building regulations do not apply, but it is very like the position of men who work on scaffolding high up on a building. Although the work had been going on for some three years without mishap, I think that it was a position in which, if someone had directed his mind to the possible danger of these men working on this very narrow platform with their backs to the drop, some protection should have been afforded behind them. That was the view which the judge took, and though it may be on the borderline I am not satisfied that it was wrong.

That, of course, raises the question of causation. This man was not actually working at the time. He was going to his place of work, but it is plain from the evidence that he was, as one would expect, getting down on to the step at the place where the shuttering was and where there ought in my opinion to have been a protecting fence. It was not, I think, really disputed that if there had been such a fence there it could not have been said that it would not have saved the fall which caused the man's death. It is possible, of course, that he might have fallen over the fence, but the probabilities are, and one has to act on probabilities, that if there had been a fence there it would have saved his life. I think, therefore, that if there should be protection at a place at which a man works and he falls over because there was no protection it is not an answer to say: "At the time when you fell you were getting "to the place and were not actually working at it." On the other hand, I do not think that the fact that an argument on causation does not succeed means that one should apply section 26 (1) and hold that because the deceased was injured when he was approaching his place of work that therefore there was a breach of that subsection. It is a point in a narrow compass and it may not be of great importance, but I do not think that the fact that the injury occurred in the way I have described entitled the plaintiff to maintain that there was a failure to provide safe means of access. In my judgment the only failure established in this case was the failure at common law which applies to this particular type of shuttering work which was being done on the upper tier. I am not laying down any general principle applicable to the ordinary work carried on in dry docks. For these reasons in my judgment the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT L.J. I agree. In this case the widow has received an award of damages at the hands of a judge who listened to the evidence and who found that the defendants were responsible on two heads, firstly, the breach of statutory duty to which my Lord has already referred, and, secondly, at common law. On the point of statutory duty I do not desire to add anything to what Somervell L.J. has already said, as I agree with the conclusion which he has announced on that matter.

I would like to add a word about the liability at common law. The judge found that the defendants were liable at common law, and it is perfectly plain from the citations from the authorities which he kept well in mind, and from his clear exposition of the facts, that it is impossible to say that on this part of the case he did not direct himself absolutely properly. I think it is conceded that upon this point of common law liability the judge did direct himself in the proper way. It is not too clear from the evidence exactly how this particular accident occurred, but it is clear enough I think to show that the particular place at which this man was working upon this altar was some 2 feet 6 inches wide on the side of the dock. It is equally plain, I think, that the workman was working facing the slatting, as the judge termed it, and no doubt as the work proceeded he concentrated upon that work with his back to the dry dock. It is a remarkable thing that where one sitting in the quietude of this court might say that that was a position of the gravest possible danger, the workmen employed seem to think nothing of it. It was said here with some force that for three years at least this kind of work had been going on. The men have from time to time shifted round the side of the dock erecting the slatting, and nobody had ever suggested that any precaution of any kind should be taken.

Mr. Marven Everett quite properly relied upon the evidence of Mr. Sinclair, the assistant of works, but it was perfectly plain that there was no word of evidence to the effect that the manifest danger here was such that something should have been done. It is perfectly plain from the evidence that if a simple protection had been erected in the way of a rail, such as was in fact erected after the accident, the man would have been quite safe. Mr. Sinclair was asked: "(Q.) You have heard the description of this "accident as to how this man fell? (A.) Yes. (Q.) That fencing" —that is, the temporary fencing which is now erected—"would "obviously be sufficient to protect him in this case? (A.) I would "not say for certain." Then they discussed the question whether he might have fallen through. "(Q.) Would you regard a man "fenced in that way by the top and middle rail as being "humanly speaking safe? (A.) Yes. (Q.) A man without that "fencing and with his mind concentrated on his work is not safe, "is he? (A.) It would depend on the man." Then there was some discussion whether a man might so concentrate on his work that he would forget that there was no protection.

I should have thought that it was an obvious risk to have a man working upon a ledge of that width with a possibility of a fall of this nature. The strange thing is that nothing was done, and indeed, as I understand it, after this accident the reason why the protective fencing was erected was because of the activity of the union who, with the knowledge of this disaster, stipulated that their men should not work unless they were protected from danger, and in consequence this simple rail was erected. I think the evidence is fairly plain that had that rail been in existence at the time this man met his death his life might have been saved. In those circumstances I think that the judge had to address his mind to the question, bearing all the circumstances in mind, what was the kind of risk to which this workman was subjected. It is perfectly plain that he certainly had that matter in mind. In the case of a man upon that ledge working in that position with his face towards the work on which he was concentrating and his back to the danger of which I have spoken, there was undoubtedly a risk.

The next question, therefore, is what would a reasonable employer, contemplating that situation, do: what precautions ought he to take to lessen that risk and to make the position of the workman more secure? The answer, of course, based on the facts of the three years previous experience was that there was no reason for it. Mr. Sinclair did not think it was necessary and no workman had called for it. I think that the judge was entitled to say, looking at all the circumstances, that a reasonable employer would have taken some precaution to avoid that risk which was in the circumstances quite manifest. A slip or momentary forgetfulness might cause a man to fall with the most dreadful consequences. I think for my own part that this case ought to be considered in this light: here was a man who was at the moment getting down on to this step to do this work, and as I understand from the evidence he had actually alighted upon his feet on that place but was not able to maintain his balance. In all the circumstances I think, therefore, that the judge, having properly directed himself and having given his mind to the exact facts and heard the evidence, came to the conclusion on those facts, and applying the law that the defendants had been guilty of negligence at common law. I think that unless there was something which ought to compel this court to disturb that judgment it ought to remain where it is. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

Romer L.J. I agree. I think that there are no sufficient grounds for disturbing the judge's findings on the question of negligence at common law, and I have nothing to add to what my brothers have said on that aspect of the case.

With regard to section 25 (3) of the Factories Act, 1937, I cannot for my part share the judge's view that the dry dock itself, which was in question here, was an opening in a floor within that provision. The section is manifestly directed to fencing openings in the floors of factories. By reason of section 151 of the Act, which is the definition section, dry docks and their precincts are factories and are, therefore, brought prima facie within section 25, and, accordingly, if there was a cavity in the "precincts," whatever that word may properly mean in relation to a dry dock, it would be within section 25 and so also, I suppose, if an opening were to be made for some purpose or other in the bottom of the dock. But if one reads the relevant definition in section 151 into section 25 one would find as a result that it requires that "all openings in floors of dry docks including the precincts thereof "shall be securely fenced." As a mere matter of language it seems to me to be an untenable contention that dry docks themselves are within the meaning of the word "openings." That interpretation would result in applying to the main object itself a requirement which is referable only to one of its constituent parts. I think, therefore, that it is plain that a dry dock itself is not an opening in a floor and subject to the requirements of fencing imposed by section 25 (3).

As regards section 26 which concerns safe means of access, I do not think myself that subsection (2) really has any bearing on this case or the circumstances of the accident. As to subsection (1), I agree with my Lord, and I am not really quite sure what precisely the judge had in mind when he found that the defendants were in breach of that statutory obligation. I think on the whole that he was impressed by the presence of the culvert close to the edge of the dock, and by the evidence that this unfortunate man walked or jumped over it, and having done so, stumbled and went over the side. On the assumption that safe means of access from that direction had to be provided, I think he was holding that the presence of the culvert was a breach of the obligation imposed by section 26 (1). But if that be so, it seems to be a sufficient answer to the suggested breach that as is shown in a photograph, a perfectly safe means of access was in fact provided for anybody approaching the dock from that direction by the strip of concrete which the photograph shows at the end of the culvert. On that view it seems to me that it is not possible to hold that the defendants were in breach of section 26 (1), and I cannot agree with the judge that they were. Having regard, however, to the judge's finding of common law negligence which we ought, in my opinion, to uphold on the facts, this appeal must fail.

Appeal dismissed, save that the award of £4,600 damages was reduced to £3,600.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Clerk—Interventions by clerk—Notes of evidence based upon proof—Impropriety.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Appeal to Divisional Court—Costs—Impropriety of clerk—No order against justices or clerk—Representation by amicus curiae. Legal aid—Costs—Solicitor—Attendance of country solicitor. Solicitor.

Where both parties are represented at the hearing a justices' clerk is no more entitled to step into the arena and conduct a litigant's case for him than is a magistrate. It is important in the interests of justice that the clerk should not give even the appearance of seeking himself to conduct the case of either party, or to limit the way in which that case is conducted, although he has a duty to assist the court as to what is and is not relevant.

It was alleged, inter alia, on a husband's appeal from a decision of justices that there had been interference by the clerk to the justices with the cross-examination of the wife and with the conduct of the examination-in-chief of the husband. There was also undisputed evidence that the justices' clerk had before him at the hearing a copy of the wife's proof which he had used as the basis of his notes of her evidence-in-chief:—

Held, that since the interference alleged was proved, and there had been a substantial obstruction by the clerk in the proceedings, there must be a re-hearing.

Per curiam: It is undesirable that a proof of evidence should be before a justices' clerk at the hearing of a case, and in no circumstances should such a proof be used as the basis of his notes of evidence. A bound notebook should normally be used for such notes although there cannot be a rule of universal application.

APPEAL from an order of Newcastle and Ogmore justices sitting at Bridgend, adjudging a husband to have deserted his wife.

The following statement of facts is summarized from the judgment of Sachs J: The marriage took place in December, 1950, one child, Christine, was born in 1951, and the parties finally parted on March 1, 1952. There had already been an earlier parting of some duration. It was common ground that the occasion of the parting in March, 1952, was a quarrel which resulted from the wife having been out at a dance on the previous night, where she removed her wedding ring, and that on this occasion the husband's brother, at whose house the husband and wife were staying, ordered the wife out of the house. The husband acquiesced in the order, and thereafter did not want to have anything more to do with the wife. Before this parting there had been a number of quarrels, due to complaints by the husband that the wife returned home late at night. It also appeared to have been common ground at the trial that at any rate on two occasions the wife had been away for one or two nights from the place at which she was living, without having given any particular explanation of her absences.

A second child was born to the wife, on October 24, 1952, and there was a conflict of evidence as to when complete sexual intercourse last took place between the husband and wife, and in particular whether that intercourse was on a date or dates likely to have resulted in the birth of a child. The husband sought at the trial to establish that his wife had committed adultery, and that even if he were unable to establish that adultery he had reasonable ground for believing that it had taken place, in view of the general conduct of the wife during the marriage. Alternatively, he alleged that the general conduct of his wife had been such as to justify him in not having anything more to do with her.

On November 5, 1953, the justices held that the husband had been guilty of desertion and made an order accordingly. They found that there had been no evidence given to justify the allegations of the husband that the general conduct of the wife since the marriage had been sufficient to absolve him from the charge of desertion.

The substantial ground of the appeal was an allegation that the clerk had so interfered at the hearing before the justices that the trial as a whole had been unsatisfactory, that justice did not appear to have been done, and that in particular all the appropriate evidence which had been available on behalf of the husband did not, in fact, come before the justices. Various matters were put forward in support of this allegation while at the same time no suggestion was made against the bona fides of either the justices or the clerk, nor was any suggestion made that they had acted at any stage with an improper motive. The main points put forward were (1) that there had been interference by the clerk to the justices with the cross-examination of the wife; (2) that there had been interference by the clerk with the conduct of the examination-in-chief of the husband; and (3) that the announcement of the reasons, before the court's decision, was made by the clerk, as opposed to being made by the chairman of the justices. (A conflict of evidence upon the third point was not in the circumstances finally resolved by the court.)

The husband, also complained that the wife's solicitor, just before the hearing of the case, had handed to the clerk a copy of the wife's proof of evidence, that that proof had been used by the clerk as the basis of his notes of her evidence-in-chief, and that the clerk had taken no notes at all of the cross-examination of the husband.

When the appeal first came on for hearing on March 2, 1954, affidavits by the husband's solicitor, the clerk to the justices, one of the justices who sat at the hearing, the wife's solicitor, and by a solicitor unconnected with the case who had been present during a considerable portion of the trial, were put in evidence. The appeal was adjourned to give the justices and their clerk an opportunity of reply and for the amplification of matters arising in the affidavits. It was expressly stated by the

v.
HOBBY.

court that an opportunity was to be given to all concerned to put on record such further material as might be needed, in order that the court might be fully seized of the facts, so as to come to a decision. A number of further affidavits were then filed, and the court was assured that the justices and the clerk had had every opportunity of dealing with the matters raised in the affidavits filed both before and after the initial hearing of the appeal.

The evidence on the question of interference with the course of the proceedings given by the husband's solicitor, who was himself clerk to a neighbouring bench of justices, was to the effect that at a relatively early stage in the cross-examination of the wife, after some twelve or so questions, the clerk had commenced to object to certain questions which he (the husband's solicitor) was putting to the wife. These questions, in the main, related to the conduct of the wife. The husband's solicitor, further stated that "by his frequent interventions and directions "the clerk to the justices was allowed substantially to control "the conduct of the proceedings." He averred that the clerk had intervened without reference to or discussion with any of the justices. It was further stated that the interventions of the clerk were such that he, the husband's solicitor, was prevented in practice from dealing in cross-examination of the wife with a number of relevant facts, and, in particular, with facts relevant to the general conduct of the wife, which were alleged to have induced in the husband a reasonable belief that the wife had committed adultery. These statements by the husband's solicitor as to interference with his cross-examination were to some extent supported by the affidavit of the independent solicitor who stated that after argument between the husband's solicitor and the clerk to the justices the former had desisted from questions which he had been asking. The clerk denied that he had restricted the husband's solicitor's cross-examination, but set out a list of the suggestions which he, the clerk, had made to the husband's solicitor as to the questions which should be put in cross-examination.

As to the second allegation, the husband's examination-in-chief followed an unsuccessful submission of no case. His solicitor stated: "At the commencement of my examination-in-"chief of the husband the clerk to the justices again intervened "(without prior reference to or discussion with the justices) to "say that the only thing that concerned the court was this "question of adultery prior to the parting on March 1, 1952. He "then detailed the five or six points which he wished to be put "to the husband and indicated that they were the only questions "which need be put . . . , I prefaced the first question to the "husband by saying: 'Since I am prohibited from putting any-"'thing further to you, will you now answer these questions.' "The clerk to the justices did not object or make any comment "on my use of the word 'prohibited' in that context. I then "put to the husband the questions which had been enumerated "by the clerk to the justices in the order and in the form which "he had indicated. During the course of such questions I "referred to the fact that I was unfortunately compelled to put "leading questions to the husband. The solicitor for the wife "then stated that he was not going to object since they were "helping his case in that form." The independent solicitor, referring to what had taken place, averred:—"At the commence-"ment of the examination-in-chief of the appellant I recall the "clerk to the justices enumerating five points or questions that "should be put to the appellant. [The solicitor for the husband] "then put to the appellant the five questions preceded by a "statement to the effect that 'since I appear to be prohibited "'from putting anything further to you will you now answer "'these five questions'." The examination-in-chief of the husband, apart from five main questions, consisted merely of some half-dozen questions ancillary to the five.

The wife's solicitor stated in his affidavit: "After the sub-"mission by the appellant's solicitor that he had no case to "answer and the justices' ruling that there was a case to answer "the clerk to the justices indicated that there were certain "questions which he enumerated that the appellant was required "to answer. To the best of my recollection the clerk put these "questions to the appellant's solicitor who in turn put them to "the appellant. The appellant's answers to these questions are "set out in his evidence-in-chief in the notes of evidence filed, "and are the first four sentences in his evidence."

The court accepted evidence that a proof of the wife had been physically used at the hearing as the basis upon which the clerk took the notes of the wife's examination-in-chief.

Geoffrey Howe for the husband appellant.
Philip Owen for the wife respondent.
Tasker Watkins for the justices.

LORD MERRIMAN P. I will ask Sachs J. to give the first judgment.

SACHS J., stating the facts, referred to the suggestions made to the husband's solicitor as to questions for cross-examination, said that it indicated the way in which the clerk had been attempting to govern in detail the cross-examination of the wife, that it was likely that an advocate would be embarrassed by the interventions, and that, in the result, though a certain amount of cross-examination about the wife's conduct appeared upon the notes of the evidence taken by the clerk, it nevertheless seemed that the husband's solicitor had been deterred from putting questions which were undoubtedly relevant. Referring to the accounts of what had happened upon the examination-in-chief of the husband, his Lordship said that the state of affairs was obviously

v.
Hobby.

Sachs J.

one which called for some satisfactory explanation on oath from the clerk to the justices or from the justices themselves. Four affidavits had been filed on behalf of the justices and their clerk, but none of them mentioned the examination-in-chief of the husband. The court did not appear on this appeal to have had that full and careful assistance in the way of affidavits from either the justices or their clerk which an appellate court normally required, and to which it was, in the circumstances of such a case, entitled.

His Lordship continued: In this somewhat difficult state of affairs it is first necessary to assess the evidence as a whole in so far as it relates to allegations of undue interference by the clerk to the justices. It seems evident that the allegations of fact by the husband's solicitor in relation to interference both with the cross-examination of the wife and the examination-in-chief of the husband are in substance established as accurate. Both the independent evidence and the inferences to be drawn from the other affidavits support this view. There was, indeed, a suggestion made on behalf of the justices that when it came to dealing with the examination-in-chief of the husband the clerk did no more than to amplify the refutation of the submission of no case. The evidence does not appear to be consistent with this suggestion; but the point is, whether some limitation was or was not in effect placed upon examination-in-chief of the husband. It seems to me that a limitation was placed, and that it was an undesirable limitation.

The third point raised by the husband's solicitor, that of the alleged undue interference by the clerk as to the announcement of the reasons for the court's decision, has resulted in a considerable conflict of evidence between the various affidavits filed on this appeal. Apart from those affidavits, however, this court has, for the first time, today seen the notes of the clerk to the justices. In those notes there appears a passage which relates both to the decision of the justices and to the reasons, as purported to be given by them at the time. It is one of the less happy features of this case that the contemporaneous note of the reasons given by the justices at the time was excised from the copy of the general notes sent up on this appeal to this court. What appears on that note is not inconsistent with the version of the husband's solicitor as to who it was who announced the decision of the court, but the reasons themselves agree with those stated in the affidavit of the wife's solicitor. In all the circumstances of this case, it does not appear necessary further to resolve the conflict of evidence on the point as to who made the announcement.

Both parties were represented at the trial by solicitors; accordingly, neither of them was in need of assistance as to how to present the case in court. Both parties were entitled, within the limits of relevancy and reasonableness, so to conduct their case as seemed best to their legal representatives in court. In those circumstances a justices' clerk is no more entitled to step into the arena and conduct a litigant's case for him than is a magistrate himself. Indeed, it is important in the interests of justice that the clerk should not give even the appearance of seeking himself to conduct the case of either party, or to limit the way in which that case is conducted. At any particular trial this need to allow freedom to the litigant has from time to time to be balanced against the clerk's duty to assist the court as to what is and what is not relevant—matters, however, on which it is not for him to give a ruling himself. Sometimes the dividing line between the part a clerk may, on the one hand, take in order to see that the time of the court is not wasted, and the interventions on the other hand which, in the interests of justice appearing to be done he ought not to make, is difficult of demarcation. In the present case, however, it is clear that the clerk overstepped the line to a considerable degree, and put substantial obstruction in the way of the husband's solicitor's conduct of his client's case.

The clerk seems to have given the appearance both of being master of the conduct of the husband's case and even to some degree of being master of the court, as regards what should and should not be given in evidence. It is, perhaps, a symptom of this attitude of the clerk that after the short examination-in-chief of the husband it was the clerk who took up the cross-examination, although the wife was represented in court by a solicitor. Then, having finished and noted his own cross-examination, the clerk did not take one single note of the cross-examination by the wife's solicitor. Indeed, looking at the notes of evidence as taken by the clerk, this court was at first under the impression that there had been no cross-examination at all by the wife's solicitor, but, in fact, the wife's solicitor, in the course of his frank affidavit, has set out that he did cross-examine the husband at some length, and it is clear from that affidavit that his cross-examination elicited facts of importance. Some of those facts were of assistance to the husband, some were of assistance to the wife, but in neither case was any note taken of them, an omission which is, in itself, contrary to what has been laid down as a clerk's duty in relation to taking notes.

The result of what I have previously referred to as the substantial obstruction of the husband's solicitor's conduct of his client's case was that a considerable amount of evidence was not adduced in chief which he would otherwise have sought to obtain from the husband. Indeed, the notes of evidence clearly reveal that something appears to have gone wrong at the trial. Those notes reveal an examination unnatural in sequence, and curtailed as regards the number of questions to quite an unusual degree. Vital points were not put to the husband in examination-in-chief. Many of those vital points were discussed in argument before this court today, but they are points which perhaps it is undesirable to

v.
HOBBY.

Sachs J.

recapitulate, in view of the order which this court may be making. The result was that justice certainly did not appear manifestly to be done at this stage. Accordingly, upon the facts which I have so far stated, in my opinion the trial was an unsatisfactory one, and the decision of the justices cannot stand.

That, however, leaves over the question which has been raised in relation to the wife's proof having been handed to the clerk to the justices, and as to the way in which the clerk's notes were taken upon that proof. The fact is clear that during the trial a proof of the wife, which she had given to her solicitors, so it is said, in August, 1953, was before the clerk. Equally it is clear that it was, in fact, physically used as the basis upon which the clerk took the notes of the wife's examination-in-chief. The facts that led to this state of affairs are not so clear. In August, 1953, a summons was taken out by the wife, which I will refer to as the earlier summons. This court has been told from the Bar that it was a summons under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 and 1925, but the clerk's affidavit seems to indicate a difference on that matter. On the taking out of the summons in August, 1953, a document, also in the form of a proof was then lodged with the clerk to the justices. The second document is different in its contents from the first, and whether or not it related to the earlier summons is not clear, nor is it clear whether the second one was originally handed over to the clerk to the justices on November 4, 1953, as being material upon which a fresh complaint was founded, or whether it was actually handed to him on the morning of the trial, as seems more likely from the affidavits which have been put before us.

These doubts, however, do not affect the question now before the court, i.e., as to the propriety of a proof of the complaint being before the clerk during the hearing of the summons, and, further, as to the propriety of its being used by the clerk as a document upon which to take his notes. The court is not considering what is and what is not proper material upon which a summons can be issued. I note that in the court at Bridgend there seems to be no court notebook in which the justices' clerk takes notes. He appears to use, as a practice, the complainant's proof as being part of his notebook, simply altering any portions of the proof which he thinks have not been given in evidence, and making such additions to that proof as he thinks accord with the evidence as given. For subsequent notes he uses deposition paper. This court has been informed of no reason why a bound notebook is not used as in neighbouring courts. While there neither is, nor can be, a rule of universal application as to the exact form in which notes of matrimonial matters should be taken in varying circumstances, it is right to make it clear that it is obviously preferable that normally there should be used for such notes the usual bound notebook.

That the proof of the wife was before the clerk during the hearing of the case was of itself clearly undesirable; indeed, this was conceded at the Bar by those who sought to support the decision in this case. Such a document, not having been seen by the other party's representative, is apt to be regarded with suspicion by that other party. Further, in no circumstances should such a proof be used as the basis of the notes of the clerk to the justices. His duty is accurately set out in Rayden on Divorce, 6th ed., p. 542, as follows: "It is the duty of the "Clerk to the Magistrates or Justices to take a full note of the "evidence given at the hearing of the application." The responsible nature of that duty has frequently been emphasized. As long ago as Cobb v. Cobb,[1] it was stated that "Unless notes are "taken and furnished, the [Summary Jurisdiction (Married "Women)] Act [1895] would be unworkable, for it would be "impossible for us, without the notes, to do justice between the "parties upon these appeals."

In more than one instance the notes contain unaltered the phraseology of that proof of evidence which the wife's solicitors had taken some months earlier. In such circumstances this court cannot be certain that when it receives upon an appeal a note thus compiled it contains the true shades of wording which the witnesses, in fact, used. Notes so taken are unreliable, and the method used in this case was wrong, and, indeed, dangerous in so far as the interests of justice are concerned. It was for these reasons, indeed, very properly conceded by counsel for the justices that notes taken in the way which this clerk used here cannot fairly be said to be real notes of the evidence given.

Accordingly, there was an error both in the proof being before the clerk at trial, and in the clerk making that proof the basis of his notes. But, as the husband's solicitor appears to have seen the proof being handed to the clerk, the husband cannot, upon this appeal, rely on this error in procedure, nor, indeed, does he raise it as one of his grounds of appeal. The general importance of this matter of the notes lies in the fact that this appeal has brought to light something touching the interests of justice in relation to the court at Bridgend. Its particular relevance to this case lies in the fact that where there are notes of this type before a clerk they may have some bearing on his attitude of mind towards such allegations as may be sought to be put forward by the opposing party.

But, as I have already indicated, this appeal does not turn on the question of these notes. It is on the obstruction placed in the way of the husband's solicitor in conducting his case that this appeal turns. It is on that ground that, in my view, a fresh trial is necessary: and as a fresh trial is necessary it follows that nothing more need be said on the merits of the case or as to the weight or otherwise of any matters excluded by the procedure adopted on November 5, 1953. Those are matters for the new trial. I would only add that, if those questions which were excluded on November 5, 1953, had resulted in answers favourable to the husband, or, indeed, if the husband's case had been allowed to be conducted freely by his solicitor, there might have been a different result. It is not, however, for this court to express any opinion as to what the result would have been.

Lord Merriman P. I agree. With regard to the main issue, I am in complete agreement with the concluding observations of Sachs J. If favourable answers had been obtained to the questions in cross-examination of the wife, or in examination-in-chief of the husband, which the husband's solicitor was deterred from putting in the circumstances which have been described by Sachs J., it might conceivably have thrown a fresh light on the rest of the evidence. More than that it is not necessary to say. I also agree emphatically that this is clearly a case in which the principle that justice must manifestly be seen to be done has been infringed.

With regard to the use of the proof of the wife, it is no part of my business to dictate to the Bridgend court how the details of an information sworn to by a complainant shall be recorded, but I am strongly of opinion that it is highly undesirable that that record, whatever form it takes, and particularly if it takes, as it did in this case, the form of a proof of evidence, should be transferred to the actual hearing as the basis of the notes of the complainant's evidence given in open court. The objections to that practice are so obvious that it is unnecessary to dilate upon them, and, indeed, no attempt has been made to defend the practice. The objections are indisputable, and I hope that this will be the last instance in which the practice is followed in that particular court. I would only add, as another footnote, so to speak, to what Sachs J. has said, that its relevance in this case is not that it is raised as a substantive ground of appeal, nor, indeed, could it have been raised, I think, for the reasons given by my brother, but that it is, in my opinion, impossible to ignore the possibility that the use of this proof as the basis of the note may have been a factor which induced the apparent reluctance of the clerk to widen the area of investigation.

The result is that the appeal must be allowed, the order set aside, and the wife's complaint remitted for rehearing by a completely fresh panel of the justices, and I would add the suggestion that on the rehearing it would be desirable that a deputy for the clerk should be appointed.

[It was submitted on behalf of the husband that, although he was an assisted person, he was paying a substantial contribution towards his own costs, and that in the event it would appear that part of the cost of the appeal had arisen from the manner in which the hearing had been conducted by the intervention of the clerk. Some redress, either for the legal aid fund or for the husband, should be found by making an order for costs against the clerk, or against the justices.]

v.
HOBBY.

LORD MERRIMAN P. How could we? We invited the assistance of the justices, who very properly briefed counsel to appear, in effect as amicus curiae, so that the matters which have been so faithfully dealt with by Mr. Tasker Watkins might be put before us. But the justices are not here as parties against whom an order can be made.

[The court was asked about the costs of the attendance of the country solicitors.]

LORD MERRIMAN P. I suppose that we are entitled to express an opinion; but we cannot bind the taxing master. But we are both clearly of the opinion that it was eminently desirable that the country solicitors on both sides should attend. It would have been a very great embarrassment to the court had they not done so.

Appeal allowed; case remitted for rehearing.

As a result of a scheme of reduction of a company's capital there was issued to preference shareholders 5 per cent. cumulative stock. The income stock was constituted by an instrument dated May 4, 1938, clause 5 of which provided for the stock's redemption and for payment of 5 per cent. interest on it until redemption. The interest was to be payable only to the extent to which the company's net profits for the year ended September 30, 1938, and for each succeeding year ended on September 30 should suffice to pay it, and was to be cumulative:—

Held, that the payments of interest on the stock were properly allowable in computing the company's profits for the purposes of profits tax by virtue of para. 4 of Sch. IV to the Finance Act, 1937 and of section 14 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940, since those payments were payments of interest on money and were not distribution of profits. Holders of income stock were not, as such, members of the company, but were persons towards whom the company's liabilities were defined by the trust instrument and not otherwise. They were, in fact and in law, in the position of debenture holders, and the condition that if there was no profit interest was not payable was only a measure of the company's liability.

APPEAL by the Crown from a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The case stated set out the following facts: At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on July 15, 1953, the Pullman Car Co. Ld. (hereinafter called "the company") appealed against two assessments to profits tax made on it for the chargeable accounting period beginning on October 1, 1948, and ending on September 30, 1949, being a first assessment in the sum of £14,000 and an additional assessment in the sum of £7,250.

The questions of law for the opinion of the court were whether, in the circumstances hereinafter set forth, payments described as interest paid by the company in the said chargeable accounting period to holders of 5 per cent. cumulative income stock (a) were properly allowable as deductions in computing the company's profits for the purposes of profits tax by virtue of paragraph 4 of Schedule IV to the Finance Act, 1937, and section 14 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940,[1] and (b) if not so allowable as deductions, were to be taken into account (in so far as they were made

[1] Finance Act, 1937, s. 19: "(1) There shall be charged, on the profits arising in each chargeable accounting period falling within the five years beginning on the first day of April, 1937, from any trade or business to which this section applies, a tax (to be called the 'national defence contribution') of an amount equal to five per cent. of those profits in a case where the trade or business is carried on by a body corporate and four per cent. of those profits in any other case."

S. 20: "(1) For the purpose of the national defence contribution, the profits arising from a trade or business in each chargeable accounting period shall be separately computed, and shall be so computed on income tax principles as adapted in accordance with the provisions of the Fourth Schedule to this Act."

Sch. IV, para. 4: "The principles of the Income Tax Acts under which deductions are not allowed for interest, annuities or other annual payments payable out of the profits . . . shall not be followed: Provided that nothing in this paragraph shall authorise any deduction in respect of—(a) any payment of dividend or distribution of profits. . . ."

Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940, s. 14: "(1) No deduction in respect of any interest, annuity or other annual payment shall, by virtue of paragraph 4 . . . of the Fourth Schedule to the Finance Act, 1937, be allowed in computing the profits of a trade or business for the purposes of excess profits tax or the national defence contribution unless the interest, annuity or other annual payment would, on income tax principles, be an allowable deduction in computing profits but for the express provision contained in paragraph (l) of Rule 3 of the Rules applicable to Cases I and II of Schedule D that no deduction is to be made in respect of any annual interest or any annuity or other annual payment payable out of the profits or gains."

to stockholders who were also registered as shareholders in the company) as "distributions to proprietors" within sections 35 and 36 of the Finance Act, 1947, for the purpose of computing the profits tax payable by the company.

The company owned a fleet of Pullman cars which were operated under agreements made with various railway companies and subsequently with British Railways. At the beginning of 1938 the issued share capital of the company was £1,125,000, made up of 625,000 cumulative preference shares of £1 each and 500,000 ordinary shares of £1 each. Dividends on the cumulative preference shares were in arrear from February 22, 1932.

About the beginning of 1938 the directors of the company proposed a reduction of capital for the reasons and in the manner set out in a circular dated January 6, 1938. The proposals included the substitution for the 625,000 7 per cent. cumulative preference shares of £437,500 5 per cent. cumulative income stock and 187,500 "A" ordinary shares of £1 each to be effected by paying off or satisfying the sum of 14s. per share, being part of the capital paid up on each of the 7 per cent. cumulative preference shares, and by issuing to the holders thereof in satisfaction of such capital 5 per cent cumulative income stock of nominal amount equal to the amount of the capital paid off or satisfied. The balance of the preference share capital not so repaid or satisfied was to be converted into "A" ordinary shares.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the company held on January 28, 1938, special resolutions were duly passed giving effect to the proposal for reduction of capital contained in the circular and divers consequential matters. On April 11, 1938, the reduction of capital effected by the special resolution was confirmed by the High Court.

The income stock was constituted by an instrument dated May 4, 1938. The attention of the commissioners was in particular drawn to clause 5 of the instrument which, after providing for eventual redemption of the stock and for payment of interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum until redemption, provided as follows: "Provided always that the interest on the "stock shall be payable only to the extent to which the net "profits of the company (calculated as hereinafter mentioned) for "the year ended on the 30th September, 1938, and for each "succeeding year ended on a 30th September shall be sufficient "to pay such interest and so that such interest shall be cumu-"lative, that is to say, that if and so far as the net profits for "any such year as aforesaid shall be insufficient for the payment "thereof the deficiency shall be carried forward and shall be "payable out of the net profits for the succeeding year or years "if and so far as the same shall suffice for the purpose. All "interest on the stock which shall become payable out of the net "profits of the company for any such year as aforesaid shall in so "far as not previously paid be payable within 30 days after such "profits shall have been certified as hereinafter provided but the "company may whenever in the opinion of the directors the "available profits of the company justify such payment pay "the interest on the stock or any part thereof by half-yearly "payments on April 1 and October 1." The income stock was in due course quoted on the Stock Exchange and there were numerous dealings over the years.

Full interest was paid on the income stock under the instrument to March 31, 1939, and 2 per cent. interest was paid for the following half-year. No further payment of interest was made until 1947, when payments again began to be made. As a result of payments made on January 1 and November 24, 1947, and April 1, 1948, only 2½ years' interest remained in arrear on September 29, 1948.

Between the date of issue and September 29, 1948, substantial amounts of the income stock were redeemed and on September 29, 1948, the company gave notice of its intention to redeem at par on December 31, 1948, the whole of the outstanding income stock, the notice being coupled with an offer to stockholders to convert their holdings into 4½ per cent. preference shares, the company's capital having meanwhile been increased by the creation of 500,000 4½ per cent. cumulative redeemable preference shares of £1 each.

Payment of outstanding arrears of interest on the income stock was made on October 1, 1948, amounting to £45,184 before deduction of income tax, provision having been made in the accounts of the company for the year ended September 30, 1948, for the payment of the equivalent net amount of £24,851. On December 31, 1948, the outstanding income stock was redeemed and the company at the same time paid interest on that stock from October 1 to December 31, 1948, amounting to £4,517 before deduction of income tax. It was in respect of that amount of £4,517 that the question of law (a) hereinbefore set out arose. The question of law (b) hereinbefore set out affected an amount of £28,618, being such part of the two said amounts of £45,184 and £4,517 as was paid, under deduction of income tax, to persons who were registered as shareholders of the company.

A member of the firm of chartered accountants who were auditors to the company gave evidence, which the commissioners accepted, that the interest payable under the instrument constituting the income stock was a charge which fell to be made against the profits of the company, according to the ordinary principles of commercial accounting, to arrive at the company's profits for the purpose of distribution of dividends. In relation to the Crown's contention that payment of interest to holders of income stock who were also registered as members of the company should be treated as part of the "gross relevant "distributions to proprietors," he produced a number of illustrations of individuals and companies holding both income stock and "A" or "B" shares in the company. These included a number of nominee companies which held "A" or "B" shares in addition to substantial holdings of income stock. In such cases it was not possible to determine whether the shares and the stock were held for the same person or for different persons.

For the company it was contended: (1) that the interest paid to the holders of income stock should be deducted in computing company's profits for the purpose of profits tax, by virtue of paragraph 4 of Schedule IV to the Finance Act, 1937; (2) that in any event that interest did not form part of the gross relevant distributions to proprietors of the company within sections 35 and 36 of the Finance Act, 1947, and, in particular, was neither a "dividend" nor a "cash bonus" within section 36 (1) (a); and (3) that the assessments under appeal ought to be reduced accordingly.

For the Crown it was contended: (1) that the interest on the income stock was not "interest" within paragraph 4 of Schedule IV to the Finance Act, 1937, or, alternatively, if it was such interest, the payment of it was a payment of dividend or distribution of profits within the proviso to paragraph 4; (2) that the said interest was not allowable as a deduction in computing the company's profits for the purpose of profits tax; (3) that the said interest, in so far as it was paid to persons who were registered as members of the company at the date of payment, should be included in the gross relevant distribution to proprietors of the company by virtue of sections 35 and 36 of the Finance Act, 1947; and (4) that the assessments should, subject to certain necessary adjustments to the figures, be confirmed.

The commissioners who heard the appeal gave their decision in favour of the company in the following terms, expressing no opinion on the question of law (b) hereinbefore set out which, in view of their decision on the question of law (a) hereinbefore set out, did not arise: (1) The commissioners held that the "interest" paid to the holders of income stock of the company in the chargeable accounting period in question was "interest payable out of the profits" of the company within paragraph 4 of Schedule IV to the Finance Act, 1937, and was not a "payment of dividend or distribution of profits" within subparagraph (a) of the proviso to paragraph 4. (2) The commissioners reached that conclusion from a perusal of all the documents relating to the income stock to which they were referred; in particular, the terms of the special resolution passed on January 28, 1938, and of the instrument dated May 4, 1938, indicated to their minds that the "interest" in question was in truth interest on loan capital of the company, payable out of the company's profits, and they did not read the proviso to clause 5 of the instrument as pointing to any different conclusion. (3) It followed that in their opinion that interest was deductible in computing the company's profits for the purposes of profits tax. Accordingly, they held that the appeal succeeded in principle and they left the figures to be agreed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. PULLMAN CAR CO. LD.

Agreement of the figures on the basis of the commissioners' decision in principle was in due course reported to them and, on September 24, 1953, they determined the appeal by confirming the first assessment and reducing the additional assessment to £2,382 13s.

The Crown appealed from that decision.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

HARMAN J. This is an appeal by the Crown against the decision of the Special Commissioners on a profits tax appeal by the Pullman Car Co. Ld. The commissioners allowed the appeal, holding that in computing its profits tax liability the company was entitled to deduct sums paid to the holders of its income stock in respect of its financial year 1948–9, this sum being described by the company as "interest."

The income stock came into existence as a result of a scheme of reduction of the company's capital sanctioned by the High Court in 1938. It was redeemed in the year 1948. Immediately before the scheme came into force the company's capital consisted of 625,000 7 per cent. cumulative preference shares of £1 each, the interest on which was six years in arrear, and 500,000 ordinary shares of £1 each. The company was advised that its main asset, namely, Pullman cars, was much over-valued. The object of the reduction was to reorganize the balance sheet on a realistic basis. It is thus described in a circular sent to shareholders in 1938: "Under the scheme it is proposed that the book value of the "cars and equipment be reduced by £533,617, this amount to "be provided as to £450,000 by reducing the existing 500,000 "ordinary shares of £1 each by 18s. per share to 500,000 ordinary "shares of 2s. each entitled to one vote per share, and as to "£83,617 by appropriating part of the balance now standing to "the credit of profit and loss account. The scheme further "provides for the reconstitution of the preference share capital "and the variation of the rights attaching thereto as follows:— "1. For the present issue of 625,000 7 per cent. cumulative "preference shares there will be substituted:—£437,500 5 per "cent. cumulative income stock and 187,500 'A' ordinary shares "of £1 each."

The necessary resolutions were passed and the sanction of the court to the reduction was obtained. The ordinary shares were reduced to 2s. in the usual way, but the preference shares were treated differently, 14s. nominal of each share being replaced by the income stock and 6s. nominal by new "A" ordinary shares. The income stock was created by what is called an instrument, from which I take the following: "This instrument

"entered into the fourth day of May, 1938, by the Pullman "Car Co. Ld. . . . witnesseth and the company hereby agrees "with all persons whose names are for the time being entered "in the register hereinafter mentioned as holders of the said "stock (and to the intent that such persons shall be entitled "to enforce the provisions of this instrument as against the "company) and declares as follows: . . . 4. The stock shall be "held subject to the conditions set forth in the schedule hereto ". . . 5. As and when the stock or any part thereof ought to be "redeemed or paid off in accordance with the conditions set forth "in the said schedule hereto the company shall pay to the stock-"holders or to those whose stock ought to be redeemed or paid "off the full amount of the stock held by them respectively or "as the case may be such part of the stock as in accordance with "the said conditions ought to be redeemed or paid off and such "payment shall operate in satisfaction of the amount of the "stock so redeemed or paid off and the company shall in the "meantime until the stock is redeemed or paid off but subject "as hereinafter provided pay to the stockholders interest on "the stock held by them respectively at the rate of 5 per "centum per annum calculated from October 1, 1937: Provided "always that the interest on the stock shall be payable only to "the extent to which the net profits of the company (calculated "as hereinafter mentioned) for the year ending on September 30, "1938, and for each succeeding year ending on September 30 "shall be sufficient to pay such interest and so that such interest "shall be cumulative, that is to say, that if and so far as the "net profits for any such year as aforesaid shall be insufficient "for the payment thereof the deficiency shall be carried forward "and shall be payable out of the net profits for the succeeding "year or years if and so far as the same shall suffice for the "purpose."

Up to March, 1939, the full interest (so-called) was duly paid, but then fell into arrear. Payments were resumed in 1947, and by September, 1948, two and half years' arrears remained. Stock was from time to time redeemed, and the whole was paid off by the end of that year together with the so-called interest. It is in respect of interest payments in 1948 that the question arises, the company maintaining and the Crown denying that the "interest" payments were in law interest or other annual payments payable out of the profits of the company within the meaning of Schedule IV, paragraph 4, to the Finance Act, 1937. This Act created the national defence contribution, which was renamed "profits tax" in 1946, and section 19 (1) of the Act provides: "There shall be charged, on the profits arising in each "chargeable accounting period falling within" the years of charge, ". . . a tax . . ." Section 20 is in these terms: "(1) For the purpose of the national defence contribution, the "profits arising from a trade or business in each chargeable "accounting period shall be separately computed, and shall be

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Pullman Car Co. Ld.

Harman J.

"so computed on income tax principles as adapted in accordance "with the provisions of the Fourth Schedule to this Act." In Schedule IV, I find an elaborate code altering to the extent stated the usual income tax principles under Schedule D. Paragraph 4, which is the relevant one, is in these terms: "The principles of "the Income Tax Acts under which deductions are not allowed "for interest, annuities or other annual payments payable out "of the profits . . . shall not be followed: Provided that nothing in "this paragraph shall authorise any deduction in respect of— "(a) any payment of dividend or distribution of profits. . . ."

To that I must add section 14 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940, which by way of precaution provides as follows: "(1) No "deduction in respect of any interest, annuity or other annual "payment shall, by virtue of paragraph 4 . . . of the Fourth "Schedule to the Finance Act, 1937, be allowed in computing "the profits of a trade or business for the purposes of excess "profits tax or the national defence contribution unless the "interest, annuity or other annual payment would, on income "tax principles, be an allowable deduction in computing profits "but for the express provision contained in paragraph (l) of "rule 3 of the Rules applicable to Cases I and II of Schedule D "that no deduction is to be made in respect of any annual interest "or any annuity or other annual payment payable out of the "profits or gains." Thus, in order to qualify the payment must be such as but for paragraph (l) of rule 3 would be a payment deductible for income tax purposes.

It is the Crown's contention that the so-called interest is in truth a distribution of profits. Therefore, it is necessary to analyse the position of the income stockholders. It seems clear to me that a holder of this stock is not as such a member of the company. He is a person towards whom the liabilities of the company are defined by the so-called instrument, and not otherwise. These obligations consist of a covenant to redeem under certain conditions, and in the meanwhile to pay, but only if and when the profits allow it, what is called interest. The stockholder is in fact and in law in the position of a debenture-holder. He has, it is true, no charge in respect of either payment, but that is not essential, though usual in a debenture. There is a sinking fund, and there are terms of redemption, and the schedule to the instrument reads much like a debenture trust deed.

Why, then, is the so-called interest any different from ordinary debenture interest? Because, says the Crown, its payment is contingent on the earning of sufficient profits. It is argued that to promise such a payment is really to confer on the promisee a share in the profits of the concern, and the performance of that promise is in truth a distribution of profits, or alternatively, is in the nature of a dividend. Therefore, so runs the argument, even if it should be conceded that the payments are interest and so forth within paragraph 4, they are excluded by the proviso (a) as being a distribution of profits.

I find this argument entirely unconvincing. It seems to me that holders of income stock are in the position of people who have lent money to the company, and they are not proprietors nor sharers in the profits as such. True, in the absence of profit no interest becomes payable, but that is only the measure of the company's liability. I find nothing strange in the conception of a debenture-holder whose right to interest is so limited, and am of the opinion that the commissioners were entirely in the right in finding as they did. "We hold that the 'interest' paid to the "holders of income stock of the company in the chargeable "accounting period in question was 'interest payable out of the "'profits' of the company within paragraph 4 of Schedule IV to "the Finance Act, 1937, and was not a 'payment of dividend or "'distribution of profits' within subparagraph (a) of the proviso "to the said paragraph 4."

It was suggested to me that of the two expressions in the proviso the first, namely, "payment of dividend," was intended to apply to corporations, and the other, "distribution of profits," to unincorporated concerns. This, I think, may well be so, but it is unnecessary for me to decide it.

It is said, however, by the Crown that I am precluded from coming to the conclusion which I would otherwise have reached by two cases decided by Rowlatt J., one in 1920 on similar words relating to excess profits duty, and the other in 1926 on other but not materially different words in connexion with corporation profits tax. I need hardly say any decision of that judge on this subject merits most careful attention.

The first of these cases was A. W. Walker & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.[1] That case was concerned with the terms of a loan made to a firm of corn merchants, who under an agreement made in 1914 had agreed in consideration of a loan of £4,000 to pay the lender while it was outstanding £200 a year, and in addition three-twentieths of the profits of the firm between £1,000 and £3,000—that is to say, a maximum of £300. The document provided that this should not constitute a partnership. The firm was allowed only the £200 as a deduction in computing its profits, and appealed, claiming that the extra £300 was also interest on the borrowed money. This claim was rejected by the judge. Among other things, this was said[2]: "For excess profits "duty, generally speaking, the profits of a trade or business are "calculated as if for income tax, but there is an exception "made with regard to deduction of interest on money borrowed "for the purpose of the trade or business in the second para-"graph of Part I of the Fourth Schedule to the Finance (No. 2) "Act, 1915. That says that 'The principle of the Income Tax "'Acts under which deductions are not allowed for interest on "'money borrowed for the purpose of the trade or business, or "'for rent, or royalties, or for other payments income tax on "'which is collected at the source (not being payments of "'dividends or payments for the distribution of profits), . . .' is "not to be followed. Therefore it comes to this that interest "on money is deductible but distribution of profits is not "deductible. Now I have come quite clearly to the conclusion "that the commissioners are right here. They have allowed the "£200 a year which is interest on money, and they have dis-"allowed the other £300, which seems nothing but giving the "lenders a share of the profits eo nomine. They both, of course, "are in consideration of the loan; that is why they are paid, there "is no doubt about that, but they are different things, and the "people who have lent this money have got interest and they "have got a share of the profits—that is the long and short of it. "They have got interest which is payable to them as a debt, it "matters not whether the concern prospers or languishes; they "have got the other thing, which is a share of what the business "earns, and that is not interest, that is simply a share of the "profits. If there are profits they get a share, if there are "no profits they do not get anything. It is simply, as it says in "the agreement, a share of the profits."

That case seems to me distinguishable from the present, though it has no doubt a superficial resemblance in that the amount of the return which the lender gets on his loan depends in both cases on the prosperity of the borrower. In Walker's case [3] the lender, as the provision excluding partnership shows, was made a quasi-proprietor. He did get interest on his money to the tune of £200 whether the business prospered or no, but he was made a sharer quoad ultra. The two rights stand clearly distinguishable on the document of loan.

In the present case the stockholder is in no sense a proprietor or member of the company. He is simply a debenture-holder whose right to interest is contingent.

In the other case, Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Mashonaland Railway Co. Ld.,[4] the facts are far different from those I have here to consider. The Mashonaland Railway Co. had provided a sum of £800,000 to enable another company, the Beira Co., to build a railway. The latter company in return was under a liability to pay an annual sum out of its earnings, or if insufficient the whole of its earnings, to the Mashonaland Co. This was called a rentcharge. The question was whether this sum was "a payment for distribution of profits," those being the relevant words in the statute. Rowlatt J. held that it was, and followed his own decision in Walker's case.[5] He said [6]: "The "question here is, in my opinion, whether this is a distribution "of profits. They are profits, because they are income tax "profits, but is this a distribution of profits? I do not quite "know what other payments, income tax on which is collected "at the source, may be left in that expression after you have "taken out the exceptions, but it does seem to me that I cannot "avoid saying this is a distribution of profits. 'Distribution' "is what it turns on. Does that mean something merely by "way of a dividend (saying the same thing very much over again), "something in respect of which there is no consideration except "the subscription of shareholders' capital, or something of that "sort? I do not think I can so limit it, and I think I am bound "by my own decision in the Mahratta case,[7] and, more par-"ticularly, in Walker's case.[8] In Walker's case, for facilities "afforded to the company, a gentleman was awarded three-"twentieths of the profits, and I said: 'He is given a share of "'the profits without being made a partner. He has a share "'of the profits limited to three-twentieths.' Here they have "a share of the profits limited to £42,500. I do not think you "can state it more clearly than that, and therefore it seems to "me I am bound by my own decision and, if that principle is "wrong, recourse will have to be had to another court to put it "right." No other court has been asked to put it right. But the facts in that case, particularly by the terms of the instrument which created the loan are so different from those in the present case that it seems to me, with all respect to those who urge to the contrary, that I get no help from it, and do not feel constrained by it to alter the opinion which I have formed, that the payments here in question are interest on money and not distribution of profits. I therefore dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

MONTAGU
v.
BROWNING.

In 1941 the trustees of a synagogue employed the first defendant as caretaker to the synagogue and at the same time let to him a house within the ambit of the Rent Restriction Acts. From 1941 to 1946 he paid as rent a weekly sum of 10s., the difference between the estimated value of his services and the estimated rental value of the house. His wife, the second defendant, carried out the caretaker's duties. In 1946 the trustees increased the caretaker's wages by 10s. a week, and thereafter he paid no rent in money form.

In 1953 the trustees sought to recover possession of the house, contending that, as the increase in wages in 1946 constituted a new agreement by which the rent became payable entirely in services, the protected tenancy came to an end at that date. The county court judge made the order for possession, holding himself bound by dicta in Hornsby v. Maynard [1925] 1 K.B. 514, that rent in the Rent Restriction Acts meant pecuniary rent only. On appeal by the defendants:—

Held, that the character of the protected tenancy created in 1941 was not changed and no new agreement came into being as a result of the increase in wages in 1946, and the cessation of monetary payments by the tenant; and that the tenancy remained within the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts.

Per Denning L.J. Where rent is not payable in money but in kind, so long as the parties have by agreement quantified the value in terms of money, the sum so quantified is the rent of the house, within the meaning of the Rent Restriction Acts.

APPEAL from Judge H. C. Leon, sitting at Willesden County Court.

In June, 1941, Browning, the first defendant, was appointed caretaker of the Wembley Synagogue by the plaintiffs as trustees of the United Synagogue, the value of his services as caretaker being estimated at £40 a year. At the same time the plaintiffs let to him a dwelling-house of which they were the owners at 12, Forty Road, Wembley Park, the rental value of which was estimated at £66 a year; and it was agreed that he should pay the difference between his wages and the rental value of the house, namely, £26 a year or 10s. a week as rent or balance of rent for the house. The rateable value of the house was £34 per annum.

That arrangement continued until February, 1946, the second defendant (wife to the first defendant) taking over and in fact performing the services of caretaker, her husband being employed on other full-time work elsewhere.

In February, 1946, the managers of the Wembley Synagogue decided by resolution that, in view of the additional work of cleaning the synagogue which was being done by the defendants, the remuneration should be increased by 10s. a week, or £26 a year, and the minister to the synagogue called on the wife and said: "I have good news for you. You won't have to pay the "10s. a week any more. We are raising your wages," to which she replied: "Thank you very much." From that date no further cash was handed over by the defendants.

On August 28, 1953, the trustees determined the defendants' employment, and later required them to leave the premises on October 9, 1953. They remained in possession and on March 22, 1954, a valid notice to quit was served on them. The trustees then began the action claiming possession against the first defendant on the ground that by virtue of a new agreement made in February, 1946, the first defendant ceased to pay a rent within the meaning of the Rent Restriction Acts,[1] and accordingly ceased to be a protected tenant.

The first defendant, who appeared in person, resisted the claim, stating that he felt he had always paid rent because he and his wife had never received wages.

The plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to judgment, on the basis of the decision of the Divisional Court in Hornsby v. Maynard,[2] where it was said that rent in the Rent Restriction Acts meant pecuniary rent.

The county court judge found (1) that from June, 1941, to February, 1946, the first defendant was a tenant of the plaintiffs paying a rent partly in money and partly in services, the value of those services being agreed between the parties as being worth £40 per annum; and (2) that from February, 1946, no rent in money was paid, credited, offered or demanded, and that from that time the first defendant was a tenant of the plaintiffs, paying his rent entirely in services, which were agreed between the parties as being worth £66 per annum. He expressed the view that had it not been for the decision in Hornsby v. Maynard,[2] he would have been prepared to hold that the tenant who provided evaluated services was paying a rent of more than two-thirds of the rateable value of the house, and was thus protected by the Rent Restriction Acts; but, having regard to both the judgments in that case, in which Shearman and Salter JJ. expressly stated as a ground for their decision that "rent" meant a pecuniary rent and that nothing else would do, he was bound by that decision to decide in favour of the plaintiffs; and he accordingly gave judgment for possession in three months. He suggested that the defendants should appeal from his judgment and said that it was a proper case for legal aid to be granted to them.

The defendants appealed. Their application for legal aid was refused by the relevant local committee on the ground that there was no reasonable ground for bringing, defending, or being a party to, the proceedings.

S. W. Templeman for the tenants. Now LQ.

The cases cited in argument are all referred to in the judgments.

SINGLETON L.J. This is an interesting case, more interesting than some of those which arise under the Rent Acts. [His Lordship stated the earlier facts and continued:] In 1941 there was created a tenancy of the house between the trustees and Mr. Browning; and it is not disputed that at that time there was created a tenancy to which the Rent Acts applied.

In 1946 the trustees realized that much more work had to be done in the way of cleaning the synagogue and that the duties of Mr. and Mrs. Browning, the caretakers, were much heavier than they had been during war-time, and so they passed a resolution dated February 18, 1946, in these terms: "Mr. P. Milstone "proposed and Mr. S. Schonfeld seconded that the wages of the "caretaker be increased by £26 per annum, making a total of "£66 per annum." That increase was 10s. a week, and it meant that the wages to be paid to the caretaker, or caretakers, were precisely the same as the yearly value which had been placed on the house. The minister called to see Mrs. Browning, and said to her: "I have some good news for you; you won't have to pay "10s. a week any more; we are raising your wages." "Thank "you very much," said Mrs. Browning.

It is said on behalf of the trustees that that constituted an entirely new agreement, and that from that moment—I suppose from the moment of communication to Mrs. Browning—there was no tenancy which was protected by the Rent Acts, but that there came about an arrangement which was not the letting of a house for rent, but an arrangement that the Brownings should have the house in return for services rendered. I do not think that that was the agreement. Mr. Browning said that "there was no "suggestion of a new agreement of tenancy when the plaintiffs "agreed to pay me or my wife an extra 10s. a week." Mrs. Browning, in response to the news from the minister, had said: "Thank you very much." There was nothing to alter the nature of the tenancy between the parties; indeed, the minutes of the trustees showed that the trustees had agreed to pay the caretaker an extra 10s. a week in wages, which would put up the total payment to £66 a year. If there was (as I think it is clear there was) a tenancy which was covered by the Rent Acts between 1941 and 1946, I cannot see that any change was made by that which took place in 1946.

[His Lordship read section 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 [repealed by the Act of 1939] and section 3 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and continued:] Rateable value is now the test. There remains, however, in force section 12 (7) of the Act of 1920, which is in these terms: "Where the rent payable in "respect of any tenancy of any dwelling-house is less than two-"thirds of the rateable value thereof, this Act shall not apply "to that rent or tenancy nor to any mortgage by the landlord "from whom the tenancy is held of his interest in the dwelling-"house, and this Act shall apply in respect of such dwelling-house "as if no such tenancy existed or ever had existed."

Before the Rent Acts come into operation there must, of course, be a tenancy; and if there is a tenancy there is usually a rent. When this house was first let to Mr. or to Mrs. Browning there was a rent; no one disputes that; but it was submitted to the county court judge that the change which took place in 1946 took the case out of the Rent Acts altogether, and the county court judge acceded to that submission, and said: "On the "evidence called before me I found as a fact (as counsel for the "plaintiffs submitted I should find) (1) that from June, 1941, "until February, 1946, the first defendant was a tenant of the "plaintiffs paying a rent partly in money, viz., 10s. per week, "and partly in services, the value of those services being agreed "between the parties as £40 per annum; (2) that from February, "1946, no rent in money was paid, credited, offered or demanded "and that from that time the first defendant was a tenant of the "plaintiffs paying his rent entirely in services, which were agreed "between the parties as being worth £66 per annum."

I do not think that that last finding is warranted on the evidence. The minutes show that there was an increase of wages. The wages had to be paid in some way, and it was probably a saving to the officials of the synagogue not to have to make cross-entries. I cannot see that there was an agreement between the parties under which the tenancy of the house which had existed prior to that time was altered or changed. There was a tenancy to which the Rent Acts applied from the years 1941 to 1946: that is common ground. There was no change in the character of that merely by the increase of wages or merely by the remarks made by the minister to Mrs. Browning: "We are putting up your "wages, so you need not pay the 10s."

The county court judge would have been inclined to decide the case in favour of the defendants but for the citation to him of Hornsby v. Maynard,[1] decided by the Divisional Court in 1924. There are passages in the judgment of Shearman J.[2] and in the judgment of Salter J.[3] on which reliance was placed by counsel for the trustees, and which impressed the county court judge. Towards the close of the judgment of Salter J. there are these words[4]: "The most important of the points taken on behalf of "the defendant may be thus stated: Suppose that a dwelling-"house, which had been let to a tenant at the full standard rent, "was let to a new tenant on the terms that that tenant should "pay the full standard rent in money and should allow the land-"lord the use of part of the house rent free, or should take the "landlord as a lodger or render him certain services, is the "additional benefit thus given by the tenant to the landlord "'rent' within the meaning of the Act of 1920, so that the rent "of the house has been thereby 'increased' within the meaning "of section 1 of that Act? The pecuniary consideration for the "demise is not larger, but the actual consideration is larger. The "question is whether or not 'rent' in section 1 and the other "sections of the Act refers only to money. At common law the "term 'rent' was not restricted to pecuniary rent. Tenancies "under which the rent was payable by way of services were "formerly very common, and such tenancies are still to be met "with. In this Act, however, having regard to its own provisions "and to the authorities decided upon it to which our attention "has been called, I think that the term 'rent' applies only to "pecuniary rent. I regret to have to come to this conclusion, "because it follows that the Act can be in some respects evaded."

I think that it may be necessary at some time for those words of Salter J. and some words of Shearman J. to the like effect to be reconsidered. I do not think that the decision of the Divisional Court in Hornsby v. Maynard[5] affects the present case in any degree. There was a protected tenancy from 1941 to 1946, and the same class of tenancy remains notwithstanding the increase of 10s. in the wages, and notwithstanding the fact that the one was written off against the other. There was no new agreement which put an end to the old tenancy or which changed its character.

I would add this. Everyone realizes that the trustees have been acting as they thought best in the interests of those for whom they are trustees. If this had been, or could properly be considered as, a service letting, and if they required the premises in order to put in another caretaker, they might have a remedy: they might be able to obtain possession. But that part of their claim was not proceeded with before the county court judge, and it does not arise here. It appears to me that the appeal should be allowed and that the judgment given in the county court should be reversed.

DENNING L.J. Rent is usually quantified in money and paid in money, but it is not necessary in law that it always should be so. The position at common law is stated in the latest edition of Woodfall at p. 330 (25th ed., 1954): "... there is no occasion for "it to be, as it usually is, a sum of money: for spurs, capons, "horses, corn, and other matters, may be, and occasionally are, "rendered by way of rent: it may also consist in services and "manual operations; as to plough so many acres of ground, and "the like; ..." In Rent Act cases, according to an observation of Shearman J. in Hornsby v. Maynard,[6] the position is different. He said that the term "rent" in section 1 and the other sections in which it occurs is rent payable in money and money alone. I cannot agree with that restricted meaning of the word "rent." It seems to me that even under the Rent Acts, in cases when rent is not payable in money but in kind, as in goods or services, then, so long as the parties have by agreement quantified the value in terms of money, the sum so quantified is the rent of the house within the meaning of the Rent Restriction Acts; and, if it exceeds two-thirds of the rateable value, the house is within the Acts.

[3] [1925] 1 K.B. 514, 525.
[5] [1925] 1 K.B. 514.

If the tenancy is determined and the landlord has no further use for the services the landlord can recover the standard rent in lieu of the services. I say nothing about the position where the services are not quantified in money, which was the case in Hornsby v. Maynard,[6] except to say that even on that point some of the observations in that case may need reconsideration. Suffice it to say in the present case that, accepting the findings of fact of the county court judge, nevertheless the tenant was protected because there was the quantified sum which the services were worth, £66 a year. The house was, no doubt, let to him in consequence of his employment, but the landlords do not suggest that they can bring the case within the provisions of the Act so as to recover possession on that score. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed accordingly.

MORRIS L.J. I entirely agree. It seems to me that the evidence does not warrant the conclusion that a new tenancy arrangement was made in February, 1946, and the male defendant says that there was no suggestion of a new agreement of tenancy when the plaintiffs agreed to pay him or his wife an extra 10s. a week; and the case can be decided on that ground. I do not think, therefore, that it is necessary in this case to express any final opinion in regard to Hornsby v. Maynard.[6] It is, I think, relevant to note that in Insall v. Nottingham Corporation[7] Somervell L.J. in his judgment said[8] that he would like to reserve for further consideration a case in which the court were confronted with a lease which, on the face of it, had in addition to rent some further consideration which could be evaluated in money. I agree, for the reasons given, that this appeal succeeds.

At the conclusion of the hearing, Mr. TEMPLEMAN for the defendants informed the court that the defendants had been refused a legal aid certificate to appeal on the ground that they had not shown a reasonable ground for taking, defending, or being party to the proceedings.

DENNING L.J. But the county court judge had indicated that it was a proper case.

SINGLETON L.J. I should have thought in the ordinary course that if a judge expresses the view that a party ought to have legal aid to appeal against his decision, it is probably the most important factor for a legal aid committee to consider.

Appeal allowed.

Damages — Personal injuries — Husband and wife — Wife disfigured through defendant's negligence—Husband's desertion after accident —Damages for loss of husband.
Husband and Wife — Tort — Negligence — Negligence of third party. Damages—Consortium, loss of.

A wife, in an action for negligence following a road traffic accident, alleged that in consequence she became so disfigured that her husband left her, and she claimed that in assessing the general damages the court should take this matter into consideration:—

Held, that although the wife was not entitled to damages for loss of consortium of her husband, if she lost him as a result of the tortious negligence of the defendants which caused her injury, that was an element in the damages which she could recover. On the facts, it was not established that the wife had lost anything of value by reason of her husband's desertion, or that he had left her because of her disfigurement; accordingly, she was not entitled to damages under this head.

Dictum of Lord Goddard C.J. in Best v. Samuel Fox & Co. Ld. [1952] A.C. 716, 732; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 246; [1952] 2 All E.R. 394 applied.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs, who were husband and wife, claimed damages for injuries sustained by the female plaintiff when involved in a collision between a motor-car owned by her and an omnibus the property of the defendants and driven by their servant. The male plaintiff, who deserted the wife after the accident, although originally a party to the action, did not appear and was not represented, and judgment was accordingly awarded against him.

On September 21, 1947, the male plaintiff was driving the motor-car on the Great North Road with the female plaintiff in the front passenger seat. At a point on a straight length of road the motor-car was approaching the defendants' omnibus, which was stationary at the near side of the road and facing in the same direction, and had stopped some 125 yards to 135 yards short of a cross-roads and some 20 yards or 25 yards short of a stationary lorry. On starting off, the driver of the omnibus made a hand-signal to indicate that he was about to pass the lorry, and the omnibus was driven with its offside wheels near to the centre of the road as the driver intended to turn off to his right at the cross-roads. It was doubtful whether the driver of the omnibus repeated his signal after he had passed the lorry, and as the motor-car reached the omnibus, which was by then beginning to turn across the road to enter the side turning, it collided with the omnibus.

At the date of the accident the plaintiff was the owner of a small business. In addition to special damage amounting to £611, and the loss on the business consequent on her injury, the plaintiff claimed damages for the loss of her husband. In evidence she alleged that in consequence of the facial and bodily disfigurement caused to her by the accident her husband had said that he could not bear to live with her and had deserted her. He returned temporarily in order to obtain money to go to America and the female plaintiff gave him £250 in the hope that he would obtain employment there and then send for her. This hope was not fulfilled as the husband returned to England and stayed a few days in the plaintiff's house, she staying in the next house because they were estranged. The plaintiff took out a summons for maintenance, and in August, 1949, an order was made against the husband. Afterwards he disappeared and the plaintiff had never heard of him since, had received no maintenance and had been unable to enforce the order.

Martin Jukes and F. B. Purchas for the female plaintiff.
R. O. Armstrong-Jones for the defendants.

HILBERY J. stated the facts, referred to the special damage and to the business carried on by the plaintiff, and continued: The plaintiff claims that in consequence of the negligence which she alleges against the defendants she was disfigured, and that the result has been that her husband has left her.

It is plain that a wife, under English law, has not, and never has had, a claim by way of trespass on the case, merely for loss of consortium. But the plaintiff is not alleging as a cause of action the loss of consortium, but that she lost her husband, who deserted her as a result of the tortious negligence of the defendants which caused her injury. She alleges that this is part of the consequential damage which flowed from their negligence. That, I think, is a distinction which can properly be drawn.

In Best v. Samuel Fox & Co. Ld.[1] there is a passage in the speech of Lord Goddard where, having referred to Lynch v. Knight,[2] he says[3]: "I think there is much to be said for the "opinion of Rich J. in Wright v. Cedzich,[4] in which he closely "analyses the case"—that is, Lynch v. Knight—"and comes "to the conclusion that Lord Campbell was not supporting the "right of a wife to bring an action for loss of consortium, but was "considering whether the estrangement of a husband from his "wife with consequent distress and suffering of the latter due "to the slander was not sufficient special damage to support the "action."

[2] (1861) 9 H.L.C. 577.
[3] [1952] A.C. 716, 732.
[4] (1930) 43 C.L.R. 493.

Slander would be a tort, and it would be actionable as a tort by the married woman, if she could support it with proof of special damage. In Wright v. Cedzich [5] Rich J. is pointing out that the consequential damage may be the loss of the husband by estrangement brought about by the tortious act.

In the present case if the facts showed that the plaintiff had really lost anything of value in losing her husband—if lose him she did because of the disfigurement she suffered—it might well be that that would be an element in the damages which she could recover, because it would be in the line of consequential damage following from the tortious act done towards her. But I cannot think that there is anything to be added to the damages on this particular head, because it is clear to my mind, from the plaintiff's own evidence, that she and her husband had been getting on very badly for a long time. He had turned out to be a very different man from the man that she thought she was marrying at the time that she married him. She had thought that he was a commercial traveller and an honest worker, but she found that he was helping a bookmaker, and was resorting to racecourses and was gambling, and, being unable to get him to correct his ways, they quarrelled. They were estranged before this accident happened, to a large extent. When she came out of hospital and he saw her disfigured he made that an excuse for leaving her. He extracted £250 of her money to go off to America and then came back and deserted her, more, I think, because of his own failings in character than because of the disfigurement. I am not satisfied that her disfigurement was genuinely the reason for his deserting her. In the circumstances, I do not think that there is any sum to be added under that head.

[His Lordship referred to the plaintiff's personal injuries and continued:] I think that the plaintiff's general damage ought to be £2,500, in addition to which she ought to receive the £611 special damage, making a total of £3,111.

However, in the circumstances in which she was being driven I have to examine whether she is affected by her husband's negligence, if he was negligent in the course of this accident. That he was driving in circumstances such that, if he was negligent, that negligence also is her negligence, I have no doubt. They were going on a holiday together in her car; she delegated to him part of the driving; he was driving at the time and she was seated beside him, and had the right to control his driving, and the duty to do so if, for example, he was driving unlawfully.

The question, therefore, is whether the husband or the omnibus driver was wholly responsible, or was each of them guilty of some negligence causing the accident, and, if so, in what fractions ought that responsibility to be distributed as between the two?

LAMPERT v. EASTERN NATIONAL OMNIBUS CO. LD.

[His Lordship considered the evidence and continued:] In my view there was negligence on both sides. In the circumstances, therefore, the female plaintiff, as she too is affected in the particular circumstances by the negligence of her husband in the driving, must receive half her damages.

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—High Court—Children—Periodical payments—Whether court has power to make order for payment direct to children—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 23 (1).

The court has no power to make an order for payments direct to the children of the marriage on an application by a wife for periodical payments under section 23 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.

ORIGINATING SUMMONS.

A wife took out an originating summons in March, 1954, under section 23 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, alleging that her husband had been guilty of a wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for herself and the three infant children of the marriage.

Dimitry Tolstoy and Basil Webb for the wife.
C. A. Marshall-Reynolds for the husband.

The question arose during argument upon the merits whether, if wilful neglect to maintain were found, an order might be made, in respect of any provision for the children, that payments should be made direct to the children, as was sometimes ordered in respect of maintenance under section 26 of the Act,[1] in order to obtain certain income tax benefit.

[1] Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23: "(1) Where a husband has "been guilty of wilful neglect to pro- "vide reasonable maintenance for his "wife or the infant children of the "marriage, the court . . . may, on "the application of the wife, order "the husband to make to her such "periodical payments as may be "just; . . ."

S. 26: "(1) In any proceedings for "divorce or nullity of marriage or "judicial separation, the court may "from time to time, either before or "by or after the final decree, make "such provision as appears just with "respect to the custody, maintenance "and education of the children the "marriage of whose parents is the "subject of the proceedings, . . ."

LOGAN v. LOGAN.

COLLINGWOOD J., after finding upon the merits of the case (which do not call for a report) that the husband had been guilty of a wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife and the infant children of the marriage: I was invited by counsel for the applicant to order the payments to be made direct to the infant children. In my opinion the court has no power to make an order in that form under section 23 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.

Order for periodical payments accordingly.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Practice—Intervener—Lesbianism alleged—Allegation not proved—Dismissal of intervener from suit.

Where charges of Lesbianism are not established the intervener is entitled to be dismissed from the suit.

A wife formed an affection for another woman of such a kind as to give her husband grave cause for anxiety as to the precise nature of that association, which he alleged by his petition to be Lesbian. The wife persisted in her association against the husband's entreaties, and the husband's health was affected:—

Held, that although there was no physical Lesbian relationship, the conduct of the wife had been such in the circumstances as to amount to cruelty.

DEFENDED PETITION by a husband for divorce on the ground of cruelty.

The gravamen of the charges made by the husband concerned his wife's association with another woman, Ryan. That association was alleged to have been of a Lesbian nature, and charges of Lesbian practices were made in the petition. The wife denied the allegations made against her, and denied that she had been guilty of cruelty; and the woman concerned intervened to deny the charges of Lesbianism.

The intervener did not give evidence, as the charge of actual Lesbian practices was not pursued, the court indicating that the charge of cruelty had been established on the evidence given upon matters other than the accusation of an actual physical relationship.

Ifor Lloyd Q.C. and King Anningson for the wife.

SPICER v. SPICER (RYAN INTERVENING).

KARMINSKI J. I think that I can deal with this case on the evidence before me as it stands. I emphasize the words "as it "stands," because I have not heard yet the evidence of Mrs. Ryan, the intervener, who was at all times, I understand, denying the charges of Lesbian practices between herself and the respondent wife, and who was prepared to go into the witness-box and deny them on oath. Mr. Ifor Lloyd, for the wife, has indicated that the case alleged by the husband against the wife is cruelty. I have had a good deal of evidence that the wife admittedly formed an affection for another woman of such a kind as to give her husband grave cause for anxiety as to the precise nature of that association; more important still, when his suspicions were aroused and he was anxious that she should discontinue that association she persisted in it against his entreaties and against his best endeavours. In so doing I am satisfied beyond any doubt that she occasioned him actual physical injury as well as a reasonable apprehension of future injury to his health should her conduct continue. There was medical evidence before me from a doctor which left no doubt in my mind as to the injury and the extent of the injury.

So far as the precise nature of the association between the respondent wife and the intervener is concerned, I am making no finding, nor is it necessary for me, as I see it, so to do. I bear in mind once more the important fact that not only has the wife denied any physical association, and has denied it on oath, but that the intervener has taken an active part in the suit in the sense that she intervened, instructed counsel on her behalf, and has pursued her denials up to this moment, and still maintains them. That being so, I want to make it absolutely clear that in finding cruelty I am making no finding of any physical relationship between the respondent wife and the intervener; but on the evidence before me, which has been extensive, I have no doubt that I can and ought to find as proved the cruelty alleged in the petition. I do so, and on that ground I pronounce a decree nisi.

Hollins submitted that the intervener should be dismissed from the suit, and said that there did not appear to be an accepted practice in such cases.

KARMINSKI J. The position of those who are the subject of such charges is rather an odd one. If a woman is named in the ordinary way she is charged with adultery in a wife's suit and she then intervenes, and if the charge against her fails as a result of not being proved she is entitled to be dismissed from the suit.

Hollins. That is why I made the application.

KARMINSKI J. Mr. Lloyd, I understand that you were in a very recent case of a similar nature before Davies J.? [1]

SPICER v. SPICER (RYAN INTERVENING).

Lloyd. Yes, my Lord. The woman intervener was dismissed from the suit after the charges had been rejected.

KARMINSKI J. Where charges of this kind are not proved (I use that term in the technical sense), it would seem to be right that some order of the kind indicated by you should be made. I shall dismiss the intervener from the suit.

[No application was made in respect of the intervener's costs.]

management of an unlawful society (Mau Mau) and of being members of the society, the question was raised by the Board whether the petition was competent in view of the fact that the petitioners sought to come direct to the Board and had not first appealed to the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa, and attention was called to Dagnino v. Bellotti,[1] where it was said: "The "proper course for the appellant to have adopted was, if he "considered that the verdict was not warranted by the evidence, "to move the court for a new trial. He has not exhausted the "remedies which the rules and practice of the court directed "should be observed in cases where a verdict of the judge and "assessors is objected to on the ground that it is not warranted "by the evidence."

D. N. Pritt Q.C., R. K. Handoo and Ralph Millner for the petitioners. There is nothing in the legislation establishing the Court of Appeal of Eastern Africa to say that the right of application to the Privy Council for special leave shall be interfered with in any way. That right, under the Judicial Committee Act, 1844, is that: "It shall be competent to Her Majesty, by any order "or orders . . . made with the advice of Her Privy Council, to "provide for the admission of any appeal or appeals to Her "Majesty in Council, from any judgments, sentences, decrees "or orders of any Court of Justice within any British colony or "possession abroad, although such court shall not be a court of "errors or a court of appeal within such colony or possession."

Melford Stevenson Q.C., A. G. Somerhough Q.C. and J. G. Le Quesne for the Crown. The theoretical possibility is not disputed of bringing a petition direct from the Supreme Court of Kenya, but it is submitted that there is a discretion in the Board and that it would be wrong to permit an appeal to the Privy Council in the present case since the right to go to the Eastern Africa Court of Appeal has not been exhausted.

Pritt. It being conceded that the Board has jurisdiction, the only question is whether any, and if so what, weight should be attached to the failure to appeal first to the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa, and it is submitted that in all the circumstances no weight should be attached to it. What little authority there is on this matter shows that one can go straight from the court of first instance to the Board, but it cannot be imagined that anyone would be encouraged to do that today. [Reference was made to Bentwich, Privy Council Practice, 3rd ed. (1937), p. 125.] Dagnino v. Bellotti[1] was a civil case, and it does not help or hinder on the present point.

The BOARD directed the hearing of the petition to continue and, having heard it on its merits, dismissed it, LORD GODDARD (presiding) saying: "Their Lordships do not find it necessary to "decide whether the fact that the applicants did not first appeal "to the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa ought in this parti-"cular case to be regarded as a ground for refusing leave, because "they are of opinion that apart from that question no grounds "have been established which would justify their Lordships in "advising Her Majesty to grant leave."

Settlement. Revenue—Tax avoidance scheme. Court of Appeal—Jurisdiction—Compromise of appeal—Variation of beneficial interests.

Under a settlement made in 1923 the income of a trust fund was payable to a tenant for life until some act or event should happen whereby the income would become vested in or charged in favour of some other persons, in which event discretionary trusts would come into operation in favour of the tenant for life, his wife and issue. By clause 10 of the settlement it was provided that, after the death of the tenant for life, the trust fund was to be held in trust for the issue of the tenant for life in such shares and with such gifts over "and with such provisions for their respective advancement (either "overreaching the interests prior to this power or not) and main-"tenance and education and otherwise in such manner for the "benefit of such issue" as the tenant for life should by deed or will appoint, with ultimate trusts in default of appointment for the children of the tenant for life at 21 or marriage. The tenant for life had had three children, and by an appointment made in 1951 he appointed the whole trust fund and the income thereof in favour of his eldest son, if he should attain the age of 21 years. The eldest son attained the age of 21 in 1953 and the tenant for life requested his trustees to pay the whole trust fund to the eldest son. The tenant for life's two younger children were still infants.

The trustees of the settlement took out a summons to have the effect of clause 10 of the settlement and the appointment determined. Harman J. declared that the tenant for life had no power to appoint the whole fund to his eldest son. The eldest son appealed on the ground that Harman J. had misconstrued clause 10.

LORD HYLTON'S SETTLEMENT, In re. BARCLAYS BANK LD. v. JOLLIFFE.

The Court of Appeal was asked to sanction the compromise of the appeal on the terms that the trustees should raise out of the trust fund a sum of £5,000 and hold that sum upon trust for the benefit of any future wife of the tenant for life and the children of the tenant for life other than the eldest son as thereby provided and, subject as aforesaid, the trust fund should be held upon trust for the eldest son free from the prior trusts of the settlement to take effect during the life of the tenant for life. The result of the compromise would be to effect a large saving in estate duty should the tenant for life survive five years:—

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to sanction the compromise and that it should be approved.

Chapman v. Chapman [1954] 2 W.L.R. 723; [1954] 1 All E.R. 798 distinguished.

APPEAL from Harman J.

By a settlement dated December 27, 1923, made between the late Lord Hylton as settlor of the first part, the plaintiffs Barclays Bank Ld. as trustees of the second part, and the fourth defendant, the present Lord Hylton (hereinafter called Lord Hylton), of the third part, a trust fund was settled upon trust to pay the income to Lord Hylton during his life until some act or event should happen whereby the income, if belonging absolutely to him, would become vested in or charged in favour of some other person, on which event discretionary trusts were to come into operation for the benefit of Lord Hylton, his wife and issue. Clause 10 of the settlement provided that after the death of Lord Hylton the capital and income of the trust fund shall be held in trust for his issue "at such times and if more than one in such shares and "with such gifts over and with such provisions for their respective "advancement (either overreaching the interests prior to this "power or not) and maintenance and education and otherwise in "such manner for the benefit of such issue or some or one of "them as [Lord Hylton] shall by deeds revocable or irrevocable "or by will or codicil appoint but so that under any appointment "a child shall not otherwise than by way of advancement take a "vested interest except being a son or sons upon attaining the "age of 21 years or being a daughter or daughters upon attaining "that age or upon marriage"; and in default of any appointment trusts were declared in favour of Lord Hylton's children.

Lord Hylton had had three children, the first defendant Raymond Hervey Jolliffe (hereinafter called Mr. Jolliffe) who attained the age of 21 on June 13, 1953, and the second and third defendants who were not yet of age.

By an appointment dated May 7, 1951, expressed to be supplemental to the settlement Lord Hylton irrevocably appointed: "1. The said trust fund and any other property subject to the "trusts of the settlement and the income thereof as from the "date of this deed shall be held in trust for Mr. Jolliffe if he shall "attain the age of 21 years.

"2. The statutory power of expending income of the said trust "property for or towards the maintenance education or benefit of

"Mr. Jolliffe shall not be exercised during the lifetime of Lord "Hylton except on the request in writing of Lord Hylton.

"3. The statutory power of paying or applying capital of the "said trust property for the advancement or benefit of Mr. Jolliffe "shall be exercisable with the following extension and modifica-"tions (that is to say) the said power (a) shall extend to and "be exercisable over the whole of the said capital (b) shall be "exercisable during the lifetime of Lord Hylton so as to over-"reach all such prior interests as aforesaid and (c) shall during "the lifetime of Lord Hylton be exercised in accordance with "such directions as he may from time to time give to the trustees "in writing and not otherwise."

On June 5, 1951, Lord Hylton signed a request to the plaintiffs, as trustees of the settlement, requesting and authorizing them to advance the whole trust fund to Mr. Jolliffe forthwith.

The plaintiffs took out a summons to have clause 10 of the settlement and the appointment construed. Harman J. held that in clause 10 "advancement" was used in its strict sense and that Lord Hylton had no power to direct payment of the whole fund to his eldest son. Harman J. made an order declaring that, upon the true construction of clause 10 and in the events which had happened, the plaintiffs held the trust fund upon trust for Mr. Joliffe absolutely in remainder expectant on the death of Lord Hylton and further that there was power under the appointment of 1951 to apply any part or the whole of the capital of the trust fund for his advancement in some definite way as Lord Hylton should direct, on the trustees being satisfied that the payment was an advancement. The income of the trust fund was still payable to Lord Hylton, no forfeiture of his life interest having occurred.

Mr. Jolliffe appealed on the ground that Harman J. had given too restricted a construction to the provisions as to advancement in clause 10 and he asked the court to declare that the plaintiffs held the trust funds in trust for him absolutely. If the appeal were successful it was not disputed that a large sum would be saved in estate duty should Lord Hylton survive five years.

Before the appeal was heard the parties agreed to compromise the appeal upon the terms that the plaintiffs, as trustees, should forthwith raise the clear sum of £5,000 out of the trust fund and hold that sum and the investments representing it upon trust for the benefit of any future wife of Lord Hylton and his children and remoter issue, other than Mr. Jolliffe, as therein provided, and that, subject to that payment, they should hold the capital and income of the trust fund on trust for Mr. Jolliffe absolutely by way of acceleration of the absolute interest to which he was entitled under the appointment and free from all prior trusts to take effect during the life of Lord Hylton. Lady Hylton agreed to this compromise.

When the matter came before the Court of Appeal for its approval the question was raised whether, since Harman J. had decided the point of construction at issue, the court had power, having regard to the decision of the House of Lords in Chapman v. Chapman,[1] to approve the compromise on behalf of the infants and other persons who might become interested in the event of Lord Hylton forfeiting his life interest.

Geoffrey Cross Q.C. and Kenneth Elphinstone for Mr. Jolliffe. The court is asked to approve this compromise. It has jurisdiction to do so. There is a real dispute here between the parties about the true construction of clause 10 of the settlement. The matter was argued before Harman J. for a day and a half and there is a point of substance to be argued on appeal. The ambiguity in clause 10 appears on its face. This case is not within the scope of the decision of the House of Lords in Chapman v. Chapman.[1]

J. L. Arnold for the two infant children of Lord Hylton.

E. I. Goulding for Lord Hylton.

Revenue—Income tax—Capital or income expenditure—Gravel merchant—Cost of right to take gravel—Whether capital expenditure or expenditure on stock-in-trade—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), Sch. D, Case I.

A company of sand and gravel merchants, in consideration of a payment of £2,000, acquired the benefit of a contract to take a deposit of sand and gravel. They later exercised an option contained in the contract, under which they acquired for £2,250 a right to take a further deposit. The company did not treat the gravel in any way but merely removed it from the soil and carted it away to be sold. The company claimed that the sums of £2,000 and £2,250 were expended on the purchase of stock-in-trade and therefore admissible as deductions in the computation of their profits for the purpose of Case I of Sch. D. The General Commissioners held that they were not allowable deductions. On appeal by the company from their decision, the Crown contended that the sums were not expended in the purchase of stock-in-trade but were capital expenditure, being expenditure to acquire the right to go on the land and win the gravel:—

Held, that the purchase of the deposits by the company was a purchase of stock-in-trade; and the sums were admissible as deductions for the purpose of computing profits under Sch. D.

Golden Horse Shoe (New) Ld. v. Thurgood [1934] 1 K.B. 548; 18 Tax Cas. 280 applied.

APPEAL by case stated from the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for Freebridge Marshland in the County of Norfolk.

The case stated so far as relevant provided: By an agreement dated October 29, 1947, Luddington Estates Ld. (on whose land were considerable deposits of gravel) agreed to sell to Gorbould Bros., a firm of contractors, a deposit of gravel and sand ballast on approximately 8 acres of their land for the sum of £2,000. No estate or interest in the land was acquired by the purchasers, their rights being expressly limited to having access to the land for the purpose of removing the gravel and sand ballast by one gateway only.

Gorbould Bros. did not work or excavate any part of the deposit of gravel and sand covered by the agreement, the benefit of which was acquired by the appellant company, Stow Bardolph Gravel Co. Ld., in consideration of £2,000, under an oral agreement with Gorbould Bros. The appellant company, who were sand and gravel merchants, proceeded to excavate the deposit of sand and gravel and to sell it in the course of trade. They did not treat or process the gravel but merely dug it up or raked it off the surface and carted it away in a lorry.

In 1949 the appellant company, in exercise of an option contained in the agreement of 1947, obtained access on like terms to a further deposit of sand and gravel lying on an adjoining 2¼ acres of land at the price of £1,000 per acre, making a total of £2,250. On the exercise of that option the appellant company became entitled to a further option exercisable within five years over a third piece of land.

The appellant company claimed that in the computation of their profits for the purpose of Case I of Sch. D [1] to the Income Tax Act, 1918, they were entitled to deduct the sums of £2,000 and £2,500 paid respectively to acquire the agreement of 1947 and in the exercise of the first option under that agreement, on the ground that it was expenditure incurred in the acquisition of trading stock, or expenditure of a revenue character wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the company's trade.

[1] Income Tax Act, 1918, Sch. D, Case I, r. 3: "In computing the "amount of the profits or gains to be "charged, no sum shall be deducted "in respect of—(a) any disbursements "or expenses, not being money wholly "and exclusively laid out or expended "for the purposes of the trade . . . "(f) any . . . sum employed or in-"tended to be employed as capital in "such trade . . ."

STOW BARDOLPH GRAVEL CO. LD. v. POOLE.

The General Commissioners held that the two sums in question were not admissible as deductions. The company appealed against that decision.

Hilary Magnus for the appellant company.

Sir Lynn Ungoed-Thomas Q.C. and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

Cases cited in argument other than those set out in the judgment: Coltness Iron Co. v. Black [2]; Gowan v. Christie [3]; Hughes v. British Burmah Petroleum Co. Ld.[4]; Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Broomhouse Brick Co. Ld.[5]; Morant v. Wheal Grenville Mining Co. Ld.[6]; Moseley v. Wimpey & Co. Ld.[7]

HARMAN J., having stated the facts, continued: The appellants' trade is that of sand and gravel merchants and the case has been treated throughout under Sch. D and not under Sch. A. The only question that I have to determine is whether, in making up their accounts, they were entitled to debit against the profits of the sale of this gravel the money paid, first, for taking over this contract and, secondly, for exercising the option. No one seeks to make any distinction between the two.

It is argued on behalf of the appellants that this is a mere purchase of stock-in-trade—their stock-in-trade being sand and gravel—and that all they do is to go on the land, shovel the sand and gravel into a lorry, and sell it to their customers, so that it is as much their stock-in-trade as any other article in which a trader might deal.

It is said on behalf of the Crown that the sand and gravel is not a chattel detached from the soil, but something which has to be worked as if it were in a mine or a quarry; and that all that was bought under this contract was a capital asset, namely, the right to go on the land and win the gravel and the sand and to carry it away. The cost of working the sand and gravel, the Crown conceded, may be charged, but not the price paid for the contract. The sums of £2,000 and £2,250 are, according to the Crown, merely capital expenditure incurred by the company in order to acquire these valuable rights.

The nearest case to this on the facts is Golden Horse Shoe (New) Ld. v. Thurgood,[1] a case before the Court of Appeal, where a company had bought a dump of "tailings" lying on the soil which contained a certain amount of gold, but which formed no part of the land in the sense of being, in any way, affixed to it. The Court of Appeal, reversing the decision of Finlay J., held that the company was entitled to deduct the price paid against its profits. Lord Hanworth, in his judgment, had much to say about fixed and floating capital, and observed [2]: "The question "involved is always a troublesome one, and is not rendered less "difficult by recalling the principle which has many times been "approved in the courts, that prudent directors of a company "would make provision for the wasting character of their enter-"prise." He cited British Insulated and Helsby Cables Ld. v. Atherton [3]—where an attempt was made to decide what was a capital payment and what was an income payment—and a number of other cases, and continued [4]: "The above cases serve to "establish the difficulty of the question rather than to affirm "any principle to be applied in all cases. Indeed, in the last "case cited, [Atherton's case [5]] Lord Cave says that a payment "once and for all, a test which had been suggested by Lord "Dunedin in Vallambrosa Rubber Co. v. Farmer,[6] was not true "in all cases, and he found authority for that statement in Smith "v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and "Wales [7]; and the Anglo-Persian case,[8] already referred to, is "another. The test of circulating as contrasted with fixed "capital is as good a test in most cases to my mind as can be "found; but that involves the question of fact: was the outlay "in the particular case from fixed or circulating capital? It is "clear that there may be an immediate outlay for the purpose "of the trade carried on, a large outlay on the stock in trade "which is to be marketed over such a span of time as the business "warrants."

For that proposition he cited Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[9] and said [10]: "After careful considera-"tion of the present case, in the course of which my mind has "fluctuated on either side, I think it is to be decided upon its "own facts." It is clear, therefore, that he was doing nothing more than deciding the actual case before him, and he decided —and I think that it was the ground for his decision—that the company was entitled to make the deduction in question of the price of the "tailings," because, as he said: "They had not to "win them from the soil; they had been gotten already."

Lord Hanworth then [11] quoted from Alianza Co. v. Bell [12]: "'If it is merely a manufacturing business, then the procuring "'of the raw material would not be a capital expenditure. But "'if it is like the working of a particular mine or bed of brick "'earth, and converting the stuff worked into a marketable com-"'modity, then the money paid for the prime cost of the stuff "'so dealt with is just as much capital as the money sunk in

STOW BARDOLPH GRAVEL CO. LD. v. POOLE.

Harman J.

"'machinery or buildings. In my opinion the particular adven-"'ture here belongs to the latter category.'" In that case Channell J. had held that as the company had to work the material up, it was a capital expense to buy it.

Lord Romer, in Golden Horse Shoe (New) Ld. v. Thurgood,[13] again only decided the case on its own facts, saying[14]: "Unfor-"tunately, however, it is not always easy to determine whether "a particular asset belongs to the one category or the other. It "depends in no way upon what may be the nature of the asset "in fact or in law. Land may in certain circumstances be "circulating capital. A chattel or a chose in action may be fixed "capital. The determining factor must be the nature of the trade "in which the asset is employed." I think that he too relied on the fact that in that case the "tailings" had already been extracted from the mine.

It is said here that the opposite conclusion should be reached, and the reason in substance is because this gravel had never been raked off the soil on which it was lying. This is not a case where the gravel is in any true sense "won" from the soil; nor is any process applied to it. It is not even suggested that a riddle or sieve is used; it is merely shovelled up where it lies, put on a lorry and sold wherever it can be sold. It is argued that what was bought was a mere right to go on the land and win the gravel, but, in effect, in the Golden Horse Shoe case[15] what was bought was the licence to go on the land and take away the "tailings," and I think that it is a distinction without difference to suggest that, because nobody had ever before applied a rake to this gravel, it should be treated as capital, whereas if somebody had raked it into little heaps before the contract was made, then its purchase would constitute a different form of adventure. It is the same situation; it is no more and no less attached to the land.

It was decided by the House of Lords in Russell v. Scott[16] that sand and gravel pits were not taxable under No. 3 of Sch. A, and that they must, therefore, be chargeable under No. 1 of that Schedule. In the present case it was not suggested that Sch. A was applicable. If that be right, the basis of charge must be under Sch. D on the footing that this was the trade of dealing with sand and gravel.

The appellant company were sand and gravel merchants; what they bought under this contract was sand and gravel. They did not work it up or treat it as raw material or do anything with it, so far as I am told, except to load it on a cart and take it away, and it would be to introduce only another artificiality if I were to hold that the fact that this gravel had not been moved made the expenditure upon it a capital outlay, when the expenditure on it would have been a trading cost had it been touched by a rake.

In my judgment the appellants were buying stock-in-trade when they bought the gravel, and they ought to be allowed to deduct the cost against the money they made by selling it. The appeal will be allowed with costs and the assessment remitted to the Commissioners.

Appeal allowed.

Court of Appeal—Appellant appearing in person—Right to be heard.

Earned income relief under section 15 (1) of the Finance Act, 1925, is to be calculated by reference to the total earned income, less any sums within section 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.[1]

A taxpayer was under obligation to pay out of his income interest on a mortgage and loan, payments to a building society and interest on an overdraft at his bank:—

Held, that in arriving at his earned income for the purpose of computing the earned income relief, all three items should first be deducted, for section 17 of the Act of 1918 was, by virtue of section 15 (3) of the Finance Act, 1925, and para. 17 of the Fifth Schedule to the Act of 1918, brought in to qualify the right to relief contained in section 15 (1) of the Act of 1925.

Adams v. Musker (1930) 15 T.C. 413 approved.

Decision of Wynn-Parry J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Wynn-Parry J.

A chartered accountant, Owen Michael Lewin, appealed to the Commissioners for the General Purposes of Income Tax for

[1] Finance Act, 1925, s. 15 (1): "An individual who makes in the manner prescribed by the Income Tax Acts a claim in that behalf and who makes a return in the prescribed form of his total income shall, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of his assessable income for the purpose of income tax, be allowed a deduction from the amount of his earned income of a sum equal to one-sixth of the amount of that income, . . ."

[The amount of the deduction was increased to one-fifth by section 27 (2) (a) of the Finance Act, 1948.]

Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 17: "A claimant shall not be entitled to exemption, abatement or relief in respect of any income the tax on which he is entitled to charge against any other person, or to deduct, retain, or satisfy out of any payment which he is liable to make to any other person."

the division of Kingston and Elmbridge, Surrey, against an objection to the amount of his claim for an allowance in respect of earned income for the year ending April 5, 1951. The figures for the taxpayer's income during the tax year in question were agreed for the decision of the commissioners as follows: first his share of the profits of the partnership of which he was a member was £1,481; from that there was deducted his national insurance contribution, leaving £1,468, and there was added a family allowance of £13, a Royal Naval Reserve training fee of £35, and £52 representing the Schedule "A" valuation of his residence, which he owned beneficially. The total income so computed was, therefore, £1,568. During the year, however, the taxpayer was under obligation to pay the following sums: first, mortgage and loan interest of £85, secondly, interest to a building society of £56, and thirdly, interest to his bankers in respect of an overdraft, £29. The total charges were, therefore, £170. In paying the interest on the mortgage and loan the taxpayer deducted tax, but the other two payments were paid without deduction of tax. It was conceded that the unearned income represented by the Schedule "A" valuation of £52 had first to be brought into account for tax purposes against the charges, so that they were reduced to £118.

The question for the general commissioners was whether in computing the earned income relief under section 15 (1) of the Finance Act, 1925 (as amended by section 27 (2) of the Finance Act, 1948),[1] the appropriate fraction (one-fifth) should be calculated by reference to the whole of the taxpayer's earned income, less only the difference between the mortgage and loan interest and the unearned income (that is £33), making a total of £1,483; or whether the building society interest and the bank interest ought also to be deducted, making a total of £1,398. The first method, which was followed by the taxpayer, produced an allowance of £297, and the other, which was adopted by the Revenue, produced an allowance of £280. The general commissioners decided that the second method was correct. The taxpayer appealed by case stated by the commissioners. Wynn-Parry J. held that the decision of the commissioners was correct, and the taxpayer appealed. At the hearing of the appeal the question was whether the allowance should be calculated on the earned income, as it in fact was, or whether all the deductions should first be made, the taxpayer conceding that, if section 17 of the Act of 1918 applied, no distinction was to be drawn between the three items of charge.

The taxpayer appeared in person.

In addition to the case referred to in the judgment, the following cases were cited in argument: Commissioners of Inland

[1] See note on p. 1063.

Revenue v. Dalgety[2]; Earl Howe v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue[3]; Solomon v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.[4]

EVERSHED M.R. stated the facts and continued: The point is whether Mr. Lewin is entitled to relief or deduction in respect of earned income calculated by taking one-fifth of the whole of his earned income, as it was in fact, that is, £1,480 odd, or whether he must first allow the balance of the charges, £118, to be deducted from his earned income, so as to enable him to claim relief to the extent of one-fifth of the balance only. The point is simple—simple, at least, to state. Further, if reference is made only to section 15 of the Finance Act, 1925, which is the section now conferring on the taxpayer his right to earned income relief, it would appear, to say the least, that Mr. Lewin would have a very formidable case for arguing as he does in favour of the former of the two alternatives which I have stated. [His Lordship read section 15 (1) and continued:]

The phrase "earned income" has been defined and no question, I think, arises in this case but that it comprehends the whole of the sum which Mr. Lewin derives from his partnership business, together with his family allowance and Royal Naval Reserve training fee. If, therefore, section 15 (1) stood alone, and there were no other relevant sections in any of the taxing statutes, I could see no answer to the submission that he is entitled, in terms of the statute, to deduct from the amount of his partnership earnings, for the purposes of his income tax assessment, one-fifth of those earnings, that is to say, one-fifth of £1,516. That, indeed, was the view which Rowlatt J. took in Adams v. Musker,[1] to which I will presently return.

Section 15 (1) is not, however, the only relevant statutory provision. Section 15 (3), which I agree with Mr. Lewin may fairly be called a mechanical provision, provides, inter alia, that the provisions of paragraph 17 of the Fifth Schedule to the Income Tax Act shall apply "for the purpose of claims under this "section." In my judgment, it is manifest that the expression "claims under this section," though it covers, of course, claims under subsection (2), must cover claims under subsection (1), that is, claims for an allowance in respect of earned income; and if one turns to paragraph 17 of the Fifth Schedule to the Income Tax Act, 1918, one finds that it is there laid down that an individual must, for the purposes of the income tax administration, make certain declarations, including a "declaration of the "amount of interest, annuities, or other annual payments to be "made out of the property or profits or gains assessed on the "claimant, distinguishing each source." One may, therefore, at this stage ask what the relevance of such a declaration is. In my judgment the answer to that question is that the right set out in section 15 (1) in apparently unequivocal terms is subject to the operation or application of section 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

Partly out of respect for and fairness to Mr. Lewin's argument I will now consider the history of this legislation. Mr. Lewin reminded us of its origin in the days of the Napoleonic wars, but I do not propose to go back earlier than the Act of 1918. Section 14 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, gave to the taxpayer relief in respect of earned income, but gave it in a way which differs in principle from the method which is enshrined in section 15 of the Act of 1925. Section 14 (1) provided that where the income of the taxpayer did not exceed a certain figure and any part of that income was earned income, the claimant should be entitled to relief from tax in such a way as would reduce the tax liability to the figure that would be arrived at if the tax on the earned income were not at the standard rate, but were at certain other rates. Those rates varied according to the sizes of the income earned. Section 17, to which I have already briefly referred, is in the same fasciculus of sections. [His Lordship read section 17 and continued:] The scheme of relief in respect of earned income was altered in 1920 [by the Finance Act, 1920, Third Schedule] and instead of the words "exemption, abatement," there were substituted the words "allowance or deduction." But for the present case, nothing turns on any difference in the language.

I observe that there is in respect of the three items of charges a slight difference in that, according to the case stated, Mr. Lewin deducted from the mortgage and loan interest the income tax in respect of that interest, as he was entitled to do. Thereby, in effect, and in accordance with the procedure which is enshrined in the General Rules and is well known, he accounted to the Revenue for the tax on the interest, for which otherwise the mortgagee or recipient of the interest would have been liable. The building society interest and the bank interest, however, he paid in full without deduction of tax. I had thought that Mr. Lewin made it plain in the early part of his address to this court that, for the purposes in hand, he did not seek to draw any distinction between the mortgage interest, on the one hand, and the building society and banking interest, on the other. I was not quite sure whether later on he desired to qualify that concession, but, in any case, I am satisfied that there is no valid distinction to be drawn, and Mr. Lewin did clearly tell the court that he accepted the view that section 17 applied to all three items.

I will, therefore, proceed henceforth on the basis that there is no distinction fairly or validly to be drawn between any of these items of interest, and that they are all items which fall within the words which I have read, namely, "income the tax on "which he"—that is, the claimant—"is entitled to charge " against any other person, or to deduct, retain, or satisfy out of " any payment which he is liable to make to any other person."

I think it must be taken as clear that a taxpayer who sought to claim the relief which section 14 (1) of the Act of 1918 gave to him, would find that the relief was granted subject to a qualifying condition and that by section 17 he had to bring into account against himself, so to speak, such income as was within section 17, that is, the income which would have included the three items of interest which I have already mentioned.

The method of giving relief in respect of earned income enshrined in section 14 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, was subsequently altered and is now to be found in section 15 (1) of the Finance Act, 1925. It will be observed that the difference, putting it briefly, is that instead of paying tax at a lower rate on earned income, an arithmetical calculation of the kind mentioned by section 15 is made, and a deduction is made from the amount of the earned income and tax is then levied at the standard rate upon the reduced figure. As Rowlatt J. observed, in the ordinary case there is not much difference, arithmetically speaking, between paying tax at the full rate on four-fifths of a particular sum, on the one hand, and paying at the rate of four-fifths of the ordinary rate of tax on the whole sum. It will be noticed that section 17, which was formerly a neighbour of section 14 in the Act of 1918, has never been repealed; and the reference in section 15 (3) of the Act of 1925 and paragraph 17 of the Fifth Schedule to the Income Tax Act, 1918, make it quite plain, I think, that, so far from section 17 being repealed, it was clearly in the mind of Parliament as being a section with which and subject to which section 15 would have to be read, just as under the old procedure the relief given by section 14 of the Act of 1918 was qualified by section 17.

If that conclusion is reached, it seems to me necessarily to follow that the point put forward by Mr. Lewin must, by the effect of section 17, be answered adversely to him, namely, that the amount of the earned income deduction is the less sum, computed according to the second of the two alternative methods which I formulated at the beginning of this judgment.

I have so far tried to express in my own language my own conclusion upon this very short question, though perhaps I should not say, as it is an income tax question, that it is a simple matter. But I have done perhaps little more than restate the conclusion which Rowlatt J. arrived at in Adams v. Musker.[1] The headnote of that case reads: " The appellant made, under " deduction of income tax, certain annual payments which were " charged upon his total income." That means the income taxed at source. " . . . He claimed that in the assessment of his salary " for the year 1927–28 he was entitled to an earned income " allowance of one-sixth of the whole amount of his salary. He

v.
ALLER.
Evershed M.R.

"was given an allowance of one-sixth of the amount of his "salary remaining after deducting from it the amount by which "the charges exceeded the taxed income." It will be noted that, save for the circumstance that the unearned income (or part of it, at any rate) was taxed at source, Adams v. Musker[1] is on all fours with the present case, and a reference to the figures given shows that it was, in reality, a close parallel.

Rowlatt J. upheld the view of the general commissioners that the amount of the permissible deduction was to be arrived at by deducting from the total salary, that is, the total earned income, the balance of the charges which had not been satisfied by a set-off against the unearned income. That decision has stood for almost a quarter of a century and Mr. Lewin has had to concede, and has stated, that to prevail he must satisfy the court that Rowlatt J. wrongly decided Adams v. Musker.[1] From what I have already said, it will be appreciated that I do not take that view. I think that Rowlatt J. rightly decided Adams v. Musker[1] and I am, therefore, not prepared to do other than to follow it. At the end of his judgment Rowlatt J. said, after referring to the previous legislation[2]: "In 1920, and in the Act which is now in "force a different scheme is introduced. Instead of saying that "earned income shall be taxed at a lesser rate, it say that earned "income shall be taxed at the same rate, but you are to take it "as only being five-sixths of what it is, which is much the same "thing as saying it is to be taxed at five-sixths of the normal "rate. Then this rule" (that is a reference to the rule in section 17) "is applied to that, and the only way you can apply it is "by saying, in making the calculation you shall not bring into the "calculation any income which has to be handed on to somebody "else; in other words, you must take the net. That is as I "read it. I do not think there is any other way of making section "17 apply at all, except by reading it in that way. It is intended "to apply, and always has been intended to apply in this way. "I think it is quite clear."

I respectfully agree with that conclusion of Rowlatt J., and it suffices to dispose of this case. But there is an alternative way of meeting Mr. Lewin's claim; that is by reference to section 40 of the Act of 1927 which, among other things, substituted for super-tax what is called "surtax."

Section 40 was in Part III of the Act, which concerned amendments with respect to the method of charging additional income tax and so on. Subsection (3) is a long and elaborate subsection upon which the Crown founded the argument that, whatever else might have been the result of the earlier section, subsection (3), at any rate, made it clear that, for the purpose of calculating such a relief as is here in question, the net amount of the earned income should be taken, after reducing it by any charges of the character, such as the mortgage interest, with which we are here concerned. It may be that that is another answer to the claim, and Wynn-Parry J. accepted that argument. I am bound to say that I find the language of subsection (3) somewhat involved, and I think that there is something, at any rate, to be said for the view put forward by Mr. Lewin that it is directed to a different point. On the whole, therefore, I express no view, one way or the other, upon the possible effect in this matter of section 40 (3).

For the reasons I have stated, I think that Mr. Lewin fails in this appeal. I think he has argued his case both well and fairly and, since he has at times been inclined to apologize for taking up time, I wish also to say that he comes here, as it is his right to do, to put his argument before us. Having lost it, he may suffer certain consequences, but I should not wish it to be thought that a litigant who chose to come in person had to apologize for "occupying," as it is sometimes said, "the time of the "court." It is the duty of the court to hear appeals which litigants may choose to bring in person or by counsel. But, acknowledging the courtesy and the clearness with which he has argued his case, I am bound to conclude that in my judgment he is wrong and that his appeal must be dismissed.

Joint Tortfeasors.

The plaintiff claimed damages against his employers, Cozens & Sutcliffe Ld., and the Port of London Authority, for personal injuries incurred during the course of his employment which he alleged were due to the negligence of both defendants. Liability was contested. Devlin J. gave judgment for the plaintiff for £6,515 5s. with costs, finding that both defendants were equally liable, and made an order that each of the defendants should pay 50 per cent. of the damages and 50 per cent. of the plaintiff's costs.

BASTED v. COZENS & SUTCLIFFE LD.

Before the hearing of the action, on June 4, 1954, the second defendants made a written offer to the first defendants to contribute to the extent of 50 per cent. to the damages to which the plaintiff might be entitled. On June 11, there was a direction under Order 30, r. 2 (2) (j) that the written offer of contribution might be treated, for the purposes of the first defendants' claim for contribution from the second defendants, as a notice of payment into court.

On the question of costs, it was submitted on behalf of the second defendants that each defendant was liable for 50 per cent. of the plaintiff's costs up to the date of the notional payment into court, but that thereafter the first defendants should pay any further costs that the second defendants might have to pay to the plaintiffs and also that they should pay the second defendants' costs of the proceedings.

DEVLIN J. I can give full effect to the rule in this case in the way in which I imagine effect ought to be given. The offer that the Port of London Authority had made is to be treated as if it were equivalent to a payment into court. That means, that any person who disputes the payment into court or the offer as being sufficient, must pay all the costs that have been incurred as a result of the continuance of such dispute, which would otherwise be thrown away. The rule may be very effective in a case where there are, for example, separate proceedings for contribution. The rule may be effective where a large part, or some appreciable part, of a single trial is taken up by a dispute as to whether the proper proportions, if there is any liability, are 50 per cent. or are not 50 per cent.; but in this case there has been no dispute of that sort. Neither party at any time during the trial has even so much as addressed me upon what the proper proportion of contribution should be. They were content to leave it, as, no doubt, it must be left, to the view that I took of the facts of the case. Accordingly, in the circumstances, no costs have been thrown away as the result of the employers having failed to agree the apportionment at 50 per cent., and they cannot be made liable under this rule for costs which the second defendants have incurred in continuing (wrongly as it turned out) to resist that they were liable at all. Accordingly, the order for apportionment of the costs will be that which I have already stated.

Building — Safety regulations — Application — "Building" — Power station—Installation of plant—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1145), regs. 2 and 30 (3).

The defendants, under a contract, installed in a power station four large steam generating plants, consisting of boilers, compartments, cooling chambers and chutes, which when assembled reached a height of something over 100 feet. The installation necessitated the erection of steel stanchions, steel girders and joists, for the purpose not only of supporting the various items of plant but also of providing galleries, stairs and floors to make the portions of the plant accessible.

The plaintiff, a steel erector employed by the defendants, was engaged with other workmen in getting a chute into position by means of chains and pulley tackle. The chute having fouled a cross joist the plaintiff was directed by the foreman to "nip up and "release it." He did so, using the three-inch ridges on the chute as foot and hand holds in climbing and pressing his back against the wall of an economiser. When descending in the same way, however, the plaintiff's foot slipped and he fell through open joists a considerable distance and sustained injury. He sued the defendants for damages, contending that they were in breach of regulation 30 (3) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, in failing to cover securely by temporary boards the joisting through which he fell and above which he had been working:—

Held, that the question whether work which included the installation of plant attracted the Building Regulations must depend on the circumstances of each particular case; that on the facts of the present case the defendants were engaged on the construction of a building and the regulations applied; and that the defendants were in breach of a statutory duty.

Per Romer L.J. The way in which the question may be posed is whether at the time of the accident a building was being constructed and whether the defendants were contributing to its construction. I say "contributing" because it is plain that the words in regulation 2 "the construction of a building" should be read "the construction of a building or any part thereof." The proviso to the regulation shows that the draftsman was using the word "building" in a wide sense.

Decision of Ormerod J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Ormerod J.

The defendants contracted with the City of London Electric Lighting Co. Ld. to manufacture and deliver, unload and erect four steam generating plants at the Bankside Power Station. The plants, of which there were four divisions, consisted of boilers, compartments, cooling chambers and chutes, which when erected resulted in a structure something over 100 feet in height and of still greater width. As found by the trial judge the defendants not only put in the boilers etc., but also had to erect a substantial amount of steel stanchions, steel girders and joists, for the purpose both of supporting the various items of plant and also of providing galleries, stairs and floors to make the various portions of the plant accessible when the plant had to be worked.

On May 25, 1951, the plaintiff, a steel erector in the employ of the defendants, was working with other men under a charge-hand getting a chute into position by means of chains and pulley tackle. The chute having fouled one of the cross joists the plaintiff was told by the charge-hand to "nip up and release it." This the plaintiff did by making use of three-inch ridges on the chute as foot and hand holds and resting his back against the wall of an economiser. By these means he got up to another girder and released the chute, but when proceeding to descend in the same way his foot slipped and he fell through open joisting a distance of some 13 feet and suffered injury. It was not contended by the defendants that the plaintiff had been guilty of any negligence in carrying out the charge-hand's orders in the way he did.

The plaintiff's case was that the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations of 1948,[1] applied and that the defendants had committed a breach of regulation 30 (3) in failing to cover securely by temporary boards the joisting through which the plaintiff fell a distance of more than 6 feet 6 inches.

The defendants' case was that the contract which they were performing was merely the installation of plant to which the Building Regulations did not apply.

Ormerod J., on May 6, 1954, held that on the facts the Building Regulations did apply and that there had been a breach of regulation 30 (3); and he awarded the plaintiff £1,250 damages.

[1] Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 2: "(1) These regulations shall apply to "the following operations, where "undertaken by way of trade or busi-"ness or for the purpose of any indus-"trial or commercial undertaking, or "by or on behalf of the Crown or any "municipal or other public authority, "namely, the construction, structural "alteration, repair or maintenance of "a building (including re-pointing, "re-decoration and external cleaning "of the structure), the demolition of "a building, and the preparation for, "and laying the foundation of, an "intended building whether or not "the building is on or adjacent to the "site of work of engineering construc-"tion within the meaning of the "Factories Act, 1937, and to machi-"nery or plant used in such opera-"tions; and Part VI of these regula-"tions shall apply as respects persons "employed in such operations as "aforesaid: Provided that the fol-"lowing shall not be deemed to "be buildings for the purposes of "this regulation: docks, harbours, "wharves, quays, piers, sea defence "works, lighthouses at sea, river "works, canals, dams, reservoirs, "aqueducts, viaducts, bridges, tun-"nels, sewers, pipelines, filter beds, "gas holders, or pole or lattice work "structures designed solely for the "support of machinery, plant or "electric lines."

The defendants appealed.

SOMERVELL L.J. This is an appeal from a decision of Ormerod J. The plaintiff claimed in respect of personal injuries which he sustained while he was working for the defendants, who had a contract with the City of London Electric Lighting Co. Ld., to manufacture and deliver, unload and erect four steam generating plants. The plaintiff claims for a breach of duty at common law, and also breach of the Building Regulations. The trial judge held that the Building Regulations were applicable and that there was a breach of them. From that decision the defendants appeal and the first point taken is that the Building Regulations do not apply to what was being done here. [His Lordship read regulation 2 and continued:]

I have read the proviso in full because some argument was based on it, an argument which has some but not always very great force, namely that the excluded matters would be, or at any rate were thought to be, included in the words that preceded and it was therefore necessary expressly to exclude them. If that is a right approach to the construction of the regulation as a whole it would indicate that "the construction of a building" is used in a very wide sense. As against that argument it is to be noted that the form is not perhaps quite the usual form. The form is that "the following shall not be deemed to be buildings" and not, as one might have thought, "shall be deemed not to "be buildings." There is, however, some slight force in that argument.

We have a model of the generating plant and I will very shortly describe it. There are four divisions containing the four generating plants. It is a large structure, we were told something over 100 feet high and rather wider than that I would say from the model. It contains a series of floors or levels connected by gangways and stairways. It would appear to be made of steel and it contains, in addition to the boilers, compartments, cooling chambers, chutes and various things of that sort. The question is whether the work of erecting that structure was the construction of a building.

Somervell L.J.

Mr. Marven Everett based his argument on a contrast between installation of plant and construction of a building. That was not based on any words in the regulations or in any Act of Parliament and I do not myself find it a really helpful or satisfactory contrast, because I think that the installation of plant may involve the operation of the construction of a building. The judge put it in this way: "I have to decide on the facts of this "case whether it is right to say here that the defendants were "engaged on the construction of a building or whether they were "merely putting something into a building which had been, or "was in the process of being, constructed." He decided, on the model which he saw and on the evidence, that the defendants were engaged on the construction of a building and the regulations therefore applied. I agree with that. I think that was a correct conclusion on the facts of this case, giving the words in the regulation their ordinary meaning.

There was some discussion in argument whether this quadrupartite structure should be regarded as a building itself or as a component part of the whole, which was the Bankside Power Station. I do not find it necessary to decide that because I do not think it matters for the purpose of the issue whether the Building Regulations apply or not. It is a question of words which I think has no relevance to the matter we have to decide.

There remains the question whether the plaintiff has established a breach of the regulations. We have a plan, and there was also a little model. [His Lordship stated the circumstances of the accident and continued:] It was first of all said that there was no safe means of access under regulation 5. The judge negatived that and found a breach of regulation 30 (3). [His Lordship read regulation 30 (3) and continued:] I think it is clear that the plaintiff did fall through open joisting.

The judge, in considering regulation 5, found that there was a safe means of access to the place where it was necessary to get to release this chute by getting onto another girder, then going along where there had admittedly been some boards laid over the chequer work of joists, up a little staircase and along a floor, and in that way he could have got, without any climbing in the sense in which he did climb, to the place where he could release the chute. That might have indicated that that was the proper way for him to go and that he was doing something he ought not to have done and taking a risk he ought not to have taken by climbing up in the way I have described. But that is not, and never has been, the defendants' case. Right at the beginning Mr. Marven Everett said that it was not his case that the plaintiff was doing anything wrong in going the way he did. Indeed, all the evidence, with the exception possibly of one witness, showed that this was a perfectly proper thing for a man to do, skilled as this man was in moving about these structures.

That being so, it seems to me that regulation 30 (3) applies. He was ordered to do work immediately above open joisting and it is not disputed that he fell a distance of more than 6 feet 6 inches. The open joisting was at the side of the chute and no doubt if it had been covered with planks a small gap would have had to have been left between the planks and the chute to enable it to be lifted up into position. The obvious inference is, however, that, if there had been planks, as in my opinion the regulation say there should have been, the accident would not have happened and he would have fallen a comparatively short distance on to those planks. For these reasons I think that on the two points the trial judge came to a right conclusion and I would dismiss the appeal.

BIRKETT L.J. I am entirely of the same opinion. The substantial point which was argued in the case was the first point taken by Mr. Marven Everett that the Building Regulations do not apply at all to the work which was being done by his clients at the Bankside Power Station. The argument was, of course, that what was being done was merely the installation of plant and was in no sense the undertaking of the construction of a building. It is quite clear, as Mr. Thompson conceded, that you can have an operation which is in itself merely the installation of plant and therefore the Building Regulations would not apply. But what I think it is important to keep in mind is the point which was emphasized by Romer L.J. in the course of the argument, that we have to consider the actual case before the court. Many illustrations were used in the course of the argument, quite naturally, in order to try to illustrate the meaning of the regulations, whether they would apply in this case or the other, and those illustrations ranged over a very wide field. I think it is all-important in deciding these matters that the actual facts of the case before the court should be kept in mind.

My Lord has already indicated what was the nature of the work, but there is a passage in the judge's judgment which puts the matter rather concisely: "In order to instal this plant it "was necessary, of course, not only to put in boilers but also "to erect a substantial amount of steel stanchions, steel girders "and joists for the purpose of not only supporting the various "items of plant which had to be put in, but also for the purpose "of providing galleries, stairs and floors to make the various "portions of the plant accessible when in due course the plant "had to be worked."

It is fairly plain, therefore, that on the facts of this case it is not a simple case of installing plant. Mr. Thompson argued that what was in fact being done was first of all that the defendants were dealing with a part of the construction of the building. He said that in fact what they were doing constituted the construction of a building. So the argument passes to and fro. I myself have come to the conclusion that the Building Regulations do apply to the work in question, and that the judge in the court below took entirely the right view about that. I think

1954
Elms
v.
Foster Wheeler Ld.
Birkett L.J.

that the defendants were undertaking the construction of a building within the meaning of these regulations. Mr. Marven Everett pressed upon us that this was making rather an extension of the Building Regulations and that it would make things difficult in future. All that I desire to say about that is that I am not satisfied that those rather lurid prognostications are really justified by the facts as we know them. At all events there is always power in the Minister to make appropriate regulations if any particular hardship should arise. On the facts of this case as we know them I think that the Building Regulations apply to the work which was being done.

With regard to the other point, a rather curious situation arises; but I am satisfied that the judge was right in saying that regulation 30 (3) applied to the facts of this case. In view of the fact that we are upholding the trial judge upon regulation 30 (3) I do not think that it is necessary to say anything about regulation 5, although had that remained a live question I should have had something to say about whether or not the judge was right about that matter. What I think governs the matter is the fact that the plaintiff went up to do the task he was assigned by a route which everybody appeared to agree was a perfectly proper route to take. He was told by the charge-hand, who himself was an experienced steel erector, to go up to this particular place and to release tackle which had become jammed. To an ordinary layman it seems a very hazardous thing to do, but apparently to a skilled steel erector it was all in the day's work. The charge-hand thought nothing about it. The plaintiff went and everybody conceded that that was a perfectly proper thing to do and a perfectly proper route to take. It was when he was returning from that hazardous operation that his foot slipped and he fell on to a concrete floor a distance of some 13 feet and sustained the injuries in respect of which he made his claim.

When regulation 30 (3) is considered, "when work is done"—and he certainly was doing work, he was obeying the instructions of the charge-hand to release this particular jam—"on or immediately above open joisting"—and there can be no question on the facts that that applied to this situation—"through which "a person is liable to fall a distance of more than 6 feet 6 inches." —he did in fact fall 13 feet—"the joisting shall be securely "covered over by temporary boards or other covering where and "to the extent necessary to afford safe access to or foothold for "the work . . .", it is quite clear that if the regulations apply the provisions of that regulation were broken in this case. Therefore, without any further word about regulation 5, it is enough to say that I agree with the finding of the judge with regard to regulation 30 (3) and I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

Romer L.J. I also agree. I only want to say a very few words on the one point which I think is principally troubling the defendants, and that is whether the Building Regulations apply to this case at all. I agree with my brethren that it is quite impossible to say in a general way that the Building Regulations apply on the one hand or do not apply on the other to work which includes the installation of plant, because it must depend on the circumstances of each particular case whether such an operation attracts the regulations or not.

I think that in the present case the kind of way the question may be posed is whether at the time of the accident a building was being constructed and whether the defendants were contributing to its construction. I say "contributing" because it is quite plain that the words in regulation 2 "the construction of a building" should be read "the construction of a building or "any part thereof." I think that is clear from the regulation as a whole and in particular from the parenthesis which immediately follows upon the word "building." The answer to the question which I have indicated depends on the construction of the regulation and the application of the regulation when construed to the facts of this case. The object of the power station, the structure which was erected, was to house the plant which the defendants introduced into it. In other words, it was a structure designed to accommodate the plant.

The regulation excludes from the word "building" (whatever the word is intended to mean, because it is not defined) amongst other things "pole or lattice work structures designed solely for "the support of plant." That exclusion shows that in the mind of the draftsman of the regulation structures of that description would or might fall within the meaning of "building" as used in the regulation; that is to say, it shows that the draftsman was using the word "building" in a wide sense and in a sense which did not necessarily, from its context or otherwise, exclude that conception. If that is so it would seem a fortiori that he was using it in a sense that would include structures of a more solid kind designed for the same purpose. It would accordingly appear that if a structure is built of a kind such as the Bankside Power Station it prima facie is, or is deemed to be, a building within the meaning of the regulations if it is designed to support plant. That it undoubtedly is, for not only does it accommodate the plant but it gives it both subjacent and lateral support. The operation of constructing the power station was, therefore, in my opinion, a building operation within regulation 2 (1).

The question then arises, Did the work which the defendants undertook form part of that operation? The evidence showed, and I think the judge found, that what the defendants or their sub-contractors did was a contribution to the construction of the power station, inasmuch as they were installing the essential apparatus which it was the object of the outer walls and roof to house and shelter and which was indeed united to those walls and to the outer walls as well as to the foundations of the structure. It is to be noted further, as I understand the matter, that the erection of the undoubted structure itself, the outer walls and so on, was proceeding more or less contemporaneously with the installation of the plant itself. Further than that, the defendants were also making stairways and galleries and floors for purposes of access and supervision and so on, such as one would expect to find in many factories.

I accordingly have come to the same conclusion as that at which the trial judge arrived, namely, first, that the purpose and result of the operation which was undertaken were the construction of a building, and, secondly, that the defendants took part in that operation in the sense that they contributed to the structural work. What they undertook to do therefore and did was, in my judgment, an "operation" within the meaning of regulation 2 (1), and the Building Regulations accordingly apply. I again emphasize that the application of the Building Regulations which I think has been established depends on the facts of this particular case. As Birkett L.J. said the defendants need not think necessarily, as apparently they do think, that all kinds of disastrous consequences will arise merely because in this particular case we hold that the Building Regulations apply. In other cases they might not.

On the question of the breach of regulation 30 (3), I entirely agree with what my brethren have said and I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Husband and Wife — Justices — Practice — Constitution of court — Different justices sitting on adjournments — Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 55), s. 98 (6).

The hearing of an application by a husband to vary an order for the maintenance of his wife which had previously been made against him was spread, owing to adjournments, over three separate days. Three justices were present on the first day, the same three with two additional justices on the second day, and on the third day the first three justices were absent, and the matter was heard by the second two justices and another justice who had not been present previously. The application was dismissed by the justices sitting on the third day:—

Held, that there must be a rehearing before an entirely fresh panel of justices and a different clerk, for there had been a failure to comply with the mandatory provisions of section 98 (6) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. This was also pre-eminently a case in which the principle that justice must not merely be done, but must be seen to be done, had been infringed.

APPEAL by a husband against an order of the Petersfield justices dated March 3, 1954.

In October, 1950, the justices made an order against the husband for £2 a week for the wife and 10s. a week for each of the two children (one of whom had reached the age of 16 before the date of the order now appealed) on the ground of desertion. An application by the husband in 1951 to reduce the amount of the order was rejected. On another occasion the husband was sent to prison for five days for non-payment of arrears, and a suspended committal order was made against him in July, 1953. A further application to vary the order was made in 1954, his case being that he was unable to maintain the payments under the order.

The application in 1954 was first heard on February 3 by three justices. The husband gave evidence-in-chief and was cross-examined. An adjournment was ordered for the purpose of the production of certain books and documents, and the case came on again on February 17, 1954. At that hearing there were present the three previous justices and two additional justices. Further evidence was given by the husband at that hearing and the wife also gave evidence, which was interposed, concerning her earnings. No objection was taken to the change in the composition of the court nor to the interposition of the wife's evidence. A further adjournment was ordered so that the wife's solicitors might examine the books and documents produced, and the case came on for a final hearing on March 3, 1954. At this hearing the two justices who had been added to the court on February 17, and one who had not attended either of the previous hearings, were present. The three justices who had heard the husband's evidence-in-chief and cross-examination on the first occasion, and the evidence on the second occasion, were absent.

The justices in their reasons for dismissing the husband's application stated, inter alia: "3. Two of us on February 17, "1954, found that the wife was earning a net wage of £4 12s. 6d. "a week as a typist. . . . We considered that the nature of the "wife's job, the amount of her earnings, and her present circum-"stances, did not in themselves justify us in reducing the amount "payable by the husband." They also stated: "The husband's "evidence on each occasion subsequent to the making of the "order [the order of October, 1950] has been to the same effect "—diminishing business, the hope one day of setting matters "right, trade creditors, inability to sell the companies or their "assets or to obtain other employment, financial assistance from "his parents."

Basil Garland for the husband.
N. R. Blaker for the wife.

It was alleged on behalf of the husband and as a ground of appeal that: "The provisions of section 98 (6) of the Magistrates'

1954

Munday
v.
Munday.

"Courts Act, 1952,[1] were not complied with in that the justices "composing the court were not present during the whole of the "proceedings." It was submitted on behalf of the wife that the whole of the proceedings had in substance been repeated on the third occasion.

Lord Merriman P. This is a husband's appeal against the dismissal by the justices for the Petersfield petty sessional division of Hampshire on March 3, 1954, of his application to vary by reduction an order made against him in October, 1950, on the ground of desertion. The order originally was £2 for the wife and 10s. each for the two children under 16, of whom she was given the custody. One of these children has since reached the age of 16, so that the order has lapsed in respect of that particular child.

The sole question in this case was one of amount. The husband's case in a nutshell was: "I cannot afford to pay." I do not propose to go into the merits of that application because, in my opinion, this case falls to be dealt with on the point which is that taken in the forefront of the grounds of appeal in these words: "That the provisions of section 98 (6) of the Magistrates' "Courts Act, 1952, were not complied with in that the justices "composing the court were not present during the whole of the "proceedings." That that was so is not disputed, except in the sense that it is said that the whole of the proceedings were repeated on the third and last occasion, when the three justices who made the order were present.

[1] Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 98 ("Constitution and place of "sitting of court"): "(6) Subject to "the provisions of the next following "subsection, [which concerns cases "where the trial of an information has "been adjourned after the accused "has been convicted and before he is "sentenced] the justices composing "the court before which any proceed-"ings take place shall be present "during the whole of the proceedings: "Provided that, if during the course "of the proceedings any justice ab-"sents himself, he shall cease to act "further therein and, if the remain-"ing justices are enough to satisfy "the requirements of the preceding "provisions of this section, the pro-"ceedings may continue before a court "composed of those justices."

[1] Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 56: "(1) In this Act the expression "'domestic proceedings' means pro-"ceedings—

"(a) under the Guardianship of "Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925; (b) "under the Summary Jurisdiction "(Separation and Maintenance) Acts, "1895 to 1949; (c) under section 3 or "section 4 of the Maintenance Orders "(Facilities for Enforcement) Act, "1920; (d) under subsection (3) of "section 4 of the Family Allowances "Act, 1945, or under that subsection "as applied by subsection (2) of sec-"tion 19 of the National Insurance "Act, 1946; (e) under section 3 of the "Marriage Act, 1949;

"other than proceedings for the "enforcement of an order made under "any of the enactments mentioned in "paragraphs (a) and (b) of this sub-"section, or for the variation of any "provision for the payment of money "contained in an order made under "any of those enactments, or in an "order made or confirmed under the "enactments mentioned in paragraph "(c) of this subsection.

"(2) A magistrates' court when "hearing domestic proceedings shall "be composed of not more than three "justices of the peace, including, so "far as practicable, both a man and "a woman."

[His Lordship reviewed the circumstances of the three hearings, saying of the second hearing:] It is right to say that no objection was taken to the change in the composition of the court by the addition of these two extra justices. It is also right to point out that owing to the definition of "domestic proceedings," [1] an application for the variation of an order under the summary jurisdiction (separation and maintenance) code does not come within the definition, and, therefore, there was nothing vitally wrong in the fact that five justices were sitting. Nor is it necessary, I think, to consider what would have been the position if the matter had ended there, with the original three justices sitting with two additional justices and a certain amount of the evidence, no doubt, being taken again.

It is true that there was a quorum on the last occasion, but it seems to me to be impossible by any process of reasoning to say of the order arrived at by this curious procedure that the justices composing the court before which any proceedings took place were present during the whole of the proceedings. I am unable to accept the argument that in substance there was a hearing de novo before the tribunal of three on the last occasion. It is not the fact, and I do not propose to go through an analysis of the findings. Suffice it to say that it is plain beyond a doubt that a great deal of what these justices have set out as findings of fact was derived from evidence appearing on the notes of the first hearing, at which not one of them was present, and I repeat that one of the three sitting on the last occasion had not been present on any previous hearing of this application at all.

Apart from the consideration that section 98 (6) of the Act of 1952 is mandatory, and contains no dispensing power which is remotely relevant to these proceedings, I think that there are wider considerations still, for it seems to me that this is pre-eminently a case in which the principle that justice must not merely be done, but must manifestly be seen to be done, has been infringed.

I turn now to the third of the reasons given by the justices for dismissing this application. I have not gone through the others, beyond stating that it is plain that in reasons 1 and 2 several of the material facts found are derived from the evidence given by the husband-in-chief on the first occasion, which was not heard orally by any single one of those who were present when the order was made. [His Lordship read the third reason as set out above and continued:] The justices are plainly there speaking collectively for all three of them, in contrast with the first sentence of the reason, which refers only to "two of us." So three of them, one of whom had not even seen the wife in the witness-box, made a finding about the nature of the wife's job, the amount of her earnings, and the effect of it. Then they say that they regret that they did not all sit on the three occasions on which the application under review was heard.

v.
Munday.

Lord Merriman
P.

Here I am bound to say that I find a good deal to regret in the reasons which are given, for, as counsel pointed out, the suggestion does appear that this curious procedure has been followed before. But what I think is more important is that it is not likely to satisfy the husband that justice has been done when, in support of the findings on this occasion, it is recorded that the same three justices have on a previous occasion, in 1951, sat on an earlier application to reduce the order and have dismissed that application, or that on a later occasion one member of the court was party to sending the husband to prison for five days for non-payment of arrears, and that on a later occasion still all three members of the present court, as recently as July 22, 1953, made a suspended committal order against the husband, on which it was not necessary to send him to prison because, apparently, his aged parent paid and has continued to pay the necessary instalments. I do not think that it makes it any better that the justices add that the same solicitors had represented the husband on three of the specified occasions, and that on each occasion evidence and accounts similar to those produced to them on the hearing of this particular complaint had been produced then. They summarize it in this way: "The husband's evidence on each occasion subsequent to the making of the order"—"each occasion," not the occasion with which they are dealing—"has been to the same effect—diminishing business, the hope one day of setting matters aright, trade creditors, inability to sell the companies or their assets or to obtain other employment, financial assistance from his parents."

I regard this as a very deplorable business. I cannot understand how a man who was not represented could have been subjected to this procedure without any protection from the court, or from the clerk, who ought to have seen that the proceedings were rightly conducted. It is quite impossible to support this order thus arrived at. The dismissal of the husband's application must be set aside.

Davies J. I entirely agree, and save for the fact that this is obviously a matter of some public importance I would not add anything.

It is unnecessary to say any more about the provisions of section 98 (6) of the Act of 1952, which are, as my Lord has said, mandatory and ought to have been within the knowledge of the clerk, if not of the justices themselves, and ought to have been acted upon by him.

All I desire is to add a word on the broader aspect of the case. I am not prepared to go through the notes of the evidence with a tooth-comb, as we were invited to do by Mr. Blaker, to decide whether the hearing on the third occasion was a hearing de novo; though in so far as we did embark upon that examination, it appeared to be plain that the three justices who sat on the last occasion were acting in part upon evidence which none of them had heard. But, to my way of thinking, the real point is a much broader one. Every layman would believe that all three hearings were part of the same case; indeed, the justices themselves in their reasons speak of the three occasions on which the complaint under review was heard so that all are treated as a part of the hearing. It seems to me to be impossible that any layman could believe for one moment that justice had been done in the circumstances of this case when three persons heard it on the first day, those three plus two others heard it on the second day, and the second two plus a third and without the original three heard and determined it finally. Obviously any member of the public would think, and rightly think, that that was no way for any legal proceedings to be conducted, and would at once come to the conclusion that no fair or proper decision in those proceedings could be arrived at, when they were conducted in such a manner.

I have said that it was obviously the duty of the clerk to know the proper procedure under the section, and I cannot help feeling that, quite apart from the section, the justices themselves ought in common fairness and in common sense to have realized that to conduct proceedings as they did was wholly and obviously wrong. I hope that if, as appears to be the case from the justices' reasons, there is some kind of tradition or practice of this kind in the Petersfield magistrates' court, it will now for ever cease.

LORD MERRIMAN P. The appeal is allowed, the order dismissing the complaint set aside, and the complaint remitted for rehearing by a quorum of justices none of whom has taken any part in the disputes between this husband and this wife. There is no deputy clerk, but it is quite open now, as I understand it, for justices to appoint a deputy for the purpose. It is not for me to say how that shall be done. One knows that as a matter of practice it very often happens that a clerk from a neighbouring petty sessional division is borrowed, and I see no reason why that should not be done in this case. The point is that we are determined that on the next occasion the tribunal shall manifestly be seen and known to be differently constituted in every respect from that which has hitherto dealt with the affairs of these spouses.

Appeal allowed.
Case remitted for hearing by fresh panel of justices.

* ROBERTSON v. ABERDEEN JOURNALS LD. AND OTHERS.

[1953 R. 894.]

Practice—Payment into court—Defendants sued severally—Action for infringement of copyright—Claim for damages against all defendants for infringement and breach of confidence and against two defendants for conversion—Application for the payment of one sum into court by all defendants in respect of all causes of action—Whether permissible—R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 1 (1) and (2); r. 4 (1).

R.S.C., Ord. 22 permits a payment in by all the defendants together whether they are sued jointly, severally or in the alternative.

In an action where the plaintiff claimed damages against all three defendants for breach of copyright and breach of confidence, and damages against the first and second of them for conversion, the first and second defendants applied under Ord. 22, r. 1 (2) for leave for all three of them to pay into court a single sum in respect of all causes of action:—

Held, that although the causes of action were in law separate and distinct, they were inseparably bound together; that there was jurisdiction under the rules to make the order; and that in the present case the discretion of the court should be exercised in allowing one payment in to be made in respect of all the causes of action, as the plaintiff would not be prejudiced in any way.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

The plaintiff in an action against Aberdeen Journals Ld. and two other defendants claimed (1) an inquiry as to the damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the infringement of the plaintiff's copyright and conversion and payment of the amount found due, and (b) an inquiry as to the damages suffered by him by the breaches of confidence committed by the defendants and each of them and payment of the amount found due.

The facts and allegations as set out in the statement of claim were as follows: "1. The plaintiff is the author of, and is and "has been at all material times the owner of the copyright in, a "certain memorandum entitled 'Proposed Memorandum on "'Government Fish-Selling Scheme.' 2. The first named "defendants are and have been at all material times the pro-"prietors of, inter alia, two newspapers published in Aberdeen "and entitled respectively 'The Press Journal' and 'Evening "'Express.' The second named defendant is a newspaper "reporter. The third named defendant is and has been at all "material times the Member of Parliament representing the "South Division of Aberdeen in which city the plaintiff was at "all material times resident. 3. On or about January 10, 1952, "the plaintiff delivered to the third named defendant a copy of "the said memorandum. 4. The delivery of the said memorandum was made in confidence to the third named defendant in her capacity as aforesaid as the defendants and each of them at all material times well knew and understood. 5. In breach of the aforesaid duty of confidence the third named defendant permitted the second named defendant to examine the said memorandum and to copy the same. 6. In further breach of the aforesaid duty of confidence and in infringement of the plaintiff's said copyright the first and second named defendants and each of them have, without the plaintiff's consent, caused to be reproduced and published on January 18, 1952, in the said newspapers the said memorandum or a substantial part thereof. 7. The acts of infringement complained of in paragraph 6 hereof were authorized by the third named defendant without the plaintiff's consent and in further infringement of the plaintiff's said copyright. 8. Further or in the alternative by reason of section 7 of the Copyright Act, 1911, all reproductions of the said memorandum including all infringing copies of the said newspapers are the property of the plaintiff and the first and second named defendants and each of them have converted the same to their own use to the plaintiff's detriment. 9. By reason of the aforesaid breaches of confidence, the aforesaid infringements of the plaintiff's said copyright and the aforesaid conversion the plaintiff has suffered and is calculated to suffer damage."

The first and second defendants applied by procedure summons "for leave for all the defendants or alternatively for each of the defendants either jointly or severally as they may be advised to pay into court a single sum in respect of all causes of action herein."

all causes of action, pursuant to the discretion vested in the court by Order 22, r. 1 (2).

The nature of the action, as set out in the statement of claim, briefly, is this. It is alleged that the plaintiff is the author and owner of copyright in a certain memorandum entitled "The "Proposed Memorandum on Government Fish-selling Scheme." That memorandum was handed, so it is alleged, by the plaintiff to the third defendant, Lady Tweedsmuir, who is the Member of Parliament for the South Division of Aberdeen, where the plaintiff resides, and it was delivered (so the plaintiff says) to Lady Tweedsmuir in confidence, in her capacity as a Member of Parliament. Then it is alleged that, in breach of that confidence, Lady Tweedsmuir handed the memorandum to the second defendant, one Catto, who is a reporter employed by the first defendants, Aberdeen Journals Ld. The delivery of the memorandum, as I understand it, is admitted, although, of course, it has been denied that the delivery was in breach of any confidence.

Then it is alleged that Catto and the first defendants, also in breach of confidence, published the memorandum, or substantial parts thereof, in certain publications owned by the first defendants, and that is also alleged to be an infringement of the plaintiff's copyright—and also to be a conversion under section 7 of the Copyright Act, 1911.

The causes of action against the defendants, as appearing in the statement of claim, are, therefore, these: against Lady Tweedsmuir, that she handed the document to Mr. Catto in breach of confidence, and, secondly, that she authorized the publication and consequential infringement of the plaintiff's copyright. No claim is made against Lady Tweedsmuir for conversion. Then the causes of action against the first and second defendants are these: first, the use of the confidential information; secondly, infringement of copyright; and thirdly, conversion.

In those circumstances it is plain that leave is required if it is desired to pay a lump sum into court to meet all causes of action, for rule 1 (2) of Ord. 22 provides: "Where the money is "paid into court in satisfaction of one or more of several causes "of action the notice shall specify the cause or causes of action "in respect of which payment is made and the sum paid in respect "of each such cause of action unless the court or a judge otherwise "order."

Now two points arise: first whether I ought to exercise my discretion under that rule; and, secondly, it is sought to make a payment in by one single payment by all the defendants, and it is said that that is not permissible under the rule. It is said that the causes of action here are several and not joint, and that in such events no good payment in may be made by all defendants together, because rule 4 (1) says: "(1) Money may be paid into "court under rule 1 by one or more of several defendants sued "jointly or, in the alternative, upon notice to the other defendant "or defendants"; and it is said that that rule expressly excludes payment in by defendants sued severally. The point was then taken that the defendants can make a single payment in, and nothing can prevent them, and it is a matter which can be determined at the trial as to whether the payment in is a good one or not.

All the parties have argued that matter fully before me and I think, in the circumstances, it is my duty to express a view upon the power of defendants, sued severally, to join all together in making a payment into court.

Rule 1 (1) of Ord. 22 is in these terms: "In any action for "a debt or damages or in an Admiralty action the defendant may "at any time after appearance upon notice to the plaintiff pay "into court a sum of money in satisfaction of the claim or (where "several causes of action are joined in one action) in satisfaction "of one or more of the causes of action; provided that with "a defence setting up tender before action the sum of money "alleged to have been tendered must be brought into court." The word "defendant" there is in the singular, but Ord. 71, r. 2, provides: "In these rules, unless repugnant to the context, "the singular number shall include the plural, and the plural "number shall include the singular." While dealing with this point I am, of course, considering only a payment in in respect of one cause of action; prima facie, therefore, "defendant" includes the word "defendants," and there would appear to be nothing in so reading the rule which is repugnant to the context. There would seem to be no injustice to any party if all the defendants, sued jointly, severally, or in the alternative, make a payment in in respect of one cause of action; the plaintiff can only recover in the aggregate the damage he has suffered, and I can see nothing to prevent all the defendants sued from making one single payment in together. If the plaintiff thinks that that is insufficient he goes on with his action; if he thinks that it covers his cause of action he takes it out and his costs are paid.

Therefore in my judgment the rules permit a payment in by all the defendants, who are sued jointly, severally or, in the alternative, joining together. In my judgment r. 4 is only dealing with the situation where some only of the defendants make payment in, and then elaborate provisions are laid down as to giving notice to other defendants, and also with regard to costs.

I turn, then, to the point on rule 1 (2). Ought I to exercise my discretion and permit a payment in in respect of all the causes of action? Prima facie—and there is no doubt about this —a separate payment in ought to be made, and it is only in proper cases, where the court can properly exercise its discretion, that a payment in covering more than one cause of action ought to be allowed.

It was suggested by the applicants that damages really would be very much the same for the cause of action depending on breach of confidence as for the cause of action depending on copyright, and I was referred to two cases: Exchange Telegraph Co. Ld. v. Gregory & Co.[1] and Fenning Film Service Ld. v. Wolverhampton, Walsall and District Cinemas Ld.,[2] which were said to support that view. But I do not accept that. All that those cases decide is that damages are at large, and it seems to me that damages will not be the same in respect of (in substance) two causes of action, that is to say, the breach of confidence and the infringement of copyright. I say "in substance two" because, in Tallent v. Coldwell,[3] Farwell J. permitted a single payment in to cover the infringement of copyright and conversion under section 7 of the Copyright Act; and Mr. Shelley, for the plaintiff, does not desire to contend—at any rate in this court—that that was wrongly decided; so that he agrees that one payment in may be made for infringement and conversion, and the issue is as regards one payment in for breach of confidence and breach of copyright.

As I have said, it seems to me that damages for breach of confidence may be very different from damages for breach of copyright; Mr. Shelley urges, with some force, that for the purposes of the rule there is no real inter-relation of damages between the two and each case must be regarded upon its own, and therefore in justice to the plaintiff separate payments in ought to be made. He points out that damages for breach of confidence may well be a matter which will affect the reputation of the plaintiff, and he may be able to claim damages for breach of confidence which would not be available to him in an action for breach of copyright, although he does not concede that that is necessarily so.

It is quite true that these two causes of action are quite separate and, in a sense, quite distinct, and they may give rise to different quanta of damages; but they are, in my judgment, really inseparably bound up together, depending largely, though not entirely, on the same set of facts, and I ask myself this question: Is there any injustice to the plaintiff in ordering one payment in to cover both causes of action? I can see none. He must know what he expects to get out of the action, and I cannot see that he is prejudiced in any way. Then I ask myself: Is there any prejudice to the defendants if they are ordered to pay in, or if they are compelled to pay in, separate sums under the separate causes of action? I think there is, for this reason: damages for breach of confidence may be serious, for the plaintiff may say, "I wanted this document kept secret," and if that is his main case he will hardly recover a large sum for breach of copyright. On the other hand, he may say, "I wanted to publish "this document and it has become less attractive to publishers," and if that is his main case it would seem that his claim for breach of confidence must at any rate be very small.

The real truth is that the plaintiff knows which is his main claim; the defendants do not; and I think that there would be grave hardship upon the defendants, in those circumstances, if I ordered them to pay in separate sums for each cause of action.

Accordingly I propose to grant an order as asked.

Order accordingly.

Vendor and Purchaser—Purchaser for value without notice—Tenant in possession — Equities binding purchaser — Rectification — Sale at auction of farm occupied by tenant—Mutual mistake of vendors and tenant as to effect of repairing covenant — Claim by tenant against purchaser to rectify tenancy agreement—Whether purchaser affected by notice of equity to rectify—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 199 (1).

Landlord and Tenant. Rectification.

In 1946 a number of farms, part of an agricultural estate, were sold at auction. One of the farms was purchased by the defendant. He had knowledge that the farm was in the occupation of a tenant (the plaintiff). After the purchase of the farm by the defendant disputes arose between the plaintiff and the defendant, as each required repairs to be done while refusing to do them himself. Eventually the plaintiff brought an action claiming that his tenancy agreement should be rectified in such a way as to make the defendant liable for structural repairs. The defendant contended, inter alia, that, if a case for rectification could be established against the original lessors, he, as a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, was not bound by the plaintiff's equity to rectify:—

Held, that the doctrine that a purchaser was bound by the equities which a tenant in possession could enforce against the vendor did not extend to an equity of rectification; while it was the duty of the defendant purchaser properly to ascertain the terms under which the plaintiff tenant held the farm, he was under no duty to ascertain whether the document containing those terms set out accurately the respective rights of the original landlord and tenant, but was entitled to rely on the terms of the document, which spoke for itself.

Barnhart v. Greenshields (1853) 9 Moo.P.C. 18 considered.

ACTION.

In 1946 a number of farms, part of the Parmoor estate, Buckinghamshire, were sold at auction. One of the farms was purchased by the defendant. He had knowledge that the farm was in 1954

the occupation of a tenant (the plaintiff); before the sale he had inspected a copy of the plaintiff's tenancy agreement at the office of the auctioneers, and formed the opinion that under the terms of the repairing covenant the responsibility for doing repairs to the farmhouse and buildings was on the tenant.

For many years the estate management had used a standard printed form of tenancy agreement, and it had always been their belief and the belief of the tenants that under the repairing covenant the estate was responsible for repairs to buildings; they and the tenants had always acted accordingly, and the plaintiff, when he signed his agreement in 1939, was told that that was its effect.

After the purchase of the farm by the defendant disputes arose between the plaintiff and the defendant, as each required repairs to be done while refusing to do them himself. Eventually a case was stated for the opinion of a county court judge, under regulations made pursuant to the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, which raised, inter alia, the question of the proper construction of the repairing covenant. The judge held that the plaintiff was liable for structural repairs, but suggested that there might be a case for rectification, and stayed all proceedings until that question was decided.

The plaintiff accordingly brought this action, claiming rectification of the tenancy agreement by providing that, while he was to keep the house, cottages and buildings in good order, the defendant was to keep the same in repair. At the hearing it was not disputed that the county court judge had been right in rejecting the extrinsic verbal evidence and in holding that the covenant, as amended, made the plaintiff responsible for repairs to the buildings. In answer to the claim for rectification, the defendant contended (1) that no right to rectification was made out on the evidence; (2) that, supposing that such a claim was made out, he was a bona fide purchaser for value and not bound by an equity to rectify; (3) that the plaintiff could not at such a late stage assert a claim for rectification. The case is reported on the second contention only.

J. L. Arnold for the plaintiff.
L. A. Blundell for the defendant.

Cases cited in argument not referred to in the judgment: Jones v. Smith [1]; Reeves v. Pope.[2]

Upjohn J. stated the facts; rejected the defendant's third contention; and, on the first contention, found that the plaintiff and the Parmoor estate intended to have an agreement in the common estate form, under which both parties mistakenly thought that on its true construction the responsibility for repairs fell on the landlord. On those facts he dismissed the claim for rectification and proceeded: Lastly, Mr. Arnold for the plaintiff argued that as the plaintiff was in actual occupation as tenant, the defendant was affected with notice of all his rights and all his equities, including an equity to rectify. On the view I have formed of the facts and law as to rectification, this point does not strictly arise, but as it has been fully argued, I think that I ought to express my views thereon.

In Barnhart v. Greenshields,[1] when the law is clearly and compendiously stated, the judgment of the Privy Council was delivered by Mr. Pemberton Leigh, afterwards Lord Kingsdown, who said[2]: "With respect to the effect of possession merely, we "take the law to be, that if there be a tenant in possession of "land, a purchaser is bound by all the equities which the tenant "could enforce against the vendor, and that the equity of the "tenant extends not only to interests connected with his tenancy, "as in Taylor v. Stibbert,[3] but also to interests under collateral "agreements, as in Daniels v. Davison,[4] Allen v. Anthony,[5] the "principle being the same in both classes of cases; namely, that "the possession of the tenant is notice that he has some interest "in the land, and that a purchaser having notice of that fact, is "bound, according to the ordinary rule, either to inquire what "that interest is, or to give effect to it, whatever it may be."

Then a little later on he cited the language of Lord Eldon in Allen v. Anthony[6]: "It is so far settled as not to be disputed, "that a person purchasing, where there is a tenant in possession, "if he neglects to inquire into the title, must take, subject to "such rights as the tenant may have."

On the other hand, Mr. Arnold has not produced any case which goes so far as to say that an equity of rectification is an equity which is enforceable against a purchaser. In my judgment it would be extending the doctrine of notice and the obligation to make inquiry far too much if the doctrine was intended to cover an equity of rectification. Of course the purchaser is bound by the rights of the tenant in occupation—that is quite clear. He is not entitled to assume—as was argued in the earlier cases, notably, I think, Taylor v. Stibbert[7]—that the tenant is in possession from year to year. He must look at the agreement and he is bound by the agreement, and if, as in Daniels v. Davison,[8] the tenant not only has a tenancy agreement but an option to purchase, he is also bound by that.

But, in my judgment, a purchaser is not only entitled but bound to assume, when he is looking at the agreement under which the tenant holds, that that agreement correctly states the relationship between the tenant and the landlord; and he is not bound to assume or to ask or make inquiry whether the tenant has any rights to rectify that contract.

Barnhart v. Greenshields [9] was followed in the Court of Appeal by the well-known case of Hunt v. Luck,[10] where the principle was again stated, but as Cozens-Hardy L.J. pointed out in argument, and Vaughan Williams L.J. pointed out at the beginning of his judgment, the real question for determination was the true construction of the Conveyancing Act, 1882; Farwell J. who heard the case at first instance [11] having dealt with the matter without reference to the statutory enactment. I have no doubt that that was because he treated the Act as merely declaratory of the existing law; but it is after all a matter of construction of the Act, although I have already expressed an opinion as though the matter rested solely upon decided cases.

The relevant section which re-enacts exactly, so far as relevant, the provisions of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, is to be found in section 199 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and it reads thus: "A purchaser shall not be prejudicially affected by "notice of (i) any instrument or matter capable of registration "under the provisions of the Land Charges Act, 1925, or any "enactment which it replaces, which is void or not enforceable "as against him under that Act or enactment, by reason of the "non-registration thereof; (ii) any other instrument or matter or "any fact or thing unless—(a) it is within his own knowledge, or "would have come to his knowledge if such inquiries and inspec-"tions had been made as ought reasonably to have been made "by him."

The question which I have to answer is this: What inspection and inquiries ought reasonably to have been made by the defendant of the tenant before the sale, so far as relevant to this question? I think the only relevant inquiry that he would have made would have been this: "May I see your tenancy agree-"ment? I want to see whether it corresponds with the copy "agreement I have seen in the auction rooms." That is the document which governed the rights of the parties.

He ought to have asked whether he had seen a correct copy, but he was under no obligation, in my view, to proceed further and say: "Does that correctly represent your rights?" In fact, if he had asked that question, the answer honestly but erroneously given would have been "Yes." Still less was he bound to take the tenant step by step through the document and ask how the tenant interpreted its provisions. He could not be so bound, and it would be most unwise for any intending purchaser to do so.

In my judgment the defendant is entitled and bound to rely on the terms of the document, and the document speaks for itself.

[11] [1901] 1 Ch. 45.

Accordingly, had I come to a contrary conclusion upon the claim for rectification, I should have found that this action was barred by the plea of bona fide purchaser of value without notice. In the circumstances, I must dismiss the action.

Emergency Legislation—Statutory force—Inconsistent enactment. Trustee Savings Bank.

A wage dispute between a trustee savings bank certified under the Trustee Savings Banks Act, 1863, and members of the National Union of Bank Employees employed by the bank was referred by the Minister of Labour to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal under article 8 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951. On an application by the bank for an order prohibiting the tribunal from entering upon the reference on the ground that the dispute was not a dispute "in a trade or industry . . . or in an undertaking" within the meaning of article 1 and that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain the reference:—

Held, that even if the business carried on by the trustee savings bank was on a different footing from the business carried on by an ordinary bank, which was a "trade," there could be no doubt that the bank carried on an "undertaking" within the meaning of article 1.

Held further (per Lord Goddard C.J. and Cassels J.), that if the tribunal were to make a wage award such award would not be inconsistent with the statutory provisions for the safeguarding of the depositors' interests controlling and regulating the expenditure of the bank, since to pay such an increased wage in order to obtain employees would be a necessary expense; and that, accordingly, the tribunal had jurisdiction to enter upon the reference.

Per Lord Goddard C.J. The business carried on by the savings bank was not only an "undertaking" but was just as much a "trade" as that carried on by an ordinary commercial bank.

On March 3, 1954, the Minister of Labour and National Service made a reference, under article 8[1] of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal for settlement of a wage dispute between the East Anglian Trustee Savings Bank and members of the National Union of Bank Employees in the employment of the bank.

The East Anglian Trustee Savings Bank was a trustee savings bank, with a head office at Norwich, certified under the Trustee Savings Banks Act, 1863. Such banks are regulated by the Trustee Savings Banks Act, 1863 to 1929,[2] and are non-profit making. They differ from commercial banks in that, inter alia, current accounts are not kept but deposits, which may be of very small amounts, are recorded, and the depositors credited with the sums paid in and with monthly compound interest at the statutory rate of 2½ per cent. In order to make withdrawals depositors must

The trustees act gratuitously, being paid only their expenses, and by section 15 of the Act of 1863 are required to transfer funds to the National Debt Commissioners for investment in the commissioners' names in the Bank of England funds. Weekly accounts are kept, subject to investigation by a committee. By section 4 the rules must be certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies.

Rule 3 of the East Anglian Trustee Savings Bank provided, in compliance with section 6 (1) of the Act of 1863, that "No person being trustee, custodian, trustee, or manager of "the bank, or having any control in its management, shall derive "any benefit from any deposit . . . save only and except such "salaries and allowances or other necessary expenses as shall, "according to the rules, be provided for the charges of managing "the bank and for remuneration to officers employed in its "management. . ." By rule 8: "The finance committee . . . "shall have power . . . to appoint the paid officers. . . ." By rule 12: ". . . Every paid officer . . . shall hold office . . . on such "terms as regards salary, duties, holidays and other conditions "as [the committee] may from time to time specify with power "to vary the same. . . ."

The bank applied to the court for an order prohibiting the tribunal and the members of the National Union of Bank Employees in their employ from further proceeding in the settlement of the dispute on the grounds that the tribunal had no jurisdiction in respect of the reference or dispute because the jurisdiction conferred on it by regulation 58AA of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, and the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, extended only to disputes in a trade or industry as defined in the regulation and order, and not in a business of the kind carried on by the bank.

Lord Goddard C.J.

that there was some doubt whether the East Anglian Trustee Savings Bank, which is a bank formed under the Trustee Savings Banks Acts, 1863 to 1929, was a trade, industry or undertaking within the meaning of article 1 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951. I have not the least doubt that it is an undertaking. "Undertaking" is a word having the widest connotation and it seems to me to have been used deliberately in the Order. I have also no doubt that, ordinarily speaking, banking is a trade. I think that the ordinary banker carries on a trade and always has carried on a trade since banking was set up by the Lombards and the Goldsmiths in the City of London. The old bankers never referred to their clients; that was left to hairdressers and dressmakers. A banker in the proper way refers to his customer because he is carrying on the trade of a banker. When leave to apply was given in this case I did not think that there was much doubt so far as that was concerned, but I thought that it was worth hearing argument because it might be said that trustee savings banks such as the East Anglian Trustee Savings Bank, which are in the nature of savings banks and are more akin to the Post Office Savings Bank than to an ordinary bank, might be on a different footing. But even if it was on a different footing as to trade, the bank would, in my opinion, nevertheless be an undertaking. The trustees undertake the business of receiving moneys on deposit, and I cannot see how it can be said that that is not an "undertaking." Any doubt on that point so far as this court is concerned is put at rest by the decision in In re Bottomgate Industrial Co-operative Society.[1] The Industrial and Provident Societies Act prohibits societies or companies, or whatever is the right term, registered under those Acts from carrying on the business of banking; and in that case an industrial society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1862, was said to be carrying on the business of banking. The society received money on deposit and paid it out in very much the same way as a trustee savings bank receives money on deposit, and pays it out to their customers in accordance with their rules. A. L. Smith J. said that that was carrying on banking. Although the trustee savings bank does more than the Post Office savings bank, it does not carry on the business of banking in the same way as one of the Big Five banks in the sense of issuing cheque books to its customers and performing various services for them, but it nevertheless carries on the business of banking. A. L. Smith J. said[2]: "the business embarked on by the society "when it took loans on deposit was in reality a banking business "prohibited by the statute. It is not necessary, in our judgment, "in order to constitute a banking business prohibited by the "statute, that the society should carry on every part of a business "carried on by some bankers; it is sufficient to bring the business "within the prohibition, if the society carried on what is the

[1] (1891) 65 L.T.(N.S.) 712. [2] Ibid. 714.

" principal part of the business of a banker, viz., receiving money " on deposit, allowing the same to be drawn against as and when " the depositor desires, and paying interest on the amounts stand- " ing on deposit."

In my opinion, although perhaps it is not really necessary to say so as I am quite satisfied that this was an undertaking, the business conducted by the applicants was none the less a trade. It follows that, as there is admittedly a dispute in the sense that the bank clerks, or their trade union on their behalf, are claiming that they should have an increase in wages, there is no doubt that there is a dispute in a trade or industry or undertaking, and therefore, prima facie, the Minister could refer the matter to the tribunal.

At a somewhat late stage in this case another point emerged. It was said that, even so, these particular banks were governed by statute, and it could never have been intended, as the structure of the statutes which govern these banks shows, that a body like the Industrial Disputes Tribunal should be able to dictate or lay down standards of wages. I think the foundation of that argument is that section 2 of the Act of 1863 provides that an institution, to be entitled to the privileges and benefits of the Act, must be one in which the only income of the bank, and the only fund out of which its expenses must be found is the interest which can be obtained from the money which is deposited.

[His Lordship read section 2, and continued:] In other words, it must not be a profit-making business and the bank, instead of being able to make a profit out of the business, can only make the necessary expenses attending the management of such institution. One cannot run a bank without paying clerks, and obviously one necessary expense must be to pay the bank clerks.

[His Lordship read section 6 of the Act of 1863, and continued:] In other words, the management is to be voluntary, by philanthropic gentlemen or, I suppose ladies, who would give their time to managing the affairs of these banks, which were meant to promote thrift amongst the humbler members of the community; and section 6 shows that rules have to be made to carry out the intention of the Act, and to provide that they are to receive nothing. But clerks, of course, have to be paid, and accordingly we find in rule 12, which seems to me to have been made in order to comply with the Act, that every paid officer shall give his whole time to the service of the bank, and " shall " hold office during the pleasure of the committee on such terms " as regards salary, duties, holidays, and other conditions as they " may from time to time, specify with power to vary the same." The committee, just like any other employer, state the terms on which they are prepared to remunerate the bank clerks, and it is because the bank clerks are not satisfied with the remuneration which this bank is paying that they have applied for a reference to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal; and I confess that for myself I cannot see any answer to it.

Lord Goddard
C.J.

It is suggested here that because the necessary expenses of the bank, which must be paid out of the growing produce of the deposits, can be controlled by the Commissioners for the National Debt, the Commissioners for the National Debt would have power to say that an increased wage which the Industrial Disputes Tribunal might order would not be a necessary expense and that, therefore, in effect, a conflict of some sort between the Industrial Disputes Tribunal and the Commissioners for the National Debt might be set up. It is perfectly true that the Commissioners for the National Debt can call for a full return of the bank's expenses, and if they come to the conclusion that an expense is not necessary, they can disallow it. But obviously, wages must be a necessary expense; there is no doubt about that, and it seems to me that if the Industrial Disputes Tribunal, who, we must assume, act properly, order an increase, it would be impossible for the Commissioners for the National Debt to say that the increased wages were not a necessary expense, because the bank could only get employees by paying those increased wages. This court does not assume that a tribunal will act improperly or do something absurd, but were the tribunal to order that every bank clerk in the Norwich office of the bank was to receive £5,000 a year, that would be an unnecessary expense, but the answer would be that that was not giving them a genuine wage, it would be giving them a bribe, and any such decision as that could be controlled by this court. In this case one is concerned with a mere matter of referring to the tribunal what is the proper salary to pay to bank clerks having regard to the increased cost of living, or perhaps it is more true to say the decreased value of money, and of course the proper wage must be a necessary expense.

For these reasons, I can see no reason whatever for saying that the Industrial Disputes Tribunal have not power to hear this reference. I think that the only real point is whether or not the applicants are carrying on a trade, industry or undertaking and, for the reasons I have given, I have no doubt about that. If I thought that the provisions in the Trustee Savings Banks Acts which deal with the powers of the Commissioners for the National Debt put any real obstacle in the way of the matter being referred to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal, it might have been necessary to consider carefully whether section 1 (4) of the Emergency Powers Act, 1939, is still in force. I do not myself think that there is any doubt that it is still in force. One would naturally feel very loath to have to put in force or to rely, nine years after the end of the war, on a subsection of an Act passed in 1939 when war was imminent, which would apparently still allow a Government Department to obtain an Order in Council legislating in a manner which is inconsistent with an Act of Parliament. It is said that there is still power under that subsection to issue Orders in Council and regulations thereunder which may be inconsistent with Acts of Parliament. If that is so,

I should hope that very few are issued, in fact I should doubt whether any are issued. At any rate, I do not think that it is necessary to call that section in aid, and, for the reasons I have mentioned, in my opinion this application should be refused.

CASSELS J. I agree. The applicants are an undertaking within the meaning of the Industrial Disputes Order of 1951. There is a trade dispute. A mode of settlement is by arbitration before the Industrial Disputes Tribunal. The applicants invite this court to prohibit that tribunal from further proceedings, and I am satisfied that they are not entitled to the relief which they seek.

SLADE J. I agree that no order of prohibition should issue in this case, but I prefer to base my judgment on other grounds.

In the first place, I am satisfied that the activities of the East Anglian Trustee Savings Bank do constitute the carrying on of an "undertaking" within the meaning of article 1 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951. Ordinarily that would be an end of the matter because the Minister of Labour and National Service is not only permitted but is required under article 8 in the appropriate circumstances to refer any dispute to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal. But sometimes general legislation is not permitted in law to delegate from special legislation, and the East Anglian Trustee Savings Bank is a bank which is certified under and controlled by the Trustee Savings Banks Acts, 1863 to 1929. In the circumstances, however, for a reason I shall give, it becomes unnecessary to consider whether there was anything in that special legislation which is inconsistent with the powers conferred upon the Minister by the general legislation from which the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, derives its force.

That order has effect by virtue of the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act of 1945, which is still in force. Section 5 (2) provides that: "If the principal Acts expire while "this Act is in force"—the principal Acts are defined by section 10 (2) to mean the Emergency Powers Defence Acts, 1939 to 1945, and the Emergency Powers Defence Act, 1939, did expire whilst the Act of 1945 was in force, and therefore, these words become operative—"(a) the provisions of those Acts"—that means, inter alia, the Act of 1939—"except the provisions "specified in the Second Schedule to this Act, shall, notwithstand-"ing their expiry for all other purposes, continue to apply (so far "as applicable) while this Act is in force to any Defence Regula-"tion having effect by virtue of this Act, any Order or other "instrument made under any such regulation and any scheme "of control contained in or authorized by any such regulation."

The Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, is made under the Act of 1945, and therefore the Act of 1939, notwithstanding its expiry for all other purposes, continues to apply to it. Section 1 (4) of the Act of 1939 provides that: "A Defence Regulation, and "any order, rule or byelaws duly made in pursuance of such a

Slade J.

"regulation"—and the Industrial Disputes Order is made in pursuance of Defence Regulation 58AA which derives its force from the Act of 1945—"shall have effect notwithstanding anything "inconsistent therewith contained in any enactment other than "this Act, or in any instrument having effect by virtue of any "enactment other than this Act." By section 1 (2) of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1940, that refers to any enactment passed before 1939 which, of course, includes the Trustee Savings Banks Acts, 1863 to 1929. In the result, therefore, it seems to me that I am precluded from considering whether there is anything in the special legislation of 1863 to 1929 which is inconsistent with the general legislation under which the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, derives its force. Had it been necessary for me to consider the special legislation, I should have wanted to be satisfied that it was consistent with the safeguards provided by the savings banks legislation for protecting the interests of the depositors for some outside body such as the Industrial Disputes Tribunal to have the power to substitute themselves for the body to which the task of deciding what constitutes necessary expenses to be incurred in the management of the activities of the savings banks has been entrusted under the Acts of 1863 to 1929. For the reasons I have given it becomes unnecessary to consider that point further, and in the result I agree that no order for prohibition should be made in this case.

Inn—Duty to guest—Loss of guests' goods—Luggage left in locked boot of car in hotel garage—Luggage stolen—Inn-keeper's liability.

The plaintiffs, who were guests at a hotel, left some luggage in the boot of their car, which they parked in the hotel's temporary garage. The garage was situated about 300 yards from the hotel and was open to the sky, being protected only by walls which were readily scalable. Notices were exhibited within the garage stating: ". . . Hotel guests garaging their cars here do so entirely at their "own risk and no responsibility is accepted for damage, theft, fire "or any other cause whatsoever." The luggage was stolen from the car by a thief who gained access to the yard by climbing over the wall during the night. The plaintiffs claimed the value of the goods lost from the owner of the hotel on the basis of the innkeeper's absolute liability for goods of travellers received within the hospitium of the inn:—

Held, that although the garage was not adjacent to the hotel, it formed part of the hospitium of the inn as far as the motor-car was concerned, because an innkeeper was obliged to provide accommodation for his guest's car. Whether the garage could be regarded as part of the hospitium of the inn in relation to the luggage was primarily a question of fact to be determined on the evidence as to the physical attributes of the premises, the availability of any more suitable place for its reception and the existence or absence of any invitation so to use it; on the facts, and in view of the notices which negatived any implied invitation to leave luggage there, the garage was not part of the hospitium of the inn as far as the plaintiffs' luggage was concerned and accordingly the hotel owner was not liable for its loss.

Held, further, that the hotel owner could escape liability for the loss on the ground that it was due to the plaintiffs' own carelessness and failure to take reasonable care of the luggage.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs, Harry Gresham and his wife, having reserved accommodation for themselves and their car at the Hotel de France, Dover, owned by the defendant, Graham Lyon, arrived at the hotel about 7.30 p.m. on August 22, 1951, with their car. The male plaintiff was handed a card with his room number which contained certain printed information (which he did not read) including the following: "Temporary garage accommodation . . . "has been secured in Northampton Street. This is not entirely "weatherproof, but is under lock and key. No responsibility can "be accepted for vehicles, and parking outside the hotel is strictly "forbidden by the police." The male plaintiff then drove his car to the garage, which was situated about 300 yards from the hotel itself and which consisted of an old one-storey warehouse, which had been badly damaged by enemy action and remained only partially repaired, and a yard surrounded by brick walls about 10 or 12 feet high, but open to the sky except for the partial shelter provided by the damaged roof of the warehouse. The entrance to the yard for cars was by way of two large sliding doors marked on the outside with the words "Garage. Hotel de "France," and secured at night by a stout padlock. There was also a small side door bolted on the inside.

On the instruction of the garage attendant, the male plaintiff locked all the doors of the car and the boot, in which he left two large suitcases and a small handgrip. There were exhibited within the garage yard in conspicuous positions five notices in the following terms: "Important Notice: This overflow garage is not "weatherproof and no responsibility is accepted for damage due "to inclement conditions. Hotel guests garaging their cars here

Gresham
v.
Lyon.

"do so entirely at their own risk and no responsibility is accepted "for damage, theft, fire or any other cause whatsoever." Later in the evening the sliding doors were padlocked and the small side door was left bolted on the inside. In the morning when the attendant returned, it was discovered that the two suitcases from the boot of the plaintiffs' car had disappeared with their contents. The padlock on the doors was intact, and the bolts on the side door had been drawn from the inside. The suitcases and their contents had been stolen by a thief who had gained access to the yard by climbing over the wall, and who left by the side door.

The plaintiffs claimed the agreed value of the goods lost, which was £250, from the defendant, on the basis of the innkeeper's absolute liability for goods of travellers received into the hospitium of the inn.

The defendant, while admitting that the Hotel de France was a "common inn" on the occasion in question, and that the plaintiffs were in law "travellers" and were received into the inn as guests, did not admit that either the motor-car or the luggage was received into the hospitium of the inn. He alleged that the overflow garage accommodation was only made available for guests to park their motor vehicles on the conditions of the notices there exhibited, and further or in the alternative contended that, if the overflow garage formed part of the hospitium of the inn at all, it was only part of the hospitium in relation to motor-cars and not in relation to luggage in the cars. Further, by way of substantive defence, he alleged that the loss of the goods was due to the negligence of the plaintiffs themselves in leaving their luggage in the car, when they well knew or ought to have known the physical condition of the garage, and in failing to pay any heed to the written notice that cars garaged there were so garaged at the owner's risk. No ground of limitation of liability under the Innkeepers' Liability Act, 1863, was alleged.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20. McNAIR J. read the following judgment: This case raised interesting questions as to the liability of innkeepers in relation to personal luggage left by guests in motor-cars left on or near the inn premises.

[His Lordship stated the facts and found that, although the male plaintiff had not seen the notices in the garage, all proper steps were taken to draw them to the attention of intending users of the garage, but that neither of the plaintiffs had been warned not to leave luggage in their car. His Lordship continued:] The first question which I have to decide is whether or not the garage in question formed part of the hospitium of the inn for any purpose. In my judgment it clearly did so far as the motor-car itself is concerned. It is clear on authority that today the keeper of a "common inn" is under obligation to provide accommodation, not only for the guest himself but for his motor-car, as he was in the olden days obliged to provide accommodation for the traveller's gig and horse and, if the innkeeper offers no other accommodation for his guests' motor-cars than such accommodation as was provided by the garage space here in question, there is no reason in law why such a garage space should not be treated as part of the hospitium notwithstanding that it is not contiguous with or adjacent to the inn premises proper. As far as the plaintiffs' motor-car is concerned, the garage space in question was the place where he, as a hotel guest, was invited to park his car, and for this facility a small charge was made. The judgments of Tucker and Asquith L.JJ. in Williams v. Linnitt [1] lead inevitably to the conclusion stated above.

It was argued, however, that, though the garage space might be regarded as part of the hospitium of the inn so far as the car itself was concerned, it could not be so regarded in relation to luggage left in the car. So far as I have been able to ascertain, this distinction has not been effectively drawn in any of the decided cases. There are, however, indications in certain of the recent decisions on this topic which seem to me to support this argument.

For example, in Williams v. Linnitt, Tucker L.J. said [2]: "The liability of the innkeeper, in my view, extends to the goods "of his guest which are placed by the guest in that part of the "premises in which such goods are usually taken in the inn." In Watson v. People's Refreshment House Association Ld., Devlin J.[3] used the following language: "An innkeeper, as I have "said, is absolutely liable in respect of goods, whether they be

"baggage or a conveyance, which he receives within the inn. In "the case of baggage there is very little difficulty about deter-"mining what receiving it within the inn means. It means, of "course, within the inn buildings." Though this expression of opinion was not strictly necessary for the decision in that case, it is an observation of weight. There was no evidence, or no evidence that satisfied me, that guests generally, or the male plaintiff in particular, were invited (as distinct from being permitted) to leave their luggage in their cars when using the garage space or that luggage was usually so left, though there was evidence, which I accept, that on occasions guests' heavy luggage was removed from cars and placed in a convenient place within the inn. The distinction between invitation and permission is properly drawn by Devlin J. in the case last cited.

In these circumstances, whether the garage space is properly to be regarded as part of the hospitium of the inn in relation to passenger luggage seems to me to be primarily a question of fact to be determined on the evidence as to the physical attributes of the premises in question, the availability of any other more suitable place for its reception and the existence or absence of any invitation so to use it. The evidence satisfied me that the garage space was open to the sky and protected only by walls which were readily scalable, that there was another convenient place for passengers' luggage within the inn itself, and that in the garage space itself there were exhibited conspicuous notices in the terms set out above. These notices seem to me to negative any implied invitation, though admittedly they have no contractual force if in fact the garage space was part of the hospitium of the inn in relation to the luggage, and there was no evidence of any express invitation.

Accordingly, in so far as it is a question of fact, I find, and so far as it is a question of law I hold, that the garage space was not part of the hospitium of the inn so far as concerns the plaintiffs' luggage, and, accordingly, the defendant was not under the absolute liability of an innkeeper in relation to these goods. To hold the contrary would, in my judgment, have the effect of extending the innkeepers' liability to a wholly unreasonable extent. Accordingly, the plaintiffs' claim fails.

There is, however, a second ground on which, in my judgment, the plaintiffs' claim fails. In Shacklock v. Ethorpe Ld.,[4] in the speech of Lord Macmillan the following language occurs[5]: "It "has always been the law, however, that the innkeeper can "escape liability if he can show that, as Erle, J., delivering the "judgment of the court in Cashill v. Wright[6] said, ' . . . the "' negligence of the guest occasions the loss in such a way as "' that the loss would not have happened if the guest had used "' the ordinary care that a prudent man may be reasonably "'expected to have taken under the circumstances.' The word "'negligence' is tending in modern legal usage to be restricted "to denoting the breach of a duty owed to some other person, "but it is not in this correlative sense that the word is used in "the present context. The innkeeper's defence is not based on "the breach of any duty owed to him by his guest, but simply "on the plea that the loss or theft of his guest's property was "due to the guest's own carelessness, his own failure to take "reasonable care of it."

In my judgment, the loss of the plaintiffs' luggage in the present case can properly be held to be due to the plaintiffs' own carelessness and failure to take reasonable care of their luggage. Being no doubt anxious to get away to a good start on the following morning, the plaintiffs took the chance of leaving the luggage in the boot of the car in a garage space which was open to the sky and completely unprotected against evilly disposed persons who might be minded to climb over the wall for the purpose of theft. They may have been misled by the fact that the owner of another car in the same garage space had left his luggage strapped on the back of his car. But they apparently relied on the security of the lock on the boot of the car, which common experience demonstrates to be no security at all against a determined thief. Accordingly, in my judgment the plaintiffs' claim fails on this ground also.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Practice—Dismissal of case at close of complainant's evidence—Desirability of hearing both sides.

Justices, having heard evidence in support of a wife's charge of persistent cruelty, dismissed her complaint without calling upon the husband. They gave as their reason when she appealed that having regard to the lack of substance in the evidence she had failed to make out her case. They did not rule that, taking the evidence at its face value, nothing had been shown which could in law amount to persistent cruelty:—

Held, that while in the circumstances the decision of the justices had been right, and while justices were fully entitled to take such a course, it was usually better in such cases to hear both sides before coming to a decision, so as to avoid a subsequent contention that they had ruled as a matter of law that there had been no case to answer.

Ramsden
v.
Ramsden.

Appeal by a wife from the dismissal by the Manchester County Justices sitting at Strangeways, Salford Hundred, on January 20, 1954, of her complaint of persistent cruelty.

The parties were married in August, 1953, when the wife was eighteen and the husband twenty. The wife left the husband on November 24, 1953. At the time of the marriage the wife was pregnant by the husband and her complaint before the justices was in the main based upon alleged excessive sexual demands, having regard, inter alia, to her pregnancy. She also gave evidence of alleged blows in the course of quarrels arising from disputes connected with demands for intercourse. There were further disputes over money, particularly money for clothes for the expected child, and there was one allegation of an attempted sodomitical practice. Her mother gave evidence in support of the complaint. The justices then stopped the case without calling on the other side.

The justices stated in their reasons that the wife's main complaint was about the alleged excessive sexual demands, and said that her evidence on that point did not satisfy them that the husband's conduct had been unreasonable; and they concluded: "With regard to the acts of physical cruelty, though these may "have taken place we do not consider they were of sufficient "persistence or of sufficient seriousness to cause any serious "consequences to the complainant's health, or to cause danger to "life or limb. . . We further are of opinion that having regard "to the short duration of the marriage, the youth of the parties ". . . and the lack of substance in the allegations, the complainant "has failed to make out her case."

W. F. N. Perry for the wife.
John Moylan for the husband.

Lord Merriman P. referred to the nature of the wife's complaint and the facts of the marriage and continued: After hearing the wife's evidence, and such evidence as her mother gave, the justices stopped the case without calling on the other side. It is important to ascertain exactly what that means, and it may quite plainly mean one of two things. It may involve a ruling made either by the justices, or possibly on a submission by the defendant, that taking the evidence at its face value nothing had been shown which could, in law, amount to persistent cruelty. It is not suggested that there was any submission on the part of the husband that there was no case to answer. If, therefore, there was such a ruling, it was made by the justices on their own initiative. Secondly, the decision may mean no more than this, that the justices heard the evidence put forward by the wife in support of allegations of persistent cruelty, and that they did not think there was any substance in it.

I think that it is clear from the statement of the reasons of the justices that it was the latter course which they took. They set out a very fair statement of their reasons, first of all realizing quite accurately that the wife's main complaint was about the excessive sexual demands of her husband. [His Lordship referred to the justices' reasons set out above, and continued:]

It is quite plain on the face of their statement of reasons that the justices are not purporting to rule as a matter of law that the matters of which complaint was made could not, if established, amount to persistent cruelty. They are saying, literally and impliedly, throughout the whole of their reasons: "We think that "this case lacks substance, and do not want to hear any more "of it." It is said that they should not do this, that it is their duty to hear the case out if there is anything which could afford prima facie evidence in support of it. I think that that proposition is too wide. Although I cannot put my hand on any authority, Mr. Moylan is able from his own experience to support my recollection, that this court on more than one occasion has laid down, in similar circumstances, that justices, like anybody else, whether it be a judge or a jury, are perfectly entitled to say: "We "have had enough of this case, and we do not think anything of "it," without being said to have misdirected themselves in law. But at the same time, I am confident that we have coupled with that the advice that it is usually better to wait to hear both sides in these matrimonial cases before coming to a decided conclusion. I still think that that advice is sound, because, very often, if justices reach their decision out of hand on the complainant's case, the result is that it is contended before us, as on this appeal, that they are said to have ruled as a matter of law that there was no case to answer. It is liable to give rise to more difficulties than it avoids.

I repeat, however, that the justices have a perfect right, if they think fit, to say that there is nothing whatever in the case, and that they do not want to hear any more of it; and it would be quite wrong for this court, in my opinion, to lay down any rule to the contrary of that proposition. I am satisfied beyond any doubt that that is what the justices have done in the present case, and I can see no reason whatever from the adequate note before us why they should not have come to that conclusion. In those circumstances it seems to me that this appeal must fail.

DAVIES J. I entirely agree, and do not desire to add anything.

Appeal dismissed.

Conflict of Laws—Chose in action or debt—Situs.

A Russian bank, incorporated in 1866 under the laws of the Russian Empire, carried on the business of banking in Moscow and elsewhere; it had no branch in England, but in December, 1917, it had a current account with the Midland Bank Ld. which was in credit. By December 14, 1917, the bank was dissolved under the laws affecting the nationalization of the private banks in Russia, in particular by a decree of that date and an edict known as Article 997.

On May 30, 1932, on the footing that the bank had been dissolved in Russia, an order was made by the English court under section 338 of the Companies Act, 1929, winding it up. Since then the liquidator in England had got in substantial assets.

Proof of a claim against these assets was lodged in respect of money credited to a claimant in Russia in 1917, the claim being based on two documents dated December 16, 1917, ordering the Midland Bank Ld. to pay him two sums of £10,000 and £2,000 respectively out of the assets held by that bank to the credit of the Russian bank. A third document dated December 17, 1917, was purported to support those claims.

It was accepted in evidence that by December 14, 1917, there was an effective system of control in Russia of all transactions relating to foreign exchange, and that these transactions would have been contrary to the applicable laws.

His proof was rejected by the liquidator, and the present applicant (as personal representative of the claimant who had since died) asked that the rejection should be set aside and the proof allowed in full:—

Held, that the proof should be rejected, since (i) the transaction which it was sought to uphold was illegal in its inception as it was contrary to the currency laws then in force in Russia; (ii) the Russian bank was dissolved before the date of the documents relied on to support the claim; but had they ever imposed any liability on the bank it was extinguished when the bank was dissolved which was before the winding up in England; (iii) as the bank resided only in Russia, on the authority of Deutsche Bank und Disconto Gesellschaft v. Banque des Marchands de Moscou, December 14, 1931, unreported, this debt (even if leave might have been given to sue the bank for it out of the jurisdiction) was situate in Russia at the date of the dissolution, and such a debt was not among the debts which could be proved under section 261 of the Companies Act, 1929, in a winding-up.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment: The Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky) (hereafter referred to as "the Russian bank") was incorporated in 1866, under the laws of the Russian Empire, to carry on the business of banking in Moscow and elsewhere. It never had a branch in England, but in December, 1917, it had a current account with the Midland Bank Ld. in London which was in credit. On May 30, 1932, Eve J., on the footing that the Russian bank had then been dissolved, made an order winding it up under section 338 of the Companies Act, 1929. Since then the liquidator had got in substantial assets.

On September 21, 1932, Alexei K. Ouchkoff, a Russian domiciled in France, lodged a proof in the liquidation in respect of the sums of £10,000 and £2,000, which was rejected by the liquidator. He had since died and his widow, the present applicant, also a Russian domiciled in France, as his personal representative, asked the court to set aside the rejection of the proof by the liquidator and to allow the proof in full.

The claim rested on three documents which came into existence in the circumstances stated by the applicant, Madame Ouchkoff, in her affidavit: "After my marriage to the claimant "we lived in Moscow, but prior to December 16, 1917, we had "decided to escape from Russia and eventually did in fact "succeed in doing so. Following our escape the claimant never "returned to Russia to the best of my knowledge and belief, and "he never had any intention of doing so. At all times from "the date when we both escaped it was his intention and mine "to acquire a domicile of choice in France. The claimant, with "my concurrence, intended to exchange his assets in Russia for "assets abroad. With this object in view, the claimant to my "knowledge obtained from the bank the two letter orders dated "December 16, 1917, and the letter dated December 17, 1917," these documents being exhibited to her affidavit. "It is within "my personal knowledge that the claimant delivered a large "quantity of gold to the bank at about the same time, and that "the claimant had a large account to his credit at the bank. It "was at all material times the intention of the claimant, and as I "verily believe of the bank, that the debts created and/or "evidenced by the said letter orders and letter should be paid in "England."

The first document was in English and headed "The Russian "Bank, Moscow, December 16, 1917," and then, in figures, "£10,000." Then there were these words: "The City of Midland "Bank [the Midland Bank was intended by that description],

"London: Pay to order of Mr. A. K. Ouchkoff the sum of ten "thousand pounds debiting our account with you, Moscow "Merchants Bank Ld." There were two signatures to this document.

The second document was also dated December 16, 1917, also addressed to "The City of Midland Bank Ld., London," and the figure in this case was £2,000. The document read: "Pay "to order of Mr. A. K. Ouchkoff the sum of two thousand pounds "debiting our account with you. Yours truly, Moscow Mer-"chants Bank," and there were the two signatures. At the bottom of each document was the name of Mr. Ouchkoff as addressee.

These documents were not on any recognized cheque form. The third document which was in Russian was translated as follows: "The board of the Moscow Merchants Bank hereby "certifies that out of the foreign funds belonging to the bank "which are deposited abroad £2,000 belongs to Alexei Konstan-"tinovitch Ouchkoff. Instructions to pay this amount to him or "to his order will be made by the bank immediately on resump-"tion of normal communications between the bank and its foreign "correspondents. For the chairman," and there followed a signature and then the word "Directors," followed by two signatures and dated "December 17, 1917, Moscow."

Roxburgh J. having stated the facts continued: The third document, that is to say, the one translated from the Russian, is not set up by the applicant now as evidence of a third debt but as a voucher to support her claims under the first and second documents. But as it refers to "foreign funds," and not to funds in England, still less to funds at the Midland Bank, it seems to me that it can have no effect as a charge on or appropriation of any of the Russian Bank's English assets and, therefore, as far as I can see, adds nothing to the first two documents, and I propose to say no more about that document.

My first conclusion is that the whole transaction was illegal in its inception as being a transaction carried out in Russia in breach of the Russian currency laws then in force. I should say that both of these laws were made during the regime of the Provisional Government; a fact which is not without importance in connexion with this matter. The first is article 734 and is called: "On the Prohibition of Money transfers abroad. An act "of the Provisional Government." The second is: "Ordinances "announced to the Ruling Senate by the Minister of Finance "concerning the approval of a statute for the settlement depart-"ment attached to the special office for credit matters." The first was signed on June 5, 1917, and the second seems to have been approved on July 23, 1917, but the precise date is not material.

I have listened attentively to the evidence of Dr. Dobrin and Dr. Fischmann on this point, and having done so I accept on this point the evidence of Dr. Dobrin and I reject that of Dr. Fischmann. Professor Bernatzky, who was formerly professor of political economy in the University of Petrograd and in the Petrograd Polytechnicum, and was minister of finance (and this is to my mind the important point) in the Russian Provisional Government—that is to say, the government which promulgated these two edicts having the force of law—has written a book on Russian public finance during the war. I do not think that he had any legal qualifications—at any rate, none are mentioned on the title page of this book—but this after all is perhaps just as much within the purview of a minister of finance as of any lawyer. In this book he says this: "An effective system of "control by the government of all transactions in foreign "exchange was thus introduced in Russia only on the eve of the "outbreak of civil war and of the complete collapse of her "political organisation."

The civil war had broken out before these documents had been executed, and if those two edicts were to be given the limited operation which Dr. Fischmann for no sufficient reason claimed for them, and if therefore the transaction which is the subject-matter of this claim, was not, as Dr. Fischmann contends, prohibited by them, then the system of control could not possibly have been described by anybody who knew anything about it as "effective," and I think that I am entitled to assume that the minister of finance in the Provisional Government which enacted those two edicts did know a good deal about it, probably a great deal more than any court in England ever will. I accept, therefore, on this matter, as I have already said, the evidence of Dr. Dobrin and not that of Dr. Fischmann.

However, assuming that I am wrong on this point, there seems to be an insuperable difficulty for the claimant at the other end of the transaction. By the operation of certain law-making edicts in Russia, and in particular a decree of the nationalization of banking passed on December 14, 1917, and article 997, which is described as "Instructions approved by the "People's Commissary of Finance on December 10, 1918, on "the method of nationalization of private banks," both of which are printed in a note to the case of Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Mulhouse,[1] the nationalization of the Russian bank took effect as from December 14, 1917. I may say in passing that both Russian legal experts agreed that article 997, to which I have just referred, had the force of law in Russia. Dr. Fischmann did indeed attempt some recantation from, and qualification of, his earlier clear admissions, but having observed the circumstances and manner in which the partial recantation was made I cannot attach any weight to it. I hold on the evidence that article 997 had the force of law. There must, therefore, be doubt whether these documents, all dated after December 14, 1917, can ever have imposed any liability on the Russian bank, but, assuming that they did, that liability was under Russian law extinguished when the Russian bank was finally dissolved in Russia, if it had not been extinguished before. This was long before the commencement of the winding-up in England.

What, then, is the position regarding these claims here? I will assume, without deciding, that at the date of these documents the bank was under some antecedent liability to Ouchkoff and that, but for the dissolution of the bank, he could have sued the bank on the cheques on the footing that they had been presented, or that presentation had been excused and that they had been dishonoured or for so much of the antecedent debt as was evidenced thereby. These are large assumptions, but even so the position now, in my judgment, admits of little doubt. In Russian and English Bank v. Baring Brothers & Co., Ld.[2] Lord Atkin pointed out[3]: " . . . it is a necessary implication, that " the dissolved foreign company is to be wound up as though " it had not been dissolved, and therefore continued in exist- " ence." At first sight, this would seem to suggest that all debts without distinction of race would be provable, because section 261 of the Companies Act, 1929, which does not differ materially from section 316 of the Act of 1948, provides: " In every " winding up (subject in the case of insolvent companies to the " application in accordance with the provisions of this Act of the " law of bankruptcy) all debts payable on a contingency, and all " claims against the company, present or future, certain or " contingent, ascertained or sounding only in damages, shall be " admissible to proof against the company. . . ." and that section appears to be applicable to the winding up of a dissolved foreign company. But Lord Atkin was careful to avoid committing himself to this line of reasoning, because he said[4]: " But if the corporation does trade here, acquires assets here " and incurs debts here, we shall not accept its dissolution abroad " without a stipulation that if desirable it may be wound up here " so that its assets here shall be distributed amongst its creditors " (I do not stay to consider whether its English creditors or " creditors generally) and for the purpose of the winding-up it " shall be deemed not to have been dissolved," and Mr. Jennings, who steered his vessel with a high degree of seamanship, did not quite dare to explore that channel.

Maugham J. in In re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade,[5] had already devised a means of escape from an application of section 261 of the Act of 1929 which would certainly be surprising because, after all, what is being administered here is not all the assets of the Russian Bank, but assets on which the liquidator can lay his hands, and which, broadly speaking, are English assets. It would, therefore, be surprising if debts which could, broadly speaking, be described as English debts, should find themselves in competition with Russian debts against assets which were broadly English assets and of necessity excluded the Russian assets. Maugham J., in carefully chosen words, considered this problem[6]: "There is, however, a real question in "dispute, and that is whether the debt to the petitioner"—this was a petition for winding up a dissolved foreign company—"was or was not locally situate in Russia at the date of the "decrees of 1917 and 1918 above referred to. If it was locally "situate in Russia, it seems to me that as the effect of the "legislation the debt is no longer due by the bank as a corpora-"tion, and that the only claim of the petitioner is against the "Soviet State. By the decree of December 1917, the assets and "liabilities of the bank within Soviet territory were taken over "by the People's Bank, and this in my opinion involves the "destruction of the original debt and a kind of statutory novation "(in some sense, perhaps, only a theoretical one) whereby the "State Bank became liable to discharge it. This legislation "must be taken to be effective as regards property situate in the "territory of the Soviet Republic (see Princess Paley Olga v. "Weisz[7]), in which it was held that the English courts will not "inquire into the legality of acts done by a recognized foreign "government against or in relation to its own subjects in respect "of property situate in its own territory. It seems to me to be "clear that the same principle must apply, whether the property "consists of chattels or of a debt regarded in this country as "having a local situation. If, then, it were to be established "that the debt of the petitioner was represented by a credit to "him in the Archangel branch of the bank [that was alleged in "this case], I should be of opinion that that debt had ceased to "exist. The petitioner, however, has sworn that if the Arch-"angel branch was credited with the proceeds of the goods sold "by the London branch on his instructions it was done without "his authority. The effect of the correspondence in relation to "the matter is not conclusive, and the evidence does not enable "me to express a final opinion on the claim of the petitioner to "be a creditor for a debt recoverable in London. If the debt was "primarily recoverable in London, I am of opinion that it was "not affected by the Soviet legislation, even though it was due "to a person who was a Russian subject at the date of the "nationalization decrees. Its locality must be taken to be the "place where the debt was in the ordinary course recoverable." Maugham J. then cited certain authorities, and continued: "The "decrees in question could not according to our laws have the "effect of extinguishing the debt, if locally situate here, or of "transferring it to the Soviet Republic."

This reasoning does provide an escape from section 261. If a debt was locally situate in Russia at the material date, then the nationalization decree which took effect on the dissolution of the Russian Bank or earlier removed it altogether from the category of debts and liabilities provable, because it was not a debt at all at the time when the proof was sought to be admitted; but if the debt was not locally situate in Russia then the decrees have no extra territorial operation and, accordingly, whatever may have happened in Russia, the debt remains provable in an English liquidation.

This reasoning was in its inception embodied in what must, I think, be described as a dictum, but it has since been treated as a proper foundation for a judgment by Vaisey J. in In re Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky),[8] a case relating to this same bank, where Vaisey J., after reading most of the passage which I have cited, said[9]: "I agree that those statements are "obiter, but they seem to me to be founded on accurate principles, "and to control and govern the present case." Mr. Jennings invited me to desert Maugham J. and Vaisey J., and to strike out a new path for myself. It might well have been difficult for me to do so had I felt that I should like so to do, but Mr. Jennings' alternative proposition makes no appeal to me. What he asked me to do was to propound as law that if a creditor can show that it was the agreement and intention of the parties that he was to be paid out of the assets in England he should be paid out of the English assets but not otherwise. But, in my judgment, no escape from the universality of section 261 of the Companies Act, 1929, or from section 316, the corresponding section of the Companies Act, 1948, lies by this route, and, therefore, Mr. Jennings' proposition, for which no authority is available, does not commend itself to me on grounds of logic.

Mr. Jennings felt unable, or almost unable, to contend that the debt in this case was not situate in Russia in view of two passages in an unreported judgment of the Court of Appeal in Deutsche Bank und Disconto Gesellschaft v. Banque des Marchands de Moscou,[10] this same bank. Judgment was delivered on December 14, 1931, and it became necessary for the purposes of that appeal to discuss the situation of a debt. In the course of his judgment Greer L.J. said: "At the date when the "Treaty of Peace Order in Council came into operation, namely, "January 10, 1920"—and that was the material date in that appeal—" the defendants had no place of business in, and were " therefore not resident in, the United Kingdom, and I think it is " established by the decision of this court in New York Life " Insurance Company v. Public Trustee,[11] . . . that the debt " had not situs in this country."

It had occurred to me during the argument that perhaps it might be enough if the applicant could show that the case was one in which leave to serve the Russian Bank out of the jurisdiction might have been granted—it will be observed that no action could have been brought in England without such leave, because the bank had no branch in England and could not have been served here—but Romer L.J. who dealt with the situs of debts in greater detail, considered and rejected that argument. I agree with what he said, which was as follows: " As has often " been pointed out, a chose in action has not in strictness any " locality. But where, as in the present case, a simple contract " debt has to be treated as having some locality, it is deemed by " English law to be situated in the place where the debtor resides. " The reason for assigning this locality to a simple contract debt " was that the place where the debtor resides was in nearly every " case the place where it was recoverable. Even in earlier times, " it might, of course, occasionally have happened that judgment " could be obtained against a debtor in a country where he did not " reside. But it was probably thought desirable for the sake of " uniformity to adopt in all cases the test of residence rather " than the test of recoverability. However, whatever the reason " may have been, the rule was laid down, as I have stated it in " Attorney-General v. Bouwens,[12] . . . and was recognized by " this court as still being the rule in the case of New York Life " Insurance Company v. Public Trustee,[13] . . . The difficulty " in that case was that a corporation, unlike an individual, can " be residing in two places at one and the same time, a possibility " not within the contemplation of the authors of the rule, and it " became necessary to consider which of the two residences of the " insurance company, London or New York, was to be taken as " determining the locality of the debt due from it. As the debt " in question was, in terms of the contract creating it, payable " in this country, and in addition was recoverable here, its " locality was held to be English.

" In the present case the debt is payable in this country, but " the defendant bank was not residing here on January 10, 1920. " It was in May of the same year, but that will not help the " plaintiffs. The debt was also recoverable here on January 10, " 1920, had the plaintiffs been successful in obtaining leave to " serve the defendant bank out of the jurisdiction. But I know " of no authority for the proposition that a simple contract debt " is situate in this country at a time when the debtor is not

"resident here merely because he can be sued by putting into "operation the provisions of Order XI. It would be strange if it "were so. For it is always in the discretion of the court in "cases coming within the rule to give or refuse leave for service "out of the jurisdiction, a discretion depending upon the balance "of convenience. A debt due from a debtor resident out of the "jurisdiction cannot therefore be deemed to be in this country "until an application has been made for service of the writ out of "the jurisdiction and that application has been acceded to. If "leave be obtained, the question would then arise whether the "order granting leave brings the debt into this country for the "first time, or establishes its presence here as from some earlier "date. In the present case the plaintiffs obtained leave from "McCardie J. to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction in 1930. "Was the effect of that order to establish the English locality "of the debt as existing in January, 1920, or only in 1930?—but "I need not attempt to answer this question, for in my judgment "the fact that a simple contract debt can be recovered here from "a debtor out of the jurisdiction does not establish an English "locality for the debt, any more than it puts an end to the "debtor's absence beyond the seas for the purpose of the Statute "of Limitations."

This Russian bank, in my judgment, resided only in Russia; the situs of the alleged debts was in Russia; having formed a clear view on this point, it is unnecessary to consider the innumerable other points which otherwise would arise. The proof is rejected altogether.

Order accordingly.

* In re G.'S APPLICATION FOR A COMMITTAL ORDER.

Contempt of Court—Committal order—Application by litigant in person—Such applicant not to be heard—R.S.C., Ord. 44, r. 2, note.

An application for committal on the ground of an alleged contempt of court cannot be made by a litigant in person.

Motion.

An applicant in person moved the court to commit the respondent for alleged contempt, but was stopped on the raising by the court of the preliminary question whether the applicant could so move.

S. Seuffert for the respondent. There appears to be no authority on the question whether a litigant in person can move to commit. There are, however, two authorities clearly establishing that he cannot move for a writ of attachment. The first is Ex parte Fenn,[1] in which Lord Denman C.J. held that only a member of the Bar could so move, the second Ex parte Liebrand,[2] apparently a decision of a Divisional Court, in which Lawrence J. followed the earlier case, Atkin J. concurring. The later case is given as authority for the statement at p. 807 of the Annual Practice, 1954, as a note to Order 44, r. 2, that "a motion for "attachment must be at the bar, it cannot be made by a com-"plainant in person." A motion to commit is in pari materia with a motion to attach and, accordingly, must likewise be at the bar. The applicant on the present proceedings cannot, therefore, be heard.

Vaisey J. It is a well-settled rule of this court that a party in person cannot move for a writ of attachment, which is precisely the same, in its nature, as moving for a committal order. The reason is that a motion to commit is, as Lord Denman C.J. in Ex parte Fenn[3] said of an application for an attachment, "in "the nature of a criminal information" and, as Lord Denman went on to say, "the court always requires that such a motion "should be made by a gentleman at the bar, in order that it may "have the sanction of that gentleman's name for the application. "To you, therefore, who apply in person, the court cannot grant "a rule for an attachment." In Ex parte Liebrand[4] the applicant appeared in person and moved for a rule nisi for a writ of attachment for contempt of court; and Lawrence J. said that "the court "would not hear an application of this sort by an applicant in "person."

The only difference between those two cases and this case is that the application here is for committal for contempt, but it is a difference without significance. In either case the application is not only, as Lord Denman C.J., in Ex parte Fenn,[5] said "in the "nature of a criminal information," but it is a report to the court of information on which the court is asked to uphold its own honour and protect its own dignity, and that is a matter on which the court may not be addressed by anyone except counsel at the bar. Accordingly, the applicant in the present case cannot be heard, and his motion must be dismissed.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Costs—Trade Dispute—Industrial Disputes Tribunal—Crown Practice—Practice—Prohibition—Application for order—Parties to be served—Minister and union separately represented—Whether both entitled to costs.

Trade Dispute.

On the refusal of an application for an order of prohibition to prohibit the Industrial Disputes Tribunal from entertaining a reference by the National Union of Bank Employees of a dispute between the applicants, the American Express Co. Inc., and their employees, counsel for the Minister of Labour and National Service and counsel for the union both asked for their costs.

David Renton Q.C. for the applicants.
Walter Gumbel for the Minister.
Peter Pain for the union.

LORD GODDARD C.J. said that both parties might have their costs, and continued: The court does not like having to give two sets of costs in these cases. It seems to me that if the Minister is satisfied that the trade union is going to be represented and argue the case, then the Minister ought not to be represented, or if the trade union is satisfied that the Minister is going to argue the case, as he generally has done, then the trade union need not be represented. The opinion of the court is that, in future, in matters of this sort, we shall not grant more than one set of costs. Next time that there is one of these applications we may consider who is to be served. The Minister may in some cases wish to be represented, even if he appears as amicus curiae, but I do not think that we ought to make employers, as a rule, pay two sets of costs. In the present case, as we have not given special directions and both the Minister and the union were properly served because it was sought to prevent them from continuing, they will have their costs, but we do not think that we ought to order it in the future. It is not necessary for parties to appear merely because they are served. I have no doubt that both the Minister and the union ought to be served, but as a general rule they might be able to settle who is going to argue the matter, and if the union are going to have the assistance of counsel, and the Minister is content to rely on counsel for the union, then no doubt the matter will be perfectly properly put before the court. It is very seldom that we have found it necessary to hear both counsel for the Minister and the union. I want it noted that in the future the court will consider very carefully whether or not they will give two sets of costs.

Criminal Law — Murder — Provocation — Woman jeering at accused's impotence—Whether disability to be taken into account.

In considering whether there has been sufficient provocation to reduce a killing from murder to manslaughter, the test to be applied throughout is the effect on a reasonable and normal man of the acts of provocation alleged; infirmity of body or affliction of mind in the accused is not a material factor to be considered. Accordingly, the disability of a man conscious of being physically impotent and therefore liable to be more readily excited if twitted on the subject is not a relevant consideration in assessing the provocation alleged to have been suffered by him in having been jeered at by a woman whom he has thereupon killed.

APPEAL from the Court of Criminal Appeal (Hilbery, Cassels and Havers JJ.).

This was an appeal by Henry Alec Bedder from the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal on June 21, 1954, affirming his conviction at the Leicester Assizes on May 27, 1954, of the murder of Mrs. Doreen Mary Redding on March 12, 1954.

The facts are fully stated by Lord Simonds L.C.

Sir Lionel Heald Att.-Gen., Richard Elwes Q.C. and J. P. Stimson for the Crown.

LORD SIMONDS L.C. Their Lordships agree with me in entertaining no doubt that this appeal should be dismissed. As, however, some questions of general principle have been raised on which the House may deem it proper to pronounce, I propose to move from the Woolsack the dismissal of the appeal while the House takes time to formulate such opinions on these general questions as it seems right to express.

The House dismissed the appeal.

July 30. Their Lordships delivered their reasons.

Lord Simonds L.C. My Lords, this appeal raises once more a question of importance in the criminal law. Your Lordships, I think, agree with me that, upon examination, the question appears to be amply covered by the highest authority, but the answer can usefully be re-stated.

The appellant, a youth of 18 years, was on May 27, 1954, convicted at Leicester Assizes of the murder of Doreen Mary Redding, a prostitute. He appealed to the Court of Criminal Appeal on the substantial ground of misdirection, claiming that the learned judge who tried the case had wrongly directed the jury upon the test of provocation and that, had they been rightly directed, they might have found him guilty not of murder but of manslaughter only. The Court of Criminal Appeal dismissed his appeal, holding that the jury had been rightly directed.

The relevant facts so far as they bear on the question of provocation can be shortly stated. The appellant has the misfortune to be sexually impotent, a fact which he naturally well knew and, according to his own evidence, had allowed to prey upon his mind. On the night of the crime he saw the prostitute with another man and when they had parted went and spoke to her and was led by her to a quiet court off a street in Leicester. There he attempted in vain to have intercourse with her, whereupon—and I summarise the evidence in the way most favourable to him—she jeered at him and attempted to get away. He tried still to hold her, and then she slapped him in the face and punched him in the stomach: he grabbed her shoulders and pushed her back from him whereas (I use his words), "She "kicked me in the privates. Whether it was her knee or foot, "I do not know. After that I do not know what happened till "she fell." She fell, because he had taken a knife from his pocket and stabbed her with it twice, the second blow inflicting a mortal injury.

It was in these circumstances that the appellant pleaded that there had been such provocation by the deceased as to reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter, and the question is whether the learned judge rightly directed the jury upon this issue. In my opinion, the summing up of the learned judge was impeccable. Adapting the language used in this House in Mancini v. Director of Public Prosecutions[1] and Holmes v. Director of Public Prosecutions,[2] to which I shall later refer, he thus directed the jury: "Provocation would arise if the "conduct of the deceased woman, Mrs. Redding, to the prisoner

"was such as would cause a reasonable person, and actually "caused the person, to lose his self-control suddenly and to drive "him into such passion and lack of self-control that he might "use violence of the degree and nature which the prisoner used "here. The provocation must be such as would reasonably "justify the violence used, the use of a knife." And a little later he addressed them thus: "The reasonable person, the "ordinary person, is the person you must consider when you are "considering the effect which any acts, any conduct, any words, "might have to justify the steps which were taken in response "thereto, so that an unusually excitable or pugnacious indivi-"dual, or a drunken one or a man who is sexually impotent is "not entitled to rely on provocation which would not have led an "ordinary person to have acted in the way which was in fact "carried out. There may be, members of the jury, infirmity "of mind and instability of character, but if it does not "amount to insanity, it is no defence. Likewise infirmity of "body or affliction of the mind of the assailant is not material "in testing whether there has been provocation by the deceased "to justify the violence used so as to reduce the act of killing "to manslaughter. They must be tested throughout this case "by the reactions of a reasonable man to the acts, or series of "acts, done by the deceased woman." Other passages may be found in his summing-up in which he takes as the test the reaction of the hypothetical reasonable man to the alleged provocation. In the Court of Criminal Appeal these directions were quoted and approved, and reference was made also to the recent case of Reg. v. McCarthy[3] where it was held that there is "no "distinction between a person who by temperament is unusually "excitable or pugnacious and one who is temporarily made excit-"able or pugnacious by self-induced intoxication." It appeared to that court, as it appears to me, that "no distinction is to be "made in the case of a person who, though it may not be a "matter of temperament, is physically impotent, is conscious "of that impotence, and therefore mentally liable to be more "excited unduly if he is 'twitted' or attacked on the subject of "that particular infirmity." The court thereupon approved and reiterated the proposition that the question for the jury was whether on the facts as they found them from the evidence the provocation was in fact enough to lead a reasonable person to do what the accused did.

My Lords, no other conclusion was open to the Court of Criminal Appeal nor is any other conclusion open to your Lordships in view of the recent cases in this House of Mancini v. Director of Public Prosecutions[4] and Holmes v. Director of Public Prosecutions.[5] The relevant part of the former decision is accurately stated in the headnote in these words: "The test to "be applied is that of the effect of the provocation on a reasonable man, so that an unusually excitable or pugnacious person "is not entitled to rely on provocation which would not have "led an ordinary person to act as he did." And Lord Simon, in a speech in which all their Lordships concurred, referred with approved [6] to the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Rex v. Lesbini.[7] It is worth recalling that in that case the court said [8]: "We agree with the judgment of Darling J. in Rex v. "Alexander[9] and with the principles enunciated in Reg. v. "Welsh,[10] where it is said that 'there must exist such an "'amount of provocation as would be excited by the circum-"'stances in the mind of a reasonable man, and so as to lead "'the jury to ascribe the act to the influence of that passion'." Finally, in Holmes v. Director of Public Prosecutions[11] Lord Simon in a speech in which my noble and learned friend Lord Porter and I as well as Lord Macmillan and Lord du Parcq concurred, after a prolonged hearing and an exhaustive examination of the relevant law used these words: "If, on the other hand, "the case is one in which the view might fairly be taken (a) that "a reasonable person, in consequence of the provocation "received, might be so rendered subject to passion or loss of "control as to be led to use the violence with fatal results, and "(b) that the accused was in fact acting under the stress of such "provocation, then it is for the jury to determine whether on "its view of the facts manslaughter or murder is the appropriate "verdict."

My Lords, in the face of this authority I am at a loss to know what other direction than that which he gave could properly have been given by the learned judge to the jury in the present case. The argument, as I understood it, for the appellant was that the jury, in considering the reaction of the hypothetical reasonable man to the acts of provocation, must not only place him in the circumstances in which the accused was placed but must also invest him with the personal physical peculiarities of the accused. Learned counsel, who argued the case for the appellant with great ability, did not, I think, venture to say that he should be invested with mental or temperamental qualities which distinguished him from the reasonable man, for this would have been directly in conflict with the passage from the recent decision of this House in Mancini v. Director of Public Prosecutions[12] which I have cited. But he urged that the reasonable man should be invested with the peculiar physical qualities of the accused, as in the present case with the characteristic of impotence, and the question should be asked what would be the reaction of the impotent reasonable man in the circumstances? For that proposition I know of no authority:

[8] Ibid. 1120.

[11] [1946] A.C. 588, 597.
[12] [1942] A.C. 1.

nor can I see any reason in it. It would be plainly illogical not to recognise an unusually excitable or pugnacious temperament in the accused as a matter to be taken into account but yet to recognize for that purpose some unusual physical characteristic, be it impotence or another. Moreover, the proposed distinction appears to me to ignore the fundamental fact that the temper of a man which leads him to react in such and such a way to provocation, is or may be itself conditioned by some physical defect. It is too subtle a refinement for my mind or, I think, for that of a jury to grasp that the temper may be ignored but the physical defect taken into account.

It was urged upon your Lordships that the hypothetical reasonable man must be confronted with all the same circumstances as the accused and that this could not be fairly done unless he was also invested with the peculiar characteristics of the accused. But this makes nonsense of the test. Its purpose is to invite the jury to consider the act of the accused by reference to a certain standard or norm of conduct and with this object the "reasonable" or the "average" or the "normal" man is invoked. If the reasonable man is then deprived in whole or in part of his reason or the normal man endowed with abnormal characteristics, the test ceases to have any value. This is precisely the consideration which led this House in Mancini's case [13] to say that an unusually excitable or pugnacious person is not entitled to rely on provocation which would not have led an ordinary person to act as he did. In my opinion then the Court of Criminal Appeal was right in approving the direction given to the jury by the learned judge and this appeal must fail.

My noble and learned friend, LORD GODDARD, has authorized me to say that he has read, and concurs in, this opinion.

Road Traffic—Disqualification—Driving while disqualified—Sentence of imprisonment—"Special circumstances" justifying imposition of fine—Sudden emergency—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 7 (4).

"Special circumstances."

At 5 a.m. on June 22, 1953, the appellant, the owner of a bakery at Hampstead, was informed by telephone by the bakery foreman at his home in West Norwood that the dough-mixing machinery had broken down. The appellant had in his possession the keys of the tool store in which the tools needed for repairing the machine were kept. Although disqualified from holding a driving licence the appellant, as no taxis were available and as he was unable to contact his driver, drove his car from his home to the bakery. He was convicted by magistrates of driving a car while disqualified and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. He appealed against sentence on the grounds that the circumstances were such as could amount in law to "special circumstances" within the meaning of section 7 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, so justifying the court in not imposing a sentence of imprisonment. The appeals committee, being of the opinion that the circumstances were special to the offender and not special to the case, considered that it was not open to them to hold that there were special circumstances and dismissed the appeal. On appeal, by case stated:—

Held, allowing the appeal and remitting the case to the appeals committee, that a sudden emergency if serious enough and provided that it cannot be dealt with in any other way, can amount to a "special circumstance" within the meaning of section 7 (4); and that it was open to the appeals committee, on the facts found, to consider whether there were special circumstances.

Whittall v. Kirby [1947] K.B. 194; 62 T.L.R. 696; [1946] 2 All E.R. 552 applied.

CASE STATED.

The appellant, Gerald Paul Aichroth, was convicted at Hampstead magistrates' court on July 8, 1953, for driving a motor-vehicle on a road while disqualified from holding a licence. He was sentenced to three months' imprisonment from which he appealed to the appeals committee of the County of London Sessions.

At the hearing of the appeal on September 8, 1953, the following facts were proved or admitted. On June 9, 1953, the appellant had been convicted at the Marylebone magistrates' court of careless driving and disqualified from driving a motor-vehicle for three months. On Monday, June 22, 1953, he drove his motor-vehicle from his home at West Norwood to his bakery business at Hampstead, while still disqualified. At about 5 o'clock in the morning on that day the appellant was told by his foreman on the telephone that the dough-mixing machine at the bakery had broken down. The keys of the store in the bakery in which the tools required to repair the machine were kept were in the appellant's possession. If the dough-mixing machine were not repaired the material would be wasted and the Monday morning supply of bread for the bakery's five thousand retail and five hundred wholesale customers would have been spoilt, so causing the bakery to lose its customers and goodwill. The driver regularly employed by the appellant since his disqualification had no telephone and lived four miles away from the appellant. There were no taxis available but the appellant made no inquiry as to any car hire services which might have been available.

It was contended by the appellant that the circumstances could in law amount to special circumstances within section 7 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930,[1] justifying the court in not passing a sentence of imprisonment. The respondent contended that the circumstances did not in law amount to special circumstances within the section.

The appeals committee, being of opinion that the circumstances were in law special to the offender and not special to the case, considered that it was not open to it to hold that the circumstances were special circumstances justifying consideration of the view that a fine would be an adequate punishment for the offence. They dismissed the appeal and stated a case for the opinion of the court whether upon the facts found they came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

Edward Clarke for the appellant.
Paul Wrightson for the respondent.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by the appeals committee of the London Sessions before whom the appellant was summoned for driving a car while disqualified from holding a licence. The result of that very serious offence is that, unless special circumstances can be found which would lead the court to decide that a fine would be an adequate punishment, they must impose a sentence of imprisonment.

The Hampstead magistrates had imposed a sentence of three months' imprisonment and quarter sessions held that, as a matter of law, there could not be special circumstances authorizing them

[1] Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 7 (4): "If any person who under the provisions of this Part of this Act is disqualified for holding or obtaining a licence applies for or obtains a licence while he is so disqualified, or if any such person while he is so disqualified drives a motor vehicle, ... on a road, that person shall be liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or if the court think that, having regard to the special circumstances of the case, a fine would be an adequate punishment for the offence, to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds. . . ."

Aichroth v. Cottee.

Lord Goddard C.J.

to impose a fine. The question which we have to consider is not whether there were special circumstances, but whether or not, on the facts stated by the magistrates, it was open to them to consider whether there were special circumstances. [His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:]

In Lines v. Hersom[1] this court held that the words "special "circumstances" in section 7 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and the words "special reasons" which appear in other sections in the statute justify the magistrates in taking a certain course. There is no difference in substance between the two expressions and it is very difficult to find any satisfactory distinction; although, if there were any circumstances rather more in the defendant's favour, one circumstance to be taken into account would be his own particular circumstances; but I think it is desirable to adhere to the reasons given in the judgment and to the decision of the court in Lines v. Hersom,[1] that is, that the two expressions are the same.

In Whittall v. Kirby,[2] in an attempt to lay down what could be regarded as "special circumstances," we said, first, that they were "special" as opposed to "general"; that is an antithesis, and therefore circumstances common to a large number of people such as, for instance, the circumstance that the defendant was a first offender could not be a special reason. In an endeavour, for reasons which we gave, to lay down some guidance to courts, we said that the circumstances must be special to the offence and not to the offender, but we recognized that however much one might try to give guidance or lay down matters of principle in such a matter, there must be border-line cases, and it must be very difficult in certain circumstances to draw the line. In Whittall v. Kirby,[2] I quoted Rex v. Crossan,[3] a decision of the King's Bench Division in Northern Ireland, and said[4]: "In that case the court adopted a test that I had ventured to "use in an address that I gave to the magistrates assembled at "the summer assizes for Essex in 1937. I suggested that the "reasons must be special to the offence, and not to the offender "and the court in adopting what I had said used these words: "'A "special reason" within the exception is one which is "'special to the facts of the particular case, that is, special to "'the facts which constitute the offence. It is, in other words, "'a mitigating or extenuating circumstance, not amounting in "'law to a defence to the charge, yet directly connected with "'the commission of the offence, and one which the court ought "'properly to take into consideration when imposing punishment. "'A circumstance peculiar to the offender as distinguished from "'the offence is not a "special reason" within the exception.'" I then continued: "I respectfully and entirely agree with and "adopt this passage. While it is impossible to enumerate or "define everything that can amount to a special reason, one may "give as an illustration a driver exceeding the speed limit because "he has suddenly been called to attend a dying relative or a "doctor going to an urgent call. It is difficult indeed to "visualize any special reason in the case of dangerous driving, "except the one actually mentioned in the section itself, namely, "the lapse of time from the date of a previous conviction." I then considered the effect of driving under the influence of drink, and said that it was difficult indeed to find any excuse there. In that case the court gave as illustrations the case of a man going to attend a dying relative or a doctor going to an urgent call, and I think a reasonable deduction from that is that the court meant to lay down that a sudden emergency, provided it is serious enough and provided that it cannot be reasonably dealt with in any other way, can amount to a special circumstance or special reason, to use the actual expression which had to be considered in Whittall v. Kirby.[5]

In the present case, the emergency was that the dough-mixing machine apparently needed—and this will be a matter for the magistrates to consider—some special tools which were locked up. There is nothing prima facie unreasonable in a man locking up his tools. The appellant had the keys. We intend to send the case back to the appeals committee and it will be for them to consider whether it was essential, in view of what had happened, for the appellant to obtain the keys.

The appeals committee also found that there were no taxis available and that "the appellant made no inquiry as to any car "hire services being available." Whether there were likely to be any car hire services available at West Norwood as distinct from the West End of London is questionable; I should have thought it unlikely that you would find them in West Norwood, but that, again, is a matter for the magistrates to consider. They must also consider whether it would make any difference if public transport was available because public transport starts early in London. Those are all matters which the magistrates can take into account if they are of opinion that there was a sudden emergency, and that this was a bona fide case of a man trying to meet it. As Slade J. pointed out in argument, it was said in the present case that if the dough-mixing machine were not put in order it would not only waste material, but would prevent the supply of bread to the bakery's five thousand retail customers and five hundred wholesale customers. I do not know how many retail customers five hundred wholesale customers represent, but the bakery itself seems to have had five thousand, so it looks—the court says no more than this—as though there was a sudden emergency; and Whittall v. Kirby[5] has left it open to the court to say that there was a sudden emergency. The mere fact, however,

[5] [1947] K.B. 194.

Aichroth v. Cotter.

Lord Goddard C.J.

that there is a sudden emergency will not be enough if it is shown that there are other reasonable methods of meeting it. If, on the other hand, the magistrates think that there was a sudden emergency and they are satisfied about the fact of the dough being spoilt and the results, and if they think that the appellant, by doing what he did, was using the only method open to him that night or early morning, we think that they would be entitled to say that those matters were special to the offence and not to the offender.

In our opinion, therefore, the appeals committee did not come to a correct determination, and it would be open to them—they are not bound—to hold that there were in the present case special circumstances.

A sergeant in the regular army who enlisted on June 10, 1948, for five years with the colours and seven with the reserve, was arrested on June 17, 1953, while still on active service in the Middle East on charges of conspiracy to steal and stealing Government property; and he was later tried by court-martial and convicted on some of the charges:—

Held, that the words of section 90 (1), (3) and (4) of the Army Act could not be construed to mean that a regular soldier ceased to be subject to military law the moment he became entitled to be transferred to the reserve, and, as the appellant had not in fact been transferred at the time of his arrest and court-martial, he was still subject to military law and therefore the court-martial had jurisdiction to try him.

Appeal against conviction.

The appellant, George Hadfield, a sergeant in the Royal Army Service Corps, was convicted by general court-martial held at Moascar, Suez Canal Zone, in November, 1953, of conspiracy to steal and stealing Government property. He had enlisted on June 10, 1948, for five years' service with the colours and seven years with the reserve. On June 17, 1953, while he was still serving in the Middle East he was arrested; and in November, 1953, he was tried by court-martial on a charge sheet containing 26 charges laid under section 41 of the Army Act alleging conspiracy to steal and/or receive, stealing and receiving stolen goods. He was acquitted on the charges of receiving and one charge of stealing, but convicted of the remaining fifteen charges and sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. The findings and the sentence were confirmed. The conviction on one of the charges was subsequently quashed by the Secretary of State for War and Hadfield appealed, with leave of the court, against his convictions on the other 14 counts, contending, inter alia, that the court-martial had no jurisdiction to try him on the charges preferred against him or on any charges as the provisions of section 90 and of the proviso to section 158 (1) of the Army Act [1] had not been complied with.

Garth Moore for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD C.J.: The first point taken by Mr. Skelhorn is that the appellant was not subject to military law, the fact being that he was enlisted on June 10, 1948 for 5 years with the colours and 7 years on the reserve. His colour service thereupon terminated, so it is said, on June 10, 1953. He was arrested on June 17, 1953, for these offences while still in Egypt and still apparently drawing pay as a sergeant, he not having at that time

"(3) Every soldier of the regular forces, upon falling to be transferred to the reserve, shall be transferred to the reserve, but until so transferred shall be subject to this Act as a soldier of the regular forces.

been sent back to the United Kingdom. [His Lordship read section 90 (1) (3) and (4) of the Army Act and continued:]

We are asked to say that this man ought to have been transferred to the reserve, and that as he had not been so transferred but was still in Egypt serving with his unit, he cannot be subject to military law. That seems to me to ignore the words "until so transferred shall be subject to this Act as a soldier of "the regular forces" in section 90 (3). It seems to me to be impossible to read those subsections as meaning that the moment a man's turn arrives for him to be entitled to be transferred to the reserve he ceases to be subject to military law. That would seem to be exactly contrary to the words. He ceases to be subject to military law when he is transferred, but not until then. In the present case the appellant had not been transferred to the reserve at the time he was arrested or when he was brought before the court-martial, and it is therefore quite unnecessary to consider the provisions of sections 158 or 87, to which we have been referred. In my opinion, the court-martial had jurisdiction, and on that point the appeal fails. [His Lordship then considered the question of misdirection, said that the court could find no fault with the judge-advocate's summing up, and dismissed the appeal.]

Appeal dismissed.

Sale of Goods—Memorandum in writing—Defence—Repeal of section 4 of Sale of Goods Act, 1893—Defence pleading section 4 delivered before the repeal—Whether a prior vested right in litigation—Whether operation of section 4 procedural—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 4—Law Reform (Enforcement of Contracts) Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 34), s. 2.

Since the coming into operation on June 4, 1954, of the Law Reform (Enforcement of Contracts) Act, 1954, defences based upon section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, can no longer be relied upon in an action on a contract for the sale of goods to which they applied, and this is so even though the writ in the action was issued and a defence pleading section 4 delivered before the coming into operation of the Act of 1954.

On December 9, 1953, the defendants gave to the plaintiffs a written order for the supply of 1,001 sets of plastic mouldings forming the component parts of dolls at 2s. a set. The plaintiffs accepted the order and themselves ordered material to carry it out. On December 21, 1953, the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs cancelling their order. On January 11, 1954, the plaintiffs issued a writ claiming damages for breach of the contract of December 9, 1953. By their defence, delivered on February 3, 1954, the defendants pleaded that if (which they denied) they had contracted with the plaintiffs as alleged in the statement of claim, or at all, they would rely upon section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, "per non-compliance with which such contract is unenforce-"able," and at the trial they sought to contend that the written order which they had given to the plaintiff was insufficient to satisfy section 4 in that it contained no reference to an essential term of the contract, namely, the material of which the goods were to be made.

The plaintiffs contended that, as section 4 had been repealed by section 2 [1] of the Law Reform (Enforcement of Contracts) Act, 1954, which came into operation on June 4, 1954, the defendants could not set up section 4 as a defence.

PILCHER J. found, inter alia, the facts stated above, and continued: That brings me to the questions of law which arise on the defence raised under section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The Law Reform (Enforcement of Contracts) Act, 1954, which came into force on June 4, 1954, provides by section 2: "Section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, is hereby repealed in "relation to any contract, whether made before or after the "commencement of this Act. I think that it is conceded that if a party to litigation has acquired a vested right or interest in an action, such right or interest will not be destroyed by a subsequent statutory enactment unless such enactment specifically so provides. The authority for that proposition is Hitchcock v. Way.[1] It is submitted here by the defendants that they had before the passing of the new Act what I think they called a "vested defence" to this action, which was an action in being before the new Act was passed, and it is argued on their behalf that such vested right to rely upon the defence afforded by section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act can only be taken away by express words in the new enactment.

Whilst the new Act provides that section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act is repealed in relation to any contract made before as well as after the passing of the Act, it does not in terms save any right which may have become vested in the litigant before the passing of the Act. Section 4 provided, the material words of which I will read (I hope for the last time): "(1) A contract for "the sale of any goods of the value of £10 or upwards shall "not be enforceable by action unless the buyer shall accept "part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give "something in earnest to bind the contract, or in part payment, "or unless some note or memorandum in writing of the contract "be made and signed by the party to be charged or his agent in "that behalf."

The plaintiffs submit that section 4 is a procedural section and constitutes, and constitutes only, a fetter on the power of the court to grant a remedy. It is submitted (and I think that it is not really in dispute) that if it is right to regard the provisions of section 4 as procedural then the court will only look at the law as it stands at the time when the case comes before it. It is to be borne in mind, I think, that section 4 does not affect the legal rights of the parties. It does not affect the passing of property under a contract which would be subject to its terms. If a party desires to rely upon the section that party has to plead it and plead it with some particularity. It is not a substantive provision of the law in the sense that the court itself will take judicial notice of the fact that a provision of the section has not been complied with, unless the point is raised by one of the parties. The section, in effect, provides that contracts which are covered by it shall be proved in a certain fashion and that unless they are proved in that fashion the court will not enforce them.

I do not propose to repeat the careful arguments which were addressed by either side to me on this particular point, but I am satisfied that the plaintiffs' argument is right and that section 4 is a procedural section in the sense that I have indicated. It seems to me difficult to suppose that, because this action was begun before the passing of the new Act and the defendants put in a defence relying upon section 4 before the passing of the Act, they thereby acquired a vested right to rely upon defences open to them under the section. Such defences, as I have pointed out, raise questions of the evidence which is available at the trial of the action to support the contract which is being set up; and it is in the light of the evidence which is available that the court will arrive at a determination whether or not a contract for the sale of goods of the value of £10 or upwards can be enforced. The new Act applies to contracts made before it was passed and I have come to the conclusion that defences based upon section 4 in regard to such contracts can no longer be relied upon. That is sufficient to dispose of the case. The result is that the plaintiffs succeed and are entitled to judgment for a sum to be assessed by a master, if not agreed; and there will be judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

In re PORTER (C. E.) A BANKRUPT. Ex parte THE BOARD OF TRADE v. OLLARD, OLLARD & SESSIONS.

1954 July 19.

Danckwerts J.

[King's Lynn No. 3 of 1951.]

Bankruptcy — Costs — Taxation — County court — Adjudication on debtor's petition — Non-summary case — Assets certified likely to realize less than £200—Items and amounts allowable—Bankruptcy Rules, 1952 (S.I. 1952, No. 2113 (L. 14)), rr. 100 (1), 114 (1); Appendix II, Parts I, IV.

A petitioning debtor's assets were certified as likely to realize £100 but not £200. The court did not order that his estate be administered in a summary manner. His solicitors carried in their bill of costs and the county court registrar dealt with the matter on the footing that, as it was a non-summary case, items 3 to 11 of Part I and item 1 of Part IV of Appendix II to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, applied; and he allowed the full costs under Appendix II of an ordinary debtor's petition (including disbursements and payment for allocatur), applying items 3 to 11 of Part I of the appendix (which were headed "non-summary cases") and item 1 of Part IV, and not applying items 1 and 2 of Part I (which were headed "summary cases"). The Board of Trade, who had the duty of auditing trustees' accounts in which were items for the payment of taxed costs, agreed with the registrar's applying the items which he did, but not with his allowing full costs under Appendix II of an ordinary debtor's petition; they contended that, in accordance with the proviso to rule 100 (1) of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, only three-fifths of the costs ought to be allowed. The registrar considered the proviso inapplicable, but was willing to tax as suggested if it could be shown to accord with the practice so to do. In the Taxing Office, however, the practice where the assets did not exceed £200 was to apply items 1 (b) and 2 (b) of Part I of Appendix II as if the case were a summary case.

On a review of this taxation, the taxing master applied this practice, disallowing items 3 to 11 of Part I and item 1 of Part IV which the registrar had allowed. The Board of Trade objected to his so doing, and moved the court to review both the registrar's and the taxing master's taxations and to uphold its objections:—

Held, that, as a summary order had not been made, items 1 and 2 of Part I did not apply. The proviso to rule 100 (1) applied, with the result that the proper course, which neither the registrar nor the taxing master had taken, was, after making the 50 per cent.

Motion.

This motion, raising matters under section 129 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914 and under the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952,[1] which came into operation on January 1, 1953, was launched following the bankruptcy taxing master's review, under rule 114 of those rules, of the taxation of the petitioning debtor's bill of costs by the registrar of the King's Lynn County Court.

On April 9, 1951, the bankrupt was adjudicated on his own petition. As a trustee in the bankruptcy was appointed, the case was not dealt with under section 129 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which enables the court, if satisfied that the debtor's assets are unlikely to exceed £300, to order that his estate be administered in a summary manner. On October 2, 1952, the trustee in the bankruptcy certified in writing that the bankrupt's assets were likely to exceed £100 but not £200. In fact they realized £162. The respondents acted as the bankrupt's solicitors for the presentation of his petition and on October 30, 1952, carried in their bill of costs in respect thereof for taxation. The registrar of King's Lynn County Court dealt with the matter on the basis that, as the case was a non-summary case, items 3 to 11 of Part I and item 1 of Part IV of Appendix II to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, were applicable. With that the Board of Trade agreed, but disagreed with the registrar's allowing the costs at £22 18s., i.e., full costs under Appendix II of an ordinary debtor's petition (including disbursements and payment for allocatur), contending that under rule 100 only three-fifths of those costs ought to be allowed, in accordance with the proviso to subrule (1). The registrar considered that the proviso did not apply to the case, but was willing to deal with the taxation as suggested if that was in accordance with the practice. In fact, however, the practice in the High Court Taxing Office in non-summary cases where the assets did not exceed £200 was to apply items 1 (b) and 2 (b) of Part I of Appendix II as if the matter were a summary case: see Butterworth's "Costs," p. 537n. On March 19, 1954, application was accordingly made for review of the taxation, the Board of Trade objecting to the registrar's taxation on the ground that the amount allowed by him was excessive. On May 20, 1954, the matter was argued before Master Gibbon, Chief Bankruptcy Taxing Master, who on June 2, 1954, gave his answers in writing. He stated therein that in the High Court the practice had always been to read Appendix II as a continuing scale and therefore, in a case such as the present, where the assets were so small, to pay strict attention to the trustee's certificate of value and to allow the amounts set out in items 1 and 2. That, he stated, was the only way in which to give strict regard to the certificate of value, and to ensure the carrying out of the main object of the rules, namely, to prevent the incurring of large costs where there was only a small estate to distribute. He reviewed the bill and allowed it at £4 13s. 4d., applying items 1 and 2 of Part I of Appendix II and disallowing all other items in the bill. To the £4 13s. 4d. he added the 50 per cent. increase of £2 6s. 8d., making a total of £7 0s. 0d.

The Board of Trade took the view that the registrar's taxation and the taxing master's review were erroneous in principle in that (a) the registrar, while correctly applying items 3 to 11 of Part I and item 1 of Part IV of Appendix II, wrongly allowed a sum in excess of three-fifths of the amounts stated in the Appendix contrary to the proviso to rule 100 (1); (b) the taxing master wrongly applied items 1 and 2 of Part I as if the case were a summary case under section 129, which it was not, and wrongly disallowed all other items in the bill. In the opinion of the Board of Trade, the correct principle of taxation in the case of a debtor's petition where the assets did not exceed £300 was to tax under items 3 to 11 of Part I and item 1 of Part IV and to take three-fifths of the resulting total. Had that principle been applied to the bill in the present case, the profit costs in all would have amounted to £12 6s. 0d., three-fifths of which was £7 7s. 7d. Items 3 to 11 of Part I and item 1 of Part IV of Appendix II as allowed on taxation by the registrar, amounted to £12 6s. 0d., so that the Board of Trade, if its view was correct, could ask the debtor's solicitors to refund two-fifths of that amount, i.e., £4 18s. 5d. Although the amount involved was small, the matter was important from an administrative point of view, as it was the Board of Trade's duty to audit the accounts of trustees in which items for the payment of taxed costs appeared. Accordingly, on July 19, 1954, the Board of Trade asked by this motion for an order that the taxation made by the registrar and reviewed by the taxing master might be reviewed by the court, and that the objections made to it by the Board of Trade might be allowed. The respondent solicitors did not appear, and the Board of Trade did not claim any relief against them and conceded their right to an allocatur in respect of their profit costs of £7 7s. 7d.

Porter (C. E.) In re. Ex parte The Board of Trade v. Ollard, Ollard & Sessions.

Muir Hunter for the Board of Trade.

Danckwerts J. This is an application to review a taxation, which comes before me from a county court case, in which the county court registrar has taxed the costs of the petitioning debtor's solicitors in a particular way and on appeal the taxing master has taken a different view. It seems to me that the original taxation taxed the items correctly, but that there should have been a deduction, which was not made, and that the review taken subsequently by the taxing master was not in accordance with the rules which regulate this matter.

The rule which applies is rule 100 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952. It provides: "(1) The scales of costs and allowances and "the directions contained in Appendix II and Appendix III to "these rules shall, subject to these rules, apply to the taxation "and allowance of costs and charges in proceedings under the "Act and these rules: Provided that, subject to the provisions "of Part I of Appendix II, where the estimated assets of the "debtor do not exceed the sum of £300 and costs are payable "out of the estate, not more than three-fifths of the amounts "stated in or applied by the scale of costs in Appendix II may be "allowed in any proceedings under the Act in respect of solicitors' "costs, disbursements being added."

Items Nos. 1 and 2 of Part I of Appendix II, to which the proviso is made subject, deal only with summary cases under section 129 of the Act in which certain fixed amounts are provided for. This is not a case of that kind; in the present case the assets were certified as likely to exceed £100 and not likely to realize £200, and in fact they realized £162. Therefore, it is quite true that a summary order, if it had been made, would have brought in items numbers 1 and 2 of Part I; but in fact a summary order was not made, and consequently, as it seems to me, items numbers 1 and 2 of Part I of Appendix II of the rules have no application whatever.

The result of that is, in my view, that the proviso applies, and that the amount of the items and the amounts in which they are to be taxed originally are to be found in items numbers 3 to 11 of Appendix II. First, there is the item "Instructions for "petition" and then there are a number of other items set out, with an appropriate fee against each, which are the amounts primarily to be applied in the present case. Item number 3 commences: "Instructions for petition: Where the assets are certi-"fied—(a) As not likely to realize more than £500." It seems to me, as this is not a summary case and as this item is headed "Non-Summary Cases," that this is the provision which must be applied, and that consequently £3 3s. was the appropriate sum to be allowed in respect of the instructions for petition. So, as one goes down the other items to number 11, one finds items for search for prior petition, drawing and attesting petition, and so on.

Having reached the amount of the items in that way, it seems to me that the proviso contained in rule 100 must be applied; and consequently, having added together those sums and increased the amount by 50 per cent. allowable under subrule (2) of rule 100, one must apply the proviso by allowing not more than three-fifths of the amounts stated in Appendix II. In other words, they are reducible in that way, but in fact what is done is to deduct two-fifths from the total.

Consequently, neither of the methods applied previously in this case was correct, and the correct amount to be allowed for the costs is that which will be reached by adopting the method which I have just indicated, and the amount reached in that way is £7 7s. 7d. Accordingly I make an order to that effect. The matter is one of principle, and the Board of Trade wished to have a direction for future cases. In the circumstances very properly the Board, as it is carrying out a public duty, does not ask for its costs.

Order accordingly.

* REGINA v. MARTIN SECKER & WARBURG LD.

Criminal Law—Obscene libel—Contemporary novel—Test of obscenity—Tending to corrupt and deprave by present-day standards.

In considering whether a book, of which the subject-matter is the relationship of the sexes, constitutes an obscene libel, the jury must have regard to the proper functions of a contemporary novel, namely: to hold up a mirror to the society of its own day and place, to present a picture and a record of that society, its manners, customs, attitudes and thought for the information both of its own generation and of posterity, for the benefit, that is, of other societies separated from it in space or in time. In applying the test of obscenity laid down in Reg. v. Hicklin (1868) L.R. 3 Q.B. 360, 371, the task of the jury is to decide whether they think that the tendency of the book is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds were, at the time of the alleged offence, open to such immoral influences and into whose hands the book might then fall.

Trial on indictment.

Martin Secker Warburg Ld., publishers, of John Street, London, W.C., Frederic John Warburg, a director of that firm, and the Camelot Press Ld., of Stanley Road, Southampton, printers, were charged on indictment with publishing an obscene libel, namely, a novel called "The Philanderer," by Stanley Kauffman. All the defendants pleaded Not Guilty.

Mervyn Griffith-Jones for the Crown.
Rodger Winn for Frederic John Warburg.
Maxwell Turner for the defendant companies.

Stable J. Members of the jury, the charge against the accused is one of publishing what is called an obscene libel, and everybody agrees here that they all stand or fall together. The verdict that you will give is a matter of the utmost consequence, not only to the accused but also to the community in general. It is of great importance in relation to the future of the novel in the civilized world and the future generations who can only derive their knowledge of how we lived, thought and acted from the contemporary literature of the particular age in which they are interested. Your verdict will have a great bearing upon where the line is drawn between liberty and that freedom to read and think as the spirit moves us, on the one hand, and, on the other, a licence that is an affront to the society of which each of us is a member. The discharge of this important duty rests fairly and squarely on your shoulders. It is not what I think about this book; it is the conclusion that you come to, and you represent that vast diversity of minds and ages which is the reading public of the

[Reported by Niul Hogg, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

English-speaking world. You and you alone must decide this case and if, in the course of this summing-up, I express my opinion about the matter, you are entitled to ignore it. The burden of proof in this, as in all criminal cases, rests on the prosecution from start to finish. You, in arriving at your verdict, must arrive at a unanimous verdict. If you can all agree, so much the better, but if there is any one of you, or more, who honestly cannot share the view of the others, then it is your duty so to say.

The test of obscenity to be applied today is extracted from a decision of 1868; it is this [1]: " . . . whether the tendency of the " matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those " whose mind are open to such immoral influences, and into whose " hands a publication of this sort may fall." Because this test was laid down in 1868, that does not mean that you have to consider whether this book is an obscene book by the standards of nearly a century ago. Your task is to decide whether you think that the tendency of the book is to deprave those whose minds today are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands the book may fall in this year, or last year when it was published in this country. Considering the curious change of approach from one age to another, it is not uninteresting to observe that in the course of the argument of the case in 1868 the rhetorical question was asked [2]: " What can be more obscene than many pictures " publicly exhibited, as the Venus in the Dulwich Gallery?" There are some who think with reverence that man is fashioned in the image of God, and you know that babies are not born in this world, be they of either sex, dressed up in a frock-coat or an equivalent feminine garment.

We are not sitting here as judges of taste. We are not here to say whether we like a book of this kind. We are not here to say whether we think it would be a good thing if books like this were never written. You are here trying a criminal charge and in a criminal court you cannot find a verdict of " Guilty " against the accused unless, on the evidence that you have heard, you and each one of you are fully satisfied that the charge against the accused person has been proved.

Remember the charge is a charge that the tendency of the book is to corrupt and deprave. The charge is not that the tendency of the book is either to shock or to disgust. That is not a criminal offence. Then you say: " Well, corrupt or " deprave whom?" and again the test: those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall. What, exactly, does that mean? Are we to take our literary standards as being the level of something that is suitable for a fourteen-year-old school girl? Or do we go even further back than that, and are we to be reduced to the sort of books that one reads as a child in the nursery? The answer to that is: Of course not. A mass of literature, great literature, from many angles is wholly unsuitable for reading by the adolescent, but that does not mean that the publisher is guilty of a criminal offence for making those works available to the general public.

You have heard a good deal about the putting of ideas into young heads. But is it really books that put ideas into young heads, or is it nature? When a child, be it a boy or a girl, passing from a state of blissful ignorance, reaches that most perilous part of life's journey which we call "adolescence," and finds itself traversing an unknown country without a map, without a compass, and sometimes, I am afraid, from a bad home, without a guide, it is this natural change from childhood to maturity that puts ideas into its young head. It is the business of parents and teachers and the environment of society, so far as is possible, to see that those ideas are wisely and naturally directed to the ultimate fulfilment of a balanced individual life.

This is a book which obviously and admittedly is absorbed with sex, the relationship between the male and the female of the human species. I, personally, approach that great mystery with profound interest and at the same time a very deep sense of reverence. It is not our fault that but for the love of men and women and the act of sex, the human race would have ceased to exist thousands of years ago. It is not our fault that the moment in, shall we say, an over-civilized world—if "civilized" is an appropriate word—sex ceases to be one of the great motive forces in human life, the human race will cease to exist. It is the essential condition of the survival and development of the human race, for whatever ultimate purpose it has been brought into this world. Speaking, as I am sure I do, to a representative group of people, nine men and three women, each one of you, I am sure, is of good will and anxious that in the solution of this great mystery today we should achieve some conception which will lead to great personal happiness between individuals of the opposite sex in millions of homes throughout this island, which, after all, is the only possible foundation upon which one could build a vigorous, a strong and a useful nation.

Rome and Greece, it is not uninteresting to reflect, elevated human love to a cult, if not a religion, but when we reach the Middle Ages we find an entirely different approach. The priesthood was compelled to be sexless, and a particular qualitative holiness was attached to the monks and the nuns who dedicated themselves to cloisters and sheltered lives. You may think that it is lucky that they were not all quite as holy as that because otherwise, if they had been, we should none of us have been here today.

When you approach this matter which—let us face it—throughout the ages has been one of absorbing interest to men and women, you get these two schools of thought which are poles apart, and in between those two extremes you have a wide variety of opinion. At one extreme you get the conception, I venture to think, of the mediaeval church, that sex is sin; that the whole thing is dirty; that it was a mistake from beginning to end (and, if it was, it was the great creator of life who made the mistake and not you or I); that the less that is said about this wholly distasteful topic the better; let it be covered up and let us pretend that it does not exist. In referring to the arrival of a particular day, reference is made to "the happy event on Monday" instead of saying "a baby was born on Monday"—it means exactly the same thing—and in speech and behaviour the utmost degree of reticence is observed. I suppose the high tide was obtained in the Victorian era, possibly as a reaction against the coarseness of the Georges and the rather libertine attitude of the Regency, when I understand that in some houses legs of tables were actually draped and rather stricter females never referred as such to gentlemen's legs but called them their "understandings."

At the other extreme you get the line of thought which says that nothing but mischief results from this policy of secrecy and covering up, that the whole thing is just as much a part of God's universe as anything else and the proper approach to the matter is one of frankness, plain speaking and the avoidance of any sort of pretence. Somewhere between those two poles the average, decent, well-meaning man or woman takes his or her stand.

The book that you have to consider is, as you know, in the form of a novel, and I venture to suggest for your consideration the question: what are the functions of the novel? I am not talking about historical novels when people write a story of some past age. I am talking about the contemporary novelist. By "the contemporary novelist" I mean the novelist who writes about his contemporaries, who holds up a mirror to the society of his own day, and the value of the novel is not merely to entertain the contemporaries of the novel; it stands as a record or a picture of the society when it was written. Those of us who enjoy the great Victorian novelists get such understanding as we have of that great age from chroniclers such as Thackeray, Dickens, Trollope and many others. And where should we be today if the literature of Greece, Rome and the other civilizations portrayed, not how people really thought and behaved, but how they did not think and how they did not speak and how they did not behave? The only real guidance we get about how people thought and behaved over the ages is in their contemporary literature.

It is equally important that we should have an understanding of how life is lived and how the human mind is working in those parts of the world which, although not separated from us in point of time, are separated from us in point of space. At a time like today, when ideas and creeds and processes of thought seem, to some extent, to be in the melting pot, this is more than ever necessary, for people are bewildered and puzzled to know in what direction humanity is headed. If we are to understand how life, for example, is lived in the United States, France, Germany, or elsewhere, the contemporary novels of those nations may afford us some guide, and to those of us who have not the time or the opportunity or the money or the inclination to travel, it may even be the only guide. This is an American novel written by an American, published originally in New York and purporting to depict the lives of people living today in New York, to portray their speech and their attitude in general towards this particular aspect of life. If we are going to read novels about how things go on in New York, it would not be of much assistance, would it, if, contrary to the fact, we were led to suppose that in New York no unmarried woman of teenage has disabused her mind of the idea that babies are brought by storks or are sometimes found in cabbage plots or under gooseberry bushes?

You may think that this is a very crude work; but that it is not, perhaps, altogether an exaggerated picture of the approach that is being made in America towards this great problem of sex. You may think that if this does reflect the approach on that side of the Atlantic towards this great question, it is just as well that we should know it and that we must not close our eyes or our minds to the truth because it might conceivably corrupt or deprave any somewhat puerile young mind.

You may agree that it is a good book, or a bad book, or a moderate book. It is at least a book. It is the creation of a human mind and it depicts the people created in their particular environment. If you look at the front page, you will see the text. It is taken from a Victorian poet, Browning: "What of soul was "left, I wonder, when the kissing had to stop?" and I suppose men and woman of all ages have wondered that.

The theme of this book is the story of the rather attractive young man who is absolutely obsessed with his desire for women. It is not presented as an admirable thing, or a thing to be copied. It is not presented as a thing that brought him happiness or any sort of permanent satisfaction, and throughout the book you hear the note of impending disaster. He is like the drunkard who cannot keep away from drink although he knows where it will land him in the end.

The author traces the moral thought of this man back to his childhood where the unhappy relations between his mother and his father left a sort of permanent bruise on his personality. He describes the pitfalls of slyness and filth into which the unhappy adolescent stumbles, without knowledge or experience, without the map and the compass and without the guiding hand of a wise parent or the example of a well-ordered, decent, home. You will have to consider whether the author was pursuing an honest purpose and an honest thread of thought, or whether that was all just a bit of camouflage to render the crudity, the sex of the book, sufficiently wrapped up to pass the critical standard of the Director of Public Prosecutions. So far as his amatory adventures are concerned, the book does, with candour or, if you prefer it, crudity, deal with the realities of human love and intercourse. There is no getting away from that, and the Crown say: "Well, that is sheer filth." Is the act of sexual passion sheer filth? It may be an error of taste to write about it. It may be a matter in which some, perhaps old-fashioned, people would prefer that reticence continued to be observed as it was yesterday. But is it sheer filth? That is a matter which you have to consider and ultimately to decide.

I do not suppose there is a decent man or woman in this court who does not whole-heartedly believe that pornography, the filthy bawdy muck that is just filth for filth's sake, ought to be stamped out and suppressed. Such books are not literature. They have got no message; they have got no inspiration; they have got no thought. They have got nothing. They are just filth and ought to be stamped out. But in our desire for a healthy society, if we drive the criminal law too far, further than it ought to go, is there not a risk that there will be a revolt, a demand for a change in the law, and that the pendulum may swing too far the other way and allow to creep in things that at the moment we can exclude and keep out?

That is all I have to say to you. Remember what I said when I began. You are dealing with a criminal charge. This is not a question or a case of what you think is a desirable book to read. It is a criminal charge of publishing a work with a tendency to corrupt and deprave those to whom it may fall. Before you can return a verdict of "Guilty" on that charge you have to be satisfied, and each one of you has to be satisfied, that that charge has been proved. If is it anything short of that the accused are entitled to a verdict at your hands of "Not Guilty."

Verdict: Not Guilty.

Ex parte EASTBOURNE WATERWORKS CO.
v.
OFFICIAL RECEIVER.

[No. 2 of 1954 in the Tunbridge Wells County Court in Bankruptcy.]

Bankruptcy—Rating—Water rate—Whether payable in priority to other debts—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 33 (1) (a).

A rate payable to a waterworks company in respect of the supply of water to an occupier is not comprised in the expression "all "parochial or other local rates" in section 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and therefore is not, in the distribution of the property of a bankrupt, included in the debts payable in priority to all other debts.

Dicta of Lord Alverstone C.J. and Henn Collins M.R. in Northampton Corporation v. Ellen [1904] 1 K.B. 299, 313, 315; 20 T.L.R. 168, applied.

Special case stated by His Honour Judge F. K. Glazebrook. judge of the Tunbridge Wells county court, for the opinion of the High Court on the question of law therein submitted pursuant to section 100 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

The case stated set out the following facts: In the motion the applicant company claimed a declaration that certain sums due to it from the bankrupt for the supply of water were payable in priority.

On February 10, 1954, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt in the Tunbridge Wells county court on a creditor's petition, and on February 28, 1954, he was adjudicated bankrupt. On the adjudication the official receiver, the respondent to the motion, became and remained trustee ex officio of the property of the bankrupt. The applicant company (hereinafter called "the "company") was incorporated by the Eastbourne Waterworks Act, 1859, to acquire the undertaking of the Eastbourne Waterworks Company, Ld. The company carried on the undertaking of the supply of water in the town of Eastbourne and certain adjacent areas. The company's powers were regulated by the Eastbourne Waterworks Acts, 1859 to 1921, together with the Eastbourne Waterworks Order, 1948, under which the company acquired the Hailsham Water Company's undertaking.

The company was a creditor of the bankrupt in respect of the sum of £5 13s. 9d., being the aggregate of the "water rates" payable by the bankrupt in respect of the period December 25, 1952, to February 10, 1954, for the supply by the company of water to certain premises belonging to the bankrupt and known as 88 and 89, Beachlands Estate, Pevensey, in the county of Sussex, and for the period June 24, 1952, to January 14, 1953, for the supply by the company of water to certain other property belonging to the bankrupt and known as 100, Beachlands Estate, Pevensey, for which sum of £5 13s. 9d. the company filed its proof of debt, sworn on March 1, 1954. It was not disputed that that sum represented a proper charge for the supply of water by the company, the imposition of which was authorized by the provisions of the relevant Acts and in particular section 3 of the Act of 1921. The company claimed that that "water rate" fell within the category of "all parochial or other local rates" appearing in section 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914,[1] and that, accordingly, so much of that "water rate" as was due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order and had become due and payable within twelve months next before that time was payable in priority. The official receiver rejected the company's claim to priority in respect of the water rate. It was agreed that, of the water rates payable on the premises, £1 13s. 8d. had become due and payable on 88, Beachlands Estate, and £2 9s. on 89, Beachlands Estate, on demand dated January 16, 1954, based on a proportion of the rateable value of those premises.

Both parties wished to have determined in the first instance in the High Court the question raised by the motion and the county court judge stated this case accordingly. The question was: whether the aforesaid sums of £1 13s. 8d and £2 9s. due to the company, being "water rates," were comprehended within the term "all parochial or other local rates" under section 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and, as such, were entitled to be paid in priority.

G. C. Dunbar for the company.
Muir Hunter for the official receiver.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Ex parte Harrison[2]; In re An Arranging Debtor.[3]

DANCKWERTS J. This case raises the question, which, I think, has not hitherto been directly decided by any court except possibly a county court, whether a sum of money due to a waterworks company in respect of the supply of water is to be treated as a preferential debt in bankruptcy by reason of section 33 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

[1] Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33: "(1) In the distribution of the property of a bankrupt there shall be paid in priority to all other debts— "(a) All parochial or other local rates due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, and having become due and payable within twelve months next before that time, and all assessed taxes, land tax, property or income tax, assessed on the bankrupt up to April 5 next before the date of the receiving order, and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment."

Baker, a Bankrupt, In re. Ex parte Eastbourne Waterworks Co. v. Official Receiver.

Danckwerts J.

[His Lordship read the subsection and continued as follows:] The company was formed under the Eastbourne Waterworks Act, 1859, and has powers conferred by a number of other statutes, and its local Act or special Act incorporates the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. It is no doubt true that it will be found in those Acts that the company is entitled to charge for supply of water what in those Acts is called "the rate," and the rate is to be ascertained, in certain circumstances at any rate, by reference to the rateable value of the property of the occupier who is supplied with water. On the other hand, the question arises whether the money payable in respect of the supply of water is a rate of the kind referred to in section 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

I have been referred to a number of authorities, but very few, if any, of them touch the point which I have to decide. In In re Mannesmann Tube Co. Ld.,[1] it is perfectly plain that it was assumed that a sum payable for the supply of water, and therefore commonly termed "a water rate," was a preferential debt in bankruptcy, and the only point in the case was the date relevant for the purpose of the preference. The debt was assumed to be preferential and the point was apparently not argued.

I was referred to a number of cases of landlord and tenant in which the point was argued on covenants to pay rates, taxes, impositions and the like under the special terms of the covenant contained in the lease. Such cases included Direct Spanish Telegraph Co. Ld. v. Shepherd,[2] Badcock and Another v. Hunt,[3] and Bourne & Tant v. Salmon & Gluckstein Ld.[4] However, none of those cases, I think, really touches the question which I have to decide, which depends, not on a covenant in a lease, but on a statute giving a preference to particular kinds of creditors.

The nearest case, in a sense, is In re Ellwood,[5] in which it was held that what is called a drainage rate, chargeable by a drainage board, was a preferential payment for the purpose of bankruptcy. On the other hand, the argument in that case against preference was put on the ejusdem generis rule, and I am satisfied, as the court was in that case, that section 33 has nothing to do with that rule. On the other hand, the drainage rate, as has been pointed out by Mr. Muir Hunter, is a rate which the local inhabitants in the district cannot avoid; they cannot say, "we will not have "drainage" or "we will not contribute towards it." If they are in a district which is liable to flooding, they will have to pay. It is not like a public water supply which, though it may for practical purposes be a necessity, is something which need not be taken involuntarily.

In re Flack,[6] to which I was also referred, also is to be distinguished from the present case, because there the supply of water was by means of a meter, and did not involve payment by reference to the rateable value of the property.

In my view, the matter was put most accurately in Northampton Corporation v. Ellen,[7] which, it is true, was not a decision on the point which I have to decide. The question there was whether the charge to the consumers in respect of water supplied had to be at the same rate for everybody. I would refer to the observations of Lord Alverstone C.J. where he said[8]: "In my "opinion it is not correct to speak of this corporation as rating "in respect of water supply. There may be cases in which that "expression could properly be used with regard to a corporation; "but in the present case I think they do not rate in respect of "water supply in the proper sense of the words, but merely charge "a sum, the amount of which is ascertained by reference to a "percentage upon the rateable value of the house, and I do not "think that section 36 gives rise to any implication that they "must charge all consumers at an equal rate in the pound."

Henn Collins M.R. said[9]: "The only expression in it which "gives any countenance to that suggestion"—that is, the equality argument—"is that the charge is spoken of as a 'water rate.' "I do not think that it is a necessary implication from that "expression that the charge must be at an equal rate on all "consumers. The basis upon which that implication is suggested "is the supposed analogy to a poor rate. But there is no such "analogy. The original statute of Elizabeth, from which "the poor-rate derives its origin, no doubt contains no "provision for equality in rating, but, having regard to the "nature of the charge, the reason for its imposition, and the "persons on whom it is imposed, it is obvious that the "very essence of the thing involved that the charge on all "the ratepayers should be at an equal rate. It is an imposition "upon citizens of a duty to the community in proportion to "their means, and the character of the duty necessarily involves "equality in rating. There is no analogy between such a rate and "a charge to be made for a marketable commodity, such as water, "which a company is under an obligation to sell, and householders "needing it have a right to buy for their individual consumption." That, to my mind, makes a right distinction in regard to these matters.

So far I have not referred in terms to the definitions contained in the respective statutes. With regard to the Waterworks Clauses Act, the definition of a "water rate," so called in section 3 is: "The expression 'water rate' shall include any rent, "reward, or payment to be made to the undertakers for a supply "of water." In other words, it is a payment to be made for a supply of a commodity, as pointed out by Lord Collins.

Next, coming to rating, the statute which is, I think, typical of the various rating Acts, namely, the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, by section 68, defines "rate" in this way: "'Rate' means "a rate the proceeds of which are applicable to local purposes of a "public nature and which is leviable on the basis of an assessment "in respect of the yearly value of property, and includes any "sum which, though obtained in the first instance by a precept, "certificate or other instrument requiring payment from some "authority or officer, is or can be ultimately raised out of a rate as "before defined, but does not include: (a) any rate which is "assessed under any commission of sewers, or in respect of any "drainage, wall, embankment, or other work for the benefit of "the land; or (b) any rate of the description commonly known as "a church rate, a tithe rate, or a rector's rate, or any other rate "of a similar character; or (c) any rate which is leviable by the "conservators of a common; or (d) any rate payable by consumers "for a supply of water; or (e) any rate of the description com-"monly known as a garden rate or square rate, if levied by any "persons other than a rating authority."

To my mind, that shows that a rate of the type described in that Act, which, of course, is later than the Acts relevant to the supply of water, is something quite different from what is known popularly (and, indeed, in those Acts) as a "water rate."

In my judgment, the legislature really has in mind two different things, and one must turn to section 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, to see what they are. Paragraph (a) provides: "All "parochial or other local rates due from the bankrupt at the date "of the receiving order, and having become due and payable "within twelve months next before that time, and all assessed "taxes, land tax, property or income tax, assessed on the bank-"rupt up to April 5 next before the date of the receiving "order. . . ." Though those are different matters, they are alike in this respect, that they are matters of taxation: and what the legislature had in mind in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, was local and general taxation, or it may be called local and national taxation. Therefore, it excludes completely the idea of payments for the supply of water, which may be called rates because they are assessed at a particular rate or payable at a particular rate.

This section, I would observe, is one conferring special preference on certain debts, and in conferring a privilege or preference on debts there must be care not to extend unduly the privilege or preference in question. The words, therefore, must be construed with some strictness.

For the reasons which I have stated, I am satisfied that a rate payable to a water company in respect of the supply of water to some occupier is not a "parochial or other" local rate within the meaning of section 33 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. Accordingly, I will declare that the aforesaid sums of £1 13s. 8d. and £2 9s. due to the company, being water rates, are not comprehended within the term "all parochial or other local rates" under section 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and, as such, are not entitled to be paid in priority. I direct that the costs of the official receiver be taxed and paid by the company.

Declaration accordingly.

Tribunal—Statutory. Compulsory Purchase.

It is of importance that an agricultural land tribunal, which is the sole judge between the subject and the Minister and whose decision is binding on both, should be appointed strictly in accordance with paragraph 15 of Schedule 9 to the Agriculture Act, 1947.

An agricultural land tribunal, the two members of which, other than the chairman, had been appointed by the secretary of the tribunal, who was not authorized and had no delegated authority from the Minister to appoint them, purported to confirm a proposal by the Minister to give a certificate under section 85 (2) of the Agriculture Act, 1947, retaining in his possession land under requisition, and the Minister, acting on the determination of the tribunal, gave such a certificate:—

Held, that the tribunal, its members not having been appointed in accordance with paragraph 15 of Schedule 9 of the Act of 1947, had not been properly constituted and its determination, and the Minister's certificate given in pursuance thereof, were null and void.

Held, further, that, as the most essential condition, the reference to a properly appointed tribunal, had not been observed, the certificate was not a certificate within the Act and, therefore, notwithstanding that no application had been made to the High Court within six weeks of the service of notice of the making of the certificate, paragraph 16 of the Schedule to the Acquisition of Land (Authorization Procedure) Act, 1946, did not apply, and the court was not precluded from declaring that the certificate was null and void.

Action.

In 1941 the Essex War Agricultural Executive Committee took possession of certain land. In 1947, while the land was still under requisition, the plaintiff became the owner in fee simple of a part of some three acres of the land. On June 16, 1951, the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries gave notice in writing that he proposed to give a certificate under section 85 (2)[1] of the Agriculture Act, 1947, relating to, inter alia, the plaintiff's land. The plaintiff appealed against the Minister's proposal and on September 24, 1951, her objection, together with the objection of a number of other owners whose land was affected by the proposal, was heard by an agricultural land tribunal. On October 12, 1951, the tribunal issued its decision purporting to confirm the proposal of the Minister in respect of the land of the plaintiff and of all but six of the other objectors. who was authorized by the Minister to authenticate the seal, was issued, relating to the land of the plaintiff and of various other owners, purporting to certify in pursuance of his powers under section 85 that the Minister was satisfied that it was necessary for the purpose of enabling him to secure or maintain the full and efficient use for agriculture that possession of the land should be retained by him or on his behalf. On October 6, 1952, notice of the giving of the certificate was served, and on October 16, 1953, a notice to treat was served on the plaintiff.

The chairman of the agricultural land tribunal which heard the reference had been duly appointed by the Lord Chancellor. The two nominated members were appointed by the secretary of the tribunal, who, after a discussion with the chairman and with his approval, orally asked them if they would sit on the tribunal for the purposes of the inquiry. The members agreed to sit and the secretary later wrote to them, confirming the appointments and sending them further details. The secretary was also a civil servant employed by the Ministry, but in selecting the members of the tribunal he was acting in the capacity of its secretary, and the letters to both members were signed by him as secretary of the tribunal, and at no time had he been given any authority or instructions to appoint the members of the tribunal.

The plaintiff brought proceedings in the High Court for declarations that the certificate dated September 30, 1952, and the notice to treat were null and void. She alleged that the tribunal purporting to confirm the Minister's proposal was not validly constituted, in that the members other than the chairman were not appointed by the Minister in accordance with the provisions of the Agriculture Act, 1947, and that the alleged confirmation was null and void. She also alleged that the certificate of the Minister was null and void in that it was not made by the Minister as required by the Act, and related to the land of various other persons in addition to her land.

The Minister denied the allegations. Alternatively, he contended that, as no application had been made to the High Court within six weeks of the service of notice of the giving of the certificate, it could not, by virtue of section 92 of the Agriculture Act, 1947, and section 1 and paragraphs 15 and 16 of the First Schedule to the Acquisition of Land (Authorization Procedure) Act, 1947, be questioned. He also relied on paragraph 20 (2) of Ninth Schedule to the Agriculture Act, 1947, as validating the proceedings of the tribunal.

The further facts are stated in the judgment of Stable J.

A. P. Marshall Q.C. and Gilbert Dare for the plaintiff.
Basil Wingate-Saul for the Minister.

1954

Woollett
v.
Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.

Stable J. This case raises questions of some difficulty and considerable importance. The action is brought by the plaintiff against the Minister of Agriculture in his corporate capacity, asking for a series of declarations which, if granted, will, at all events for the time being, prevent the acquisition by the Minister of three acres of land adjacent to the bungalow where she and her husband are living and where they contemplate some enterprise in the nature of a smallholding.

The plaintiff substantially rests her claim on three grounds. First, that by reason of a defect, if it was a defect, in the appointment of the tribunal, the conditions of the Agriculture Act, 1947, the Act empowering the Minister to acquire her land, have not been complied with, and that, accordingly, any compulsory power which the Minister purports to exercise and which must be conditional on a proper hearing by a properly appointed tribunal is null and void. Secondly, that the certificate, which purported to be issued under the seal of the Minister and which is a document of considerable importance in relation to an acquisition of land under the Act, was not the act of the Minister. Thirdly, although this was a matter hardly discussed, the plaintiff contends that by the inclusion of lands belonging to various owners in the same certificate and in one hearing before the tribunal, the requirements of the Act had not been complied with.

I need say little about the last point. Whether it is a desirable practice that the inquiry before the tribunal should comprise a vast number of different properties under different ownership is a matter on which I express no opinion one way or the other. I can see nothing in the Act of Parliament which invalidates proceedings because, as it were, the documents and proceedings consequent thereon comprised more than one property in different ownership.

The second point, that the certificate which was given under the seal of the Minister was not a ministerial act, can be disposed of very shortly. The seal was authenticated by one Garside, a senior civil servant in the Ministry. He was authorized by the Minister of Agriculture to authenticate the seal, but he had no express or specific direction from the Minister to issue this particular certificate. In my view that objection to the proceedings fails. I have no doubt that Garside, as he told me, was instructed by the Minister to proceed with the compulsory acquisition of this particular plot of land, and I think that that authority was quite sufficient to invest him with the power to take the necessary steps to set in motion the requisite machinery.

That leaves the first point, which goes to the composition of the tribunal. Section 85 of the Agriculture Act, 1947, provides: "... for the purpose of enabling the Minister to secure or main-" tain the full and efficient use for agriculture—(a) of agricultural " land of which the Minister or a person acting under his authority " is in possession, or (b) of other such agricultural land in con-" junction with which in the opinion of the Minister the land

"mentioned in paragraph (a) of this subsection ought to be "farmed," he, by taking the appropriate steps, has the power to acquire that land compulsorily, that is to say, to acquire it over the heads of the person or persons who own the land. In passing, it is worth noting that sections of the Act, as for example, sections 16 and 17, where machinery is set up for dispossessing people who were either farming their land badly or not managing the land as it should be managed, albeit that those sections come into force by reason of the failure of the owner or the occupier as the case may be, contain various safeguards to ensure that the procedure under them is not abused. Section 85 is very far-reaching. Quite how far it could be held to extend if the matter came before the ordinary courts of the country for construction we shall not know, because the effect of the section is that the only safeguard as between the subject whose land is being compulsorily acquired and the executive or government who are taking it, is the report and the determination of a statutory tribunal whose decision on the matter is binding on the Minister.

The importance of the tribunal and the gravity of the duty that it is called upon to discharge is indicated by the fact that not only are they the judges of fact in each case but it is to them alone that the construction of this particular section of the Act of Parliament is left. It is very difficult to envisage a state of facts in which an action could be brought before the courts on the grounds that the Minister in acquiring land under the section had gone outside and beyond the powers that the section confers, which are simply to acquire land to enable the Minister to secure or maintain the full and efficient use of it for agriculture. As a condition of setting the machine in motion, the Minister has to be satisfied that it is necessary for those purposes that he should obtain possession of the land, and he has to certify accordingly. The emphasis I place on that is that the word used is not "desirable" or "advantageous" but "necessary," and I have no doubt that that section is susceptible of interpretation by the competent courts where the exact meaning or emphasis placed on the word "necessary" would receive proper consideration.

The Act contains certain machinery for putting the powers into force, and it provides for the appointment of a tribunal. Section 74 (4) makes it compulsory on the Minister to act in accordance with the report of the tribunal "and not otherwise." The tribunal is, therefore, a most important feature in relation to that particular section. Paragraph 13 of Schedule IX to the Act provides that the tribunal "shall consist of a chairman and two other "members . . . The chairman shall be appointed by the Lord "Chancellor," and he must have the legal qualifications there set out. He holds office for three years and is eligible for reappointment. He may resign his office by notice in writing served on the Lord Chancellor and so on. Paragraph 15 provides that "The "two members of an agricultural land tribunal other than the

Woollett v. Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.

Stable J.

"chairman (hereinafter referred to as 'nominated members') "shall, for each reference to the tribunal, be appointed by the "Minister and shall be so appointed respectively from a panel of "persons" drawn from two sources which I need not more particularly specify. The operative words are that "the two "members . . . shall, for each reference to the tribunal, be "appointed by the Minister," and the complaint here is that, far from being appointed by the Minister, the tribunal which inquired into this particular matter, and before which the plaintiff and others appeared and ventilated their grievances, was never appointed by anybody.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence, and continued:] What happened was that, one Comyns, who was a civil servant employed by the Ministry and attached to the department which was actually concerned with the management of the land in question, was also appointed secretary of this tribunal. I should like to emphasize that no sort of hint or suggestion against Comyns' bona fides in this matter has been made from first to last; he acted throughout with complete good faith and absolute integrity. He said that he had never had any specific instructions from anybody, but he simply carried on with the job done by his predecessor. There is no doubt that neither the Minister nor anybody acting for the Minister, nor anybody to whom the Minister's powers had been delegated, had ever purported to authorize or instruct anybody to appoint the two nominated members, either to this inquiry or, so far as I know, to any other. Comyns himself said that he regarded himself in a dual capacity; that when he was doing the Ministry's work he regarded himself as the servant of the Ministry; when he was acting as the secretary to this judicial tribunal he regarded himself as the servant of the tribunal. That is, in my view, a most proper attitude for him to adopt.

In this case the first of the two nominated members to be chosen, a Mr. Elliott, was selected in this way. Comyns was present with the chairman, Sir Cecil Oakes, and Mr. Elliott, and after discussion with Sir Cecil, and with Sir Cecil's knowledge and approval, Comyns approached Mr. Elliott and asked him if he would sit on the tribunal for the purpose of this particular inquiry. As regards the second member, a Mr. Soper, again after consultation with and with the approval of Sir Cecil Oakes, the chairman, he was approached by Comyns, and agreed to act as one of the two nominated members. Again there is not the slightest suggestion that either of those two gentlemen was biassed or misconducted himself in any shape or form. The whole point is whether they were appointed to the tribunal, and whether or not this tribunal ever was properly constituted.

It is to be observed that all Comyns' letters confirming the appointments, fixing dates, enclosing documents, were signed by him as secretary; they were all written on the notepaper of the Agricultural Land Tribunal, and I have not the slightest doubt that he, in acting as he did was, as he quite honestly thought, properly acting in his capacity as secretary to the tribunal and not as a civil servant to whom had been delegated the selection and appointment of members to the tribunal by the Minister. But where a tribunal of this kind is the only protection that the subject has against the encroachment of the executive, it is of vital importance that its appointment should be regarded as a very serious matter, and should be made strictly in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Parliament.

I was referred to a number of authorities, and in deference to a very able argument that was addressed to me by Mr. Wingate-Saul, I think I ought to deal in some detail with the submissions that he made on this matter, and with the authorities that he cited in support of those submissions. The first authority which he cited is West Riding County Council v. Wilson,[1] in which the instrument under criticism was a letter signed by the assistant land commissioner, and expressed to be authorized by the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries giving a requisite consent. Viscount Caldicote C.J., in disposing of that point, said[2]: "The further "point is taken that the letter from Hole is void because the "Minister had no power to delegate his responsibility to Hole. "I do not read the letter in that way. Hole was authorized, "according to the letter, by the Minister of Agriculture and "Fisheries, and, in the absence of any evidence that he was not "so authorized, I accept that letter as the letter of the Minister, "or as the consent of the Minister in writing. It is not the case "that all consents of ministers have to be signed by the ministers "themselves. The business and the duties of ministers of the "Crown would very often be quite impossible if they had to sign "all the documents in which their consent was given or their "opinion expressed."

In Carltona Ld. v. Commissioners of Works,[3] the question in issue was as to the validity of an order of the Commissioners of Works purporting to requisition certain premises. The passage which was cited, and which is not infrequently cited as laying down a general principle of approach to these matters, appears in the judgment of Lord Greene M.R., who said[4]: "In the adminis-"tration of government in this country the functions which are "given to ministers (and constitutionally properly given to minis-"ters because they are constitutionally responsible) are functions "so multifarious that no minister could ever personally attend to "them. To take the example of the present case no doubt "there have been thousands of requisitions in this country by "individual ministries. It cannot be supposed that this regulation "meant that, in each case, the minister in person should direct "his mind to the matter. The duties imposed upon ministers and

"the powers given to ministers are normally exercised under the "authority of the ministers by responsible officials of the depart-"ment. Public business could not be carried on if that were not "the case. Constitutionally, the decision of such an official is, of "course, the decision of the minister. The minister is respon-"sible. It is he who must answer before Parliament for anything "that his officials have done under his authority, and, if for an "important matter he selected an official of such junior standing "that he could not be expected competently to perform the work, "the minister would have to answer for that in Parliament. The "whole system of departmental organization and administration is "based on the view that ministers, being responsible to Parlia-"ment, will see that important duties are committed to "experienced officials. If they do not do that, Parliament is the "place where complaint must be made against them." Then at the close of his judgment, Lord Greene M.R. said[5]: "All that "the court can do is to see that the power which it is claimed to "exercise is one which falls within the four corners of the powers "given by the legislature and to see that those powers are exer-"cised in good faith. Apart from that, the courts have no power "at all to inquire into the reasonableness, the policy, the sense, "or any other aspect of the transaction."

In Metropolitan Borough and Town Clerk of Lewisham v. Roberts,[6] the instrument in question was a letter emanating from the Ministry of Health, written by a general inspector in the Ministry stating that he was directed by the Minister to say that he delegated to the town clerk certain functions under regulation 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. Bucknill L.J.[7] cited a passage from the judgment of the county court judge whose decision was under appeal, who, having had cited to him the passage from the judgment of Lord Greene M.R. in Carltona Ld. v. Commissioners of Works,[8] referred to that case and continued[9]: "'Applying these considerations to the present "'case, I am unable to say that the evidence shows that Mr. "'O'Gara in purporting to sanction on behalf of the minister "'the requisitioning of property, and in particular in issuing the "'document of November 12, 1946, was acting without authority "'to do so. On the contrary, the presumption being that "'ministerial acts will be performed, not by the minister in "'person, but by responsible officials in his department, I think "'that where such acts of an official nature, all of them involving "'the knowledge and some of them requiring and receiving the "'concurrence of other officials have, as here, continued over a "'long period, this of itself affords cogent evidence that the "'person in fact acting in such an official capacity was duly "'authorized to act.'" Bucknill L.J.[10] proceeded to point out that that was a finding of fact of the county court judge and that he was not disposed in any way to interfere.

Denning L.J. said [11]: "The first point taken here was that "the town clerk was not authorized to requisition this house "because his only authority was derived from a letter from an "official in the Ministry of Health who could point to no autho-"rity from the minister himself. Now I take it to be quite plain "that when a minister is entrusted with administrative, as "distinct from legislative, functions he is entitled to act by any "authorized official of his department. The minister is not "bound to give his mind to the matter personally. That is "implicit in the modern machinery of government: see Carltona "Ld. v. Commissioner of Works,[12] and an article by Professor "Willis in 21 Canadian Bar Review, at p. 257. When, there-"fore, a government department requisitions property itself under "reg. 51 (1), it is not necessary for the minister himself to con-"sider the matter. It is sufficient if one of the officials of that "department brings his mind to bear on the propriety of it. "When the government department delegates its functions to a "town clerk under reg. 51 (5), it is really only putting someone "in its place to do the acts which it is authorized to do. The "town clerk is, so to speak, an agent of the department, and a "sub-agent of the Crown. The delegation to the town clerk is "simply administrative machinery so as to enable the adminis-"trative function of requisitioning to operate smoothly and "efficiently; and, like all administrative functions, the act of "delegating can be exercised by any authorized official of the "government department."

Although it has no direct bearing on the present problem, Mr. Marshall cited Acton Borough Council v. Morris,[13] for the purpose of reading a passage of general application in the judgment of Somervell L.J., who said [14]: "These delegated "circulars were not normally available to members of the public "whose property might be taken under them, but they were, of "of course, disclosed on discovery. I think that it is a case in "which the principle to be applied is that those who are exer-"cising special powers to take private property must see that "they carry out accurately and in detail the Act of Parliament "or, in this case, the form and conditions of the delegation under "the Defence Regulations. Nor is it clear that this is a matter "of no substance. Nobody can say, and I think that it would be "inadmissible to call evidence on the subject. All that has "happened here is confirmation of something which did not "require confirmation, namely, taking possession of the premises. "There are no words to suggest that the Minister has been asked "to extend, and has extended, the time. For these reasons I "think that this first point succeeds."

Woollett
v.
Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.

Stable J.

The sharp distinction between the first three cases cited to me and the facts of the present case is, that in each of those cases there was an instrument, a letter of some kind or another, emanating from an official, in which it was expressly stated that he was authorized to act for the Minister and purported to be so acting. In the present case it is abundantly plain that neither the Minister nor, so far as I know, anybody connected with the Ministry, gave the matter a moment's thought. So far from the Minister acting by an agent in the appointment of this tribunal, the evidence is plain that he did nothing of the kind. There was no instrument of appointment. All that happened was that Comyns rang up the members, found out if it was convenient for them to sit, and then confirmed the date and so on in the letters that he wrote. But in so doing, Comyns was not expressing himself to be authorized by the Minister; he did not purport to be acting on behalf of the Minister; he did not think that he was acting on behalf of the Minister, and in point of fact he was not. He was functioning as the secretary of the tribunal and nothing else.

Mr. Wingate-Saul, taking a somewhat formidable point, referred me to paragraphs 19 and 20 of Schedule IX to the Agriculture Act, 1947. Paragraph 19 deals with the disqualification of persons from sitting as members of a land tribunal, and paragraph 20 (2) is in these terms: "All acts done at any "meeting of any such body shall, notwithstanding that it is "afterwards discovered that there was a defect in the appoint-"ment or disqualification of a person purporting to be a member "thereof, be as valid as if that defect had not existed." There must be some limit to the operation of that paragraph. Can it be said that, if inadvertently the wrong person selected two people, or, if you like, three, from the wrong panel to act as an agricultural land tribunal, the body so constituted in disregard of every single provision of the Act of Parliament would acquire, under that sub-paragraph, validity for what it did? It must not be forgotten that the determination of the tribunal is binding on the subject and on the Minister and that it is subject to no appeal either in relation to matters of fact or questions of law. It is the only and the final tribunal.

Mr. Marshall meets paragraph 20 (2) with the contention, which I accept, that in the present case there was not a defect in appointment for there never was an appointment at all. It is important to observe that the land tribunal is not a body in more or less permanent session or even in a state of suspended animation. Reverting to paragraph 15 of Schedule IX: "The two members of an agricultural land tri-"bunal other than the chairman . . . shall, for each reference "to the tribunal be appointed by the Minister," therefore, unless and until in relation to a particular reference two nominated members have been appointed by the Minister, there is not an agricultural land tribunal in esse. In my judgment that is exactly the position here. It was not a defective appointment, but because the tribunal did not exist, there never was an appointment which could have had a defect.

Before I pass from that, there is one further matter to which reference should be made. Section 74 of the Act provides that where, under the Act, a person is empowered to require that a proposal of the Minister shall be referred to the agricultural land tribunal, then the proposal shall be referred accordingly and then "(2) . . . the tribunal shall determine (a) whether "the conditions as to which the Minister must be satisfied "before taking the action are fulfilled, and (b) whether, "having regard to their determination under the foregoing para-"graph and to all the circumstances of the case, the Minister "should or should not take the action proposed, and shall report "to the Minister accordingly; and the Minister shall forward a "copy of the report to any person who availed himself of an "opportunity to make representations to the Minister." Subsection (4), to which I have already referred, directs that "the "Minister shall act in accordance with the report of the tri-"bunal and not otherwise."

Not unnaturally, the plaintiff applied to the Minister, as she was entitled to do, for a copy of the so-called tribunal's report. The result, I confess, of her request has astonished me. There were no less than 25 persons whose rights were involved, and the deliberation of the tribunal which was finally to determine those rights occupied no more than one day. The result was that 19 of the objectors were unsuccessful and had their land taken, whereas six, for some reason or another, succeeded and escaped from being compulsorily bought out. The so-called report of this tribunal is headed, "Between owners detailed "overleaf, applicants, and the Minister of Agriculture and "Fisheries, respondent," and there are a number of names on the back; the unsuccessful applicants apparently. It is headed "Decision of the tribunal." It is apparently a typed or printed form, and is signed by the chairman "For and on behalf "of the Eastern Province Agricultural Land Tribunal," and it is in these terms: "Whereas in exercise of the powers con-"ferred upon him by section 85 of the Agriculture Act, 1947, the "Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries has proposed to certify "that it is necessary for the purpose mentioned in subsection (1) "of the said section 85 for possession of the land above mentioned "to be retained by him or on his behalf, and whereas the appli-"cants being persons on whom notice of a proposed compulsory "purchase order would be required to be served under sub-"section (4) of the said section 85 have duly required that the "proposal of the Minister be referred to the said tribunal, now "the tribunal, having satisfied itself that all parties entitled to "appear before it have so appeared or have been duly summoned "to appear and having heard the evidence tendered by such

"parties and having inspected the said land and having determined that the conditions as to which the Minister is required to be satisfied under subsection (2) of the said section 85 have been fulfilled and having regard to such determination and to all the circumstances of the case hereby confirms the proposal of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries in respect of the said land."

Although it is not a matter that is relied upon as invalidating these proceedings, I venture to say that I find it very difficult to believe that, when the Legislature said that the tribunal should report and that interested parties should have a right to receive a copy of that report, the Legislature did not have in mind something in the nature of a considered judgment which would set out not merely the conclusion at which the tribunal arrived, but the process by which that conclusion was reached.

The next point that Mr. Wingate-Saul made arises under the joint operation of the material sections of the Agriculture Act, 1947, and the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946. Section 92 (1) of the Agriculture Act, 1947, provides that where the Minister has authority to purchase land compulsorily, the procedure shall follow that laid down in the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946. Subsection (2) provides: "Where under any provision of this Act power is conferred on the Minister to purchase any particular land compulsorily on the giving of a certificate by him, the certificate shall have effect as if it were a compulsory purchase order made under section one of the said Act of 1946." Again, under subsection (2) (c), Part IV of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, mutatis mutandis is tied up to the Agriculture Act, 1947.

Turning to paragraph 15 in Part IV of the First Schedule to the Act of 1946, it is provided that within six weeks of the giving of notice of the Minister's decision, an application may be made to the High Court by any person aggrieved. Paragraph 16 provides that "Subject to the provisions of the last foregoing paragraph, a compulsory purchase order"—for this purpose it will read, "The Minister's certificate"—"shall not, either before or after it has been confirmed, made or given, be questioned in any legal proceedings whatsoever, and shall become operative on the date on which notice is first published as mentioned in the last foregoing paragraph."

If I followed Mr. Wingate-Saul's argument, he contended that once notice has been given of the making of the Minister's certificate and six weeks have elapsed without an application being made to the court under paragraph 15, the certificate acquires a degree of sanctification which precludes anybody from questioning it in any legal proceedings whatsoever. If that is the right interpretation to put on that paragraph, it comes to this—that all the safeguards provided in the Agriculture Act, 1947, are not only completely neutralized but, far worse, may create an illusion of security which does not exist, because if, let us assume, every conceivable irregularity has been committed, once notice has been given of the Minister's certificate for the requisite length of time, it becomes for all practical purposes a document of title which cannot be attacked by anybody in any court in any proceedings whatsoever. I find it very difficult to believe that paragraph 16, tucked away in Part IV of the First Schedule of the Act of 1946, was intended by the Legislature to destroy all the safeguards which they were so careful to insert in the Act of 1947.

Mr. Marshall submitted, and I accept his submission, that this certificate only becomes immune under the paragraph provided that it was in the first instance a proper certificate in accordance with section 85 of the Act of 1947. If the view that I have taken of this case is right, it never was a certificate in accordance with the provisions of that section because the most essential condition, namely the reference to a properly appointed tribunal, had not been observed, and inasmuch as there never was a certificate, then it never did obtain the freedom and shelter afforded by paragraph 16. In my view the plaintiff succeeds in this action on the grounds that I have stated.

Bailment.

The plaintiff, who was the owner of a caravan, kept it during the summer in a municipal camping ground maintained by the defendant corporation. Camping regulations made by the corporation provided for a summer season extending from the first Sunday in March of each year until the last Sunday in October, during which time the owners of caravans on payment of 25s. a week were entitled to occupy them. At the end of the summer season the regulations allowed such owners as desired to do so, to remove their caravans from the summer camping site to a tarmac park for storage during the winter, at a charge of 12s. 6d. a week. During the winter season owners were not entitled to use their caravans for residential purposes or to visit them except by permission, and the park was locked at night. Regulation 8 of the camping regulations provided: "Liability. The corporation will accept no liability for "injury to any person using the camping ground or for damage to, "or loss of the property of any such person."

Halbauer
v.
Brighton Corporation.

The plaintiff, who had used the camp facilities during the summer of 1951, had her caravan removed to the tarmac for the winter, and for her own convenience she allowed it to remain there until after the next summer season had begun. On March 11 the caravan was stolen during the night. The plaintiff brought an action against the corporation claiming the value of the caravan and its contents, which she alleged had been lost by reason of the defendants' negligence as bailees:—

Held, that, at the time of the loss of the caravan, the plaintiff was a person using the camping ground within regulation 8, and whether or not that regulation would apply to protect the defendants from liability for the loss of the caravan during the winter season, as the plaintiff had allowed the caravan to remain in the storage park until after the summer season had begun, the terms applicable to that season, including regulation 8, were in force at the time when the caravan was stolen, and the defendants were not bailees of the caravan and were relieved of liability for its loss.

Per Singleton and Denning L.JJ., Morris L.J. dubitante: During the winter season the defendants were bailees of the caravan.

Decision of McNair J. affirmed.

Appeal from McNair J. sitting at Lewes Assizes.

The plaintiff, Lily Eliza Halbauer, was the owner of a caravan. The defendants, the Brighton Corporation, provided a municipal camp for holiday makers with accommodation for caravans and motor-cars. The camp was closed each year from the last Sunday in October to the first Sunday in March, but persons who had caravans on the summer camping ground were permitted to leave them through the winter season on a tarmac site on payment of a storage charge of 12s. 6d. as opposed to the summer charge of 25s. a week. While the caravan was parked on the winter parking site, but after the summer season had begun, it was stolen.

The plaintiff brought an action against the corporation claiming the value of the caravan and its contents, which she alleged to have been lost as the result of the negligence of the defendants. The defendants denied liability and relied on the protection which they alleged was afforded them by regulation 8 of the camp regulations, which provided "Liability. The corporation will accept no "liability for injury to any person using the camping ground or for "damage to or loss of the property of any such person." It was contended for the plaintiff that regulation 8 only applied during the summer season and that during the winter there was a bailment of the caravan to the defendants and the regulation had no application.

McNair J. held that regulation 8 was sufficient to protect the defendants from liability.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 12. The following judgments were read:

SINGLETON L.J. The defendants, the Brighton Corporation, have a camping ground which is described as "Sheepcote Valley "camping ground for holiday-makers." For three or four years prior to March, 1952, the plaintiff, Mrs. Halbauer, had a caravan on the camping ground. She had a book in which the camp regulations appear, and there were copies of the regulations posted in several places within the camping ground. It must be taken that she was aware of the regulations and of their terms. On the night of March 11, 1952, the caravan was stolen.

On March 12, the entertainments manager of the corporation wrote: "Dear Sir, Arrears of storage charges for your caravan, "which I am informed was removed from the municipal camping "ground, Sheepcote Valley, on March 11, 1952, amounted to "£2 15s. Will you kindly remit this amount direct to the above "office by return of post. A stamped addressed envelope is "enclosed for the purpose." The plaintiff replied to the effect that she did not know anything about the removal of her caravan; that there must be some mistake.

When evidence was given in regard to the matter, the plaintiff's husband was asked what the warden had said about the loss of the caravan when he went to see him, and Mr. Halbauer replied: "He took me into his office and told me: 'I "'am very sorry, Mr. Halbauer, your caravan was stolen on "'March 11 between 7 and 8, I think. It was beautiful moon-"'shine.' I said: 'Did not you hear anything?' He said: 'No, "'I did not hear anything. We had the wireless on. Everything "'was inside and we did not hear a thing.'" Mr. Halbauer asked the assistant if that was right, and the assistant, according to Mr. Halbauer, said: "I am sorry the caravan had gone, and "there was a lady on the ground who saw it pulled out by a very "powerful car with no light on, and we did not take any notice."

The plaintiff brought an action claiming damages for the loss of the caravan and its contents. The total loss was agreed at £343 17s. 6d. The corporation denied liability and relied upon one of the camp regulations printed in the little book. The claim was heard by McNair J. at the assizes at Lewes on April 12, 1954, and he gave judgment for the defendants, holding that they were protected by the terms of the regulation upon which they relied. He did not find that there was negligence on the part of the corporation, though it may be said that his judgment is based on the assumption that there was.

It is necessary that I should say something as to the nature of the camping ground which is described in the little book, and which is shown on a plan. There is an area for the parking of caravans, each site bearing a number; there is an adjoining area for cars and tents, and there is a tarmac area on which there are stores, lavatories, etc. The book shows that the camp is open from the first Sunday in March until the last Sunday in October, and the charge on the caravan site is 5s. a night or 25s. a week. This was the charge paid by the plaintiff for the parking of her caravan during what may be called the summer season.

On the same page of the book there are shown charges for kit storage, summer and winter, and: "Winter Parking, caravans "12s. 6d. per week (payable in advance)," to which is added: "(Note: Caravans accepted for parking during the winter must be "removed to the tarmac for the period)." During the period from 1948 or 1949 until March, 1952, the plaintiff's caravan had been on the camping ground. Each winter it was placed on the tarmac area, and winter parking charges were paid from the last Sunday in October until the first Sunday in March.

A letter in common form was sent out to caravan owners early in the month of October which was in the nature of a reminder. The one, a copy of which is before the court, is dated October 11, 1951, and reads: "Dear Madam, Municipal camping ground. As "you are aware the municipal camping ground at Sheepcote "Valley closes for the season on Sunday, October 28, and I shall "therefore be obliged if you will remove your caravan from the "site before that date. If you are unable to find alternative "accommodation, the caravan can be placed on the tarmac area "for the winter, at a storage charge of 12s. 6d. per week, but "during this period will not be accessible for residential purposes. "Yours faithfully, S. Avery, entertainments manager."

During October, 1951, the plaintiff and her husband packed up the things in the caravan, and, as they had not a car themselves, they gave the camp warden 5s. to remove the caravan on to the tarmac in accordance with the requirement. The caravan was on the tarmac until it was stolen on the night of March 11.

The regulation or condition on which reliance is placed by the corporation is regulation 8, which is in these terms: "Liability. "The corporation will accept no liability for injury to any person "using the camping ground or for damage to or loss of the "property of any such person."

It was not seriously contended that the regulation would not have protected the corporation if the caravan had been stolen during the summer when the plaintiff was using it. The submission on behalf of the plaintiff was that in the winter there was an entirely different position from that which existed in the summer; that there was a bailment of the caravan on the terms of the letter of October 11, 1951, and that regulation 8 did not apply. It was further submitted that when the caravan was on the tarmac, it was in the exclusive possession of the corporation; that the plaintiff could not use it for residential purposes, and that she was not a person "using the camping ground" within the words of regulation 8.

The defendants' case was that the regulation protected them in summer and in winter, and in whichever part of the camping ground the caravan was. They did not agree that there was a bailment, but they relied on the fact that the regulations described that which was granted as a licence, and contended that there was nothing more than a licence.

No doubt there is a considerable difference between the summer season, when the caravan occupier is using the caravan, and is thus in possession of it, and when entry to the camping site is open and unrestricted, and the winter season, when the place is closed and the gate locked.

I agree with McNair J. that the winter arrangement was that the corporation should store the caravan for the plaintiff; in other words, that there was a bailment. Now, a bailee is only responsible for negligence, and thus, if regulation 8 applies to the contract as being one of bailment, it would absolve the corporation from liability for the negligence of their servants.

It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the regulation does not apply to the winter parking, and that the plaintiff was not a person "using the camping ground" at the material time. I consider that this is too narrow and too technical a view. If it is right to say that the arrangements set forth in the book of regulations contemplate a different legal position as between summer and winter, it is equally right to say that the regulations are made to cover both, and that both parties to the contract must be assumed to have so intended. The plaintiff's caravan had been on the camping ground for more than three years, summer and winter, and in my view, on the ordinary understanding of the words, she was "using the camping ground" for the parking of her caravan both in summer and in winter. I do not think that the court ought to be swayed by refinements such as those put forward by counsel for the plaintiff, else one would reach the stage of having to consider whether a caravan owner who left the camping ground for a week, or for a month, was using the site within regulation 8. If the regulation is given its ordinary meaning, and that which the parties understood it to bear, it is sufficient to protect the corporation from liability on the facts of this case, as the judge held.

Furthermore, the first Sunday in March had passed before the caravan was stolen. It appears to me that, having regard to the arrangement between the parties and to their course of conduct, summer terms applied as from the first Sunday in March both as to the amount payable and otherwise whether the plaintiff moved the caravan back to the caravan site or not. I am in favour of dismissing the appeal.

DENNING L.J. During the summer months, the corporation gave to each camper a licence to use a caravan site for 25s. a week, which payment carried with it the right to use the facilities of the camp. The corporation did not let the site on a tenancy; they only licensed the camper to use it. They did not take possession of his caravan so as to become bailees of it. The camper remained in possession of it himself, and it was for him to take care for its safety. The corporation, as the camp authority, were, no doubt, under a duty to use reasonable care in their own sphere of operations. If their servants negligently ran into the caravan, they would be liable for the resulting damage. If they negligently allowed the camp to become filthy and insanitary, they would be liable for the resulting disease. But their responsibilities did not extend to locking up the caravans or chaining up the wheels so as to prevent their theft. That was the duty of the camper himself. The camp was open day and night throughout the summer, with campers and their friends coming in and out, with and without vehicles, without let or hindrance. In these circumstances the corporation could not be expected to be responsible for loss or damage to property not caused by them; and they were not in law responsible for it. In my opinion, condition 8 does no more than express the legal position as I have stated it. It is a warning to campers that they must take care of their own property. As such it is unobjectionable. It would not protect the corporation from their own negligence, for example, in running into the caravan.

During the winter months the position was different. The camp was closed. The road gates were kept locked; and the caravans of customers were parked on the hard tarmac. The corporation described them as being "stored" and made a "storage "charge" of 12s. 6d. a week. None of the camp facilities were available. During these months, I think the corporation were bailees of the caravans and responsible for their safe custody. If the corporation negligently left the gates unlocked so that a thief came and stole one of the caravans they would be responsible. I do not think that regulation 8 would protect them, because that, I think, only applies to the summer months when the campers are using the camping ground. In any case, I do not think that it is sufficiently clear to exempt them from their common law responsibilities.

The loss here occurred, however, during the summer months when the camp was open. The plaintiff was entitled to put the caravan on to a caravan site, but for her own convenience she left it on the tarmac for a week or two. That cannot, I think, increase the responsibilities of the corporation. All the facilities of the camp were available to her, if she cared to use them, and she was liable for the summer charges. Correspondingly, the corporation were only under the summer responsibilities.

The plaintiff must have known that, after the first Sunday in March, the camp was open day and night for people to come in and go out with and without vehicles. She could not expect the corporation to keep the gates locked on her account. She ought to have taken steps herself to safeguard the caravan, or she ought, at least, to have insured herself against loss. For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Morris L.J. In order to determine the issues which arise in this case it first becomes necessary to decide what was the contractual relationship between the plaintiff and the corporation; and, secondly, it is necessary to decide whether the camp regulations formed part of, or were incorporated in, any contract, and, if so, what is their meaning and effect? [His Lordship referred to the facts, and continued:]

In Ashby v. Tolhurst,[1] where the owner of a motor-car left it on a private parking ground and made a payment to an attendant and received a ticket which recorded conditions as to cars being left at owner's risk, Sir Wilfrid Greene M.R., in his judgment, said[2] "The first thing to do is to examine the nature of the "relationship between the parties, a matter upon which the "character of the ground is, I think, not without importance; "but the most important element is the document itself." In the present case the expression "winter parking" is significant and expressive. It denotes, as was the fact, that caravans (and only caravans, for motor-cars are not mentioned) may be left within the camp and in that part of the camp designated for the winter period, which means the period which in reference to the camp is regarded as winter.

It seems to me that whatever word of legal description is employed, it is to the terms recorded in the booklet (where the camp regulations are set out) that attention must be paid. Though the majority of the camp regulations only have effective operation while the camp is open, they all remain as effective camp regulations, and such as can operate even while the camp is closed do not lack effectiveness merely because others depend upon the camp being open.

One of the regulations applicable was, therefore, regulation 8, and it becomes necessary to consider its words and to see how they relate to the plaintiff. The question arises whether she was at the time of the loss of her caravan a "person using the camping "ground." In my judgment she was. The location and area of the camping ground are shown in the booklet. During the summer, when the plaintiff had her caravan on a caravan site, she might, if she chose, allow a long period to pass during which she did not go to the camp at all. She would, nevertheless, be a "person using the camping ground" within the meaning which those words in their context bear. So, during the period of winter parking, she would be a person using the camping ground. She could not go and occupy her caravan for residential purposes, but she could go down to see it, and if she wished she could attend to bedding or furniture or other contents; or she might not pay any visit. But whether present or absent, she would be a person using the camping ground.

Next it is necessary to consider the construction of the words in regulation 8. In Rutter v. Palmer,[3] Scrutton L.J. stated the rule or principle of approach as follows: "In construing an exemp-"tion clause certain general rules may be applied: First the "defendant is not exempted from liability for the negligence of "his servants unless adequate words are used; secondly, the "liability of the defendant apart from the exempting words must "be ascertained; then the particular clause in question must be "considered; and if the only liability of the party pleading the "exemption is a liability for negligence, the clause will more "readily operate to exempt him."

Applying these principles to the present case, it is to be observed that the claim made in the action is based upon negligence alone. It is said that the defendants were negligent in that they did not take due and proper care of the caravan and of its contents. Regulation 8 provides that the corporation will accept no liability for the loss of the property of any person using the camping ground. But it is for such a loss that the present claim is brought. The words of the regulation may operate as an assertion or reminder that there is no liability in the corporation for the loss of any property for the reason that the corporation are not bailees, or they may record an exclusion of such liability for loss as there might be. If the corporation were bailees, their potential liability would be for negligence, and so the words would be apt to exclude liability on any such ground.

It is to be observed, however, that the words of regulation 8 are not as wide and as comprehensive as are the words which are found in some of the decided cases. Would the words exempt the corporation if one of their servants on duty in the camp wrongfully assaulted a camper and caused him injury? Would they exempt the corporation if one of their servants negligently drove a vehicle in the camp and caused personal injuries and damage to property? It is not necessary to decide these questions, but the fact that they can be raised lends support to the view that regulation 8 is indicative of, and declaratory of, the basis upon which persons use the camp. If a caravan is occupying a site while the camp is open, there is clearly no bailment, and if a caravan is removed by some third person without the owner's authority there is no liability in the corporation. If while the camp is closed a caravan is on the tarmac for "winter parking" I incline to the view that the corporation do not become bailees of it. I doubt whether there would be delivery of possession to the corporation. Furthermore, the existence of regulation 8 may be a pointer leading to the view that there was no bailment. In Ashby v. Tolhurst [4] Romer L.J. said: "But it is perfectly plain "in this case that the car was not delivered to the defendants for "safe custody. You cannot infer a contract by A to perform a "certain act out of circumstances in which A has made it perfectly "plain that he declines to be under any contractual liability to "perform that act." If, however, the corporation were bailees, then regulation 8 can, at least, operate to exclude liability for loss due to negligence which would be the potential liability of the corporation as bailees.

HALBAUER v. BRIGHTON CORPORATION.

Morris L.J.

In the present case the loss occurred during the time that the camp was open and the plaintiff became liable to pay the charge applicable to a caravan site in the summer season; it was merely because of arrangements which suited her convenience that the caravan had not been removed to a caravan site. Accordingly, even if the view is held that while the camp is open the corporation are differently placed, then when the camp is closed, it would seem only right that regard should be had to the conditions referable to times when the camp is open. I consider, therefore, that the corporation were not liable, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Divorce—Cruelty—Sterilisation of husband—After birth of first child—Whether sterilisation cruelty.
Criminal Law—Assault—Sterilisation—Legality.

A husband and wife were married in 1934 when the wife was 21 years of age; the only child of the marriage was born in 1936. In 1938 the husband submitted to a sterilisation operation with the wife's knowledge. The husband and wife continued to live together, although there was increasing discord and quarrels in the home for 13 years until 1951, when the wife left. Sexual intercourse continued throughout this period. The wife petitioned for a divorce on the ground of cruelty:—

Held (Evershed M.R. and Hodson L.J., Denning L.J. dissenting) that, on the facts, the wife had not made out a case of cruelty. As between husband and wife, for a husband to submit himself to an operation of sterilisation, without good medical reason, would, unless his wife was a consenting party, be a grave offence to her which could, without difficulty, be shown to be a cruel act, if it were found to have injured her health or to have caused reasonable apprehension of such injury. If a husband submitted to such an operation without the wife's consent, and if the latter desired to have children, the hurt might be progressive to the nerves and health of the wife.

Per Denning L.J. An operation for sterilisation when done without just cause or excuse is unlawful, even though a man consents to it. If a man undergoes such an operation, he strikes at the very root of the marriage relationship. It is severe cruelty. Even if the wife, when young and inexperienced, consents to it, she ought not to be bound by it when in later years she suffers on account of it, especially when she was not warned that it might affect her health.

Per Evershed M.R. and Hodson L.J. We feel bound to dissociate ourselves from those observations. The question of illegality is irrelevant in the present case.

Appeal from Mr. Bush James Q.C., sitting as special commissioner.

A husband and wife were married on October 25, 1939, when the husband was 25 and the wife 21 years of age. They were both employed in a hospital. In 1936 a son, Leslie, the only child of the marriage, was born. In 1938 the husband underwent an operation for sterilisation in the hospital where he and his wife were employed. The wife knew of the operation but it appeared that she did not consent to it. The husband and wife continued to live together for a further 13 years until 1951, when the wife left. The wife petitioned for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of cruelty. Commissioner Bush James dismissed the petition.

The wife appealed. The facts are more fully stated in their Lordships' judgments.

born on December 19, 1936. At all material times the husband was employed as a hospital porter, first at the General Hospital at Croydon, and latterly at the Royal Northern Hospital, where they lived together from a time shortly before the birth of the child until the wife left the husband in September, 1951.

The case for the wife depends in the main on an allegation which appears in the petition as follows: "6. (iii) Less than 18 "months thereafter during the year 1938 the precise date thereof "your petitioner cannot remember the respondent without con- "sulting your petitioner, who had often expressed her desire to "have more children, informed your petitioner that he had seen "the surgeon at the Royal Northern Hospital and had arranged "for sterilisation which operation subsequently was performed, "thereby causing your petitioner to suffer great anguish and the "commencement of the deterioration of the marriage as afore- "said." The remaining allegations were summarized on her behalf in this court as consisting of the husband's dirty habits, of his excessive interest in Indian philosophy, art and music, and of his meanness in keeping her short of money. The question of money disappeared from the case, and the other two matters were dealt with by the commissioner in this way. [His Lordship read passages from the commissioner's judgment, and said:] This is, we think, clearly tantamount to a finding that, although the wife's evidence was not rejected on the topic of dirty habits, yet she had not proved anything sufficiently serious to be properly classified as an act, or acts, of cruelty on the husband's part, at any rate, taken in isolation from the rest of the case. As regards the Indian allegations, it appears to us that the commissioner was not at all impressed with the wife's complaint on this topic. After referring to the use of bad language, which was denied by the husband, and to other complaints of money shortage, to which we have referred earlier, the commissioner added that the petition contained a whole series of trivialities. He formed the opinion that there was discord in the household which became more exacerbated as time went on, and which (it may be) to a certain extent affected the wife's and also the husband's health, but that sexual relations had continued until shortly before the wife left.

We now turn to the main allegation upon which this appeal is founded, and which, in our opinion, is the only substantial matter to be considered, in view of the nature of the other allegations and the commissioner's conclusion thereon. The case sought to be made on behalf of the wife was that the husband had himself sterilised against her wishes, thereby causing a deep-seated and persistent grievance which disrupted the marriage, resulted in progressive deterioration of the relations of the parties, caused injury to her health or reasonable apprehension thereof, and culminated in the wife finding life so intolerable that she left the husband. This case was not made out to the commissioner's satisfaction. In our opinion, as we understand the judgment and the evidence, it failed for want of proof at all material points.

Bravery
v.
Bravery.
Hodson L.J.

The husband did in the year 1938 submit to a sterilisation operation performed, as he said, by a surgeon (who was named) at the well-known London hospital at which he was employed. As between husband and wife for a man to submit himself to such a process without good medical reason (which is not suggested here) would no doubt, unless his wife were a consenting party, be a grave offence to her which could without difficulty be shown to be a cruel act if it were found to have injured her health or to have caused reasonable apprehension of such injury. It is also not difficult to imagine that, if a husband submitted to such an operation without the wife's consent, and if the latter desired to have children, the hurt would be progressive to the nerves and health of the wife. But such was never the case put forward by the wife in the present proceedings. This operation, as it seems to us, took a relatively minor place among the wife's complaints both in her petition and in her evidence. She left her husband (according to her own evidence) because his temper got worse and worse. Although, according to her own admission, she plainly knew all about the operation before it was done, she said that she afterwards "refused to talk about it," and never suggested that he should (as could, apparently, have later been done) have his normal function restored. According to the wife the marriage was only "fairly happy" at the start, and though it subsisted a long time, matters appear to have steadily got worse for reasons altogether disconnected with the operation.

Did the wife consent to the operation? As we have said, there is not doubt on the wife's evidence that she knew that her husband was going to have it performed. She said that he had it done at the hospital where they were living, and that she took his clothes when he came out afterwards. In cross-examination her knowledge of the matter was further investigated. She said that he had told her what was going to be done. The following questions and answers follow: "(Q.) Did you make any attempt "to stop him having it done? (A.) I was so astounded and upset "at his making the suggestion to have it done that I could not "discuss it at that time. When first he spoke to me he just said: "'I will have to discuss it with you.' (Q.) You knew the surgeon "Mr. B? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And you knew the sister at the hospital, "Sister B., I think? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And the nurse who looked "after him, staff nurse C.? (A.) I do not remember the other "nurse's name. (Q.) I put it to you that you knew the surgeon "and the matron and the sister and everyone concerned with the "operation and that you never took any steps? (A.) No. (The "commissioner): Do you agree that you could have? (A.) No, "because my husband always had what he wanted. (Counsel): "But you did not approach any of these people and say you did "not want him to have the operation, did you? (A.) No."

The husband's evidence was to the effect that after the birth of Leslie the wife did not want any more children—that she was, indeed, very much afraid that she should; and, further, that, because she disliked contraceptives, he consulted a surgeon, and said to her: "It is possible I understand to have an operation, "a simple thing, which will prevent our having any more children. "This will be a temporary measure and a slight operation can be "repeated later if we decide to change our minds." He was asked what she said to that, and he replied that she said that it was a good idea, and they agreed that it was.

In this state of the evidence the commissioner's finding is not very precise; but he said this "Apparently after the birth of the "boy Leslie, the parties were not happy, but they were having "intercourse and using preventatives, and then for some reason "this man goes and has this operation performed upon himself ". . . and I think that the wife quite possibly might have objected "to it." "Might have objected" could be read as meaning that "she possibly did so" or "that she might have done but did "not"; but, in view of the wife's own evidence, it is, in our view, quite impossible to conclude that she ever made any effective objection at all. She was living in the hospital and knew the persons concerned, surgeon and nurse, and had amply opportunity of making objection if she were not a consenting party. No doctor was called on either side, but we find it difficult to believe that any surgeon, a member of an honourable profession, would perform an operation of this kind on a young married man unless he was first satisfied that the wife consented.

We have already observed that the commissioner's findings are not perhaps as precise as we could have wished. But we find it impossible to avoid the conclusion that he did not accept the evidence of the wife (upon whom the onus of proof lay) that the husband had had the operation performed in disregard of her feelings and wishes, and notwithstanding her known desire to have more children. It is, indeed, reasonably clear that the wife (and her son) did not strike the commissioner as impressive witnesses, since he invited argument at the end of their evidence on the question whether the husband had any case to answer. It seems to us, therefore, that the wife's case fails in limine.

Even if, however, it were legitimate to find in her favour that the operation had been performed against the wife's will, this would not be the end of her difficulties. It would not be difficult, as we have said already, to construct in imagination a case of grave cruelty upon a wife founded upon the progressive hurt to her health caused by an operation for sterilisation undergone by her husband in disregard of, or contrary to, the wife's wishes and natural instincts. But, as we have pointed out, that was not the case presented by the petition and evidence of the wife in the present proceedings; and the question for us is, what did the wife here allege and prove? According to her evidence she never during the succeeding 13 years referred to the matter of the operation after her husband came back from it, although the husband said that she did once refer to it a year or so ago, by which he presumably meant shortly before she left home. When she did leave home she wrote to the husband as follows: "December 29, 1951. "To Mr. Bravery. I had hoped by now you would have started "the divorce proceedings, but apparently you have not so I shall "wait a week or two to hear from you via Leslie. If you do not "reply I shall start the proceedings myself bringing in the illegal "operation. This will mean bringing in also the name of the "surgeon and probably the hospital. I have no wish to do this "but unless you divorce me I have no choice. I may add that I "have it on good authority that it would win my case for me. So "I hope to get a note from you soon otherwise I shall take it that "you wish me to proceed. Sincerely yours, Iris Bravery." The reference in the letter to the illegal operation reads more like a threat to bring up something which the husband would not like resurrected than a serious complaint of the infliction of an injury upon the writer.

More serious still, so far as actual injury to health is concerned, the commissioner, in our view, negatived it by his finding. After referring to another case he said: "In that case it was proved "that the husband's conduct was such as definitely to affect his "wife's health and I have no evidence of that sort in this case." At the end of his judgment he said, referring to discord in the household: "It may be that to a certain extent that affected the "wife's health and also the husband's health." We do not regard this as a material qualification of the previous finding which was in accordance with the husband's evidence and not, we think, effectively contradicted by the wife. Certainly no medical evidence was called on her behalf to prove injury to her health.

In the absence of proof of actual injury to health, in a case of this kind, after the lapse of a period of 13 years from the act complained of, we do not think that the court is justified in drawing an inference of apprehended injury to health. We do not for ourselves think it legitimate, upon the commissioner's findings as to other causes of discord and as to the circumstances attending the operation, to attribute the deterioration in the marriage relationship to the effect on the wife of this operation. We do not forget that the wife said that for some time after the operation she could not bear her husband near her, but this was a matter of controversy. The husband attributed it to fear of conception dating from the birth of their only child. For these reasons we think that the appeal fails.

On the facts of the case, and the inferences to be drawn from the judgment of the commissioner, we have felt, accordingly, compelled to a different conclusion from that of Denning L.J., whose judgment we have had the advantage of reading in advance. The most, if not the only, significant question in the case has been undoubtedly the operation undergone by the husband for sterilisation in the year 1938. The divergence in view between Denning L.J. and ourselves has been mainly, if not entirely, in regard to the effect of this operation—did the operation or its consequences constitute cruelty to the wife? Though we do not doubt the grave potentialities to the marriage relationship of such an operation, we think that in this case the commissioner clearly intended to find as a fact the wife's failure to establish that the husband, by undergoing, or as a result of his having undergone, the operation, had been guilty of "cruelty" to the wife; and our reading of the evidence, including the evidence directed to the wife's knowledge of, and consent to, (if not her initiation of) what was done, has not led us to any other conclusion than that which we attribute to the commissioner.

We also feel bound to dissociate ourselves from the general observations of the Lord Justice at the end of his judgment, in which he has expressed his view (as we understand it) that the performance upon a man of an operation for sterilisation, in the absence of "some just cause or excuse" (as was not, in his view, shown to exist in the present case) is an unlawful assault, an act criminal per se, to which consent provides no answer or defence.

The court must, no doubt, take notice of any relevant illegality which appears in the course of any proceeding before it. But in the present case, both the general question, whether an operation for sterilisation is prima facie illegal, and the more particular question, whether the operation here performed was a criminal assault, are alike irrelevant to the issue to be determined.

We have heard no argument adduced either to the general or to the particular question. Further, though it is true that no evidence was produced or called from the records or the staff of the hospital concerned showing what were the steps (if any) taken on the part of the hospital to see that the nature of the operation was fully appreciated and consented to by both spouses, we are not on that account prepared, in the absence of the surgeon and any member or representative of the hospital staff, to hold that the operation was done without proper justification. In Regina v. Coney,[1] one of the cases referred to by Denning L.J., the question decided was that persons voluntarily present at a prize fight could not be regarded as guilty of an assault, as aiding and abetting such a fight. The whole court expressed, however, the view that a prize fight was illegal, and the passage cited by Denning L.J. from the judgment of Stephen J. was related to this latter point: "the "injuries," he said,[2] "given and received in prize-fights are "injurious to the public both because it is against public interest "that the lives and the health of the combatants should be "endangered by blows, and because prize-fights are disorderly "exhibitions, mischievous on many obvious grounds." In our view these observations are wholly inapplicable to operations for sterilisation as such, and we are not prepared to hold in the present case that such operations must be regarded as injurious to the public interest.

In Rex v. Donovan,[3] also referred to by our brother, there was some discussion of cases of assault being per se unlawful, to which consent would be no defence; but none of the examples given appears to bear any close analogy to an operation for sterilisation, which was nowhere mentioned. It is, moreover, to be noted that, in the case cited, the conviction was quashed by the Court of Criminal Appeal, the court not being prepared to hold that the alleged assault (namely, caning or flagellation of a young girl), in spite of its disreputable character, could be regarded, without evidence of bodily harm likely to be done, or of the doer's intention (or both), as per se criminal.

In the circumstances of the present case and for the reasons we have given, we are unable to accept the conclusion of Denning L.J. at the end of his judgment. The nullity case of J. v. J.[4] appears to be the only other case in the books in which the fact of an operation for sterilisation came before the court. It was then argued for the petitioner that the operation had been an illegal act. The question of illegality was, however, irrelevant to the question then before the court as it is irrelevant in the present case. The court in J. v. J.[4] expressed no view on the point. In our view, in the circumstances of the present case, it is neither the duty nor the function of this court to do more than draw attention to the obviously grave potentialities of such an operation for the parties to a marriage: a matter which the facts of this case have well illustrated.

Denning L.J. The parties married on October 25, 1934, when the husband was 25 and the wife 21. They lived very happily together for two years until a son was born to them on December 19, 1936. About 18 months later, in 1938, a shocking thing took place. The husband underwent an operation to have himself sterilised. He was the porter at a London hospital. One of the surgeons operated upon him, and he was attended by the sister and staff nurse.

This operation provokes several questions. The first is: Why did the husband have this done? Let me give his answer in his own words. Counsel asked him: "What was the immediate "cause of the operation? (A.) It was because of my wife's "attitude towards the boy. He was not a baby to be caressed "and loved. He was a show-piece." Again: "Why did you agree "to have an operation for sterilisation? (A.) Because my wife "was so installed. She was so installed with the home, and with "this baby she had. (Q.) You said the baby was a show-piece? "(A.) Yes. (Q.) In what way? (A.) She wanted to have him "perfectly dressed, and when he was tiny, if there was the least "thing missing, she would be absolutely beside herself."

Those answers throw a flood of light on the husband's mentality. Why did he object to the wife treating the baby as a show-piece? Although he did not realize it, he must in some strange way have been jealous of the place which the child had in the wife's affections; and his jealousy found expression in a determination not to give her any more children, seeing that was the way she treated this baby. But it may well be asked why go to the length of sterilisation? Why not use contraceptives? Both agreed that ever since the birth of the child, they had been having intercourse using contraceptives. He was the one who used them, not she. And yet he went and had himself sterilised. It is, as the commissioner said, "an amazing story"; and it was done simply because he was jealous of the baby. He did it so as to "pay her "out" for making so much of it. That seems to me to be cruelty in itself.

The second question is: Did the wife consent to it? The husband said she did. She says she did not. The commissioner has not accepted the husband's version. He has not found that the wife consented. On the contrary, he has found that the wife "quite possibly might have objected to it." I take that to mean that it is quite possible that she did object. But, nevertheless, she did not object as effectively as she might have done. The husband told her beforehand that he was going to have it done, but she did not go to the surgeon and protest. She was too astounded and upset, she said, to discuss it. I do not think this should be taken too much against her. It was not for her to approach the surgeon, but for the surgeon to approach her. It has never been suggested throughout this case that the surgeon ever saw her or asked her consent. The husband said that he signed papers assenting to the operation, but no one has ever suggested that she signed anything. If she had signed, I cannot help thinking that the paper would have been forthcoming, because the husband is still the head-porter of the hospital and has clearly had access to all the records dealing with the employment of himself and his wife. His counsel gave exact details of the dates and amounts of their wages, and so forth, which must have been got from the records. Nothing has been produced to show that she signed. Nor was the surgeon called. The only proper inference, to my mind, is that she did not consent.

The third question is: What was the effect of the operation? The physical details were not given in evidence, but if it was the same operation as in J. v. J.,[5] the result of it was to leave the husband just as capable as before of the actual sexual act and even of an emission but, nevertheless, to render him sterile. The husband said that his fertility could be restored by another operation, so long as this second operation was done within a few years—five years was mentioned—but not if it was delayed longer. The husband never had any such operation to restore his fertility; so that after 1942 or 1943 he was permanently sterile. It is significant that, on his own showing, it was then that the marriage fell to pieces.

C. A.
1954
Bravery
v.
Bravery.
Denning L.J.

The fourth question is: What was the effect of the operation on the wife? The commissioner says the operation "very probably "did affect her"; and, indeed, both parties agree that it did. She could not bear him near her. Let me give their answers in their own words: When the wife was asked "How did this opera-"tion affect you in your relationship to your husband and your "married life? (A.) Well, I was disgusted with him, and for "some time after the operation I could not bear him near me, and "especially since the operation he has become really effeminate "and I could not bear him near me." And as for the husband, he was asked: "How do you say things went on from 1942? "(A.) Things became very difficult. (Q.) In what way? (A.) My "wife could not bear me near her. If I tried to embrace her, she "became frivolent (sic) to begin with, and then she refused, and "I had to give up." I must say that that is just what I should expect. I cannot think of anything more disruptive of a marriage than for a party to sterilise himself in his way.

The fifth question is: What was the effect on the wife's health? The commissioner has summarized the position in these words: "There was discord in this household, and I think that the "position became exacerbated as time went on; and it may be "that to a certain extent affected the wife's health, and also the "husband's health." But the most cogent evidence comes from the son who was aged 15½ when his mother left and who stayed with his father for six months longer. His father said that he and his son were perfect friends. Yet this son gave evidence describing the rows which his parents had, and he attributed the responsibility for them to his father. He was asked: "Do you "remember how that affected your mother? (A.) It made her "very distracted and nervous and—well, she was very miserable. "(Q.) Did that show itself in any way? (A.) Yes, very often, "especially at night, I heard her crying, and she was nervous, "and it was this sort of thing that upset her, I am quite sure."

So on September 3, 1951, she left him after nearly 17 years of married life. Both had worked in the hospital for many years, he in the lodge, and she in the laboratory. They were regarded by the hospital folk as an ideal couple. But in their own home there was discord; and the health of both was injuriously affected. It is said that this injury to health was due to the discord in the home, not to the operation; but the two cannot be severed in this way. The operation produced the discord, and the discord produced the injury to health. There were other troubles, too, which seem to have followed on the operation. The husband had some unpleasant and distasteful domestic habits, and he was dirty and untidy. He also kept Indian idols and burnt incense in the sitting-room; but the wife seems to have acquiesced in this. These incidents by themselves could not be said to have been cruelty. The important question is the effect of the sterilisation.

After she left, she hoped that he would bring divorce proceedings. As he did not, she wrote a letter on December 29, 1951, in which she said: "If you do not reply, I shall start "proceedings myself, bringing in the illegal operation. This will "mean bringing in also the name of the surgeon and probably the "hospital. I have no wish to do this, but unless you divorce me "I have no choice. I may add that I have it on good authority "that it would win my case for me." She can, no doubt, be criticized for writing such a letter, but I do not think that she should be blamed overmuch for it. The marriage had come to an end. She wanted a divorce. She had no chance of getting one except by complaining of the operation; and she warned him that she would have to bring it in. That is all it comes to. The crucial question remains—whether by undergoing the operation he treated her with cruelty.

I start with this: There was no just cause or excuse for this operation at all. If the husband had undergone it without telling his wife about it beforehand, no one could doubt that it would have been cruelty. It was an act most disruptive of the married state, and she was the victim of it. It was indeed aimed at her, because it was done so as to prevent her having another child. It was likely to injure her health, and did in fact do so.

The only defence that I can see to the charge is the wife's acquiescence. He told her of the operation beforehand, and she made no effective protest. She stayed with him for years before instituting proceedings on account of it. This would be a defence if it amounted to condonation. But condonation was not pleaded, and the facts do not warrant it, and for this reason: when this husband was sterilised, the effect of it was not over and done with at once, like a blow with the fist or like an act of adultery. This operation had an effect which continued, day in and day out, year in year out, throughout the marriage. No act of sexual intercourse could result in a child. The effect on the wife's health might not be immediate. It might have a delayed effect. That seems, indeed, to have been what happened. The husband said that his wife first complained to him about the operation in 1942—four years after it had taken place—and that from that time things became very difficult. The son said that his parents had rows about the sterilisation operation, and he knew his mother very much wanted him to have a brother or sister. Eventually the wife, when she was aged 38, left her husband as she could stand it no longer. It is interesting to note that, in the only other case in the Law Reports where a husband had had himself sterilised, the wife agreed to it before marriage and put up with it for 11 years, and yet this court granted her a remedy by way of nullity. (See J. v. J.[6]) So here, I do not think that the acquiescence of the wife should deprive her of a remedy when the ill effects of the operation can last so long and be so devastating to the marriage. I think that the charge of cruelty was proved, and that she should be granted a divorce.

v.
Bravery.
Denning L.J.

I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of the Master of the Rolls and Hodson L.J. in which they think that the wife must have consented, because she made no effective objection, and no surgeon would do this operation without her consent. I do not agree with this. I do not think she did consent, but even if I am wrong about this, even if we assume that the wife did consent at the time to the operation, I do not think that her consent then precludes her from complaining of its ill effects in later years, when it does in fact injure her health. In this respect an analogy is, I think, to be found from the criminal law about surgical operations.

An ordinary surgical operation, which is done for the sake of a man's health, with his consent, is, of course, perfectly lawful because there is just cause for it. But when there is no just cause or excuse for an operation, it is unlawful, even though the man consents to it. The classic instance is a case reported by Lord Coke, tried at Leicester in 1604, when a "young strong and "lustie rogue, to make him impotent," got his companion to cut off his left hand so that he might avoid work and be able the better to beg. Both were found guilty on indictment of a criminal offence.[7] A later instance can be given from early Victorian days when soldiers, as part of their drill, had to bite cartridges. A soldier got a dentist to pull out his front teeth so as to avoid the drill. In the opinion of Stephen J. both were guilty of a criminal offence. (See Stephen's Digest of Criminal Law, 3rd ed., p. 142.) Another instance is an operation for abortion, which is "unlawful" within the statute unless it is necessary to prevent serious injury to health. Likewise with a sterilisation operation. When it is done with the man's consent for a just cause, it is quite lawful; as, for instance, when it is done to prevent the transmission of an hereditary disease. But when it is done without just cause or excuse, it is unlawful, even though the man consents to it. Take a case where a sterilisation operation is done so as to enable a man to have the pleasure of sexual intercourse, without shouldering the responsibilities attaching to it. The operation then is plainly injurious to the public interest. It is degrading to the man himself. It is injurious to his wife and to any woman whom he may marry, to say nothing of the way it opens to licentiousness; and, unlike contraceptives, it allows no room for a change of mind on either side. It is illegal, even though the man consents to it; for it comes within the principle stated by Stephen J. (who was a great authority on criminal law) in Regina v. Coney[8]: "The principle as to consent seems to me to be this: "When one person is indicted for inflicting personal injury upon "another, the consent of the person who sustains the injury is no "defence to the person who inflicts the injury, if the injury is of "such a nature or is inflicted under such circumstances, that its "infliction is injurious to the public as well as to the person

[7] 1 Co.Lit. 127a, 127b; Hawkins P.C. 108.

[8] 8 Q.B.D. 534, 549.

"injured." That principle is well illustrated by Rex v. Donovan [9] and clearly covers cases of sterilisation.

Those cases under the criminal law have a bearing on the problem now before the court; because the divorce law, like the criminal law, has to have regard to the public interest, and consent should not be an absolute bar in all cases. If a husband undergoes an operation for sterilisation without just cause or excuse, he strikes at the very root of the marriage relationship. The divorce courts should not countenance such an operation any more than the criminal courts. It is severe cruelty. Even assuming that the wife, when young and inexperienced, consented to it, she ought not to be bound by it when in later years she suffers in health on account of it, especially when she was not warned that it might affect her health.

I would therefore, for myself, have allowed this appeal.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

A surveyor was employed by defendant builders on a building site where they were constructing a new concrete roadway leading from a warehouse to the gate of the premises. The final section of the roadway had been excavated to a depth of 6 inches but had not been concreted and the defendants had laid, as a temporary gangway, a scaffold board. The surveyor, in the course of his duty, walked along the scaffold board, lost his balance and fell, sustaining injuries. He brought an action against the builders alleging, inter alia, a breach by them of regulation 5 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, by failing to provide a safe means of access to the plaintiff's work:—

Brown
v.
Troy &
Co. Ld.

Held, that, since the earlier words of regulation 5 enumerated a number of other places, in addition to scaffolds, at which a person might be required to work, and there were no words in the regulation limiting the effect of the words "sufficient safe means of access "so far as reasonably practicable shall be provided to every place "at which any person has at any time to work," those words applied to work carried out at all the places set out in the regulation and not only to work on scaffolds; and that the defendants therefore owed a duty to the plaintiff under the regulation. Since, however, the plank provided was a sufficient means of access and was as safe as it could reasonably be made for any employee on the building site, the defendants had fulfilled their duty under the regulation and accordingly the plaintiff's claim failed.

Decision of Hilbery J. in Wingrove v. Prestige & Co. Ld. [1953] 1 W.L.R. 449; [1953] 1 All E.R. 694 not followed.

Action.

The plaintiff, Edward Eustace Brown, aged forty-three, an experienced surveyor, was employed by the defendants, F. Troy & Co. Ld., builders and contractors, as a surveyor at a building site where the defendants were engaged upon the erection of a warehouse and the laying of a new concrete roadway. On September 19, 1952, although the work was practically finished, part of the concreting of the roadway along the side of the warehouse leading to the gate of the premises had not been completed, the final section leading to the gate having been excavated, filled with hard core, blinded with cinders and ash and covered with a reinforced mesh, but not concreted. Between the last concreted section of the roadway and the gate the defendants had laid a scaffold board 9 inches wide and 1½ inches thick, to form a temporary gangway. One end of the board rested on the last concreted section and the other on a ramp of asphalt in the vicinity of the gate. The board was supported in the centre by two bricks 9 inches long, laid with their length athwart the board, lying on top of each other so that the middle support was 6 inches in height. As the excavation on the unmade portion of the roadway was approximately 6 inches deep the board was supported by three points of approximately the same height.

At 5.30 p.m. on the day in question, the plaintiff, who, with one Cooper, had been measuring up the work done, was walking from the site office to the entrance gate. In order to reach the gate he had to walk along the scaffold board. In so doing, he lost his balance and fell, injuring his knee and ankle.

The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants alleging that the accident and his injuries were caused by their negligence and breach of statutory duty. He alleged that they were negligent, in particular, in failing to support the board (which he said was warped and twisted) firmly and evenly, thereby exposing him to the danger of losing his balance (as he did) when the board suddenly moved as he walked across it; and he contended that the gangway was a trap and concealed danger. He further contended that the defendants, in breach of regulation 5 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948,* failed to provide safe means of access to every place at which the plaintiff had at any time to work, in that the gangway did not provide safe means of access to enable the plaintiff to survey the work being carried out by the defendants near the entrance gate of the premises.

The defendants denied liability. They alleged that the plaintiff's injuries were solely caused or contributed to by his own negligence in failing to put his foot squarely on the scaffold board or to walk with sufficient care or circumspection. They denied that they owed the plaintiff any statutory duty under regulation 5, contending that that regulation did not apply to the plaintiff's work.

The case is reported only on the point relating to alleged breach of statutory duty.

Rudolph Castle-Miller for the plaintiff.
Stephen Chapman for the defendants.

Case cited in argument: Wingrove v. Prestige & Co. Ld.[1]

GERRARD J., having stated the facts and reviewed the evidence, found that the plaintiff's allegation that the board was warped or twisted had not been made out; that if there had been a movement of the board it would not have been sufficient to throw the plaintiff off his balance, that a reasonable employer, considering the risk of injury, would not have taken more precautions than those taken by the defendants, and that in the circumstances there had been no breach of common-law duty. His Lordship continued:

In addition to the allegations of a failure of duty at common law, the plaintiff relies upon a breach of regulation 5 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948. Mr. Chapman submitted that on any view of the case there could not be a breach of that regulation, and he cited, in support of that argument, the judgment of Hilbery J. in Wingrove v. Prestige & Co. Ld.,[1] where regulation 5 was considered. Hilbery J. said[2]: "Regulations 5 to 30 are regulations to protect from danger as far as possible a man using a scaffold. "The words in regulation 5 'and sufficient safe means of access "'shall so far as is reasonably practicable be provided to every

* Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regs. 1948, reg. 5: "Suitable and sufficient scaffolds shall be "provided for all work that cannot "safely be done on or from the "ground or from part of the building, or from part of a permanent "structure or from a ladder or other "available means of support, and "sufficient safe means of access shall "so far as is reasonably practicable "be provided to every place at which "any person has at any time to "work."

"'place at which any person has at any time to work,' must "mean, it seems to me, a safe means of access to a place where "a person has to work on the scaffold; otherwise there would be "no relation to the purpose or purposes for which the scaffold "is erected or designed." Whilst having the greatest respect for Hilbery J.'s views on these matters, I feel constrained to differ from him in this particular matter. The regulation, it is perfectly true, comes under the general heading of scaffolds and means of access. [His Lordship read regulation 5 and continued.] Hilbery J. has said that the words mean safe means of access to a place where a person has to work on a scaffold, but it seems to me that that construction involves an addition of words at the end of the regulation having a limiting effect on the words as they stand by themselves. As a matter of construction, I do not feel that the addition is permissible unless the context compels it to make good sense of the regulation itself. The regulation could have read, "and sufficient safe "means of access so far as is reasonably practicable shall be "provided to every place at which any person has at any time "to work on a scaffold." But it does not do so. Moreover, the earlier words are words describing a variety of places in which people may have at any time to work which are not scaffolds. Indeed, the requirement of the regulation is that scaffolds shall be provided for work that cannot be done from the enumerated places, namely, "on or from the ground or from part of a "building; or from part of a permanent structure or from a "ladder or other available means of support." It seems to me that in those circumstances the very terms of the regulation setting out various places at which people may have to work contemplate safe means of access to all those places and not only to a scaffold as a place on which a person has to work. That is the view which I feel constrained to hold and, therefore, I reject Mr. Chapman's submission that regulation 5 cannot apply here because it applies only to safe means of access to a place where a person has to work on a scaffold.

I have to consider whether or not there has been a breach of regulation 5, and the means of access has to be sufficient and safe in so far as is reasonably practicable. What is the situation here? This plank was as safe as any plank is ever likely to be on a building site unless fantastic and elaborate precautions are taken. Such precautions are not required. The words "so "far as is reasonably practicable" negative any such requirement. I think that this plank was perfectly safe and sufficient in the ordinary course of work, and that to any employee on a building site it was as safe as it could reasonably be made. It was at a very low height. I do not think it was reasonably practicable to prevent the very small amount of movement which may have been possible in it. I am by no means satisfied that the plaintiff really knows what caused him to fall, and in that sense the plaintiff has not discharged the burden of proof regarding the manner of causation of the accident. But even if a slight movement did cause him to lose his balance, when one takes into account all the factors, namely, what the plank was there for, how long it had been there, the height at which it was, what it was standing on, the very tiny amount of movement, the very sort of movement which one would expect to encounter on a building site, I think that there was sufficient safe means of access, so far as was reasonably practicable, to take the plaintiff or anyone else to a place at which he might have to work on this site. In the circumstances, regretfully, my judgment must be for the defendants.

Judgment for defendants.

Revenue—Estate duty—Valuation—Shares—Property deemed to pass—Shares in company controlled by deceased—Disposition within three years of death—Method of valuation—Finance Act, 1940 (3 & 4 Geo. 6, c. 29), s. 55.

On July 27, 1942, H., who died on September 30, 1943, voluntarily settled certain shares in a company in which he held a controlling interest on trust for his son and daughter. On the question whether the value of the shares was to be ascertained under section 55 of the Finance Act, 1940, or on an open market basis under section 7 (5) of the Finance Act, 1894:—

Held, that the shares were to be valued in accordance with the provisions of section 55 of the Act of 1940, since, on its true construction, that section applied to shares which, by section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, were property deemed to be included in the property passing on the death of the settlor.

ORIGINATING SUMMONS.

The deceased, Harold Hall, was the owner of some 2,500 shares in a private limited company in which he had a controlling interest. By a voluntary settlement dated July 27, 1942, the deceased settled 400 of the shares in question upon trust for the benefit of his son and daughter. On September 30, 1943, the settlor died and the settled shares became liable to estate duty by virtue of section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894.

By this summons the court was asked to determine whether the value of the settled shares was to be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of section 55 of the Finance Act, 1940,[1] under which the value had been agreed at £90 10s. a share, or in accordance with section 7 (5) of the Finance Act, 1894, under which the value would be in the region of £22 10s. a share.

Upjohn J. This summons raises an interesting point on the true construction of section 55 of the Finance Act, 1940, which imposes (provided certain conditions are satisfied) a method of valuing shares in a company. The section is a valuation section; it does not impose a liability. On the other hand, it is fair to say that its plain object is, by imposing a different method of valuation (shortly called "the assets valuation"), to produce a larger liability to duty than if the shares in the company are valued under section 7 (5) of the Finance Act, 1894; the basis of the [1] Finance Act, 1940, s. 55: "(1) "Where for the purposes of estate "duty there pass, on the death of a "person dying after the commence-"ment of this Act, shares in or "debentures of a company to which "this section applies, then if—(a) the "deceased had the control of the com-"pany at any time during the three "years ending with his death . . . latter valuation being as between a willing vendor and purchaser in the open market.

[His Lordship stated the facts, read section 55 (1) and (2), and continued:] I need not read section 50: it is sufficient to say that the valuation proceeds on a stringent basis, when looked at from the point of view of the subject. I think that I need only refer to two other sections of the Act of 1940. First, section 57 (1). [His Lordship read the subsection and continued:] The effect is that, where, as in this case, section 55 is admittedly applicable at any rate to the shares vested in the deceased at the time of his death, the Crown have powers of a most powerful character to obtain information with regard to the company.

The remaining section is section 65, and that provides (among other things) that "Part IV of this Act" (which contains sections 55 and 57) "shall be construed as one with Part I of the Finance "Act, 1894."

The question which I have to determine is whether the 400 shares settled by the deceased have to be valued in accordance with section 55 or on the usual open market basis. Mr. Bucher, for the subject, said, and I think rightly, that section 55 is intended to produce an additional liability to estate duty although it is, strictly speaking, not a charging section but a valuation section; and for the reasons which I have already given I agree with that submission. The whole object of the section is to produce an artificial method of valuation which will produce a larger liability than under the old method of valuation. Mr. Bucher pointed out that very grave hardship might arise if section 55 were applied to a case such as this; for whereas the Crown has ample powers to obtain information to enable it to make an assets valuation it might well be impossible for the trustees of the settlement to obtain the like, or indeed any, information from the company. If the trustees still hold the shares, they will no doubt have the advantage of a balance sheet and profit and loss account, but that does not do much to assist them in an assets valuation; and, of course, the company in any given case may well refuse to give the trustees any additional information to enable them to resist the demands of the Crown; and so Mr. Bucher rightly pointed out that the section, if it was to be applied in circumstances such as these, might well work a great hardship upon the subject. But ultimately it comes to a question of construction of section 55.

I have been referred to a number of sections in the Finance Act, 1894, and in other Finance Acts, where the words used have been somewhat similar to the words in section 55: that is to say, there has been a reference to "property passing upon the death." In some cases those words have been held to include or obviously do include property which, though not actually passing upon the death, is to be deemed to be included in property passing upon the death, by virtue of section 2 of the Finance Act, 1894. For instance, in sections 4 and 7 of the Act of 1894, it is obvious that the reference to "property passing on the death" includes property which is deemed (to put it shortly) to pass on the death. Section 4 is the aggregation section and section 7 is the valuation section; and if one did not include, in references in these sections to "property passing," property which is to be included in the property passing, though not actually passing, it is clear that one would make nonsense of the whole scheme of the Act, therefore one must give a wide meaning to the phrase.

There is no such compelling necessity in this case. The property does not escape taxation. The only question is, what is the basis of valuation?

Then, again, there are other sections (a number have been mentioned to me) where the context plainly requires that "property passing" should include property which is deemed to pass. I need only mention section 51 of the Finance Act, 1947, where it is plain that the section has made its own dictionary with regard to the property passing.

Then there is, at any rate, one decision, Attorney-General v. Milne,[1] where the property passing has been held to exclude property which notionally passed: that was on the construction of section 5 of the Act of 1894. That section was a charging section which imposed in certain circumstances upon property a further estate duty called settlement estate duty.

Speaking for myself, I do not derive a great deal of assistance from the consideration of similar words in other sections of other Acts. It seems to me that the only safe canon of construction which I can adopt is to give the words their natural meaning, unless the context otherwise requires. By section 55 (1), "Where ". . . there pass, on the death of a person . . . shares . . . or "debentures," then certain consequences follow. Prima facie the reference to "there pass . . . shares . . . or debentures" as a matter of grammar means an actual passing and does not include a notional passing. Strong support for that view is to be found in Milne's case,[2] and though it is true that it is distinguishable from the present case, because it was concerned with a new liability and because section 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, had no reference to settlement estate duty, yet, nevertheless, it is plain that at any rate Lord Parker of Waddington and I think also Viscount Haldane L.C. did intend to decide the case upon a broader principle, because Viscount Haldane L.C. said[3]: "Having come to this conclusion, I see no answer to the reason-"ing of Buckley L.J. in the Court of Appeal." Buckley L.J. quite plainly decided the matter on the broad principle that it did violence to the language in section 5 of the Finance Act, 1894, to construe the word "passes" in that section as "notionally passes."

[3] [1914] A.C. 771.

Lord Parker of Waddington expressed the same view[4]: "The "Finance Act"—that is, the Act of 1894—"is a taxing statute, "and if the Crown claims a duty thereunder it must show that "such duty is imposed by clear and unambiguous words. All the "words of section 5 can be satisfied without having recourse to "any notional passing of property, and in my opinion considerable "violence would be done to these words if the idea of a notional "passing of property were introduced into the section."

However, the words "there pass" in section 55 do not stand by themselves. They are preceded by words which I regard as of great importance. They are, "Where for the purposes of estate "duty there pass." Section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, it is well known, imposes a charge to estate duty upon property actually passing. Section 2 is a "deeming" section and starts in this way: "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be "deemed to include the property following, that is to say"; and then it sets out four classes of property which do not actually pass on the death, but are necessarily included in property as though they did pass, in order to give effect to the whole scheme of estate duty legislation.

The point was put very shortly by Lord Sands in Lord Strathcona v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[5]: "The theory "underlying a revenue Act must bow to its express provisions, "but an appreciation of the theory may sometimes help "to elucidation. It appears to me that the theory of the "provisions here in question was, just as in the case of the 1881 "Act, that, in order to avoid disappointment of the estate duty, "the property donated should be treated just as if no donation "had been made, and the property in question had remained part "of the deceased's estate and had actually passed upon his "decease. The property is deemed to pass; that is to say, "for the purposes of estate duty, it shall be treated as if it had "passed." It is worthy, I think, of note that the words of the section are not "deemed to pass" but "property passing . . . "shall be deemed to include" certain property. On the other hand, the side-note to the section is, "What property is deemed "to pass."

Now the real question I have to consider in this context is: For the purposes of estate duty, do "there pass" shares which have been given by the deceased within three years of his death? There is no doubt that those shares are caught by the provisions of sub-paragraph (c) of section 2 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894. That, of course, is conceded. Ought I, therefore, to hold that for the purposes of estate duty those shares, being caught by section 2, do pass; or ought I to give the section a meaning which excludes those shares? Of course, it is well known since the Cowley case[6] that section 2 is not a definition section as to the meaning of "property passing"; but when I see that in section 2 the "property passing on the death" is "deemed to include" certain property which includes the property in question here, it seems to me that the natural meaning of the opening language of section 55 is apt and appropriate to include property which actually passes under section 1, and also property which is to be deemed to be included in that property for the purposes of section 2; and I declare accordingly.

Declaration accordingly.

* In re A DEBTOR: Ex parte THE DEBTOR v. SCOTT AND THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER

[No. 20 of 1953.]

Bankruptcy—Petition—Debt—Requirements—At date of act of bankruptcy debt of damages and untaxed costs—Costs subsequently taxed—Whether good petitioning debt—Validity of bankruptcy notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), ss. 2 (ii), 4 (1), 5 (2).

In July, 1953, a petition in bankruptcy was presented by a creditor based on the sum of £200 damages awarded to her (together with costs) in an action in the Queen's Bench Division, in which judgment had been given on March 17, 1953. A bankruptcy notice had been issued on April 16, based on the damages alone. The time for compliance with the notice was extended to July 3. On July 17 the taxing master issued his certificate. The taxed costs amounted to £226.

The petition was filed on July 28, alleging a debt of £426.

The hearing of the petition was, on October 21, 1953, adjourned pending the hearing of an appeal in the action. On October 22, 1953, the Court of Appeal reduced the damages to £25 and allowed the debtor to set off one-half of his costs in the Court of Appeal against the judgment against him in the court below.

On November 27, 1953, the petition was restored and a receiving order was made against the debtor.

The debtor appealed to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy, on the grounds that the reduction by the Court of Appeal of the sum of £200 to £25 left a figure which was not a correct figure for bankruptcy proceedings, and that the registrar in the county court had wrongly proceeded with the hearing of the petition, as he did not know at what figure the costs awarded to the debtor which had not then been taxed, ranked. The Divisional Court dismissed the appeal:—

Held, that, although the requirements of sections 4 (1) and 5 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, that the debt on which a petition was founded must amount to £50 and be a debt for a liquidated sum, both at the date when the petition was presented and at the date of the hearing, were satisfied, the further requirement under the common law of bankruptcy that the petitioning creditor's debt must also be shown to have existed and to satisfy the statutory requirements also at the date of the act of bankruptcy, was not satisfied. On July 3, 1953 (the date of the alleged act of bankruptcy), the costs of the action could not be said to constitute a liquidated debt presently payable to the creditor, for they had not then been taxed and certified, and the petitioning creditor could not say that the whole of the debt upon which she founded her claim had existed as a debt available for bankruptcy purposes under section 4 at the time of the act of bankruptcy.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Harman and Danckwerts JJ.) [1954] 1 W.L.R. 393; [1954] 1 All E.R. 454 reversed.

Appeal from the Divisional Court.

On March 17, 1953, the petitioning creditor (Mrs. Suzane Scott), in an action in the Queen's Bench Division, obtained judgment against the debtor for £200 and costs. On April 16, 1953, a bankruptcy notice based on that sum of £200 (the costs not having then been taxed) was issued against and subsequently served on the debtor.

The debtor opposed the bankruptcy notice and the registrar dismissed his opposition. On June 17, 1953, the debtor appealed to the Divisional Court against the registrar's decision and his appeal was dismissed. On July 17 the taxing master made his certificate and allowed the costs at £226 9s. 9d.

On July 28, 1953, a petition in bankruptcy was filed in the Brentford County Court for a receiving order against the debtor. The petition was presented by the creditor and stated that the debtor was indebted to her under the judgment in the Queen's Bench action in the sum of £426 9s. 9d., being £200 in respect of damages awarded by the court in the action and £226 9s. 9d. in respect of the taxed costs of the action. This petition came on for hearing on October 21, 1953, when the hearing was adjourned pending an appeal by the debtor from the decision in the Queen's Bench action. That appeal was heard by the Court of Appeal on October 22, 1953, and was allowed to the extent that the damages awarded were reduced to £25, the order as to costs being undisturbed, save that the debtor was allowed to set off one-half of his costs in the Court of Appeal.

On November 27, 1953, the petition was restored and a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against the debtor by the registrar of the Brentford County Court.

On December 18, 1953, notice of appeal against the receiving order was given by the debtor, in which he put forward as grounds of appeal that in the events which had happened no available act of bankruptcy had been proved; and that when the petition (which was for £426 9s. 9d.) was before the registrar at the Brentford County Court, he proceeded with it before the debtor's costs in the Court of Appeal had been taxed.

A Debtor, In re. Ex parte The Debtor v. Scott.

On January 25, 1954, the appeal came on for hearing before the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy who dismissed the appeal.

The debtor appealed.

Muir Hunter for the debtor.

Michael Corley for the petitioning creditor.

The only cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment of Evershed M.R.

Evershed M.R. In this case, Harman J. opened his judgment in the court below with the words, " This case raises one " or two novelties "; and, indeed, it does. In order to appreciate what are the points which we have to decide, it is necessary, briefly, to give the history of this litigation. It begins, so far as it is relevant, with a judgment pronounced on March 17, 1953, in an action by the petitioning creditor as plaintiff against the appellant debtor as defendant, by Lynskey J. for the sum of £200 damages and costs. The action related to certain land in Eel Pie Island on the River Thames, on which island the two parties to the action were neighbours. The debtor asked for a stay of execution, intimating that he desired to appeal; but, in effect, no stay was granted. Thereupon the petitioning creditor served a bankruptcy notice upon the debtor in respect of the sum of £200. The debtor applied to set that bankruptcy notice aside, but that application did not succeed. The Bankruptcy Court did, however, grant, from time to time, extensions of the time within which the debtor was required to comply with the bankruptcy notice. Finally, the time for compliance was extended until July 3, 1953, and that date is of some significance, for the taxation of the costs which the debtor had been ordered by Lynskey J. to pay had not then been completed.

In the meantime, however, the debtor had served a notice of appeal against Lynskey J.'s judgment, and the appeal was heard on October 22, 1953, and the order made by this court was in the following terms: " It is ordered that this appeal be allowed " and the judgment herein of the Honourable Mr. Justice Lynskey " dated the 17th day of March 1953 whereby it was adjudged " that judgment be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of £200 " with costs aforesaid be varied by substituting the sum of £25 " for the sum of £200. It is further ordered that the defendant " do have one-half of the costs of this appeal such costs to be " taxed by a Taxing Master and set off against the judgment debt " and costs." In my judgment, the form of orders of that kind may require hereafter a little careful consideration according to whether the court does, or does not, intend that the sum total of the original debt plus costs, or the original debt as reduced plus costs, should be subject to a set-off which might have the effect of extinguishing the debt itself altogether; or whether it is merely intended to give to the appellant in such a case a right to set-off the costs which he is entitled to recover against the costs, or the costs plus the judgment, which he is bound to pay.

The taxation of the costs of the action before Lynskey J. was completed exactly fourteen days after the expiry of the time for compliance with the bankruptcy notice, the taxing master's certificate bearing the date July 17, 1953. Those costs, when taxed, amounted to £226. We have not before us any copy of the judgment itself, but counsel have told us it followed the form, usual in actions in the Queen's Bench Division, which will be found in Appendix F to the Rules of the Supreme Court, and this case has been argued upon the footing that the judgment did take that form.

Looking at the form, it will therefore appear that the judgment starts by being dated, that being in accordance with the earlier rules, and the date on which this judgment or order was made was March 17, 1953. It thus provided, according to the form, as follows: "It is this day adjudged that the plaintiff "recovered against the defendant £200 and [blank pounds] "costs." Then the form goes on: "The above costs have been "taxed and allowed at [blank pounds] as appears by a taxing "officer's certificate dated the [blank] day of [blank]."

As we have been informed, and as we understand, when the judgment in this case was completed and perfected on March 17, it became a judgment for £200 immediately enforceable for that sum, but on July 17, or immediately after July 17 when the taxing master's certificate was given, the blanks in the final paragraph I have read were filled in, so that thenceforth the order would read with the first blank for costs filled in with the figure of £226 9s. 9d., and the last paragraph would read: "The above "costs have been taxed and allowed at £226 9s. 9d. as appears "by a taxing officer's certificate dated the 17th day of July, "1953." That would be the form which the judgment took.

The next date to mention is eleven days later, when the petition in the present case was presented by the petitioning creditor. The petition states, so far as is material, that the debtor "is justly and truly indebted to me in the aggregate sum of "£426 9s. 9d. under a judgment of the High Court of Justice "dated the 17th day of March, 1953, being £200 in respect of "damages awarded by the court in the action to which the said "judgment relates and £226 9s. 9d. in respect of the taxed costs "of the said action." In the final paragraph the petition alleges that the debtor "within three months before the date of presenta-"tion of this petition has committed the following act of bank-"ruptcy, namely, he has failed to comply before the 3rd day of "July 1953"—which it will be remembered was the final date given for compliance—"with a bankruptcy notice issued against "him in this court . . ." and then particulars of that bankruptcy notice are given.

The petition first came on for hearing on October 21, being the day before, as the bankruptcy registrar was informed, the appeal was coming on in this court. The hearing of the petition was therefore adjourned until after the appeal had been heard and decided. It finally came before the registrar on November 27, 1953. A receiving order was then made.

It will be appreciated that there had been something of a change in the nature of the obligations of the debtor to the petitioning creditor between the time when the petition was presented and first came on for hearing, and the time when it came for the second time to be heard, for in that interval the £200 had been reduced to £25, and the debtor was at least given the right to set-off half his costs in the Court of Appeal against the judgment debt so reduced and the costs of £226 which he had been ordered to pay. But the registrar proceeded on what is a simple, and may be called a common-sense arithmetical view. I read now from Harman J.'s judgment: "He simply took the "view that, as the costs to be taxed in favour of the debtor "when taxed would not reduce the total debt of the creditor "below £50, there was a good petitioning creditor's debt and a "receiving order ought to be made." I should perhaps say in explanation that, although the costs in the Court of Appeal had not been taxed, the debtor was able to give a reasonably accurate forecast of what they would amount to, and that forecast justified the arithmetic which I have stated from Harman J.'s judgment.

The debtor appealed against the receiving order, and two grounds of appeal were taken and were considered by the judges. The first point taken was that as a result of the order of the Court of Appeal first reducing the judgment debt to £25 and then providing for a set-off, and since the debtor's costs would be and were admittedly more than £25, therefore the original debt, the non-payment of which constituted the alleged act of bankruptcy, had ceased to exist altogether.

The matter was thus put by Harman J.[1]: "Under section 5 of "the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the court is bound to require proof of "the act of bankruptcy, and it is said here that it could not be "satisfied in that respect because, in the events which happened, "there was no proof of an act of bankruptcy despite the fact "that this court had declared the act of bankruptcy a good one "and there has been no appeal against that. This bizarre result "is arrived at in this way. It is said the act of bankruptcy "alleged was respecting £200. The Court of Appeal reduced that "to £25. £25 would be a sufficient debt to avail as an act of "bankruptcy, but it is further said that the debtor has the right "to set off against the debt, that is to say, the £25, the right to "costs which may amount to £60, and, therefore, having regard "to the effect of the order of the Court of Appeal, there was no "debt to support the act of bankruptcy, the condition of the "statute was not complied with, and the court cannot make an "order."

Then secondly the point was taken, and again I will read from the judgment,[2] that if a creditor "serves a bankruptcy "notice on a man for a very large sum which he cannot pay and "follows it up by a petition admitting that the sum is very much "smaller, the debtor has suffered an injustice" and, therefore, putting it briefly, in the exercise of the discretion under sub-section (3) of section 5, the court ought to refuse to make a receiving order.

The judges, Harman and Danckwerts JJ., rejected both those arguments, and, for my part, I do not in any way dissent from the view which they took upon them. On the more general point, the second one, I think that it is sufficient to say, as the judges said, that there was here no such case made out which would justify the exercise of discretion in the debtor's favour. Upon the former point, I cannot, I think, do better than read a short passage from Danckwerts J.'s judgment[3]: "It is true that the "judgment of Lynskey J. for £200 was reduced by the Court of "Appeal to £25, and, therefore, the bankruptcy notice when it "was issued was demanding a sum which ultimately turned out "to be larger than the proper sum. Presuming, therefore, that "it is to be treated as stating too large a sum, and that the "judgment of Lynskey J. must be treated as if it ought to have "been from the beginning one for £25, it seems to me that that "amount was a valid subject for a bankruptcy notice. As to "the argument that it would be wiped out by the amount of costs "which were recoverable by the debtor under the order of the "Court of Appeal, I agree that, at the date of the bankruptcy "notice, that right of the debtor could not possibly be operative. "It was a claim which did not and could not arise until the "Court of Appeal dealt with the matter on October 22, 1953."

In other words the judges were of opinion, putting it briefly, as Jenkins L.J. put it during the argument, that at each stage of these proceedings one should take the facts as one found them.

But another point was taken before us which, if it was taken before the judges in the court below, is not noticed in their judgment, and upon which, in my view, the debtor is entitled to succeed. The point is this: The petition which I have read was founded upon the claim that the debtor was indebted to the petitioning creditor in the sum of £426 odd; of that sum, £226, rather more than half, represented costs. As I have said, those costs were not taxed, and the figure therefore was not ascertained until July 17, two weeks after the date of the alleged act of bankruptcy. It has been argued by Mr. Muir Hunter (and, in my view, correctly argued) that the petitioning creditor must establish that the debt on which his petition is founded was a debt presently payable and available to the petitioning creditor at the date of the act of bankruptcy—though he need not show that non-payment of the whole debt constituted the act of bankruptcy alleged.

In order to make that point good, I will refer to two sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. Section 4 (1) provides: "A "creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankrupcy petition "against a debtor unless—(a) the debt owing by the debtor to "the petitioning creditor, or, if two or more creditors join in "the petition, the aggregate amount of debts owing to the "several petitioning creditors, amounts to £50, and (b) the debt "is a liquidated sum, payable either immediately or at some "certain future time. . . ."

Section 5 (2) provides: "At the hearing"—that is, the hearing of the petition—"the court shall require proof of the debt of "the petitioning creditor, of the service of the petition, and of "the act of bankruptcy, or, if more than one act of bankruptcy "is alleged in the petition, of some one of the alleged acts of "bankruptcy, and, if satisfied with the proof, may make a "receiving order in pursuance of the petition." It is well known that bankruptcy is a matter which not only affects the debtor and his status, but it also affects the general public, and the court therefore has a duty to see that all the requirements, either express or implicit in the statutes, have been strictly observed.

The statute itself makes it quite plain that the petitioning creditor's debt—that is, the debt on which the petition expresses itself as founded—must be proved to be existing and have the quality and character mentioned in section 4, both at the date when the petition was presented, and at the date of the hearing.

In this case those statutory requirements are satisfied, but I think that there is a further requirement which emerges from what has been called the common law of bankruptcy, that is, the rules or principles which the courts have held to be applicable in bankrupcy proceedings, though in terms this requirement does not appear to be expressly stated in the statute. The requirement, in my judgment, is that the petitioning creditor's debt must also be shown to have existed and to have the necessary character and quality stated in section 4 at the date of the act of bankruptcy as well as at the date of the presentation and hearing of the petition.

I think that that does emerge sufficiently from the case to which Mr. Muir Hunter alluded, and which I understand he did not cite in the court below, In re Debtors [669 of 1926].[4] That was a case in which the debtors were members of a rubber trade association, and the debt arose out of the contract (as I follow it) which membership of that association involved; but the headnote, which sufficiently bears upon the present case, is as follows: "In order to constitute a good petitioning creditor's "debt the debt must be a liquidated sum, payable either "immediately or at some certain future time at the date of the [4] [1927] 1 Ch.D. 19.

"act of bankruptcy. It is not sufficient that the debt should "have become a liquidated sum in the interval between the date "of the act of bankruptcy and the presentation of the petition." Subject to one point that is the situation here. The statement in the headnote is founded upon the judgment of Lord Hanworth M.R., and particularly the passage on p. 27.

After referring to the judgments of Cockburn C.J. in Ex parte Muirhead[5] and Bacon C.J. in In re Whelan,[6] Lord Hanworth M.R. states[7]: "The decisions in those cases show that there "must be at the date of the act of bankruptcy an available debt "payable and due from the debtor, and therefore, under "section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the creditor is not "entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against the debtor "unless the debt is a liquidated sum." He then cites a passage from the then edition of Williams' Bankruptcy Practice (13th ed., p. 42): "By what may be called the Common Law of Bankruptcy, "it has always been held that the petitioning creditor's debt must "have accrued due before the act of bankruptcy on which it is "intended to found the petition . . . but the debt need not have "been due to the petitioning creditor at the date of the act of "bankruptcy." The last sentence has no bearing on the present case. Warrington L.J. refers to the same passage in the textbook, and concludes thus[8]: "In my opinion that passage correctly "expresses what is really the law, that is to say, the debt must, "at the date of the act of bankruptcy, be such a debt as could "be relied upon by the petitioning creditor to support his bank-"ruptcy petition."

I have sufficiently stated the facts to make it clear that, if the matter is looked at in the way which, when I was considering the rest of the case, seemed to me to be the correct way, that is to say, by treating the facts as they were at each of the various stages, then on July 3, 1953 (the date of the alleged act of bankruptcy), it could not be said of the costs of the action that they constituted a liquidated debt presently payable to the creditor, for they had not then been certified.

But to meet that, Mr. Corley has contended that the form of the judgment which I have read by my reference to the forms in Appendix F has this effect: that after the taxing master has certified the costs, and the amount of those costs has been written into the judgment, then for all purposes (or at least for the purposes with which we are concerned) we must treat the sum of costs as having been written back and related back to the date of the original order, namely, March 17, 1953, so as to enable the creditor to say, when her petition came to be heard: "I am now in a position to say that the sum of costs was, on "July 3, a liquidated debt presently payable."

Evershed M.R.

I have been unable to accept that view. I think, apart from any other considerations, that the circumstance that the order refers to the date of the certificate, which in this case would be July 17, makes it impossible to say that one has got to read this order as though it had, from the start, included the sum of £226. It is quite true that under the rules as they now are, and following the Judgments Act, 1838, it is established that interest on costs will, prima facie, run from the date of the judgment; that is to say, the debtor will be liable to pay interest on the sum of costs when finally ascertained—namely, £226—from a back date, that is, the date of the judgment, March 17. That may well be so, but that does not seem to me to carry with it the consequence, particularly in a bankruptcy matter, that we must treat the original judgment as though it contained from its own date the figure of £226 as part of the sum due—a figure which it did not in fact contain; and I think that that view of the matter is supported by another case in 1891, to which Mr. Muir Hunter referred us, In re Crump.[9] That does not bear directly upon the present case. It was of this nature: a judgment had been obtained in the same form as is found in Appendix F, but it so happened that in that case the sum of costs, though it had been ascertained and the taxing master had given his certificate or allocatur, had never been written into the order, and the Divisional Court took the view that this could not therefore be a proper debt upon which a petition in bankruptcy could be founded since the sum, never having been put into the order, was not capable of being recovered by court process and no execution could have been issued in respect of it. Thus is to be found in the report the note: "At the request of the court "Master Pollock attended and informed the court that execution "could not be issued on such a judgment and the allocatur. The "practice was always to fill up the judgment. It might happen "that in certain cases the clerk might take the judgment and "the allocatur from the solicitor, but before execution could be "issued the practice was always to fill up the judgment first." Upon that view the court expressed the opinion that the appeal must be allowed and the receiving order must be discharged.

It seems to me that the argument in that case is in line with the view which I have formed myself in the present case, and supports my conclusion that, since these costs had not been finally taxed and the amount had not been inserted in the order until on or after July 17, it was impossible for the petitioning creditor to say that the whole of the debt upon which she founded her claim had existed as a debt available for bankruptcy purposes under section 4 at the time of the act of bankruptcy.

In those circumstances, I arrive at the conclusion that this debtor is entitled to succeed and that the appeal must be allowed, and the receiving order discharged.

By section 19 (1) of the Coal Industry (Nationalisation) Act, 1946, compensation on the transferred assets was "due on the "primary vesting date [January 1, 1947], subject to determination "of the amount. . . ." Section 19 (2), and section 22 provided a right to "interim income" or to "revenue payments" for the period between "the primary vesting date and the date on which "any such compensation is fully satisfied. . . ." Payments were to be calculated for the years 1947 and 1948 under section 22 (3) of the Act and for the year 1949 under section 1 (2) of the Coal Industry (No. 2) Act, 1949, payments under both these heads being termed "revenue payments"; payments made subsequently to these years were to be calculated in accordance with section 22 (2) of the Act of 1946 and were called interim payments.

By paragraph 7 of Sch. IV to the Finance Act, 1937, as amended by section 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, it was provided that "Income received from investments or other property shall be "included in the profits . . ." for the purposes of profits tax.

The respondent company carried on a number of businesses, including a colliery undertaking, on January 1, 1947, the assets of their colliery trade vested in National Coal Board under the Act of 1946; and during the years 1947–1950 they received "interim "income" or "revenue" payments under section 19 (2) calculated in accordance with section 22 (2) and (3) of the Act of 1946 and section 1 (2) of the Act of 1949. These sums were included in the computation of their profits for the purposes of their assessments to profits tax. The Special Commissioners discharged the assessments so far as these sums were included. On appeal by the Crown from that decision:—

Held, that the right to compensation, which was due, but payment of which was deferred, was a chose in action notwithstanding that it was created by statute, and the interim income and revenue payments which arose from that right were "income received "from . . . other property" within the meaning of paragraph 7 of Sch. IV to the Finance Act, 1937, and should therefore be included in the computation of the company's profits for the purposes of profits tax. The appeal should accordingly be allowed, and the case remitted to the commissioners for adjustment.

Appeal from a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The respondent company, the Butterley Co. Ld., was formed in 1888, and carried on a number of trades which included coal mining. On January 1, 1947, the assets of the company employed in its colliery undertaking vested in the National Coal Board under section 5 (1) of the Coal Industry (Nationalisation) Act, 1946, the date appointed by the Minister as the "primary "vesting date." After that date the company ceased to carry on its colliery trade, but it continued to carry on its other trades.

Compensation payable on the assets transferred to the Board was by section 19 (1) of the Act declared to be "due on the "primary vesting date, subject to determination of the amount "thereof." Section 19 (2) gave a right to payments of "interim "income" between the primary vesting date (January 1, 1947) and the date on which the compensation was fully satisfied.

The respondent company received five assessments in respect of the years 1947–1950 which included in its liability to profits tax interim income payments under section 19 (2) calculated in accordance with section 22 (2) and section 22 (3) of the Act of 1946, and with section 1 (2) of the Coal Industry (No. 2) Act, 1949, and termed "revenue payments" for the years 1947–1949. The company appealed to the Special Commissioners from these assessments on the ground that they were wrongly included in the computation of its profits for the purposes of profits tax.

The commissioners allowed the appeal and held: (i) that the payments under the Coal Acts of 1946 and 1949 were not properly included in computing the profits of the company for the purposes of profits tax; (ii) that all the payments in issue constituted income of the company; (iii) that on the evidence before them the company's composite trade or business consisted at the material time of a number of separate and severable trades, of which its colliery concern was one; and that that trade ceased entirely on January 1, 1947; (iv) that in view of their finding under head (iii) the payments were not receipts of any trade carried on by the company during the relevant chargeable accounting periods, because it had ceased to carry on its colliery trade on January 1, 1947; (v) that on a proper construction of sections 19 (2) and 22 of the Act of 1946, section 1 of the Act of 1949 and paragraph 7 (1) of Sch. IV to the Finance Act, 1937, as amended by section 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, the payments were not "income received from investments or other "property"; (vi) that the assessments should be reduced so far as they included these sums.

The Crown appealed from that decision.

ROXBURGH J. (after stating the facts:) The Coal Industry (Nationalisation) Act, 1946, provides by section 19 (1) that compensation should be paid in respect of a transfer of transferred interests—in other words, the respondent company's colliery concern—and that it should be due (and I attach importance to that word) on the primary vesting date, January 1, 1947, subject to determination of the amount thereof. Subsection (2) of section 19 provides as follows: "For the period "between the primary vesting date and the date on which any "such compensation is fully satisfied, there shall be a right to "interim income, to be satisfied in accordance with the pro-"visions of section 22 of this Act."

Section 22 is the general provision with regard to interim income. Subsection (1) provides: "The right conferred by sub-"section (2) of section 19 of this Act to interim income "for the period between the primary vesting date and the date "of the satisfaction in full of compensation in respect of a "transfer of transferred interests, or of an overhead expenses "increase, shall be satisfied in accordance with the provisions "of this section. (2) Subject to the provisions of subsections (3) "and (4) of this section as to the revenue payments therein

"mentioned, (a) the said right conferred by subsection (2) of "section 19 of this Act shall be satisfied, so far as regards interim "income for the period between the primary vesting date and "the time when any amount of compensation in respect of a "transfer of transferred interests . . . is satisfied, by making, "in addition to the issue of the stock then issued in satisfaction "of that amount of compensation . . . a money payment of an "amount equal to interest for that period on that amount of "compensation at such rate or rates as may be prescribed. . . ."

Subsections (3) and (4) contain provisions which are restricted to the first two years from the vesting date, and provide for what are called in the Act "revenue payments," which are to be in substitution for the interim income provided for by subsection (2) of section 22, which, apart from an amendment, to which I will refer later, continued indefinitely until the compensation was satisfied. The revenue payments were confined to the first two years. The effect of the Coal Industry (No. 2) Act, 1949, however, was to substitute a revenue payment for the interim income payment in respect of the year 1949. The sequence is therefore revenue payments for 1947 and 1948; revenue payment under the Act of 1949 for 1949, and thereafter interim income payments.

The company received payments under each of these headings, and the first question which had to be determined by the Special Commissioners was whether they were to be treated as taxable income, as distinct from capital. The commissioners held that they were taxable income; I cannot feel any doubt about that aspect of the case, and it is unnecessary to elaborate the matter further. But there remains the question with which I am really concerned: liability for profits tax. There are, of course, differences between profits tax and income tax.

The Crown contended before the commissioners that the payments were part of the profits of the trade or business carried on by the company in the chargeable accounting periods commencing January 1, 1947, and ending on December 31, 1950. But the company contended that the payments were not part of the profits of the trade or business carried on by the company during the relevant chargeable accounting periods, but arose to it from its colliery concern, which trade ceased entirely on January 1, 1947.

In the view that I take of this case it is not necessary for me to determine whether the finding of the commissioners, which was in favour of the company on this point, was well founded or not. I leave it entirely at large, except to mention that the Solicitor-General argued against it strenuously, and only forbore to continue his argument in deference to a request from me. The reason why I dissuaded him from further continuing his argument was because I could not see, and I still cannot see, how the company can escape from the alternative argument of the Crown that the revenue payments and the interim income payments were, on the true construction of paragraph 7 (1) of Schedule IV to the Finance Act, 1937, as amended by section 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, "income received from investments or other "property."

The Finance Act, 1937, makes special provisions with regard to what is now called profits tax; and Schedule IV provides: "7. (1) Income received from investments or other property shall "be included in the profits . . ." There are certain exceptions to that provision which nobody suggests are applicable to this case. This is a very short point, and I may be wrong about it, but having reached a clear conclusion upon it, it did not seem to me necessary to pursue the difficult questions which arise under the other contention of the Crown. These sums were certainly received by this company and they were, as I have said, undoubtedly income, and the question is, therefore, were they received from investments or other property?

It was not contended before me that the words "other "property" can be restricted by the application, or attempted application, of the principle of ejusdem generis and, quite plainly, they could not. The words to be construed therefore are "other property." This compensation could not properly be regarded as an investment, but I can see no reason at all why it is not "other property."

I refer again to section 19 of the Act of 1946; compensation under that section was due on January 1, 1947, but it was not immediately payable, because it had not been determined. The company's right to that compensation was, in my judgment, plainly a chose in action; nonetheless a chose in action because it was the creature of statute. Counsel has argued that that may be so, but that the interim income, or the revenue payments (and I think that they must all stand upon the same footing), do not arise from the property—that is to say, the right to compensation—but that they are an additional correlative right. It is a question of how those two words are regarded. But when I see that there is a right to interim income, I ask the question: "interim income from what?" It is income for a period; true, it is a right conferred by statute, but from what is it to be income? I should have thought plainly from the compensation due, payment of which was still deferred. In other words, these payments arose from the chose in action, consisting of compensation due but still unpaid, and fall directly within the words "income received from . . . other property," and, therefore, by virtue of paragraph 7, should be included in the profits. Accordingly, on that ground I allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed; assessment referred to commissioners for adjustment.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. SAME.

Revenue—Income tax—Discontinuance of trade—Gratuitous payment for work done—Account not finally settled when trade discontinued—Account re-opened—Liability to tax.

Revenue—Excess profits tax.

The taxpayer was a miller who had ceased to mill flour in 1929. In 1941, wishing to start milling again, he obtained a licence to do so from the Ministry of Food (who controlled the whole flour industry at that time). As a licensed miller he was entitled to receive rebates based on the flour which he milled; but as he had not been a miller at the outbreak of the war he was not entitled to remuneration under the agreement made between the British Millers' Mutual Pool Ld. and the Ministry, by which any pool miller was entitled to a rebate for a loss suffered under the system of rebates.

By a letter dated October 27, 1942, his accountant was told by the Ministry that the taxpayer would probably be required to furnish accounts on lines similar to the remuneration agreement forms used by the pool millers. On December 28, 1943, the accountant was informed by the Ministry that the basis on which millers, who had commenced milling during the period of control, would be remunerated was under consideration. On October 27, 1944, and May 11, 1945, the accountant was informed that no decision had been reached but that the matter was still under consideration.

On September 30, 1945, the taxpayer ceased to trade. On September 6, 1946, his accountant was required to furnish accounts in respect of the taxpayer's flour milling activities because the "remuneration" was under consideration. In 1949 the taxpayer received the sum of £3,289 from the Ministry as "remuneration." This sum was included in the profits for the relevant years in his assessments for income tax under Schedule D and for excess profits tax. The Special Commissioners discharged the assessments on the ground that it was not a trading receipt.

On appeals by the Crown from their decision:—

Held, that when the taxpayer discontinued to trade in 1945 the payment for work done by him had not, on the facts, been finally settled, and the further payment of £3,289 for that work (although gratuitous and not made in pursuance of any legal claim) enabled his account to be reopened so as to let in that sum, which was analogous to a trading debt at the amount actually received. The sum of £3,289 should therefore be included in the profits in the computation of the taxpayer's income tax and excess profits tax, and the appeals should be allowed.

Appeal from a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The case stated so far as material provided: The respondent taxpayer, Thomas Dadswell, had been trained as a flour miller, but he had ceased to mill flour in 1929. In 1941 he wished to start milling flour again and, as the whole flour milling industry had come under the control of the Ministry of Food (hereafter called "the Ministry") at the outbreak of war, he applied to the Ministry for a licence to mill flour. The Ministry granted him a licence on October 8, 1941. As a licensed miller the taxpayer was entitled to receive rebates based on the flour he milled; and these rebates provided him with a profit. The rebates took the form of a deduction from the invoiced prices of imported wheat sold to him by the Ministry, and periodic cash payments to him by the Ministry in respect of home-grown wheat purchased by him. The purpose of the rebates was to compensate the miller for the price he was required to pay for his wheat, such price being uneconomic in relation to the control price at which the miller was required to sell flour.

At the beginning of the war the Ministry had granted licences to all millers who were at that time engaged in milling flour. All these millers (hereafter called "pool millers") combined to form a company called "the British Millers Mutual Pool Ld." to enable terms of remuneration to be agreed between themselves and the Ministry.

On November 10, 1941, this company made an agreement (hereafter called the "remuneration agreement") with the Minister of Food by which any pool miller who suffered a loss under the system of rebates was given a right to receive compensation.

As the taxpayer had not been a miller at the outbreak of war, he was not a member of this company nor could he become a pool miller so as to be entitled to benefit under the remuneration agreement. There were a few other millers in a similar position, and they were known as non-pool millers. There was no statutory enactment or agreement with the Ministry by which non-pool millers were to receive anything more than the rebates.

In 1942 the taxpayer, who knew nothing about the way in which pool millers were remunerated, received a number of forms and documents from the Ministry relating to the payments for flour milling. The covering letter, sent with the forms, dated March 3, 1942, made use of the expression "any remunera"tion to which you may become entitled as a flour miller." He sent these forms to his accountant, Mr. Quaife.

On October 19, 1942, Mr. Quaife wrote to the Ministry to find out what information would be required by the Ministry so as to enable him to keep the appropriate records on behalf of the taxpayer. On October 27, 1942, Mr. Quaife was told by the Ministry that although the taxpayer was not entitled to become a party to the pool millers' remuneration agreement, the accounts, which the taxpayer would in all probability be required to furnish, should be prepared on lines similar to the remuneration agreement forms used by the pool millers. On December 16, 1943. Mr. Quaife wrote to the Ministry to find out when the taxpayer was likely to be asked to submit accounts and from what date they should be prepared. He also asked whether the taxpayer would have to comply with any other formalities.

On December 28, 1943, Mr. Quaife was informed by the Ministry that the general basis on which millers who had commenced milling during the period of control would be "remu-"nerated" was at that time under consideration and that the taxpayer would be advised when a decision was reached and he would be instructed in regard to the accounts which he might be called upon to furnish. On October 27, 1944, and May 11, 1945, Mr. Quaife received from the Ministry, in answer to his inquiries, information that no decision had been reached, but that the matter was still under consideration.

The taxpayer ceased to trade on September 30, 1945, when his business was taken over by James Hodson (Millers) Ld. At that time neither he nor Mr. Quaife expected that any payment would be made beyond the rebates. There was never any entry in the taxpayer's balance sheets in anticipation of any such payment.

On September 6, 1946, Mr. Quaife was requested by the Ministry to submit accounts in respect of the taxpayer's flour milling activities because the "remuneration" to be allotted to millers who had commenced milling since the beginning of the control period was under consideration. Between then and May, 1948, there was intermittent correspondence.

By May, 1948, the taxpayer, although he still had no real expectation of receiving any further "remuneration" (and Mr. Quaife was sceptical on the matter) realized that neither of them was sufficiently experienced to deal with the Ministry's forms without some assistance, and consulted Mr. Roberts, a partner in a firm of accountants, who specialized in accounts connected with the flour milling industry.

Mr. Roberts proceeded to get out figures in respect of the taxpayer's flour milling activities on the same basis as if he had been a pool miller. He did this because, although he did not regard him as having any right whatever to receive any remuneration, he knew from his previous dealings with the Finance Department of the Ministry that the Treasury had consented in 1947 to entertain claims for additional payments to non-pool millers.

When the Ministry received the forms and accounts in 1949 showing the losses on trading and allowances for salary and remuneration sustained by the taxpayer and the company which succeeded him in respect of his flour milling activities, the Ministry made two payments, the first on May 26, 1949, of £2,000, and the second on December 13, 1949, of £3,546, representing a total sum of £5,546, of which (on apportionment) Mr. Dadswell received £3,289.

The Special Commissioners, by their decision dated July 16, 1953, held that the taxpayer had no right to receive any payment other than the rebates to which he was entitled as a licensed miller, and that the sums of money which he received in 1949 from the Ministry were ex gratia payments and not trading receipts in his hands, and that this remuneration was not to be included in the computation of his liability to income tax, and that the assessments on him which included it should be discharged.

The Crown appealed from that decision.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. ROXBURGH J. read the following judgment in which he stated the facts and continued:

It is common ground that when the taxpayer ceased to trade on September 30, 1945, he had no legal or equitable right to any further payment from the Ministry, and that he had no asset which could then have been properly entered in a final account as a book debt. At first sight I was disposed to think that a man who had made out a final account including all items properly then to be described as book debts was not liable to have his account reopened after retirement from business so as to let in a gratuitous payment received long afterwards.

But a study of the cases has convinced me that the relevant question is not whether at the date of retirement there was any outstanding book debt or any contingent or deferred legal or equitable right, but whether any work had been done in the course of trade in respect of which the reward had not been finally settled, or, in other words, anything outstanding in the nature of, or analogous to, a book debt.

I was referred first to Isaac Holden & Sons Ld. v. Inland Revenue Comminsioners,[1] where the headnote is as follows: "The "appellant company was a member of the Wool Combing "Employers Federation who were engaged in combing wool on "commission for the Government, during the period of control of "the wool trade, on the basis of a tariff fixed in 1917. In July, "1918, following negotiations between the federation and the "Government, a provisional increase of 10 per cent. on the tariff,

"to operate as from January 1, 1918, and to be subject to adjust"ment either up or down on completion of the examination of "accounts to December 31, 1918, was agreed, and in July, 1919,
"a total increase of 20 per cent., to include the first increase,
"was awarded as a final settlement. In its accounts for the year "ended June 30, 1918, the company charged the full costs for "work done in the period, but it included for that work only the "amount of commission which had been received under the tariff
"as increased by the agreement of July, 1918. Held, that the "total amount of commission received for the year ended June 30,
"1918, under the terms of the final settlement arose from the "company's trade in that year, and must be included in arriving "at the profits of that period for the purpose of computing the "company's liability to excess profits duty."

This case is not entirely satisfactory because Rowlatt J. appears to have overlooked the fact that neither the first nor the second percentage increase was legally exigible at the close of the accounting period, and as the company had given credit in the accounts for the first, there seemed to be no reason why it should not give credit for the second as well. But though there may have been some misapprehension, the ratio decidendi is clear and proceeds on another basis [2]: "These woolcombers had done a "certain amount of work by June, 1918, and they were paid the "1917 tariff plus 10 per cent. up to June, 1918. It was uncertain
"whether they ever would receive more at that time: they "certainly had no right to demand more. It was uncertain that "they ever would receive more, and it might be that they would "receive less the next half-year. That is quite clear, but in the "result what happened? They were paid 20 per cent., that is to "say, 10 per cent. more, in respect of the whole of 1918; pound
"for pound of their work they earned another 10 per cent. beyond
"what had been paid them in June, 1918; if they did more work
"they got more; if they did less work they got less. It was paid "to them, as the Solicitor-General says, in respect of work in "1918, including the half-year. Looking at it merely on those "facts, what have I to say? Did not that arise from the work "that they did in their trade in the first half of 1918? If not,
"what did it arise from? Could it be said that it arose at all
"from the charity of the Government? I cannot see what it arose "from, unless it arose from the trade in the first half-year. . . .
"I cannot see any sensible way of looking at the facts other than "that which leads me to say that these profits arose from the "business in the accounting period, and, therefore, that the "decision of the commissioners was right. As the fact which "shows that the books were wrong has occurred after they have "been closed, I do not see any difficulty in reopening them and "putting them right."

This decision, and the reasoning upon which it was based, have been accepted and explained in a number of later cases of high authority.

[2] Ibid. 772.

Thus, in Northern Aluminium Co. Ld. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[3] Lord Greene M.R. said: "There are well-known "cases under the legislation in the last war which dealt with the "question of the period to which amounts received at a later date "should be attributed. The cases were cases in which, for "example, some time after the expiration of an accounting period "increases of price were granted, sometimes voluntarily, in "respect of goods sold or services rendered during the accounting "period. The Woolcombers' case[4] is a well-known example. "Broadly speaking, it was held in those cases that the subsequent "receipt of an addition to the price was referable to the trans-"action under which the goods were sold. The price for which "the goods were sold in the accounting period was so much, and "that price later on was increased by virtue of some under-"standing or something which might fall short of a contractual "obligation. There the increased price was held to be referable "to the original transaction, and therefore the accounts must be "reopened in order to bring that increase into the profits of the "company in the accounting period."

In Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Gardner Mountain and D'Ambrumenil Ld.,[5] Lord Simon referred to Isaac Holden & Sons Ld. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[6] and explained it in the following words[7]: "In other words, the taxpayer was treated as "earning, by his work in that year, all the profits arising from "the business of the year, even though there was no legal right "to part of them until the agreement was afterwards made. It "will be observed that the Crown's contention in the present case "does not go so far as the contention which prevailed in the "Woolcombers' case,[8] for in the latter there was no legal right, "at the time when the work was done, to receive the amount "which was ultimately paid. Here the appellant company had a "legal right to be paid in futuro."

Mr. Borneman relied on the summary of Isaac Holden & Sons Ld. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[8] given by the Lord President in the Scottish case of James Spencer & Co. Ld. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[9] where he said[10]: "In the case "of credit items, such cases as Inland Revenue Commissioners v. "Newcastle Breweries Ld.[11] and Isaac Holden & Sons Ld. v. "Inland Revenue Commissioners,[12] indicate that, if the title to "the sum arose in one accounting period, the fact that the precise "amount of the credit was not fixed until later will not prevent "the eventual receipt being credited in the earlier year."

Severne
v.
Dadswell.

Roxburgh J.

If by "title" the Lord President meant "legal title" (and I certainly doubt it), then it is not an accurate summary of the effect of Isaac Holden's case.[12] I much prefer that given by Lord Greene M.R. in Johnson v. W. S. Try Ld.[13]: "That was a case "where money was payable under a contract. The actual amount "payable for the work done under the contract in respect of a "particular year was only finally settled some time after that "year had expired. But there again it was something which "was quite clearly referable to a trading contract. All that had "happened was that the original amount was not left untouched "but was subsequently increased by agreement. It seems to me "that this again is a case which can fairly be regarded as "analogous to a trade debt. The circumstance that the amount "of remuneration was only fixed at a later date does not alter "the fact that the remuneration was in respect of trading "operations of the earlier year."

Alternatively I would prefer the explanation given by Lord Thankerton in British Mexican Petroleum Co. Ld. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[14] when he said[15]: "The remaining four "cases related to the final adjustment of the amount at which "receipts or liabilities had been entered in the earlier trading "account, when the amount had not been finally ascertained or "admitted between the trader and his debtor or creditor. In "Isaac Holden & Sons Ld. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[16] "the amount of the payment for woolcombing, originally entered "for Excess Profits Duty purposes, was only a provisional settle-"ment with the Government, the final settlement not being made "until a year later."

Mr. Borneman was constrained by pressure of authority to admit that sometimes a receipt may be related back to the year in which it was earned, although not then received or finalized and although not then receivable under any contract or other legal or equitable title. But this could only be done, in his submission, "When the amount actually received or agreed (or the "formula agreed for quantification) before the discontinuance of "the trade is not the final amount (or final formula for quanti-"fication of the amount) referable to the item concerned but is "only provisional and may fall to be increased by a further "amount to which a legal right may subsequently be "established."

There is no authority to support this proposition and the relevance of the subsequent establishment of a legal right I find it hard to discover. Once circumstances arise which allow the reopening of a final account, it seems to me immaterial whether the further payment is gratuitous or not, provided that it relates to work done before the discontinuance of the trade.

[14] (1932) 16 T.C. 570.

[16] 12 T.C. 768.

Mr. Beattie did not lend his aid to Mr. Borneman's proposition. He submitted another to the effect that the final account could only be reopened "where at the end of the accounting "period there is in existence a contract under which some further "payment may fall to be made on the doing of an act or the "occurrence of an event." This would appear to involve the necessity of a contingent right (I distrust the phrase "inchoate "right") and so to limit the power of reopening an account would be to defy the whole trend of authority. Authority, in my view, establishes the proposition that if it can be said at the moment of discontinuance that the payment for some work already done has not been finally settled, even though there is no legal claim for any more, then if a further payment is made afterwards, although wholly gratuitous, the account can be reopened so as to let in what is analogous to a trade debt at the figure actually received. If, on the other hand, the item is not analogous to a trade debt, or if there has been a final settlement, the account has been finally closed.

This must be a question of fact. No doubt in the present case the taxpayer and Mr. Quaife were pessimists. Mr. Roberts (whose special knowledge was greater) was less pessimistic. No doubt, too, as is usual in matters such as this, the wheels of Government grind slowly and the payment was long deferred. But on December 28, 1943, Mr. Quaife was informed by the Ministry that the remuneration of millers who had begun to mill during the period of control was under consideration, and on October 27, 1944, and again on May 11, 1945, that it was still under consideration and that no decision had been reached.

In those circumstances I have no hesitation in holding that for the work in question payment had not been finally settled on September 30, 1945, when the taxpayer ceased to trade.

Accordingly, I allow the appeal with costs. The £3,289 must be brought into the reopened accounts and the assessments restored.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. DADSWELL.

It being conceded that the appeal of the Crown in this case on the question of excess profits tax must be decided on income tax principles, ROXBURGH J. made a similar order on this appeal in respect of assessments to excess profits tax.

*BARCLAYS BANK LD. v. ROBERTS.

[1953 B. 5741.]

Execution—Sheriff—Writ of possession—Eviction of subtenant protected by Rent Acts—Claim by subtenant for wrongful eviction—Whether sheriff's officer landlord's agent—R.S.C., Ord. 47, r. 1.
Landlord and tenant—Rent restriction.

The proprietors of a house within the Rent Acts obtained a writ of possession of the premises. One of several occupiers refused to leave the premises, alleging that he was a lawful subtenant for the purposes of the Acts and he notified both the proprietors and the sheriff's officers of his contention. The sheriff's officers were advised by the solicitors acting for the proprietors that the subtenancy was unlawful and that they should continue with the ejectment. Accordingly, they executed the writ and evicted the subtenant. On the same day the subtenant applied for an injunction; obtained a stay of execution, and was permitted to re-enter the premises on the afternoon of the day on which he had been evicted. He obtained leave to defend in the original action against the tenant and he counterclaimed for damages for wrongful eviction. The action against him was dismissed on the proprietors' admission that the subletting was lawful, but his counterclaim was dismissed. On appeal against the dismissal of the counterclaim:—

Held, that, on the facts, the eviction was not wrongful. The sheriff's officers were acting in accordance with the direction of the court and within the powers conferred on them by the writ of possession, and, although they had sought and acted on advice tendered by the solicitors acting for the proprietors, the responsibility for so acting was theirs and theirs alone. They could not be converted into the agents of the persons on whose behalf the advisers were acting unless it had been shown, which was not the case, that their subsequent actions were only undertaken on the basis of those other persons assuming responsibility therefor. In such circumstances the officers had not acted as agents for the proprietors so as to make them liable in damages to the evicted subtenant.

Williams v. Williams & Nathan [1937] W.N. 208; [1937] 2 All E.R. 559 applied.

Quaere whether in a case in which the sheriff and his officers received notice of facts sufficient to show that an occupier was protected by the Rent Acts, but, nevertheless, proceded to evict him, the sheriff or his officers would be liable in damages to the occupier.

Per curiam: R.S.C., Ord. 47, r. 1, conflicts with the statutory protection afforded to a lawful subtenant of premises within the Rent Restriction Acts and revision is desirable.

Decision of Judge Bensley Wells upheld.

Appeal from Judge Bensley Wells sitting at Marylebone County Court.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Evershed M.R. The respondents, Barclays Bank Ld. (hereinafter called the bank), were proprietors for a term of years of premises known as 17, Castellain Road, Maida Vale, London, in the capacity of executors and trustees of a deceased testator. The premises had been sublet, and at the time of the commencement of the proceedings next mentioned the sublease had become vested in one Mrs. Eliza Amelia Winnearls. The bank, alleging that Mrs. Winnearls was seriously in arrears with her rent, and also in breach of covenants in her lease, issued a specially indorsed writ against her on December 9, 1953, claiming possession of the premises and other relief on the basis that she had validly forfeited the lease. Mrs. Winnearls did not defend the proceedings, and on December 29, 1953, the bank obtained judgment in default of appearance for possession of the premises and for arrears of rent, damages, and costs.

Various persons appear to have been in occupation of parts of the house. Among these persons was one George Roberts. The bank's solicitors, claiming that any sublease by Mrs. Winnearls or her predecessors in title had been in breach of the covenants contained in the lease and that none of the above-mentioned persons had, accordingly, any right to remain in occupation, wrote to them all on January 22, 1954, informing them of the judgment which they had obtained and stating that they proposed, if any of the subtenants remained in occupation after January 30, to apply for a writ of possession.

Roberts, by his solicitor, wrote to the bank's solicitors on January 29 claiming that he was (contrary to the bank's contention) a lawful subtenant within the meaning and subject to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and at an interview on February 2, between the solicitors for Roberts and the bank, Roberts contended that any irregularity in the subletting to Roberts had long since been waived. The bank's advisers did not at that time accept Roberts's contention, and on February 8 they applied for, and obtained, a writ of possession pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 47, r. 1.[1]

The bank duly complied with the second paragraph of the rule, since they proved that their solicitors sent the letter of January 22 to all persons in occupation of parts of the house. The actual writ was not in evidence, but apparently it was in the form set out in R.S.C., Appendix H; that is, it was addressed to the sheriff, and after reciting the judgment for possession commanded the sheriff to enter the premises and cause the plaintiffs in the action to have possession thereof.

On the following day, February 9, the solicitor acting for Roberts wrote to Messrs. Nathan & Co., the sheriff's officers,

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 47, r. 1: "(1) A "judgment or order that a party do "recover possession of any land may "by leave obtained on ex parte "application to the court or a judge "supported by affidavit, be enforced "by writ of possession in manner "immediately before November 1, "1875, used in actions of ejectment "in the superior courts of common "law. (2) Such leave shall not be "given unless it is shown that all "persons in actual possession of the "whole or any part of the land have "received such notice of the proceed-"ings as may be considered sufficient "to enable them to apply to the court "for relief or otherwise."

asserting again that Roberts was a lawful subtenant. He added that Roberts was no party to the action between the bank and Winnearls, and "has not been served with notice thereof," a statement of which the bank later compained as neglecting their solicitors' letter of January 22 already mentioned. As a result a telephone conversation took place between the bank's solicitors and Messrs. Nathan & Co., the only record of which was a diary entry of the bank's solicitors, which read: "Attending Nathan & "Co. when they telephoned with regard to a letter they had "received from Roberts's solicitors, advising them that notice of "proceedings had been given and that no application had been "made to the court and in the circumstances and as our instruc-"tions were that the subletting was unlawful they should "continue with the ejectment on the 15th."

Following this conversation, Nathan & Co. proceeded to execute their writ on February 15. According to the pleadings and to a further entry in the diary of the bank's solicitors, the sheriff's officers effected entry about 1.30 p.m. In the meantime Roberts had applied for an injunction, apparently, in the Winnearls action, and in the afternoon of that day he obtained a stay of execution. At 5.30 p.m. the bank permitted Roberts to re-enter, though they still denied all his claims of right. On February 22 an order was made in the Winnearls action giving Roberts liberty to enter appearance in the action and to defend, at the same time remitting the action to the Marylebone county court.

Roberts then put in a defence to the bank's claim to possession, based upon his being a lawful subtenant within the meaning of the Rent Restriction Acts. By way of counterclaim he alleged: "On February 15, 1954, the plaintiffs" (that is, the bank) "their "servants and agents broke and entered the second defendant's" (that is, Roberts) "said dwelling-house and evicted the second "defendant therefrom."

He claimed damages accordingly, referring by his particulars of damage to the cost of his applications to the court, for an injunction and otherwise.

At the trial before the county court judge, Judge Bensley Wells, the bank for the first time admitted the validity of Roberts's claim to be a lawful subtenant. Accordingly, they assented to the dismissal of their action against Roberts with costs. The bank resisted, however, his counter-claim, which was tried without oral evidence being given, both sides conceding that the facts were as stated above, that is as they appeared in the pleadings and in the correspondence. The county court judge was of opinion that on such facts the case was governed by Williams v. Williams & Nathan [2] and he dismissed the counterclaim with costs.

Roberts appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 22. EVERSHED M.R., having stated the facts as set out above, continued: The sole ground of the appeal is that the bank must be treated, as a consequence of the telephone conversation between their solicitors and Nathan & Co. (according to the true interpretation of the diary entry which I have read), as having become the principal of the sheriff's officers when the latter evicted Roberts and took possession of his dwelling-house. If this view is right, then it appears to be conceded by the bank that the damages claimed flowed naturally from the wrongful act of trespass which had been committed. I emphasize that this point has been the only point argued on Roberts's behalf. I am not to be taken as doubting the wisdom in this respect of Roberts's advisers, but it is the fact that, according to the pleadings, the bank's own agent did take possession of Roberts's premises after his eviction therefrom by the sheriff's officers.

I have come to the conclusion, not without hesitation, and not without some feeling of dissatisfaction, that the county court judge rightly held the case to be covered by Williams v. Williams & Nathan,[1] and that the present appeal, therefore, fails. In the cited case the landlord had, as in the present case, brought an action and obtained a judgment against the head tenant alone; and had also (as in the present case), after giving notice to the occupying subtenant, applied for and obtained, by way of execution of his judgment, a writ of possession. The sheriff's officers thereupon executed the writ and evicted the subtenant, who was, in truth, protected by the Rent Restriction Acts, and who thereupon brought an action for damages against both the landlord and the sheriff's officers. The subtenant succeeded in the county court, but the judgment was set aside in this court. As regards the sheriff's officers, this court held, following a decision of Parke B. in 1847 (Howard v. Gosset,[2]) that "the sheriff and the officers "executing a judgment, however wrong the judgment may be or "however mistaken they may be as to the effect of the judgment, "are not liable to have an action brought against them for "damages for what they have done." As I follow the facts of Williams v. Williams & Nathan,[3] the sheriff's officers had, in fact, no knowledge of the subtenant's rights. They acted in strict accordance with the terms of the writ of possession and in the belief that they were entitled to evict the plaintiff. As regards the landlord, the only evidence of his participation in the sheriff's officers' proceedings was that he was personally present as a silent spectator at the eviction. It was held that such presence did not suffice to make the sheriff's officers, who were acting as officers of the court, the agents of the landlord. Greer L.J., who delivered the leading judgment with which Scott L.J. and Finlay J. were content merely to concur, said[4]: "First of all, with regard to "the case of the defendant Williams, the landlord, I think it is "clear to demonstration, from the case that has been cited of "Woollen v. Wright[5] and other cases, and from a well known "rule of law, that a sheriff and a sheriff's officer, executing a judg- "ment of the court, are acting, as one may say, on behalf of the "court. Each is doing his duty as an officer of the court, and is "not a servant or agent of the plaintiff who has recovered judg- "ment in the action. Of course, there may be circumstances "which show that the plaintiff by intervention had made the "sheriff his agent to do something which was not covered by the "judgment, or by the writ of execution. If I had thought that "what happened in this case amounted to that, or that the county "court judge had found as a fact that the landlord Williams "interfered, and requested the sheriff's officer to execute the "judgment on property upon which he was not entitled to execute "the judgment, then the judge would have been right. But, in "my view, there is no evidence justifying any finding as to the "special direction given to the sheriff or the sheriff's officer which "might make the sheriff or the sheriff's officer the agent of the "defendant Williams, the landlord. That is enough to dispose of "the case as regards the defendant Williams. It seems to me "that, with all respect to the very forcible argument of Mr. "Weitzman, the cases he has cited have nothing to do with the "matter. They are cases in which the agent of the judgment "creditor, the man who has obtained judgment, has requested "the officer to execute judgment against somebody who was not "a party to the judgment at all, and was not a party to, or "included within, the writ of fi. fa. Of course, if a plaintiff who "has recovered judgment against Jones says to the sheriff's "officer, who is about to issue execution and writ of fi. fa. on the "judgment against Jones: 'Issue execution against Williams,' "he would be liable for the consequences of having so instructed "the sheriff's officer. But in this case there is no evidence of any "such instructions. The only evidence before the judge on which "Mr. Weitzman relies is that the defendant Williams, being "present, did not say to the officer: 'You must not execute "'judgment on the three rooms which are alleged to have been "'controlled premises.' But that is quite different from saying "that the appellant Williams instructed the officer to execute the "judgment otherwise than in the manner in which in law it had "to be executed. In addition to that, one has to remember that "the judgment given by the master in this case was intended by "the master to bind everybody on the premises, as in form it "does."

It was Mr. Collymore's argument in this court that the bank's participation in the present case had not been of a merely passive character; that they had here actively intervened in Roberts's eviction; that they had instructed Nathan & Co. to evict Roberts; and that Nathan & Co., having acted on those instructions, must be treated as having been the bank's agents in the doing of a wrongful act, namely, trespass on the Roberts's dwelling-house. In my judgment, the terms of the telephone conversation between the bank's solicitors and Nathan & Co., as recorded by the former, cannot fairly lead to the inference alleged. It is clear that Nathan & Co., having heard from Roberts, sought and obtained the advice of the bank's solicitors and thereupon chose to act upon it. There is no question here, as it seems to me, such as was in the mind of Greer L.J., of the sheriff or his officers departing, at the instance of a judgment creditor, from the terms of the writ of execution. The sheriff's officers adhered throughout to the strict terms and command of the writ of possession and, having done so, must prima facie at any rate, on the authority of Williams v. Williams & Nathan,[6] be treated as having acted independently of the landlord and as officers of the court. As a matter of principle, it seems to me impossible that the character and quality of their actions were entirely altered because they sought advice and then chose to act upon that advice (as it was, no doubt, expected that they would). The responsibility for acting on the advice they sought and received was their responsibility. They cannot, in my judgment, be converted into the agents of the persons on whose behalf the advisers were acting—whether that person was the landlord or a stranger to the property in question—unless at the very least it were shown that the sheriff's officers made it plain that their subsequent actions were only undertaken on the basis of that other person assuming responsibility therefor. And nothing of that kind, in my judgment, is established in the present case. Whether in a case in which the sheriff and his officers received notice of facts sufficient to show that an occupier was protected by the Rent Restriction Acts, but, nevertheless, proceeded to evict him, he or they would be liable in damages to tbe occupier, notwithstanding the decision in Williams v. Williams & Nathan [6] (in which, as I have said, no such notice appears to have been received by the sheriff's officers) it is unnecessary in the present case to decide.

I have said that I have reached my conclusion with some feeling of dissatisfaction. The whole of the costs of these proceedings have been occasioned by the mistaken view of Roberts's rights persisted in by the bank until the case came before the county court judge. The bank's counsel also contended that Roberts could at any time after his receipt of the letter of January 22, and should, have applied for "relief" in the Winnearls action. But my sympathies are with Roberts, who, no doubt, shared the reluctance common to most men towards embarking in litigation unless compelled so to do.

This consideration brings me to a matter of some general significance. The terms of Ord. 47, r. 1, reflect the state of the law before the impact of the rent restriction legislation. At that time the determination upon forfeiture of a lease necessarily and automatically put an end to the rights of all occupiers derived out of the lease, subject only to the statutory right of such an occupier to apply to the court for relief from the forfeiture. It is, however, fundamental to the rent restriction legislation that no order for possession may be made against a protected tenant save in accordance with the conditions laid down in the Acts. (See, for example, section 3 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933.[7]) So, in Haskins v. Lewis,[8] Scrutton L.J. appears to lay it down that a writ of possession obtained at the suit of a landlord in an action in which the head tenant only has been joined as a defendant does not entitle the bailiff to evict a subtenant protected by the Acts. He said[9]: "I think an order for recovery of possession of the whole "premises can be made in favour of the landlord against the "tenant which will result in determining the tenant's interest in "the whole of the dwelling-house, and that any suggestion that "the order for possession will entitle the bailiff to turn the sub-"tenants out of the part of the premises they occupy is met by "the provision that as they are tenants of the landlord under the "Act, and not tenants of the original tenant, by reason of "section 15 (3),[10] the bailiff will not be able to have such "power"—a view which Greer L.J., who dissented in Haskins v. Lewis,[11] accepted in Williams v. Williams & Nathan[12] as being the view of the majority of the Court of Appeal.

We were also referred to Lewis v. Gunter-Jones,[13] but that was a case which arose out of the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, and depended on the special terms of that Act, and it does not appear to carry the matter any further.

I do not think that these citations can affect the validity or effect in the present case, as regards the liability of the bank, of the decision in Williams v. Williams & Nathan.[14] I venture, however, to suggest that upon some convenient occasion the terms of Ord. 47, r. 1, might usefully be reviewed by the appropriate authority. But for the reasons which I have stated I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

JENKINS L.J. I agree that this appeal fails. The judgment for possession extended to the whole of the premises, and I understand the writ of possession to have been in the usual form directing the sheriff to cause the bank to have possession of the whole of the premises. Accordingly, the sheriff in ejecting Roberts was acting within the authority with which the court had invested him by the writ of possession, and the intervention of the bank's solicitors did not result in anything being done by the sheriff or his officers beyond what they were authorized, and indeed directed, to do by the court. In these circumstances I am not prepared to hold that the sheriff's officers, in ejecting Roberts, were acting not as agents of the court but as agents for the bank so as to make the bank liable in damages to Roberts for his wrongful eviction. It is no doubt true that the eviction of Roberts was wrongful in the sense that the judgment could not affect his rights as a lawful subtenant entitled to the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts; but it was regular in the sense that it was authorized by the terms of the judgment and writ of possession. The wrong done to Roberts was thus, in my view, attributable to a defect in the practice of the court for which neither the sheriff or his officers, nor the plaintiffs can be held liable. The court appears to have acted correctly in accordance with the Rules of the Supreme Court, Ord. 47, r. 1, and the injustice which has resulted suggests that a revision of this rule to meet cases where there are protected sub-tenants might well be considered.

HODSON L.J. I agree. The wrong done to Roberts was done, I think, due to a defect in the court's procedure which may result in the eviction of a tenant protected by the Rent Restriction Acts without the landlord being called upon to satisfy the court that the provisions of section 3 of the Act of 1933 have been complied with. R. S. C., Ord. 47, r. 1, puts the burden on the tenant to apply for relief in cases where application is made for recovery of land. Roberts was given notice of the proceedings and the writ of possession was regularly issued after notice had been given to him and no relief had been sought by him with the consequence that he was evicted.

It was thought that in such a case as the present where persons in possession of part of the premises had become tenants of the landlord by virtue of the operation of section 15 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, eviction would not take place. (See Haskins v. Lewis,[15] the passage which the Master of the Rolls has read.) It is plain, as this case shows, that eviction may occur when no reply is made to the notice given under Ord. 47, r. 1, for the court is not then informed that persons in possession of part of the premises are protected. This procedure therefore runs counter to the section of the Act of 1933 which places restrictions on the right to an order for possession in cases to which the Acts apply and puts a burden upon the landlord to satisfy the court that it is reasonable to make an order and that the other conditions therein contained are satisfied. A revision of the rule would, therefore, appear to be desirable.

Appeal dismissed without costs.

The defendants admitted liability and the parties arrived at a settlement.

On the question of costs, the plaintiff applied for an order that the defendants should pay the plaintiff's costs in the action to be taxed as between solicitor and client. The application was heard in chambers and adjourned into court for judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 21. WILLMER J, read the following judgment. This matter came before me in chambers on a summons to approve the terms of settlement of an action brought under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846–1908, and under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, by the widow and administratrix of the estate of a deceased seaman. The action arose out of a collision at sea, which occurred on October 18, 1949, as a result of which a number of lives were lost, including that of the plaintiff's husband. I have already dealt in chambers with the substantial matters which fall to be determined between the parties. But the summons included an application for an order that the defendants, who had admitted liability, should pay the plaintiff's costs of the action (including certain costs of proceedings in the King's Bench Division) to be taxed as between solicitor and client. This appeared to me to raise a question of general interest and importance—especially as I was informed that a similar question was likely to arise in a number of other actions arising out of the same casualty—and I therefore thought it right to adjourn this part of the summons into court for judgment.

Counsel for the plaintiff made it clear at the outset that what he sought was to recover from the defendants his costs to be taxed as between solicitor and own client, i.e., on a full indemnity basis. He was not able to cite any reported case in which such an order had been made in a case of this character, but stated that in his experience such orders were not uncommonly made in chambers, more particularly in the Queen's Bench Division. My own understanding is that, where such orders have been made, they have been made by consent, or at least without active opposition on the part of the defendant. Be that as it may, counsel for the plaintiff contended that the discretion of the court in the matter of costs included a discretion to order that they be paid on a full indemnity basis, and submitted that on the facts of this case my discretion should be exercised in that way, having regard to the great delay which has occurred, through no fault of the plaintiff, between the death of the deceased man and the determination of the defendants' liability. That delay has in fact been due to the fact that the plaintiff's action was stayed for a long period while it was being determined in other proceedings (which went to the Court of Appeal), which of five different defendants sued by the plaintiff was responsible for the casualty. It was contended that in such circumstances it would be wrong that the amount of the plaintiff's recovery should be diminished by any liability, however small. in respect of unrecovered costs.

Counsel for the defendants contended that, even allowing for the court's unfettered discretion in the matter of costs, there was no power, in a case of this character, to order the payment of costs to be taxed as between solicitor and own client. Alternatively, he submitted that, even if such power existed, there was no good reason in the present case for awarding costs against the defendants otherwise than on a party and party basis, seeing that the defendants were no more responsible than the plaintiff for the long delay that elapsed before liability was determined.

In view of the general interest and importance of the subject, it is surprising to find such a paucity of reported authority on the power of the court, in a case such as this, to order payment of costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client. In support of his argument counsel for the defendants relied on a passage in Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd ed., Vol. 26, para. 190, p. 101, under the title "Practice and Procedure," contributed by no less an authority than Sir George Bonner. It is there stated as follows: "In general the costs are taxed as "between party and party. In matters of equitable jurisdiction, "and in cases where there is express statutory provision to that "effect, and, in cases where there is an obligation to indemnify "or contribute, costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client "may be awarded; but in general there is no power to award "such costs." A similar view is expressed in Odgers in Pleading and Practice, 13th ed., p. 303, where it is stated: "Except in matters of equitable jurisdiction, the judge cannot "award costs as between solicitor and client to the successful "party, unless there is an express statutory provision enabling "him to do so (e.g., the Public Authorities Protection Act, "1893), or unless both parties consent."

Before the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, it was held in Mordue v. Palmer,[1] that the Court of Chancery had power to award costs as between solicitor and client. But in the same case Mellish L.J.[2] expressed the view that the Courts of Common Law had no such power. In 1881, i.e., 8 years after the passing of the first Judicature Act, the Court of Appeal, consisting of [1] (1870) L.R. 6 Ch. 22. [2] Ibid. 32.

Sir George Jessel M.R., Brett and Cotton L.JJ., decided unanimously in Cockburn v. Edwards,[3] that a successful plaintiff was not entitled to receive, as damages in the same action, the difference between solicitor and client and party and party costs. Cotton L.J. succinctly expressed what I conceive to be the view of all three members of the court in the following words[4]: "I "am of opinion that the difference between solicitor and client "costs and party and party costs in an action cannot be given "by way of damages in the same action, the latter costs being "all that the plaintiff is entitled to. Costs in another action "stand on quite a different footing." I apprehend that what the learned Lord Justice had in mind, in relation to that last sentence, was the case where the plaintiff's claim is for an indemnity against costs incurred by him in prosecuting or defending some other action. (Compare the passage from Halsbury's Laws of England, which I read a moment ago.) It is to be observed that in Cockburn v. Edwards[5] the difference between solicitor and client costs and party and party costs was claimed as an item of damages in the action, whereas in the present case the claim is for the recovery of the whole of the solicitor and client costs as costs. The effect, however, appears to be the same, and the observations of the Court of Appeal would seem to be equally applicable, however the claim is put.

In 1887 a similar question again came before the Court of Appeal in Andrews v. Barnes,[6] when the court, citing Mordue v. Palmer[7] with approval, decided that since the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, the High Court of Justice had, as the old Court of Chancery formerly had, in matters of equitable jurisdiction a general discretionary power to give costs as between solicitor and client. The previous decision in Cockburn v. Edwards[8] was doubted, and the question whether the High Court had the same power in matters of common law jurisdiction was expressly left open, the court refraining from expressing a decided opinion on that point. Since the date of Andrews v. Barnes[9] I have been unable to find any reported decision which gives an authoritative ruling on the point, and certainly none has been cited to me.

The material statutory provision in relation to costs which was in force at the time of Cockburn v. Edwards and Andrews v. Barnes was the Judicature Act, 1875, Sch. I, Ord. 55, which was in the following terms: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, "the costs of and incidental to all proceedings in the High Court "shall be in the discretion of the court . . ." The corresponding provision today is section 50 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which substantially reproduces section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890. Section 50 of the Act of 1925 provides: "Subject to the provisions of this Act and to "rules of court and to the express provisions of any other Act, "the costs of and incidental to all proceedings in the Supreme "Court . . . shall be in the discretion of the court or judge, and "the court or judge shall have full power to determine by whom "and to what extent the costs are to be paid." It will be seen that the section, as it stands today, and as it was substantially enacted in 1890, contains additional words, as compared with the corresponding section in the Act of 1873, which may well be thought to be of no little significance. In particular, it can be argued that, even if prior to 1890 there was no power in common law proceedings to award costs as between solicitor and client, as stated by Mellish L.J. in Mordue v. Palmer,[10] and as would seem to follow from the Court of Appeal's decision in Cockburn v. Edwards[11] (if that decision be accepted), such a power was abundantly conferred by the very wide words of section 5 of the Act of 1890.

As a matter of history, it has been said that section 5 of the Act of 1890 was passed in consequence of the decision in In re Mills' Estate,[12] and for the purpose of conferring on the court jurisdiction to award costs in certain classes of case in which it had previously been held that there was no jurisdiction to do so: see In re Fisher.[13] But it can well be argued that, coming so soon after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Andrews v. Barnes,[14] the section was further intended to resolve the question therein left open as to the jurisdiction of the court to award solicitor and client costs in common law proceedings. At all events, Kay L.J. in In re Fisher,[15] appears to have been disposed to give the words of the new enactment a wide interpretation. He said[16]: "Then follow these additional words: 'And the court "'or judge shall have full power to determine by whom and to "'what extent such costs are to be paid.' Taking these last words "alone, to what costs do they apply? Clearly to the costs "of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court. The "object of the words so plainly expressed must be to give the "court power to do that which it had not power to do before. "In my opinion, it is impossible to read section 5 in any way "but this. It is an enabling section enlarging the jurisdiction "of the court; giving it jurisdiction where it had not jurisdiction "before in respect of costs. What is the limitation to that "jurisdiction? The limitation is contained in a former part of "the section, 'subject to the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts, "'and the Rules of Court made thereunder, and to the express "'provisions of any statute whether passed before or after the "'commencement of this Act.'" Pausing there, I might observe that Kay L.J. is there quoting the words of the Act of 1890. Then he goes on: "That means if there be a provision "in the Judicature Acts or in the Rules of Court, or an express "provision in any statute which limits the discretion of the "court, the Act is to be taken subject to that limitation; but it "also means that the court is to have a discretion where the "former Acts are silent as to costs." I think Kay L.J. might well have added "or where the Rules of Court are silent as to "costs."

A rather different and narrower view was expressed by Lord Alverstone C.J. in Civil Service Co-operative Society v. General Steam Navigation Co.[17] In that case the trial judge, while dismissing the plaintiffs' claim, nevertheless ordered each party to bear their own costs, because he did not approve of the fact that the defendants had refused to agree to what he considered reasonable terms of settlement. The Court of Appeal held that there were no materials upon which the judge could exercise his discretion by making that order, and they ordered that the defendants should have their costs. In the course of the argument in the Court of Appeal it was contended for the plaintiffs that the judge's discretion was unlimited, because the discretion of the court had been extended by section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, which, it was argued, conferred a new jurisdiction. Dealing with this point, Lord Alverstone C.J. said[18]: "section 5 "of the Judicature Act, 1890, did not alter the law with respect to "the discretion of a judge as to costs, or with respect to the "powers of the Court of Appeal in dealing with that discretion. "Section 5 merely brought within the ambit of the discretion "certain cases in which it had previously been considered "doubtful whether costs were in the discretion of the judge."

In the light of these conflicting dicta I have to construe section 50 of the Act of 1925 as best I can. The section gives the court or judge "full power" to determine not only "by "whom" but also "to what extent" costs are to be paid. Reading these words in their natural and ordinary sense, it appears to me that standing by themselves they are prima facie sufficient to empower me, in a proper case, to order the payment of costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client, and even as between solicitor and own client. But, as pointed out by Kay L.J. in In re Fisher,[19] the words must be used subject to the limitation imposed by the opening words of the section, i.e., "Subject to the provisions of this Act and to Rules of Court." In my judgment, therefore, it is necessary to look closely at the provisions of the Rules of the Supreme Court, in order to ascertain whether, and to what extent, the "full power" conferred by section 50 of the Act of 1925 is subject to any limitation.

The most obvious limitation is that contained in Order 65, rule 27 (29), which provides as follows: "On every taxation the "taxing master shall allow all such costs, charges and expenses, "as shall appear to him to have been necessary, or proper for the "attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party, "but save as against the party who incurred the same no costs "shall be allowed which appear to the taxing master to have "been incurred or increased through over-caution, negligence or "mistake or by payment of special fees to counsel or special "charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other "unusual expenses." If, as the plaintiff asks, I were to order payment of costs to be taxed as between solicitor and own client, i.e., on an indemnity basis, the registrar, when he comes to tax the costs, would be prevented from doing the very thing which he is directed by this rule to do, namely, to disallow (as against the paying party) such costs as appear to him to have been incurred, e.g., through over-caution, negligence or mistake, or by payment of special fees, or by other unusual expenses. He would be bound to allow the whole of the costs in fact incurred, save only such costs, if any, as could not properly be charged by the solicitor against his own client. In my judgment, having regard to the limitation imposed by rule 27 (29), it is not open to me to direct payment of costs to be taxed as between solicitor and own client.

As was pointed out, however, by Havers J. in Gibbs v. Gibbs,[20] between the extremes of solicitor and own client taxation on the one hand and party and party taxation on the other, provision is made for various forms of so-called solicitor and client taxation, which really amount to party and party taxations, but on a more generous basis. Such, for instance, is the form of taxation which the court is required to order in the case of an assisted person under the Legal Aid Scheme. I do not think that there is anything in Order 65, rule 27 (29) to prevent my directing the payment of costs taxed on a solicitor and client basis, as so defined. On the contrary, in certain instances, e.g., where the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, applies, it is mandatory to direct the payment of costs to be taxed on such a basis. I can well conceive that there may be other types of case, where there is no such mandatory requirement, in which the court, in the exercise of the "full power" conferred by section 50 of the Act, could properly direct payment of costs to be taxed on an ordinary solicitor and client basis, without offending against the provisions of Order 65, rule 27 (29). An instance may be found in the case where a pleading is ordered to be struck out as unnecessary or scandalous: see Order 19, rule 27, which expressly authorizes the court to order costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client in such a case. Here, however, I have to deal with a special class of case, namely, one in which damages are adjudged to be paid under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, to an infant and to the widow of the person killed. Cases of this class are subject to a special code of rules, as set out in the various paragraphs of Order 22, rule 14: see particularly paragraph (9), which specifically brings cases under the Fatal Accidents Acts within the provisions of this special code of rules. Paragraph (11) provides: "The costs "of the plaintiff . . . shall be taxed . . . as between party and "party and as between solicitor and client, and the Taxing "Master . . . shall certify the respective amounts of the party "and party and solicitor and client costs, and the difference "(if any) . . . and no costs other than those so certified shall be "payable to the solicitor for any plaintiff in the cause or matter." Again, paragraph (3) empowers the court to give directions as to the dealing with any money adjudged to be paid, and by paragraph (4) such directions may include directions "as to "any payment to be made either directly or out of the amount "paid into court . . . to the plaintiff . . . or to the plaintiff's "solicitor in respect of costs or of the difference between party "and party and solicitor and client costs."

If in the present case I were to direct payment by the defendants of costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client, how, it may be asked, is the registrar on taxation to comply with the requirements of paragraph (11) of the rule, which have more than once been held to be mandatory? How again would it be possible to apply the provisions of paragraph (4), which clearly contemplate that there shall have been both a party and party and a solicitor and client taxation? In all the circumstances, I am driven to the conclusion that, so far at any rate as actions under the Fatal Accidents Acts are concerned, the discretion of the court under section 50 of the Judicature Act, 1925, is limited by the Rules of Court, and that in the absence of consent there is no power to direct payment by the defendant of costs to be taxed otherwise than as between party and party. My order in the present case will, therefore, be that the defendants do pay the plaintiff's costs to be taxed as required by Order 22, rule 14 (11).

I think it is perhaps right that I should add this. If I had come to the conclusion that I had a discretion to order the payment of costs otherwise than on a party and party basis, I should not in any event, in the particular circumstances of this case, have felt disposed to make the order asked for by the plaintiff, having regard to the fact that the defendants are no more responsible than the plaintiff for the unfortunate delay which has occurred in settling this claim. It should, I think, be made clear that there has been no suggestion of any default, or impropriety in the conduct of the proceedings, on the part of the defendants or their solicitors.

By clause 3 of his will made in 1909 the then Earl of Leven (hereinafter called "the testator") devised his K estate to the use of his brother A and his assigns during his life with remainder to the use of his first and every other son successively in tail male with remainder to the use likewise of his brother D with remainder to the use likewise of his brother I with remainder "to the use of "the person who at the time of the failure or determination of the "preceding uses and when this present ultimate limitation shall "take effect in possession shall be or become entitled to the title "and dignity of the Earldom of Leven and his heirs and assigns "absolutely." By clause 5 he constituted a settled legacy of £200,000 on trust to hold it during the period specified to pay the income to the earl for the time being and at the end thereof for the then earl. By clause 8—a forfeiture clause—he made each brother and any of their sons born in his lifetime provide for death duties by taking out insurance policies and assigning them to the trustees of the will.

In 1913 the testator died. A (hereinafter called "the earl") succeeded him and took out on his own life and in the trustees' names policies of insurance for £150,000. By deed executed in 1914 between the trustees and the earl covenanted to do nothing whereby the policies might become void or voidable, and not to hinder the trustees from receiving policy moneys; to effect a new one or new ones should any become void; and duly to pay the premiums; and he irrevocably authorized the trustees to pay them out of the income of the settled legacy and charged that income with their payment.

In June, 1942—the K estate having been sold and the proceeds of sale invested—the court authorized the acceptance of an offer by the insurance company to convert the policies into fully-paid whole-life policies totalling £172,566 and ordered the earl to covenant with the trustees that on his death his estate should bear all duty then payable in respect of the proceeds of sale. By deed executed in July, 1942, the earl did so covenant. In 1945 he and his eldest son barred the entail. In 1947 the earl died and estate duty became payable in respect of his interest in the property settled by the testator's will. Duty amounting to £68,384 13s. 2d. was paid out of the earl's free estate. The Crown claimed a declaration that, having regard to section 44 of the Finance Act, 1940, and section 7

(1) of the Finance Act, 1894,[1] in determining the value of the earl's estate for assessment to estate duty no allowance was to be made for that debt.

Held, it being admitted that the deed of 1942 was a "disposition of property" within the meaning of section 44 (1) of the Finance Act, 1940;

[1] Finance Act, 1894, s. 7 (1): "In determining the value of an estate for the purpose of Estate duty allowance shall be made for reasonable funeral expenses and for debts and incumbrances; but an allowance shall not be made—(a) for debts incurred by the deceased, or incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased, unless such debts or incumbrances were incurred or created bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit and take effect out of his interest, nor (b) for any debt in respect whereof there is a right to reimbursement from any other estate or person, unless such reimbursement cannot be obtained, nor (c) more than once for the same debt or incumbrance charged upon different portions of the estate; and any debt or incumbrance for which an allowance is made shall be deducted from the value of the land or other subjects of property liable thereto."

Finance Act, 1940, s. 44 (1): "Where a person dying after the commencement of this Act has made a disposition of property in favour of a relative of his, the creation or disposition in favour of the deceased of an annuity or other interest limited to cease on the death of the deceased or of any other person shall not be treated for the purposes of section 3, or of subsection (1) of section 7, of the Finance Act, 1894, as consideration for the disposition made by the deceased. (2) In this section the expression 'relative' means, in relation to the deceased,—(a) the wife or husband of the deceased; (b) the father, mother, children, uncles and aunts, of the deceased; and (c) any issue of any person falling within either of the preceding paragraphs and the other party to a marriage with any such person or issue; and references to 'children' and 'issue' include references to illegitimate children and to adopted children. (3) In this section the expression 'annuity' includes any series of payments, whether inter-connected or not, whether of the same or of varying amounts, and whether payable at regular intervals or otherwise, and payments of dividends, or interest on shares in or debentures of a company shall be treated for the purposes of this section as a series of payments constituting an annuity limited to cease on a death if the payments are liable to cease on the death, or the amounts thereof are liable to be reduced on the death, by reason directly or indirectly of the extinguishment or any alteration of rights attaching to, or of the issue of, any shares in or debentures of a company. (4) If the deceased has made in favour of a company to which this section applies a disposition which, if it had been made in favour of a relative of his, would have fallen within subsection (1) of this section, this section shall have effect in like manner as if the disposition had been made in favour of a relative of his, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners that no relative of the deceased was, at the time of the disposition or subsequently during the life of the deceased, a member of the company."

Section 45 (2): "The extinguishment at the expense of the deceased of a debt or other right shall be deemed for the purposes of the said enactments"—namely, those relating to estate duty—"to have been a disposition made by the deceased in favour of the person for whose benefit the debt or right was extinguished, and in relation to such a disposition the expression 'property' in the said enactments shall include the benefit conferred by the extinguishment of the debt or right."

Section 59: "In this Part of this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them respectively, that is to say . . . 'Disposition' includes . . . in relation to shares in or debentures of a company, the extinguishment or any alteration of rights attaching thereto, whether effected by a single operation or by associated operations."

Leven and Melville (Earl), decd., In re.

(1) that, for the purposes of estate duty, the effect of the disposition must be determined as at the date thereof, and not as at the death of the deceased;

(2) that, as the class entitled to take under clause 3 of the will included persons who were not "relatives" within the meaning of section 44 (2), and the person who would actually enjoy the benefit was not ascertainable at the date of the disposition, the section did not apply;

(3) that in section 44 (1) the word "disposition" did not, in its context, include extinguishment, so that the extinguishment of the earl's liability to make a "series of payments" namely, the premiums, was not "the . . . disposition in favour of the deceased "of an annuity. . . ."

(4) that, accordingly, the £68,384 13s. 2d. was properly to be treated as a deduction for the purpose of calculating the estate duty payable on the earl's estate.

Action.

By this action the Crown claimed against the executors of the late Earl of Leven and of Melville a declaration that, having regard to section 44 of the Finance Act, 1940, and section 7 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, in determining the value of the earl's estate for assessment to estate duty no allowance was to be made for a debt of £68,384 13s. 2d., being an amount paid on the earl's death in respect of an estate of which he had been tenant for life until, less than five years before his death, he and his son had barred the entail.

The following statement of the facts is taken in substance from the judgment of Wynn-Parry J.

By clause 3 of his will dated August 27, 1909, the then earl (hereinafter referred to as "the testator") devised his Kirtlington Estate in the county of Oxford to the use of his brother Archibald Alexander Lester Melville and his assigns during his life with remainder to the use of his first and every other son successively in remainder one after the other according to their respective seniorities in tail male with remainder to the use of his brother David William Leslie Melville and his assigns during his life with remainder to the use of his first and every other son successively in remainder one after the other according to their respective seniorities in tail male with remainder to the use of his brother Ian Leslie Melville and his assigns during his life with remainder to the use of his first and every other son successively in remainder one after the other according to their respective seniorities in tail male with remainder "to the use "of the person who at the time of the failure or determination of "the preceding uses and when this present ultimate limitation "shall take effect in possession shall be or become entitled to the "title and dignity of the Earldom of Leven and his heirs and "assigns absolutely."

By clause 5 of his will the testator constituted a settled legacy of £200,000, directing his trustees to hold it and the investments for the time being representing it for the period specified in the clause on trust to pay the income thereof "to the person who "shall for the time being be entitled to the title and dignity of "the Earldom of Leven," and at the end of the period to stand possessed of the settled legacy in trust for the person who should then be entitled to such title or dignity.

By clause 8 the testator laid on each of his brothers and any sons born in the testator's lifetime of his brothers, who should become entitled to the title and dignity of the Earldom of Leven, the obligation, by means of a forfeiture provision, to provide for the death duties estimated to be payable on his death by taking out a policy or policies of insurance on his life and assigning it or them to the trustees of the will.

On June 11, 1913, the testator died. He was succeeded as Earl of Leven by his brother Archibald Alexander, hereinafter referred to as "the earl," who in due course complied with the conditions of clause 8 of the will of the testator by effecting on his own life and in the names of the trustees of the will four policies of insurance for the aggregate sum of £150,000 at the total annual premiums of £3,050, and by executing a deed dated April 29, 1914, expressed to be made between the trustees of the one part and the earl of the other part.

By this deed the earl covenanted as follows: First, that he would not do or suffer anything whereby the policies might become void or voidable or the trustees be hindered from receiving all or any of the policy moneys: secondly, that if the policies or any of them should become void he would immediately effect a new policy or policies on his life in the name of the trustees for a sum or sums not less in the whole than the sum of £150,000; thirdly, that he would from time to time duly pay the premiums for the time being necessary for keeping the policies on foot. Further, the earl irrevocably authorized the trustees to pay the premiums out of the income of the settled legacy, and charged that income with the payment thereof.

On some date before June, 1942, the Kirtlington Estate was sold, and the proceeds of sale were invested. On June 8, 1942, Farwell J. at chambers made an order under section 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925, authorizing the trustees to accept an offer by the insurance company with which the policies had been effected to convert the policies into fully-paid-up whole life policies securing the aggregate sum of £172,566. The order further provided that the earl should enter into a covenant with the trustees that at his death his estate should bear any duty payable on his death in respect of the proceeds of sale of the estate. In pursuance of the order, the earl, by deed dated July 16, 1942, entered into a covenant with the trustees as required by the order of Farwell J.

On August 21, 1945, the earl's eldest son, who had attained his majority, executed a disentailing assurance and the earl released his life estate to his son. On January 15, 1947, the earl died and, as his death occurred within five years of the release of his life interest, estate duty became payable in respect of his interest in the property settled by the testator's will. Duty to the amount of £68,384 13s. 2d. was paid out of the earl's free estate.

By this action the Crown claimed a declaration that, having regard to section 44 of the Finance Act, 1940, and to section 7 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, no allowance was to be made for the debt of £68,384 13s. 2d. in determining the value of the earl's estate for assessment to estate duty.

Geoffrey Cross Q.C. and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

Sir Andrew Clark Q.C. and E. I. Goulding for the earl's executors.

Wynn-Parry J. stated the facts and continued: The question which now arises is whether or not, having regard to the provisions of section 44 of the Finance Act, 1940, the £68,000 is properly to be treated as a deduction for the purpose of calculating the estate duty payable in respect of the earl's free estate. [His Lordship read section 40 (1) (2) (3) and (4) and continued:] On the facts which I have detailed, it is agreed that there has been a "disposition of property" within the meaning of that phrase as used in section 44 (1), so that the first condition of that subsection is fulfilled.

The next condition is that the disposition should have been made "in favour of a relative." Here the parties are at variance. The first question is whether the effect of the disposition is to be determined as at the date of the disposition, or as at the date of the death of the deceased. In my view, the answer is as at the date of the disposition. I can see no justification for choosing the date of death. The choice of any date other than that of the disposition might well lead to great uncertainty and confusion, and cases might well be postulated in which it would be impossible to resolve the matter either at the date of death or for some considerable time thereafter. On the other hand, if the question is to be answered by reference to the position obtaining at the date of the disposition, no such doubt or confusion can arise.

The next question, then is, taking one's stand at the date of the disposition—in this case July 16, 1942—can the disposition be said to have been made in favour of a relative of the earl? In view of clause 3 of the testator's will it cannot be said that, at the date of the disposition, only a relative could have benefited. If the ultimate limitation took effect, the disposition would favour a person who was not a relative.

The object of the section is to provide that in the case, but only in the case, of a disposition in favour of a relative is the creation of or disposition of the annuity mentioned in subsection (1) not to be regarded as consideration for the purposes of the Finance Act, 1894. If, however, the relevant date for testing the nature of the disposition (so far as its objects are concerned) is the date thereof, it cannot be said whether or not there was consideration for the purposes of the Finance Act, 1894, because it cannot be said at the date of the disposition, whether a relative or a stranger will benefit by the disposition.

In my view, a disposition in favour of one of a class, all the members of which were "relatives," would satisfy the condition of the section; but where, as here, the class includes a person or persons who do not come within the definition of "relative" in subsection (2), and the person who actually enjoys the benefit is not ascertainable at the date of the disposition, the section is inapplicable.

It was argued that a disposition of property in favour of a class which included relatives, though it did not consist exclusively of relatives—all the interests being, of course, contingent at the date of the disposition—must be a disposition in favour of a relative as being in favour of every member of the class. My answer to that is that that view is tenable, if at all, only until one reads the rest of subsection (1), because, when it is appreciated that the object of the section is to determine whether or not the "annuity or other interest" is to be treated as consideration and that that matter must be tested as at the date of the disposition, it is seen that it cannot be said whether or not the annuity or other interest is good consideration, because it cannot be said who will benefit.

My attention was directed to section 44 (4), but in my view that subsection does not affect the construction of subsection (1). Subsection (4) is designed to strike at attempts to avoid coming within the mischief of subsection (1) by making the disposition in favour of a company to which the section applies.

The view which I have expressed is, of course, sufficient to dispose of the action; but as a further point was argued, and as the case may be taken to a higher court, I ought perhaps to express my present view on it.

The third condition of subsection (1) is that there should be shown the creation or disposition in favour of the deceased of an annuity or other interest. The word "annuity" is given a very wide meaning by subsection (3). It includes "any series of "payments." It cannot be disputed that, before Farwell J.'s order and the acceptance of the insurance company's offer pursuant thereto, the earl was under an obligation to make "a series "of payments," namely, the annual premiums. The result of the order was to extinguish the liability to make those payments, and that order operated in favour of the earl. On this basis it was argued for the Crown that the word "disposition" in subsection (1) included "extinguishment," and therefore it followed that there had been a disposition in favour of the earl of an annuity, with the result that section 44 applied.

The word "disposition," taken by itself, and used in its most extended meaning, is no doubt wide enough to include the act of extinguishment. To talk of disposing of one's enemy, no doubt, indicates his extinguishment; but the primary meaning of the word, at any rate in relation to property, is to deal with the property in one of a number of ways, the property remaining in existence. Looking only, in the first instance, at subsection (1) I should have thought that the word "disposition" denoted some dealing with an annuity, as used in the section, so that the annuity continued in existence during the lifetime of the deceased, conferring on him over that period a benefit.

Leven and Melville (Earl), decd., In re.

Wynn-Parry J.

On the language of subsection (1), it would, to me, be a quite unexpected result that the subsection should apply to a liability of the deceased. Some light is, I think, thrown on the problem by section 45 (2) which expressly provides that the extinguishment, at the expense of the deceased, of a debt or other right shall be deemed for the purposes of the Finance Act, 1894, to have been a disposition made by the deceased in favour of the person for whose benefit the debt or right was extinguished; and that in relation to such a disposition the expression "property" in the Finance Act, 1894, shall include the benefit conferred by the extinguishment of the debt or right.

From this subsection, it is clear that where the legislature intended that, as against the subject, "disposition" should include "extinguishment," it was at pains to make express provision. Again, in section 59, the definition section, the word "extinguishment" is used in connexion with the word "disposi-"tion," but only in a limited sense. These two pointers serve, in my view, to underline the conclusion to which I have already come on the wording of subsection (1), namely, that in that subsection the word "disposition" does not, in its context, include "extinguishment."

In my judgment, therefore, the action fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Action dismissed.

Husband and Wife.

In 1948 and 1950 a wife advanced sums of money to her husband, a doctor, for the purposes of his practice. In July, 1952, judgment was entered for her against him for £5,550 and costs. Under the National Health Service Act, 1946, £2,786 was due to the husband from the Ministry of Health. On the wife's seeking, in the Queen's Bench Division, pursuant to section 27 (1) of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, an order that it be paid to her, the master in October, 1952, ordered that £2,786, less seven guineas being the amount of the Ministry's costs, be paid, on the terms that the £2,786 be retained by the wife's solicitors for six months from October 31, 1952, they undertaking to indemnify the Ministry for that period against any claim in respect of that sum by a trustee in bankruptcy of the husband. Accordingly, £2,778 (being £2,786 less the costs) was paid to the wife's solicitors. On January 2, 1953, a bankruptcy petition was presented, and on March 4 a receiving order made, against the husband.

The husband's trustee in bankruptcy claimed that the sums which the wife had advanced to him were gifts and not loans: alternatively, that, under section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914,[1] she was not entitled to retain against the trustee the benefit of the attachment of the debt of £2,786 due from the Ministry of Health, as the attachment was not completed at the date of the bankruptcy.

Held, (it being established on the facts that the advances by the wife were loans and not gifts), (1) that the payment to the solicitors on the terms of the master's order did not constitute a "receipt of "the debt" within section 40 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, as the solicitors held the money as stakeholders or trustees, as security for the benefit of the Ministry of Health; with the result that the attachment was not completed before the date of the receiving order;

George v. Tompson's Trustee [1949] Ch. 322; [1949] 1 All E.R. 554 considered:

(2) that proceedings under section 27 (1) of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947,[2] were proceedings by way of attachment for the

[1] Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 40 (1): "Where a creditor has issued execution against the goods or lands of a debtor, or has attached any debt due to him, he shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the execution or attachment against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor, unless he has completed the execution or attachment before the date of the receiving order, and before notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition by or against the debtor, or of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy by the debtor.

"(2) For the purposes of this Act, an execution against goods is completed by seizure and sale; an attachment of a debt is completed by receipt of the debt; and an execution against land is completed by seizure, or, in the case of an equitable interest, by the appointment of a receiver."

[2] Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 27 (1): "Where any money is payable by the Crown to some person who, under any order of any court, is liable to pay any money to any other person, and that other person would, if the money so payable by the Crown were money payable by a subject, be entitled under rules of court to obtain an order for the attachment thereof as a debt due or accruing due, or an order for the appointment of a sequestrator or receiver to receive the money on his behalf, the High Court may, subject to the provisions of this Act and in accordance with rules of court, make an order restraining the first-mentioned person from receiving that money and directing payment thereof to that other person, or to the sequestrator or receiver."

purposes of section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. Attachment, although not defined in the Act of 1914, was not a term of art confined to attachments coming strictly under Order 45. It was just as appropriate to proceedings under section 27 (1) of the Act of 1947. The intention of that provision was to put the judgment creditor in the same position vis-à-vis the Crown as vis-à-vis any other debtor of the bankrupt—namely, the position of being able to prevent the judgment debtor from obtaining payment of the debt and to secure payment of it to himself; so that the sum of £2,778 must be paid to the trustee;

(3) that the advances made by the wife to the husband, being for the purposes of his business and so leaving her, prima facie, deferred to other creditors under section 36 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, were not changed in their character by the judgment obtained by her in 1952 so as to entitle her on that judgment to compete with other creditors; so that her claim must be deferred.

By this motion the trustee in bankruptcy of a medical practitioner claimed a declaration that moneys advanced to the bankrupt by his wife for the purposes of his practice were gifts and not loans. Alternatively, he claimed that, having regard to section 40 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the wife was not entitled to retain against him the benefit of the attachment of a debt due to her husband from the Ministry of Health.

Cur. adv. vult.

1954. February 8. Upjohn J. delivered the following written judgment: By this motion the applicant, the trustee of the estate of Nicholas Lupkovics, whom I will refer to as "the "bankrupt," makes a number of claims against the respondent, Ruth Margaret Freville, who is the wife of the bankrupt although she has now changed her name by deed poll. I will refer to her as "the wife."

The bankrupt and the wife married in Budapest in 1937 and came to England shortly after the outbreak of war in 1939. The bankrupt is a doctor and practised for a time in Swindon, but in 1948 he went with the wife to Plymouth and set up there in partnership with a Dr. Bradlaw at the premises known as No. 73 Embankment Road, Plymouth. The bankrupt and the wife purchased and resided at a house known as Compton Lodge, Plymouth. In that year and admittedly for the purpose of the bankrupt's medical practice, the wife advanced to the bankrupt

£4,500, and the first question that arises on the motion is whether that sum was advanced by way of loan or by way of gift. Later, in 1950, the wife advanced to the bankrupt £800 for the purchase of a large Ford car which was also to be used for the purposes of his medical practice. A similar question arises as to the £800.

About the end of 1951 or possibly the beginning of 1952 the bankrupt was joined as co-respondent in a divorce suit brought by a Mr. Paterson against his wife, in which Mr. Paterson claimed substantial damages against the bankrupt. Unfortunately Mr. Paterson was a patient of the bankrupt, and this not unnaturally led Dr. Bradlaw to dissolve partnership with the bankrupt. The terms of the dissolution were contained in a written agreement dated May 17, 1952, whereby the partnership was dissolved with effect from March 31, 1952, and by clause 2 thereof it was provided that the bankrupt would take over No. 73 Embankment Road, Plymouth, and would assume sole liability for £2,638 1s. 10d., being the amount then due by the partnership to Lloyds Bank, Ld., on March 31, 1952, in connexion with that property. The effect of that term of the agreement appears to have been misunderstood at the wife's private examination. The bankrupt continued to live with the wife at Compton Lodge, and on June 3, 1952, the wife issued a writ against the bankrupt claiming two sums, one of £4,750 alleged to have been lent to the bankrupt on May 1, 1948, and one of £800 alleged to have been lent on September 25, 1950. Those sums admittedly represent the sums of £4,500 and £800 that I have already mentioned, the claim for the additional £250 appearing in the writ being mistaken. No appearance was entered and judgment was duly entered against the bankrupt for £5,550 and costs on July 16, 1952.

On August 29, 1952, the bankrupt left the wife. He put up a notice in the surgery at Embankment Road saying that patients should get another doctor and the trustee admits that, apart from the liability to Lloyds Bank in connexion with that property, he left no debts in the locality. Thereafter the evidence as to his movements is somewhat obscure. The wife apparently knew that he was living with Mrs. Paterson at an address in Cheviston Gardens, London, but she herself must have left Compton Lodge some time in September and gone to stay with an aunt in Worthing and after that, apparently, she has been earning her living working at one or more jobs. We know that later on—probably in January, 1953—the bankrupt was in Brixton Prison, for the wife visited him there: and that is really the sum total of the evidence before me as to the movements of the bankrupt after he left the wife in August, 1952.

To complete the history, on October 8 and 17, 1952, respectively there were made at the wife's instance garnishee orders absolute directing the executive council for Plymouth to pay to the wife £144 14s. 1d. and £14 4s. 7d. due by them to the bankrupt and those sums were duly paid to the wife. There was a further substantial sum of £2,786 due to the bankrupt from the Ministry of Health, under the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, and the regulations made thereunder, on his retirement from practice, which took place, at latest, on August 29. Pursuant to section 27 of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, the wife sought to obtain a direction that that sum should be paid to her. On October 29, 1952, the matter came before a Queen's Bench master and a good deal of evidence was filed thereon. On that day an order was made directing payment of the said sum of £2,786 (omitting shillings and pence) less the Ministry's costs, seven guineas, but on the terms that the sum of £2,786 should be retained in the hands of the wife's solicitors for six months from October 31, 1952, they undertaking to indemnify the Ministry for that period against any claim by a trustee in bankruptcy of the bankrupt in respect of that sum. I shall have to refer in detail to that order at a later stage. Pursuant to that order, £2,778 (i.e., £2,786 less £7 7s. costs) was paid into the joint names of two partners in Messrs. Field, Roscoe & Co., solicitors, and invested by them in gilt-edged securities which they hold pending the decision of this case. On January 2, 1953, a bankruptcy petition was presented against the bankrupt and on March 4, 1953, a receiving order was made and the applicant trustee was duly appointed the trustee of the estate.

The first question that I have to determine is whether the £4,500 and the £800 advanced to the bankrupt by the wife in 1948 and 1950 were gifts or loans.

[His Lordship then held, after considering the evidence, that both the £4,500 and the £800 were loans from the wife to the bankrupt, and continued as follows:] It follows therefore that the judgment obtained on July 16, 1952, was—at all events as to £4,500 and £800—valid, and the attachments in respect of the sums of £144 and £104, having been completed before the bankruptcy, cannot be re-opened.

With regard to the sum of £2,786, different considerations arise. Counsel for the trustee submitted that the wife is not entitled to retain the benefit of the payment made to her solicitors pursuant to the order of October 29 on two grounds, both arising under section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which I will now read.

First, counsel says that at the date of the order the wife had notice of an available act of bankruptcy by the debtor. The available act relied on is contained in section 1 (1) (d) of the Act of 1914. That paragraph is in these terms: [His Lordship read section 1 (1) (d) and continued:] It is said that on October 29 the wife knew that the bankrupt was absenting himself with intent to defeat or delay his creditors. [His Lordship dealt with the evidence as to that matter and, on it, held, first, that the court could not infer that the bankrupt had gone, and remained, away from Compton Lodge with that intent and, secondly, that if he did remain away with that intent, the evidence did not show that she knew that that was why he did so. His Lordship then continued:] In my judgment, on the facts of this case, the trustee fails on this point.

The second ground submitted by counsel for the trustee was that the attachment was not completed before the date of the receiving order because there had been no receipt of the debt within the meaning of section 40 (2) for, by the terms of the order of October 29, the sum of £2,786 or investments representing the sum remained in the hands of the wife's solicitors at that date. He referred me to George v. Tompson's Trustee,[1] where Wynn-Parry J. reviewed the earlier authorities and held that where the judgment creditor had an absolute and indefeasible title to money in court but had, through no fault of his own, not obtained actual payment out before the bankruptcy, the attachment was not complete.

I must now read the order of October 29: "Upon hearing the "solicitors for the judgment creditor and counsel for the Minister "of Health and upon reading the affidavits of Arthur James "Francis Danielli and James Austin filed herein And on the "judgment creditor's solicitors undertaking to hold the sum of "£2,786 for six months from October 31, 1952 and to indemnify "the said Minister for that period against any claim by a trustee "in bankruptcy of the judgment debtor in respect of the said "sum It is ordered that the judgment debtor be restrained "from receiving from the Ministry of Health the sum of £2,786 "And it is further ordered that the said Ministry of Health (after "deducting therefrom £7 7s. their assessed costs of this appli-"cation) do on November 1, 1952 pay to the said judgment "creditor or if the judgment creditor is resident outside the "scheduled territories as defined by the Exchange Control Act, "1947, or would receive payment of the said sum on behalf of a "person so resident into court unless the Treasury's permission "under the said Act has been given unconditionally or upon con-"ditions which have been complied with £2,786 the debt due "from the said Ministry of Health to the said judgment debtor "And that the judgment creditor's costs of this application be "taxed and added to the judgment debt and be retained out of "the money recovered by the said judgment creditor under this "order and in priority to the amount of the judgment debt. . . ."

The first submission of counsel for the wife on that order was that there was an unconditional order to pay £2,778 to the wife preceded by a separate collateral arrangement between the solicitors of the wife and the Ministry to which the wife was no party whereby the wife's solicitors held, apparently, an entirely different sum of £2,786 on the terms of the order. I reject that argument. It is perfectly plain that the arrangement between the parties—that is, the wife, the Ministry and her solicitors—was that she was to be paid £2,778, but that that sum was to remain in her solicitors' hands until April 3, 1953, as security for any claim that might be made against the Ministry by a possible trustee in bankruptcy of the bankrupt. The difference of seven guineas is a matter de minimis.

Counsel for the wife has a further point. He says that the words "benefit of the execution" in section 40 (1) refer, not to the fruits of the execution, but only to the charge remaining under the still subsisting execution for the balance of the debt: see In re Andrew, ex parte Official Receiver[2]; and he says that the order has been complied with, that there has been payment, that the Ministry have been discharged of their indebtedness to the bankrupt and that there is nothing on which the "benefit of the execution" can operate: but, having regard to the words of subsection (2), he still has to say, and does say, that the attachment has been completed by receipt of the debt; and that is really the whole question which I have to determine.

Did the order of October 29 and payment to the solicitors in pursuance thereof constitute a receipt of the debt? That must mean, in my view, receipt of the debt by the creditor or her duly authorized agents. In my judgment, there is no receipt of the debt until—at all events as between the judgment creditor, the judgment debtor and the garnishee—there has been an unconditional payment to the judgment creditor or her duly authorized agents. In this case there has been a payment to the judgment creditor or her duly authorized agents, but they are bound to hold the sum not solely as her agents but, as stakeholders or trustees, as security for the benefit of the Ministry of Health. If, instead of payment to the wife's solicitors, payment into court for six months had been ordered, George v. Tompson's Trustee[3] would have been directly in point. If, instead of payment being made to the wife's solicitors, it had been made to third parties as stakeholders, I cannot see how the wife could have said that there was receipt of the debt. It can make no difference that payment was made to her solicitors, they receiving the money not solely as her agents but as stakeholders or trustees, holding it in medio to meet a possible claim against the garnishee. In my judgment, there was no receipt of the debt while the money or investments representing the same remained in the solicitors' hands on the terms of the order, and therefore the attachment was not completed before the date of the receiving order.

The next point taken by counsel for the wife was this: He said that the proceedings between the wife and the Ministry of Health were not proceedings by way of attachment at all. The argument is a dangerous one, for, if the proceedings were not an attachment, it would seem that the trustee could claim the debt from the Ministry as being due to the bankrupt and that, although the bankrupt is restrained by injunction from receiving it, it would not necessarily preclude the trustee from doing so. However that may be, counsel said, and rightly, that these proceedings were taken under section 27 (1) of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947. The sidenote to that section is: "Attachment of moneys payable "by the Crown." The section provides: [His Lordship read section 27 (1) and continued:] Apparently, before 1947, there was no means of attaching a debt due from the Crown: see Robertson's Civil Procedure by and against the Crown, at p. 611. In my judgment, however, proceedings under section 27 (1) are proceedings by way of attachment for the purposes of section 40. Attachment is nowhere defined in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, but it is not, in my judgment, a term of art confined to attachments arising under Order 45. It is equally appropriate to include proceedings under section 27 (1) of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947—a section clearly intended to put the judgment creditor in the same position vis-à-vis the Crown as any other debtor of the bankrupt, i.e., to prevent the judgment debtor from obtaining payment of the debt and to secure payment to himself, the difference in the form of order obtained being due to the privileges and immunities of the Crown. This submission fails and, in my judgment, the wife must pay £2,778 to the trustee.

[3] [1949] Ch. 322; [1949] 1 All E.R. 554.

The last point taken by counsel for the wife was this. He admits that the sums in question were originally advanced by the wife to the bankrupt for the purposes of his business and that, therefore, she is prima facie, under section 36 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, deferred to other creditors; but he submits that, having regard to the judgment that she obtained in July, 1952, she has improved her position and is entitled to prove in competition with other creditors on that judgment and he relied on In re Slade.[4] That was a very different case. Originally a married woman had advanced £1,000 to her husband for his farming business. Some years later the husband and wife entered into an arrangement whereby, in consideration of the payment of the original sum, he entered into a bond to pay her £40 per annum for her life. Years afterwards the husband died and his estate was administered in bankruptcy, and Sargant J. held that the widow or her assignee could prove for the annuity in competition with the other creditors on the simple ground that the original loan had long since been put to an end and that at the time of the bankruptcy she was in the position of a person entitled to an annuity of £40 per annum from her husband and his estate. In this case there was no change whatever in the nature of the arrangement between husband and wife, and she merely became a judgment creditor in respect of the original debt. It is clearly settled in bankruptcy law that there is no merger of the original debt in a judgment debt, and the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to go behind the judgment to investigate the nature and grounds of the debt. Cozens-Hardy M.R. expressed the bankruptcy law on the point in a sentence in In re Van Laun[5]: "I cannot bring myself "to believe that what I may call the judgment cases are anything "more than illustrations of the principle that the court has a "right and a duty to investigate the nature and the grounds of "the debt."

Investigation in this case shows two things: first, that the debt was for £5,300 and not for £5,550; and, secondly, that it was a debt created by way of loan for the purposes of the bankrupt's business.

Accordingly, in my judgment, the balance of this debt is deferred to the claims of other creditors after deduction of the sums of £144 and £104.

Order accordingly.

The two plaintiffs in the first action were German nationals carrying on business in partnership at Leipzig at the outbreak of war. The first plaintiff in that action was the sole plaintiff in the second. In the first action the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants as their London agents, had purchased in 1939 a number of Persian lambskins for the account of the plaintiffs for which the plaintiffs had paid. Subsequently, it was alleged that the defendants had sold the lambskins in Canada and had accounted to the Canadian Custodian of Enemy Property for $59,000, whereas the price for the skins was in fact $79,000. The plaintiffs claimed on account of all sales of the skins, damages for breach of trust, for the breach of the contract of bailment and in conversion and, further, a declaration that the defendants had not truly accounted to the Canadian Custodian of Enemy Property in respect of the sale of the skins. In the second action the plaintiff alleged that the defendants had in 1935 received moneys for the use and benefit of the plaintiff, and as trustee for him, and that the defendants in the accounts which they had rendered showed a number of payments amounting to £7,199 6s. 6d. as having been made which, in fact, had not been made, or that the payments had been made fraudulently. The plaintiff claimed damages for conversion or breach of trust, a declaration that the defendants had converted the sum of £7,199 6s. 6d. to their own use and an order requiring the defendants to pay that sum to the Custodian of Enemy Property in the United Kingdom. On the application of the defendants, Wynn-Parry J. made orders in both actions striking out the two statements of claim. On appeal:—

Held, (1) that there might be claims in tort of certain kinds, the rights of action in respect of which would not vest in the Custodian of Enemy Property under the trading with the enemy legislation, but the rights in question in the two actions were essentially proprietary in their origin, arising as they did out of contracts or trusts which conferred interests in the nature of property upon the plaintiffs, and that such claims were caught by the legislation, and that the claims of the plaintiffs were maintainable by the custodian and by no one else.

(2) That the actions should not be allowed to go forward for the purpose of obtaining declaratory relief in proceedings to which the custodian was not a party; that such relief could confer no tangible benefit on the plaintiffs and might be productive of embarrassment as between the defendants and the custodian in any litigation or negotiation which might thereafter take place between them upon the subject-matter of the two actions.

Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. Hannay & Co. [1915] 2 K.B. 536 distinguished.

Decision of Wynn-Parry J. affirmed.

APPEALS from two orders of Wynn-Parry J.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Jenkins L.J.

The plaintiffs in the first action were Frank Maerkle and Rudolf Tenzler; the plaintiff in the second action was Maerkle alone. The defendants in both cases were British Continental Fur Co. Ld. In the first of the two actions, 1953 M. 4414, the plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, stated that they carried on a partnership at Leipzig in Germany in 1939. They further alleged that the defendants were the London agents of the plaintiffs, and that in or about the year 1939 the defendants purchased, as agents for and on behalf of the plaintiffs and others, 12,666 Persian lambskins, approximately 40 per cent. of which were bought for the account of the plaintiffs. The statement of claim went on to allege in paragraph 3 that at the outbreak of war in 1939 these skins had not been delivered by the defendants to the plaintiffs, although full payment had been made by the plaintiffs to the vendors of the skins. None of the skins had been delivered at the outbreak of war. By paragraph 4 the statement of claim alleged that something in the nature of a statement of account was rendered by the defendants to the first-named plaintiff in or about 1948, and this purported to show that the proceeds of sale of the lambskins in question had been paid over to the Canadian Custodian of Enemy Property. In paragraph 5 it was alleged that the defendants had failed to account to the plaintiffs or to the Canadian Custodian of Enemy Property in respect of the lambskins in question, and there was a specific complaint to the effect that the skins were shown as having been sold for 59,000-odd Canadian dollars, whereas the true price was 79,000-odd Canadian dollars.

In respect of this transaction the plaintiffs claimed: "1. That "an account be ordered to be taken of all sales by the defendants "of the 12,666 lambskins. . . . 2. That on the taking of such "account and after deduction of such sums less contra accounts "as were paid by the defendants to the Canadian Custodian of "Enemy Property an order be made for payment by the defen-"dants to the Canadian Custodian of Enemy Property or the "United Kingdom Custodian of Enemy Property for and/or on "behalf of the plaintiffs of such sums as may be found to be "due and owing on the taking of such account together with "interest thereon at the rate of 4 per centum per annum" as therein mentioned. "3. Damages for breach of trust. "4. Damages for breach of the contract of bailment. 5. Damages "in conversion. 6. A declaration that the defendants have not "truly accounted to the Canadian Custodian of Enemy Property "in respect of the sale of the said 12,666 lambskins, and/or that "a true account of the sale of such skins is $79,468·76 as "pleaded, and/or that the defendants have converted the sum of "$19,600 to their own use of which 40 per centum, namely "$7,840, represented the share of the plaintiffs."

In the second action, 1953 M. No. 4415, Maerkle alleged by his statement of claim that "In or about 1935 when the defen-"dants were the London agents for the plaintiff who carried on "business in Germany it was orally agreed between the plaintiff "and one Buttman for and/or on behalf of the defendants that "the defendants should receive and retain certain moneys and/or "trade credit balances in favour of the plaintiff for the plaintiff's "use and benefit and as trustees for the plaintiff and that a "record of such said moneys and/or balances should be kept "under the style 'B. Buttman "B" Account.'"

The statement of claim went on to allege that moneys were received by the defendants in pursuance of this agreement, and that the defendants, in an account which they submitted, showed a number of payments as having been made out of the moneys in question when no such payments had in fact been made, and these allegedly fictitious payments were said to amount to £7,199 6s. 6d., those being payments which were never in fact made by the defendants, and it was alleged that the payments were made fraudulently and in breach of trust. It was also put as a conversion of the sums in question to the defendants' own use.

In a paragraph introduced by amendment, by way of alternative, the plaintiff said that he would contend "that his right "to repayment of the sum of £7,199 6s. 6d. had and received "by the defendants to his use and benefit vested in the Custo-"dian of Enemy Property for the United Kingdom by virtue of "article 1 of the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, "1951 (S.I. 1951 No. 153)" and that the defendants as alleged in the preceding paragraphs "failed to disclose or declare such "right to the said custodian pursuant to article 1 of the Trading "with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939, and that the plaintiff "has been thereby occasioned damage in that he has been "deprived of his interest in the said moneys (including his "interest thereon) whether such interest in the said moneys be "adjudged to be or to have been complete or suspensory, and "claims that the defendants be ordered to pay forthwith to the "said custodian the sum of £7,199 6s. 6d. and/or interest "thereon at the rate of 4 per centum per annum."

The claim in the prayer was: "1. Damages in conversion. "2. Damages for breach of trust. 3. A declaration that the "defendants have converted the sum of £7,199 6s. 6d. to their "own use as alleged or, 4. An order requiring the defendants as "trustees for and/or on behalf of the plaintiff to pay the sum of "£7,199 6s. 6d. together with interest thereon at the rate of 4 "per centum per annum as from September, 1939, until the "date of payment (inclusive) forthwith to the Custodian of "Enemy Property for the United Kingdom. 5. Further or other "relief," and, "6. Costs."

The defendants applied to have the statements of claim struck out. Wynn-Parry J. held that having regard to the relevant provisions of the trading with the enemy legislation as between the plaintiffs and the defendants the plaintiffs had ceased to have any interest in the subject-matter of the transactions referred to in the two statements of claim, and that, as between the plaintiffs and the Custodian of Enemy Property their interest consisted only of the right to participation in any distribution or distributions which might be made under the provisions of the Distribution of German Enemy Property Act, 1949, the custodian having the duty (to the exclusion of the plaintiffs) of swelling the funds at his disposal by pursuing any rights which the plaintiffs had against the defendants. It followed that if the actions were allowed to proceed the plaintiffs could not obtain any order for the payment of any sums to themselves. Further, he held that it would be wrong to allow the claims to proceed with a view to orders being made for payment of any sums by the defendants to the custodian and he did not consider it proper

Jenkins L.J. These are appeals from two orders of Wynn-Parry J. made on May 20, 1954, ordering the statement of claim in each of the two actions to be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action.

The question in each case is the same, namely, whether the subject-matter of the claim has become vested under the trading with the enemy legislation in the Custodian of Enemy Property, with the result that the actions are not maintainable by the plaintiffs.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The objection taken by the defendant company to the statements of claim (the objection which succeeded before the judge) was that the subject-matter of the claim in both cases was vested in the Custodian of Enemy Property, so that the plaintiffs were not in a position to maintain any action in respect of those claims.

The judge, in the course of his judgment, fully reviewed the relevant statutory provisions bearing upon the vesting of what may be compendiously described as enemy debts. His review was, I think, accepted by Mr. Campbell for the plaintiffs as an adequate review of the relevant provisions, although he joined issue with the judge as to the effect of those provisions in their application to the claims here in question.

After referring to the various statutory provisions the judge said: "Upon that review of the relevant statutory provisions it "appears to me to follow inevitably that as between the respec-"tive plaintiffs on the one hand, and the defendants on the other "hand, the plaintiffs have ceased to have any interest whatso-"ever in the property which was the subject-matter of the "transactions referred to in the respective statements of claim "and that as between the plaintiffs on the one hand, and the "Custodian of Enemy Property on the other hand, their interest "consists only of the right to participate in any distribution or "distributions which may hereafter be made under the provisions "of the Distribution of German Enemy Property Act, 1949, "the Custodian of Enemy property having the duty (to the "exclusion of the plaintiffs) of swelling the funds at his disposal "by pursuing any rights which the respective plaintiffs had against "the defendants in regard to the property the subject-matter of "the transactions in the respective statements of claim as he may "be advised."

Mr. Campbell submitted that, comprehensive as the language of these statutory provisions may be, some limit must, nevertheless, be placed upon that language as regards the character of the property to which it applies, and he said that the claims to which these two actions relate are not property of such a character as to be caught by the vesting provisions in this legislation. He submitted that the sums claimed are in the nature of damages for tort; he said that they are personal claims, and at one stage in his argument he contended that they were not assignable. I cannot accept Mr. Campbell's argument. It may be that there are claims in tort of certain kinds the rights of action in respect of which would not vest in the custodian. That may well be so, but the rights here in question seem to me to be essentially proprietary in their origin, arising, as they do, out of contracts or trusts which conferred interests in the nature of property upon the plaintiffs. It seems to me that claims of this kind are clearly such as to be caught by the legislation.

I am fortified in that view by the very wide definition of "property" contained in the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 7 (8) (b), which is in these terms: "The expression 'property' "means real or personal property, and includes any estate or "interest in real or personal property, any negotiable instrument, "debt, or other chose in action, and any other right or interest, "whether in possession or not." I hope I will not be regarded as being disrespectful to Mr. Campbell's argument if I do not go in detail through the provisions which were carefully reviewed by the judge; I am content to adopt his view of the legislation and his conclusion as to its effect in the present cases.

A second argument of Mr. Campbell should be dealt with, and that was this, that even if these rights or claims were vested in the custodian the plaintiffs were, nevertheless, entitled to maintain the first action for the purpose of obtaining a declaration in the form set out in paragraph 6 of the prayer to the statement of claim. In support of that contention (which by parity of reasoning was equally applicable to the declaratory relief sought in the second action) Mr. Campbell relied on the case in the Court of Appeal of Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. Hannay & Co.[1] That was an entirely different kind of case, but it was cited by Mr. Campbell as authority for the proposition that a declaration can be made even though the party seeking it has no cause of action against the party against whom the declaration is sought. The case was of this nature: The defendants brought an action against the plaintiffs in America to recover the amount of a bill of exchange paid by the defendants in reliance on a forged bill of lading. It was admitted that the law of England applied to the case. The plaintiffs brought an action in England claiming a declaration to the effect that they did not, by presenting the bill of exchange for acceptance with the bill of lading attached, represent that the bill of lading was genuine, and that they were not bound to repay the amount of the bill of exchange; and it was held by the majority of the court that the plaintiffs' claim for a declaration in those terms was free from objection, although they had no cause of action against the defendants in the proceedings in which the declaration was claimed.

That is an entirely different case from the present one, and although it is authority for the proposition that in some cases a declaration may be made, although the party seeking it has no cause of action, it by no means follows that in every case where a party has no cause of action he can maintain a claim for a declaration.

In dealing with this part of Mr. Campbell's argument, the judge seems to have misapprehended some observations which Mr. Settle, for the defendants, attributed to himself. The judge treated this claim for a declaration as made with a view to assisting possible proceedings in Germany, or any proceedings that were contemplated in Germany, by the plaintiffs. In fact, as I understand the position, there never was any intention on the part of the plaintiffs to take any such foreign proceedings. Except for his reference to foreign proceedings, the judge gave no reason for refusing the plaintiffs' claim to declaratory relief. The granting of such relief, as the only relief in an action, is always a matter for discretion, and it has been said, I think, that such discretion should be sparingly exercised.

In the present case, treating the matter as res integra, I cannot think that it would be right to allow either of these actions to go forward for the purpose of obtaining declaratory relief of the kind sought. If it is the case that the whole of the plaintiffs' right, title and interest in the subject-matter of these actions has passed to the custodian, then the claims which the plaintiffs now seek to assert are, in truth, claims maintainable by the custodian, and no one else, against the defendants, subject to whatever defences the defendants may have. They are claims which the custodian may, or may not, see fit to litigate between himself and the defendants; they are claims which might, or might not, be compounded or compromised between the defendants and the custodian.

In those circumstances, I cannot think that it would be right to allow either of these actions to go forward for the purpose of obtaining declaratory relief in proceedings to which the custodian is not a party. The plaintiffs' interest in such relief could only be described as nebulous, for the only advantage (if one may call it such) that Mr. Campbell claims might be achieved by such relief is that it might increase the prospect of his clients ultimately participating in any surplus that the custodian might have on hand after all prior claims had been disposed of. That, Mr. Campbell admitted, is no more than a spes; it is not a right or enforceable interest; it is at most a possibility. I cannot therefore think that it would be right to allow these actions to go forward merely for the purpose of obtaining relief of that kind, which could confer no tangible benefit on the plaintiffs, and might be productive of much embarrassment as between the defendants and the custodian in any litigation or negotiations which may hereafter take place between them upon the subject-matter of these two actions.

For these reasons, in my view the judge came to a right conclusion, and I would dismiss these appeals.

Licensor and Licensee—Dangerous premises—Child—Unaccompanied by adult—Public recreation ground—Child injured by fall from chute—Concealed danger—Whether licensee or trespasser—Liability of local authority.

Damages—Personal injuries—Jury—Summing up—"No sum of money "can compensate."

The plaintiff, then three and a half years of age, was permitted by his mother to go to the children's playground in a recreation ground provided by the local parish council, accompanied only by another child of six years. In the playground was provided a chute or slide, the use of which necessitated ascending stairs to a platform which was about 12 feet from the ground. After making several descents with the other child the plaintiff went up by himself and while sitting on the platform fell through a space some 13½ inches square between the upright and horizontal rails on the side of the platform, suffering injuries which resulted in permanent blindness. Some thirteen years previously a boy of four years had fallen from the platform when the rails were in the same condition. Additional rails had then been added as a measure of safety, but in the interval the additional rails had either rusted or broken away and had not been replaced. At the trial of the action the jury found that the plaintiff was a licensee and that the council, having knowledge of the danger, was liable. They awarded the plaintiff £17,500 damages.

Bates
v.
Stone
Parish Council.

On appeal the council contended that the licence to use the playground did not apply to very young children unless accompanied by a competent guardian; that the plaintiff was in the circumstances a trespasser and the council was not liable.

Held, that although, in certain circumstances, a licence to young children to enter on property on which there is a source of potential danger is assumed to be conditional on their being accompanied by a competent guardian, in the present case it was clear from the council's own evidence that no restriction had been placed on the admission to the playground of children, however young and whether accompanied or not; that the plaintiff entered the playground as a licensee and did not become a trespasser when he went on to the chute; and that the council knowing of the dangerous quality of the aperture through which the plaintiff fell were liable in damages.

Held, further, that the damages awarded were unreasonably high and should be reduced.

Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew Ld. [1913] 1 K.B. 398; 29 T.L.R. 124 considered.

Appeal from Cassels J. sitting with a jury.

The plaintiff, an infant, sued by his father for damages for personal injuries, against the Stone Parish Council. The defendants had, some years previously, established a recreation ground for the use of inhabitants and visitors. In a part of the ground were appliances for children, including a swing, a turntable and a chute or slide. There was uncontrolled access from the road. On January 23, 1947, the plaintiff, then three and a half years of age, went, with his mother's permission, in the company of another child just over six years of age, to this area. The chute was of a type said to be in general use, with stairs, a platform about 12 feet from the ground, and a descending slide. The plaintiff, having descended two or three times with the other child, went up by himself, and while sitting down on the platform, preparatory to sliding down the chute, in some unexplained way fell through an aperture some 13½ inches by 13½ inches, between the upright and horizontal rails on the side of the platform. He fell on his head and sustained injuries which resulted in his becoming permanently blind.

The action was tried by Cassels J. and a jury and on March 31, 1954, the jury found the defendants liable and assessed the damages at £17,500.

The following were the questions, agreed by counsel for the parties, to the jury and their answers:—

1. Did the infant plaintiff fall from the platform and sustain injuries? Yes.

2. Was the infant plaintiff in the children's section of the recreation ground with the permission of the defendants? Yes.

3. Was the infant plaintiff a trespasser when he went on the slide? No.

4. Was the slide by reason of the gap in its then state at the side of the platform a dangerous equipment for children's amusement? Yes.

5. (a) Was the slide an allurement to the infant plaintiff? Yes.

5. (b) Was the infant plaintiff allured? Yes.

6. If answers to 4 and 5 are "Yes" was the slide a danger to the infant plaintiff which he would not appreciate? Yes.

7. Did the defendants know that the slide was dangerous? Yes.

8. If "No" to 7 ought they to have known? —

9. If the answer to 4 and 6 is "Yes" had the defendants given sufficient warning of the danger? No.

10. Had the defendants taken any steps to protect the infant plaintiff from danger? No.

The defendants appealed on the grounds that the judge had misdirected the jury on the question of liability and damages, and that the award should be set aside or reduced as unreasonably excessive.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29. The following judgments were read:

SOMERVELL L.J. shortly stated the facts and continued: The defendants appeal on the ground that the judge misdirected the jury on the question of liability and damages, and also on the ground that the award of damages should be set aside as one which no reasonable jury properly directed could have arrived at.

I will deal first with the alleged misdirection as to liability. It is relevant to this issue that in 1934, just after the slide had been installed, a boy aged four had fallen from this platform with the rails as they were when the present accident happened. The circumstances remained obscure. He may have been pushed through in a tussle with another child. Anyhow, it showed that small children might fall through this gap 12 feet above the ground. It was dealt with by the then parish council and the makers supplied additional rails, which made it impossible for a child to slip through. These additional rails either rusted or broke away at some date, which remained uncertain, some years before the present accident.

Mr. Beney submitted, first, that there was no proper direction with regard to the second and third questions put to the jury, namely, 2: "Was the infant plaintiff in the children's section of the recreation ground with the permission of the defendants?" 3: "Was the infant plaintiff a trespasser when he went on to the slide?"

By paragraph 5 of their defence the council alleged that the plaintiff was a trespasser, on the ground that he was not in the custody of or under the control of a competent person. The principle on which this is based was stated by Lindley J. in Burchell v. Hickisson.[1] The plaintiff in that case, a boy of four, fell through a gap in railings on the side of the steps leading up to the defendant's front door. He was accompanied by his sister, who was twelve, to whom, of course, the gap was obvious. Lindley J. said: "There could be no duty on the part of the "defendant towards the plaintiff further than that the defendant "must take care no concealed danger exists. The plaintiff was, "no doubt, too young to see or guard against any danger, but "the logical way of considering the matter is to consider it alter-"natively in this way: the defendant never invited such a person "as the plaintiff to come unless he was taken care of by being "placed in charge of others, and if he was in charge of others "then there was no concealed danger. In other words, there was "no invitation to the plaintiff if he was not guarded, and if "guarded, then there was no trap."

In Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew Ld.[2] Farwell L.J. said: "I am not aware of any case that imposes any greater liability "on the owner towards children than towards adults: the "exceptions apply to all alike and the adult is as much "entitled to protection as the child. If the child is too young "to understand danger, the licence ought not to be held to extend "to such a child unless accompanied by a competent guardian. "See Burchell v. Hickisson,[3] Schofield v. Mayor, etc., of Bolton,[4] "and Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow."[5] Hamilton L.J. said[6]: "The child must take the place as he finds it and take "care of himself; but how can he take care of himself? If his "injury is not to go without legal remedy altogether by reason "of his failure to use a diligence which he could not possibly "have possessed, the owner of the close might be practically "bound to see that the wandering child is as safe as in a nursery. "The way out of the dilemma was found in Burchell v. "Hickisson[3] by deciding that the circumstances may evidence "the attachment of a condition to the licence or permission to "enter, namely, that the child shall only enter if accompanied "by a person in charge capable of seeing and avoiding obvious "perils and thus of placing both himself and his charge in the "position of an ordinary licensee both able and bound to look "after himself." He then cites the passage I have quoted from Burchell's case[3] and concludes: "Logically this principle is "applicable to all cases of infirmity or disability and not to "infants only."

In Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council,[7] a child of three and a quarter had an accident on a slide similar to that in the present case. The defendant council contended that the recreation ground was provided for children of school age only, and that the plaintiff was a trespasser. This court decided that as the plaintiff was accompanied by a competent guardian, a boy of fourteen, he was a licensee. I have dealt with these cases because, in my view, the principle is an important one. A wholly undue burden would be placed on the provision of facilities for the young, whether by local authorities, institutions, or private individuals, if they were held liable in damages because some of those facilities were a danger to very small unattended children. If a man put up a diving board he is not, I think, by the fact of opening it to the public, "inviting" small unattended children who cannot swim to climb up it. It, of course, depends on the circumstances whether the defendant can or cannot rely on this limitation.

Mr. Beney submitted that the matter had not been left to the jury. The difficulty in the defendants' way, however, arose from the evidence of the present chairman of the council, Mr. Roberts, and the action of the defendants' predecessors in 1934. Having read all Mr. Roberts' evidence I think the judge was justified in treating it as negativing any limitation on the defendants' invitation. In other words, their policy was to admit all children whether young and unattended or not. The groundsmen, if they saw very young unattended children approaching or using the slide, prevented them and did their best to return them home. The groundsmen had other things to do and if the plaintiff was a licensee in the ground it seems to me impossible to hold he became a trespasser when he got on the slide.

The other difficulty arises out of the policy pursued by the defendant council in 1934. When the small boy fell off the slide, they might, of course, have decided to exclude unattended children under, say, five, or make it clear that such children were not there with their permission. They pursued a different policy. By stopping up the hole through which only a very small child would be likely to fall they provided some evidence for the policy as indicated in Mr. Roberts' evidence. In view of this evidence, though he did not formally withdraw the issue from the jury, the judge was, I think, justified in indicating, as he did, that substantially the defendants' own evidence and action precluded them from maintaining the limitation on which they sought to rely.

Mr. Beney further submitted that there was misdirection as to the answers to questions 4 and 7 which read as follows: 4. "Was the slide by reason of the gap in its then state at the Bates v. Stone Parish Council.

Somervell L.J.

"side of the platform a dangerous equipment for children's "amusements?" 7. "Did the defendants know that the slide "was dangerous?" This raises, inter alia, the question of the defendants' knowledge or ignorance of the accident in 1934. The then clerk had retired, the present clerk was not called. The then chairman was still a member of the council and was not called. The accident and the action taken as a result of it is fully recorded in the minutes. In these circumstances, I would have thought that the defendants knew or must be taken to know of the accident of 1934. I do not think it would be right to lay down, as a matter of principle, that a council must be taken to know all the past contents of its minute book.

Mr. Beney said that the judge did not refer to the fact that there had been no accidents since the unknown date when the extra rail disappeared. I do not think it was necessary for him to do so. Once one reaches the position that very small and unattended children were permitted access to this slide I think the judge was justified in directing the jury as he did on these two questions, to each of which the jury answered "Yes."

That leaves the question of damages. Could a jury properly directed reasonably have given such a sum. The judge properly directed the jury as to the plaintiff's chances of being trained and earning his living. He also referred them to the medical reports which indicate the possibility of future trouble. He adopted Mr. Vaughan's submissions for the plaintiff, which were not before us, and this had relevance to one passage which, I think with respect, is open to criticism: "How right everybody "has been in this case when they have said to you (as, indeed, "I say to you) that no amount of money can restore that boy's "sight." Although he follows this by referring to and emphasizing what is done for the blind today, I think that sentence, without some cautionary words, might well have been taken to mean in effect that no figure for the blindness in itself would be too high. If that sentence did not mislead the jury then I think the figure cannot stand on the other ground. Both parties agreed that if we came to the conclusion that a new trial ought to be ordered on this ground we should ourselves assess the damages. We think the proper figure is £9,000.

Birkett L.J. I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered by my Lord. The appeal to this court is against the finding of liability, and against the amount of damages awarded. It was natural and inevitable that all the proceedings in the court below should be coloured by the disaster which had overtaken this small boy of three and a half years. Because of this accident, he had lost his sight without hope of recovery; and this accident with this lamentable consequence, was alleged to be the result of the negligence of a local authority, the Parish Council of Stone. Quite apart from any questions of fact or law by which the case was to be decided, it is easy to understand the instinctive sympathy for a small boy upon whom such a grave calamity had fallen, and it was proper that all the proceedings in the court below should be subjected to a critical examination at the hands of Mr. Beney on behalf of the parish council.

I am bound to express my own deep regret that this small boy should have been allowed to go to the recreation ground at all, accompanied only by another small boy of some six years of age. A boy of six could not be expected to be a proper or a competent guardian, and to a child of three and a half most things in this world take on an aspect of danger if he is not protected against them. To reach the recreation ground from the plaintiff's home required the two little boys to cross two public highways with all the dangers of modern traffic, and that fact by itself, I should have thought, would have been enough for a careful and thoughtful parent to forbid the small boy to go unless he were in watchful and careful hands. But the fact remains that the infant plaintiff was allowed to go in the care of this boy of six, and it was the alleged negligence of the parish council that was alone in question.

When all the evidence had been given, the judge formulated a series of questions for the jury which were agreed by counsel on both sides. No objection, therefore, can be taken to the form of the questions, but objection is taken by Mr. Beney to the summing-up in relation to some of them. Questions 2 and 3 were designed to elicit the jury's view as to the status of the infant plaintiff at the time of the accident in relation to the defendant council. Question 2: "Was the infant plaintiff in "the children's section of the recreation ground with the per-"mission of the defendants?" Question 3: "Was the infant "plaintiff a trespasser when he went on the slide?" The defendants had pleaded, and the judge drew the attention of the jury to that pleading, that the infant plaintiff was a trespasser when he used the slide in that at that time he was not under the control of a competent guardian.

Mr. Beney complained that the judge had failed to direct the jury on this all-important matter. His submission was that the child at the time of the accident was not a licensee on the recreation ground, but a trespasser, inasmuch as the licence granted by the defendants to young children was limited to young children who were at the time they entered the recreation ground in the care of a competent guardian. That such a limited licence can exist is plain from the cases already cited by my Lord, but the important words for the decision of this point in the present case seem to me to be the words of Hamilton L.J. in Latham v. R. Johnson and Nephew Ld.,[8] when he said: "The child must "take the place as he finds it and take care of himself; but how "can he take care of himself? If his injury is not to go without "legal remedy altogether by reason of his failure to use a diligence

"which he could not possibly have possessed, the owner of the "close might be practically bound to see that the wandering child "is as safe as in a nursery. The way out of the dilemma was "found in Burchell v. Hickisson[9] by deciding that the circum-"stances may evidence the attachment of a condition to the "licence or permission to enter, namely, that the child shall only "enter if accompanied by a person in charge capable of seeing "and avoiding obvious perils, and thus of placing both himself and "his charge in the position of an ordinary licensee both able and "bound to look after himself." It is the circumstances of the particular case which must be examined to see if they do evidence the attachment of a condition or not.

The evidence has been read to this court at some length, and it was discussed before the jury in relation to the questions that had been formulated. The judge had stated the point raised in the defendant's pleading and he had discussed with some fullness the evidence given by Mr. Roberts, the chairman of the parish council. Nobody apparently had suggested that this particular point should be incorporated in the two questions, in any more specific way, and it seems to me that the point was fairly before the jury when they made their answers. Indeed, it seems to me that the jury on the evidence could not have answered otherwise. There do not appear to have been any printed regulations calling attention to this point; there was no notice of any kind limiting the entry into the recreation ground, which was open to the highway, and certainly no prohibition of the entry of young children; no circular had ever been sent to parents limiting entry to the recreation ground to those young children who were in charge of a competent guardian; and the jury were entitled to regard the evidence of Mr. Roberts, the chairman of the council, as indicating that the council had never sought to limit the entry of young children in the manner now suggested, although he did say that the council relied on the parents not to allow young children to come to the recreation ground.

But the jury were also entitled to consider the events of 1934. In circumstances which are a little obscure, a small child had actually fallen through this very small gap at the top of the chute. Whether the child crawled through or was pushed through or fell through matters little, but the fact remained that on this very chute, at this very place, a small child had fallen through the gap which then existed. And the jury was entitled to consider what the council did on that occasion. There was no circular, no notice, no prohibition, but a horizontal bar was fixed in position so that a child could no longer fall through the gap. To the jury this could only mean that the policy of the council at that time was to make provision for small children, and children so small that they might fall through the gap unless the horizontal bar prevented them. There was no evidence before the jury that that policy had ever been changed. In my opinion the evidence was all one way, and the jury in their answers to questions 2 and 3 properly decided that on the day of the accident the plaintiff was a licensee and not a trespasser. I do not think that Mr. Beney's submission that the judge misdirected the jury upon this issue is well founded.

There were many other criticisms of the summing-up made by Mr. Beney. For example, he complained that the judge had said nothing about "foreseeability." Could the defendant council have foreseen that a small child of three would be on the platform of the chute when he was unaccompanied? Could they have foreseen that the boy would put his head through this small gap and slip, or be jostled or pushed so that he fell? Was there any danger on the chute which they ought to have foreseen? These and similar questions were raised by Mr. Beney, but if the agreed questions are examined it will be seen that whilst nothing is said about "foreseeability" in the questions, nevertheless the questions cover the point. If questions 4 and 7 are taken together, the one asking whether the slide was dangerous because of the gap, and the other asking whether the defendants knew of the danger, and the jury answering both questions in the affirmative, the question of "foreseeability" answers itself. For if you permit young children unrestricted entry to the recreation ground, with no limitation as to age or any other thing, and if in fact there is a chute that is dangerous and you know of the danger, then you must be taken to foresee that an accident may take place.

But Mr. Beney urged that there had not been a proper direction to the jury on the important question of the knowledge of the defendant council of the danger existing. It was a remarkable circumstance that a similar accident had taken place in 1934, and that a horizontal bar had been inserted to prevent a similar accident happening. That horizontal bar had vanished and since 1941 at least it had not been in its place, and the gap through which the infant plaintiff in this case fell was the self-same gap through which the small boy fell in 1934. Mr. Beney's complaint was that the judge should have told the jury that there had been no accident since 1934, and no accident therefore after 1941 when the bar was missing, and it was for the jury to consider whether the council could reasonably have foreseen that an accident of this kind would take place after all those years of immunity. To this he added the submission that the judge should have told the jury, on the question of knowledge, that actual knowledge of the danger must be proved and that knowledge was not to be taken as proved merely from the minutes of the council in 1934, but must be shown as knowledge of the clerk to the council or the groundsman or some other responsible person.

1954
Bates v. Stone Parish Council.
Birkett L.J.

Although the point is not free from difficulty I think the judge was right on the facts of this case in directing the jury as he did when he said: "And so far as one can attribute "knowledge to a council, well, may we not say that you can "ascertain the knowledge of the council by looking at their "minutes? Look at what they have recorded in their minutes "with regard to the accident in 1934; and look what was the "result of the action which was taken of improving the condition "of the slide by putting on that extra horizontal bar on each side "which was there to be seen by any member of the council "who happened to pass by." The knowledge of this council as recorded in its official minutes of twenty years ago must be regarded, I think, as the knowledge of the council when dealing with the same subject-matter today. It is also relevant that the then chairman of the council was still a member. In my opinion, the verdict of the jury and the judgment founded thereon ought not to be disturbed so far as the liability of the parish council is concerned.

There remains the important question of damages, and by consent of the parties we have been asked to assess the damages if in our opinion the sum awarded ought not to stand. Mr. Beney submitted that the sum of £17,500 was a sum that no reasonable jury, properly directed, could give. In one or two earlier appeals in this court I have spoken of the difficulties that the assessment of damages creates. The difficulties which face an appellate court when the damages have been assessed by a jury are more difficult still. There are no means of knowing with certainty what were the considerations which entered into the jury's calculation, by what feelings they were influenced, or whether the verdict is a compromise verdict or not. The evidence in the case, the summing-up, and the amount awarded are the only guides. There is the further difficulty, of course, that according to our procedure no specific figures may be mentioned to the jury, and no minimum figure or maximum figure may be indicated. Counsel must content themselves by asking for "substantial" or "heavy" or "moderate" or "small" damages as the occasion warrants. A jury is without experience in the assessment of damages and has no experience of comparable cases; and words like "substantial" or "moderate" do not help them very much. To all this is added the fact that the jury is being asked to assess in money that which is not strictly measurable in money at all. It is quite true to say as a general observation that there is no sum of money that can compensate for the loss of sight or the loss of limbs or for the loss of health and general well-being. But such a general observation without careful qualifications might mislead a jury. The duty of the jury is to consider the evidence in the case and then to award a reasonable sum by way of compensation, and not by way of punishment.

There are two passages in the summing-up of the judge that may well have led the jury astray. After reading from the medical reports the judge said: "Those are, you may think, "terrible reports. You may find it difficult to get out of your "minds the memory of that little man, the boy as he was led "into this court, and he sat down upon that seat not knowing "where he was, not seeing anything or anyone. I would not try "to add to the submissions which have been made to you by "Mr. Vaughan on behalf of the plaintiff because I could not do "it anything like so well. We have no need to look for glowing "words in order to have for ourselves a picture of the conse-"quences to that small boy, at the age of three and a half, his "sight taken from him; and if he grows to manhood's stature, he "will be a blind man—a blind man. How right everybody has "been in this case when they have said to you (as, indeed, I say "to you) that no amount of money can restore that boy's sight."

It is true that the judge then spoke of the boy's prospects and the remedial agencies actively working for the welfare of the blind; but there was no cautionary word to the jury after the use of the words "no amount of money can restore that boy's sight." It is impossible, as I have said, to be certain what the jury took into consideration, and whether they took into consideration things they ought not to have done or omitted considerations which it was their duty to take into account. But when the figure of £17,500 is looked at and examined I am led to the conclusion that one of those things happened, and that the figure of £17,500 is much too high. At one stage of the argument Mr. Beney asked us to look at the sum as if it were invested in 4 per cent. Consols at their present price, or if the interest were allowed to accumulate until the boy reached the age of twenty-one. If that is done it might appear that the jury took no account of the fact that the boy might grow up to be a most useful citizen earning a good livelihood when adequately trained, but however the sum is viewed, in my opinion the figure is too high, and I would substitute the figure of £9,000.

ROMER L.J. The principal point upon which the defendants seek to rely in this appeal on the issue of liability is that at the time when the infant plaintiff met with his very unfortunate accident he was not a licensee upon their premises and was not, therefore, entitled to the rights which the law attaches to that status. The defendants' contention is that the only licence which they granted to children who were too young to be able to appreciate danger was to enter the recreation ground in the company and care of some competent guardian. As an alternative way of putting their case they argued that even if children of immature perception had unconditional permission to enter the recreation ground itself the condition requiring the presence of a guardian qualified their licence to go upon the chute.

The defendants' complaint before us was that these submissions were not fully put to the jury in the judge's summing-up, and that the jury accordingly did not have them sufficiently in their minds when they considered the questions as to trespass which were formulated for their decision. The judge did in fact refer twice to the question of the plaintiff being accompanied by a guardian. The relevant passages in the summing-up were as follows: "The defendants plead that the infant plaintiff was a "trespasser when he used the slide in that at the time he was "not under the control of a competent guardian. The defendants "say that they owed him no duty and were not in breach of any "duty"; and "There were no notices which parents could have "read that children under a certain age were not allowed unless "accompanied by an elder." Nevertheless, in the later stages of the summing-up the case does seem to have been presented to the jury rather from the standpoint that the plaintiff's status, when he entered the recreation ground, was that of an unqualified licensee and that, upon that hypothesis, nothing that happened afterwards could convert him into a trespasser. For example, the judge, at one point towards the end of the summing-up, said: "I have endeavoured to explain to you that once you are on the "land by permission you do not become a trespasser when you "step on to something which is there."

It is, moreover, to be observed that although a number of citations from reported cases were read to the jury none of them was upon the point of whether a licence to infant children should in some circumstances be regarded as being conditional upon their being accompanied by a guardian. It may well be, therefore, that the jury did not have this point very clearly in their minds. As against this they had their attention specifically directed to the evidence which was relevant to the matter, and upon which they would necessarily have founded their conclusion upon the defendants' submissions if those submissions had been put to them in plain and unequivocal terms. In my opinion that evidence showed beyond question that no condition of the kind suggested by the defendants attached to the permission which they gave to infant children to enter upon the recreation ground.

Before reverting to that evidence, however, I would like to say a word or two about the legal principle itself which the defendants sought to invoke and to utilize as a defence in these proceedings. The question was considered by this court in Latham v. R. Johnson and Nephew Ld.,[10] in which an infant plaintiff sought to recover damages in respect of an injury which she had sustained while playing on the land of the defendants upon which they permitted children to play. This court held that there being neither allurement nor trap, nor invitation to the plaintiff, nor dangerous object placed upon the land, the defendants were not liable. In the course of his judgment Farwell L.J. said[11]: "I am not aware of any case that imposes any greater "liability on the owner towards children than towards adults: "the exceptions apply to all alike and the adult is as much

"entitled to protection as the child. If the child is too young "to understand danger, the licence ought not to be held to "extend to such a child unless accompanied by a competent "guardian." This last proposition would, at first sight, appear to be one of general application and unrelated to the facts of any particular case. This, however, was not, in my opinion, what the Lord Justice intended to convey. He cited three cases in support of his statement, namely, Burchell v. Hickisson,[12] Schofield v. Mayor, etc., of Bolton,[13] and Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow.[14] Of these cases the last does not warrant any such general principle as might be inferred from Farwell L.J.'s proposition, whilst in the first two the conditional nature of the licences which were in question was deduced from the particular circumstances which were established at the trial.

In my opinion the Lord Justice meant no more than that when a landowner allows the public to come upon property of his on which there is a source of potential danger to infants then, if the circumstances reasonably permit of it, the court would assume that, so far as infants were concerned, the licence to enter is conditional upon their being accompanied by a competent guardian. This view of what Farwell L.J. intended is confirmed by the fact that in Latham's case [15] the jury had found on the evidence that there was no invitation to the plaintiff (an infant aged between two and three) to go upon the defendants' land unaccompanied, and also assimilates the Lord Justice's statement with the observations of Hamilton L.J. in the same case and which my Lord has cited in his judgment. It is plain that, in the view of Hamilton L.J. the question whether a permission which is granted to very young children to enter upon land should be regarded as being subject to the condition that they should be accompanied by some responsible person falls to be determined in accordance with the circumstances of each particular case.

Approaching the matter, then, from this standpoint, I can see no evidence to support the view that the licence which the defendants undoubtedly gave to children to enter upon the recreation ground was qualified, so far as infants of three or four years old were concerned, by the condition that they should be accompanied by a responsible person. There is no evidence that unaccompanied infants were ever turned off the recreation ground or from the children's playground itself by reason merely of their age. The evidence of the groundsmen, when taken as a whole, proves no more than that young children who were by themselves were turned off if they were seen on or in close proximity to the chute. The evidence of the chairman of the council, Mr. Roberts, on the other hand (which was laid very fairly before the jury in the summing-up) shows that children of all ages were welcomed to the recreation ground, from whence they could proceed easily enough into the playground, which was expressly provided for their entertainment. He said that no attempt was made to regulate who did or did not enter the recreation ground, that there was access from there into the children's section, and that it had never been the policy of the council to stop anybody from going into that section.

It further appeared from Mr. Roberts' evidence that in 1948 the council decided to earmark about 1 acre of the recreation ground for the use of the younger children, including quite small children of three or four, and a notice board was put up saying in effect that that area was reserved for young children only. The notice board, however, eventually became rotten and was taken down. In these circumstances, and having regard also to the safeguards for small children in respect of the chute which the council put in hand after the accident in 1934, it seems to me to be clear that no case was made out on the evidence to support a case of conditional licence to children such as the plaintiff, and that the jury could not have come to a contrary conclusion if the matter had been put to them even more specifically than it was.

With regard to the defendants' alternative point, namely, that even if the licence to infants to enter upon the recreation ground and playground was unconditional they nevertheless had no licence to use the chute except under responsible supervision, there are, I think, two answers. The first is that there is no evidence, in my opinion, to warrant any such assumption. The evidence of the groundsmen, to which I have already referred, is quite insufficient for the purpose and there is no other. No notice boards were erected for the information of the parents of infants prohibiting the use of the chute by young children except under parental or other competent supervision nor were any other steps taken to indicate that the apparatus was for the use of older children only. Moreover, as already observed, precautions were taken in 1934 to ensure the safety of small children on the chute.

The second answer, which is associated with the first, is that in the absence of evidence (in which, of course, I include circumstances) leading to a contrary conclusion the court would, in my judgment, presume that if the owner of a children's playground unconditionally permits children of all ages to enter upon it, and knows that they do so, he intends his permission to extend to the use by the children of apparatuses which he had provided on the ground for their amusement; for such apparatuses are "allure-"ments" to all children old enough to use them, or to try to use them, and it is indeed because they are allurements that they are there at all. This view is in conformity with the decision and reasoning of this court in Gough v. The National Coal Board.[16] In that case the defendants operated a colliery tramway which ran over their land and they permitted children to enter on the land. The infant plaintiff did so and went for a ride on one of the moving trucks. He fell off it and was injured. It was argued for the defendants that although (as the judge found) the plaintiff was a licensee over the whole land he lost that status when he climbed upon the truck and eo instanti became a trespasser. Singleton L.J. expressed himself upon that point as follows [17]: "Mr. Lloyd-Jones' submission that the plaintiff became a tres-"passer when he got on to the truck appears to me to be answered "by a passage from the judgment of du Parcq L.J. in Holdman "v. Hamlyn,[18] where the Lord Justice said: 'It was, indeed, "'argued that the infant plaintiff was a trespasser. The truth "'is, however, that he was an invitee, at any rate down to the "'moment when the threshing machine proved an irresistible "'temptation. If the boy strayed beyond the strict limit "'imposed by the terms of the invitation, it was because of the "'failure of the defendant's agent to guard him against a "'dangerous allurement, and, if he can properly be called a "'trespasser at all the trespass was a natural and probable result "'of the negligence of the defendant's agent. A defendant who "'has lured an invitee into a forbidden area cannot thereafter "'treat him as a trespasser.' An examination of the authorities "leads me to the conclusion that if an occupier allows children "of tender years on his land, and if he has thereon something "which is, to his knowledge, attractive to them and which is "dangerous, he must take reasonable care to protect them from "the danger." Birkett L.J. expressed a similar view upon the point and Hodson L.J. said [19]: "Once the child is a licensee "on the land, the question of trespassing on an object on the "land does not, in my opinion, arise. The trap or concealed "danger will often be an object on the land, but I cannot con-"ceive that the licence to go on the land is to be taken to exclude "the thing which, being an allurement to children, is a concealed "danger for them."

It appears to me that the application of the law as so formulated by the Lords Justices to the facts and circumstances of the present case is destructive of the contention that the plaintiff became a trespasser from the moment he mounted the ladder of the chute notwithstanding that he had previously been a licensee.

I agree with my brethren in thinking that the defendants cannot be acquitted of knowing the dangerous quality of the aperture in the chute through which the plaintiff fell. The mere fact that the minutes of a parish council contain an entry which had been minuted many years before does not necessarily fix the council with knowledge of the subject-matter of the entry. In the present case, however, two gentlemen who were members of the council when the accident in 1934 occurred were still members in 1950 but neither of them gave evidence at the trial, although one of them was, it seems, in court. Moreover, the evidence of the present clerk, who was appointed in 1946, was not made available to the jury. In these circumstances the defendants cannot, in my opinion, legitimately complain of the jury's finding that the defendants knew of the danger nor is there any ground for impeaching the judge's summing-up upon the point.

On the question of liability I only desire to say in conclusion that had it not been for the accident in 1934 and the defendants' knowledge, or presumed knowledge of it, the plaintiff would, in my judgment, have had no ground of action. The evidence shows that the possibility of an accident happening such as that which unfortunately did occur would not have presented itself to the mind of any reasonably prudent person who was unaware of the previous mishap. And it would, in the long run, be disadvantageous in the extreme to the public and to children in general if such a person, or body of persons, were to be held liable for an accident of so improbable and unforeseeable a nature as that which befell the plaintiff; for the prospect of being sued for heavy damages (insurable, perhaps, but only at considerable cost) would in all probability result in the disappearance altogether of amenities which many local authorities and private persons voluntarily provide for the entertainment and amusement of children. "It is impossible," said Farwell L.J. in Latham's case,[20] "to "hold the defendants liable unless we are prepared to say that "they are bound to employ a groundkeeper to look after the "safety of their licensees, and the result of such a finding would "be disastrous, for it would drive all landowners to discontinue "the kindly treatment so largely extended to children and others "all over the country." That which the Lord Justice envisaged as disastrous in 1913 would at least be equally so to-day when the dangers of the streets, which in many cases would become the substitutes for playgrounds, considerably exceed such perils as exist in chutes and swings.

I agree entirely with what my brethren have said with regard to the general damages which the jury awarded. The court is, I think, for the reasons stated in the judgments which have been delivered, justified in setting that part of the verdict aside and the damages should be revised to the sum of £9,000.

Appeal as to liability dismissed. Appeal as to damages allowed. Award reduced to £9,000.

Revenue — Income tax — Transfer of assets to company incorporated abroad—Death of transferors—Settlement of shares in company—General bequest of shares—Liability of beneficiary to tax—"Associated operation"—"In relation to any of the assets transferred"—Finance Act, 1936 (26 Geo. 5 & 1 Edw. 8, c. 34), s. 18 (1), (2).

In 1933 the appellant's father and mother transferred certain assets to Kamouraska Investments Ld., a company incorporated in Canada. By two identical settlements, dated January 12, 1934, each of them transferred certain shares and debentures in Kamouraska to trustees on trust to pay the income from each settlement to the settlor during his (or her) life, and on the death of the settlor to pay the whole income to the other spouse during his (or her) life and on the death of the surviving spouse to pay the whole of the income to the appellant during her life. The settlements were revocable.

The appellant's father died on January 18, 1936, without having revoked his settlement. Her mother revoked her settlement on June 16, 1937. She died on December 19, 1939, and by her will, dated December 6, 1938, the appellant became entitled under a general bequest to a life interest in her residuary estate, which included the shares and debentures in Kamouraska formerly comprised in her mother's settlement.

The Crown claimed that the income of Kamouraska was deemed to be the appellant's income for income tax purposes by section 18 of the Finance Act, 1936:—

Held, (1) that the appellant was liable to tax in respect of the securities under her father's settlement, since her rights were derived from the settlement which was an "associated operation" within the meaning of section 18 (2), and the father's death was merely an incident leading to the falling into possession of the rights; (2) that she was not liable to tax under section 18 in respect of the securities received under her mother's will, since, although a will might be an "associated operation," and a specific bequest of the securities would have been an operation "in relation to" such securities, a general bequest could not be so described.

Congreve v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1948] W.N. 197; [1948] 1 All E.R. 948; 30 T.C. 163 applied.

APPEAL from the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The appellant, Mrs. Elsie Bambridge, appealed against assessments to income tax under Schedule D for the years 1948–49 and 1949–50, and to assessments to surtax for the same years, on the ground that these assessments incorrectly included the income of a Canadian company, Kamouraska Investments Ld. It was not denied that the appellant had power to enjoy the income of Kamouraska during the relevant financial years, and the sole question in issue was whether the power had devolved on her in such a manner as to come within section 18 of the Finance

BAMBRIDGE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

Act, 1936,[1] and thus constitute the income of Kamouraska her income for all purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The following facts appeared from the case stated: In 1915 the appellant's father (the late Rudyard Kipling) and her mother formed Sussex Investment Co. Ld., a company incorporated in the Province of Nova Scotia, Canada, to which they sold certain investments then held in trust for them respectively by the Royal Trust Co. of Montreal in the Province of Quebec as bare trustees. On December 14, 1933, the appellant's father and mother sold their shares in Sussex to Kamouraska Investments Ld., a company formed by them in that year and incorporated in the Province of Prince Edward Island, Canada.

On January 12, 1934, they entered into identical settlements, made in accordance with the law of the Province of Prince Edward Island, under which each of them transferred certain shares and debentures in Kamouraska to trustees on trust to pay the whole income of the settlement to the settlor during his (or her) life, and on the death of the settlor to pay the whole income to the other spouse during his (or her) life, and on the death of the surviving spouse to pay the whole of the income to the appellant during her life. The trustees had a discretionary power to raise capital for the benefit of the tenant for life for the time being. The appellant had a general power of appointment over the trust funds with remainder to next-of-kin; and the settlements were revocable by deed by the settlors with the consent of the trustees.

[1] Finance Act, 1936, s. 18: "For "the purpose of preventing the avoid- "ing by individuals ordinarily resi- "dent in the United Kingdom of "liability to income tax by means of "transfers of assets by virtue or in "consequence whereof, either alone or "in conjunction with associated "operations, income becomes payable "to persons resident or domiciled out "of the United Kingdom, it is hereby "enacted as follows:—(1) Where "such an individual has by means of "any such transfer, either alone or "in conjunction with associated "operations, acquired any rights by "virtue of which he has, within the "meaning of this section, power to "enjoy, whether forthwith or in the "future, any income of a person "resident or domiciled out of the "United Kingdom which, if it were "income of that individual received by "him in the United Kingdom, would "be chargeable to income tax by "deduction or otherwise, that income "shall, whether it would or would "not have been chargeable to income "tax apart from the provisions of this "section, be deemed to be income of "that individual for all the purposes "of the Income Tax Acts: . . . (1B) "The last two foregoing subsections "shall not apply if the individual "shows in writing or otherwise to the "satisfaction of the Special Commis- "sioners either—(a) that the purpose "of avoiding liability to taxation was "not the purpose or one of the pur- "poses for which the transfer or "associated operations or any of them "were effected; or (b) that the trans- "fer and any associated operations "were bona fide commercial trans- "actions and were not designed for "the purpose of avoiding liability to "taxation."

"(2) For the purposes of this sec- "tion an associated operation means, "in relation to any transfer, an "operation of any kind effected by "any person in relation to any of the "assets transferred or any assets "representing, whether directly or "indirectly, any of the assets trans- "ferred, or to the income arising from "any such assets, or to any assets "representing, whether directly or "indirectly, the accumulations of in- "come arising from any such assets."

On January 18, 1936, the appellant's father died without having revoked his settlement, and the income from his settlement became payable to the appellant's mother during her life.

On June 16, 1937, the appellant's mother revoked her settlement. She died on December 19, 1939, and under her will dated December 6, 1938, the appellant became entitled under a general bequest to a life interest in her residuary estate which included shares and debentures in Kamouraska to which her mother had been absolutely entitled at the date of her death by virtue of the revocation of her settlement made in 1934.

Since the death of her mother the appellant had become entitled to income from Kamouraska from two sources: (A) under her father's settlement made in 1934 which remained unrevoked at his death, and (B) under her mother's will.

It was contended for the appellant that even if it be admitted that the transactions by her father and mother constituted transfers of assets and associated operations within the meaning of section 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, there remained an essential preliminary to her ability to enjoy the income of these assets, namely, in the case of source (A) the death of both of her parents during her lifetime, and in the case of source (B) the death of her mother during her lifetime. It was argued that death was not an associated operation within the meaning of section 18 (2), and that the chain of events was broken and the section no longer applied. Alternatively, it was argued that in the case of source (B), the will of the appellant's mother was not an associated operation and that even if source (A) were within the section, source (B) was not.

The Crown admitted that death of a person was not an associated operation but contended that the deaths of the appellant's parents were merely points in time in which previously associated operations affected the appellant and brought her within the section in place of the deceased.

The commissioners held that that view was correct, and that the appeal failed with regard to the income arising from source (A). They further held that the definition in section 18 (2) "an "operation of any kind effected by any person in relation to any "of the assets transferred" was wide enough to include the making of a will, and as it had not been shown as required by section 18 (1B) (a) that the purpose of the will was not to avoid liability to tax, the appeal in respect of income from this source failed also.

No cases were cited in argument other than the case referred to in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

BAMBRIDGE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

June 16. HARMAN J., reading his judgment after stating the facts: The appellant's father died before the passing of the Finance Act, 1936, but nevertheless his estate became liable to surtax under section 18 of that statute for the last year of his life. The appellant's father for the last year of his life and the appellant's mother during her lifetime were admittedly charged to tax under section 18 (1) of the Act of 1936 as having acquired rights by means of a transfer of assets within the mischief of the section.

On her mother's death the appellant became entitled to the income from both sources but it never occurred to her, or apparently to the Crown, that she came within the mischief of section 18 until after the decision in 1948 of the House of Lords in Congreve v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.[1] That case decided, in circumstances very different from the present, that a person may acquire rights "by means of" a transfer within the meaning of the section although the transfer was not made by himself or his agent or anyone whom he could influence to make it. It is argued by the Crown, therefore, that the appellant has acquired rights by means of transfers made by each of her parents, and as those rights admittedly confer on her the power to enjoy the income or part of the income of Kamouraska, the Crown maintain that she can properly be charged as being entitled to the appropriate portions of the income of that company. This contention has been upheld by the commissioners. Having regard to the decision in the House of Lords to which I have referred it is not open to the appellant to argue that she may not be liable by reason of the transfers made by her parents; moreover, she does not deny that the settlement made by her father was an associated operation within the meaning of the section.

As to the father's securities, the only point on this appeal is whether the appellant can be said to have acquired rights "by "means of" the transfer and the settlement. She argues that these are not the only events, but that to them must be added the death of her father without revoking the settlement and the death of her mother, and that these events are not associated operations. Death, avers Peter Pan, is an awfully big adventure, but the Inland Revenue has not yet claimed that it is not an associated operation. It is said, however, that the two deaths are merely events bringing the interest into possession, and that it was not by means of them that the appellant acquired the rights. In my judgment that contention is right. The appellant acquired her rights in the assets in question immediately the settlement of 1934 was made. It is true that she did not enjoy them in possession till the death of the survivor of her parents, and that during her father's life she might have lost them by the exercise of his power of revocation, but the events were not means by which she acquired the rights. Indeed, the section seems to go further, speaking as it does of rights to enjoy "whether forthwith or in the future." What these words mean I have been unable to understand, but the subsection in my judgment avails to catch the appellant's interest under her father's disposition.

As to the mother's securities the position seems to me to be quite different. The settlement she made was no doubt an associated operation, but as that was revoked it is out of the picture altogether. The only means by which the appellant acquired rights to her mother's securities was by her mother's will. No doubt the will may be an associated operation having regard to the definition in subsection (2), but it will be observed that to be effective the associated operation must be "an "operation of any kind effected by any person in relation to any "of the assets transferred." Can this will be said to have been made "in relation to any of the assets transferred"? I think not. If it had contained a specific bequest of these securities that would no doubt have been in relation to them, but a mere general bequest does not seem to me properly to be described as made "in relation to" any assets that happen to fall within it because they belong to the testator at his death. If the Crown were right, a will made before the date of the original transfer would needs be classed as an associated operation, which seems to me to be absurd.

In my judgment, therefore, so far as the enjoyment by the appellant of these securities is derived through her mother's will, she is not taxable on the income of them by virtue of section 18 of the Finance Act, 1936.

I therefore dismiss the appeal so far as income from the property emanating from the appellant's father is concerned, and I allow it so far as income from her mother's securities is concerned.

Appeal dismissed as to the securities from the father's settlement, and allowed as to the securities under the mother's will. Case remitted to commissioners for adjustment of the amount.

* GRAINGER v. GRAINGER.

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Justices—Second marriage of husband — Maintenance for first wife — Second wife's capabilities — Possibility of letting rooms.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Appeal to Divisional Court—Exhibits—Provision.

A wife, who had previously been granted an order for maintenance by a court of summary jurisdiction, later divorced her husband but continued to rely upon the existing order. The husband married his former housekeeper, who had bought on mortgage a house of some size. On the husband's application to the justices for a reduction of the maintenance order, he alleged that he could not afford the payments and did not want his second wife to go out to work. The justices reduced the wife's order from £3 10s. to £3 a week:—

Held, that in the circumstances, there was no reason why the second wife, if she remained at home, should not exercise her skill as a housekeeper and help to reduce the expenses of the home by letting surplus rooms, and that there was no reason further to reduce the amount which the justices had ordered after careful consideration.

Per curiam: Relevant documents put in evidence before the justices should be made exhibits on appeal.

Appeal by a husband from an order of the Mortlake justices, dated March 16, 1954.

In December, 1949, the justices found the husband guilty of wilful neglect to maintain his wife and two children and ordered him to pay a weekly sum in all of £2 10s. The order was subsequently varied as to amount, and on March 2, 1951, it was increased to the weekly sums of £3 10s. for the wife and 10s. for each child. On May 28, 1953, the marriage was dissolved on the ground that the husband had deserted the wife, and in August, 1953, the husband married a woman who, he said, had been his housekeeper. His second wife had obtained on mortgage a house of some size in which they lived. The husband, who was in arrears under the order, applied for a variation, alleging that his own means had decreased and his former wife's had increased, and referring to his remarriage. By their order of March 16, 1954, the justices reduced the maintenance payable to the wife, who was in bad health, from £3 10s. to £3 a week. The husband appealed.

At the hearing before the justices reliance was placed in evidence on certain documents, including the mortgage deed, the terms of which were stated to preclude the granting of subtenancies in the second wife's house, and a signed certificate as to the husband's wages. These documents were not, however, exhibited to the notes of evidence provided for the hearing of the appeal.

F. Irwin for the husband.
Miss C. Colwill for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN P., after referring to the nature of the appeal, continued: Since the variation in March, 1951, the wife obtained a decree of divorce on the ground of desertion by the husband. That decree was made absolute on May 28, 1953, and the husband has remarried. He has married a woman who, according to his evidence, had been employed as a housekeeper. This woman has obtained, on mortgage from the local authority, a house said to be worth £1,000, and to have been acquired cheap because it was large. That combination of circumstances suggests that, as there are three or four surplus rooms in the house, it might be possible to make a more profitable use of the house than at present by creating, for example, subtenancies so as to enable the new wife to exercise her skill as a housekeeper, with some reduction in the overhead expense of living in this establishment and to that extent, no doubt, indirectly relieving the husband of the financial anxieties which have been caused by having to support the ex-wife and the new wife.

It is said that this is a most dangerous doctrine. But it seems to me to be merely a common-sense comment on the realities of this particular case. I am not conscious that I am laying down any doctrine; I am merely considering the matter from the point of view which appeared to commend itself to the justices, who gave very careful consideration to the whole matter. We are not convinced by the husband, who admittedly had run into arrears and was pleading inability to pay, when he says that he did not approve of his wife being in work, but wanted her in the home, and I think that the justices realized as well as we do that there were ways in which she could remain in the home and still do work which would be useful in the circumstances.

In that connexion, we were confronted with an argument which induces me to make another comment. Admirable as are the note and the statement of the justices' reasons, I regret that there is one defect which crops up much too often. We are told, in response to the usual inquiries made by the registrar, that there were no exhibits in this case. The fact is that a considerable number of documents were referred to, including the mortgage deed. It is now suggested that the terms of the deed prohibit any use of the house in the way I have mentioned. It would have been very much better to have been able to see the document itself. This we should have been able to do if it had been made an exhibit, as it should have been if anything turned on it. As it is we shall have to leave that matter in the obscurity in which it at present rests.

[His Lordship referred also to the absence of even a copy of a signed certificate about the husband's wages and to the absence of a letter showing his indebtedness to the bank, both of which were said to have been produced and shown to the justices.]

GRAINGER v. GRAINGER.

Lord Merriman P.

The other outstanding matter is that the former wife is in a very bad state of health. She has already lost one lung, and half the other is threatened, so much so that the children have been boarded out by the county council at Dr. Barnardo's Home at Tunbridge Wells, and she is not even allowed to see them. For the same reason she herself has to live in a separate flat from her parents. I suppose her mother is able to look after her to some extent, but she cannot have anyone actually living with her, and the justices sum the whole situation up by saying that they felt that in view of her state of health her need was as great as ever, and nobody could dispute that proposition. Quite rightly they have said, and, indeed, this is not challenged, that there is no sort of ground for reducing the figure in respect of the two children, which goes, in effect, to their maintenance at Dr. Barnardo's Home, as does also the amount received from the county council.

So the sole question is whether the justices ought to have done more than they have done in reducing the amount payable in respect of the wife herself from £3 10s. to £3. They came to the conclusion, after careful consideration, that that was the most that could reasonably be expected by way of reduction in the circumstances. It seems to me to be impossible to say, looking at their statement of reasons, that there is any question of principle in respect of which they have gone wrong, and I do not think that there is any ground on which we can say that the conclusion to which they came was anything but justified. It is a case in which, very wisely, the maintenance order has been allowed to stand notwithstanding the divorce, and nobody suggests that it ought to have been revoked or discharged altogether; nor, in fact, was there any application to that end. It is simply a question of examining the figures resulting from the present state of things—the former wife's ill-health and the fact that the husband has married again. There is no reason for saying that the justices have not come to a just conclusion, and this appeal fails.

DAVIES J. I entirely agree.

Sale of Goods — F.O.B. — Construction of contract — Undertaking by vendor to furnish "a guarantee" — Third-party guarantee not furnished—Personal guarantee given by vendor—Whether a good discharge of contractual undertaking.

Guarantee. Contract—Construction—Meaningless term.

The plaintiff contracted to sell to the defendants 300 tons of aluminium ingots, to be delivered at Antwerp within thirty days of the defendants establishing a confirmed, irrevocable, transferable and divisible letter of credit for the goods. The written contract provided that the plaintiff would undertake to furnish the defendants with a ten per cent. guarantee to deliver the goods to the defendants' forwarding agents at Antwerp as soon as he received confirmation that the necessary letter of credit would be established in his favour. By letter dated October 20, 1952, the defendants' bankers wrote that they had received instructions to open the necessary letter of credit on condition that they received from the plaintiff within fourteen days a sum equivalent to ten per cent. of the value of the goods. Following negotiations the plaintiff gave in writing a personal guarantee to pay to the defendants ten per cent. of the value of the goods should he fail to deliver the 300 tons of aluminium ingots. At the same time he asked for a confirmation of the letter of credit. The defendants, contending that they were entitled to a bank or third-party guarantee, did not provide the confirmation of the letter of credit:—

Held, that on the true construction of the contract the plaintiff's undertaking to furnish the defendants with a guarantee was satisfied by the personal guarantee contained in his letter; and that the defendants, having failed to provide confirmation of the letter of credit, were in breach of the contract.

APPEAL from Devlin J.

By a written contract dated October 7, 1952, the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendants to buy 300 metric tons of aluminium, which at that date was in Norway and apparently owned by a Swedish company. The ultimate purchaser, on whose behalf the defendants were acting, though not as agents in the legal sense, was a concern in Poland, referred to as Impex Metal. The contract was as follows: "It is herewith agreed that we have "sold to you and you have bought from us 300 (three hundred) "metric tons of aluminium ingots of 99.5 per cent. A1 minimum, "consignment to arrive in Antwerp within thirty days from your "establishing the confirmed irrevocable transferable and divisible "letter of credit for 300 metric tons of aluminium ingots at $718 "(seven hundred eighteen U.S. dollars) per metric ton f.o.b. "Antwerp. We undertake to furnish you with a 10 per cent. "(ten per cent.) guarantee that we will deliver the goods to your "forwarding agents in Antwerp as soon as we receive confirmation "from your bankers that the necessary letter of credit, valid not "less than six weeks, will be established in our favour in free "transferable U.S. dollars. You undertake to establish your con-"firmed irrevocable transferable and divisible letter of credit in "free U.S. dollars, validity not less than six weeks, containing "the following stipulation: Payment to be released against (1) "official weight certificate to be contrasigned by P.S.A.L. in Ant-"werp; (2) works certificate that the ingots are of 99.5 per cent. "A1 minimum and contrasigned by P.S.A.L. Antwerp; (3) con-"firmation of P.S.A.L. evidencing actual shipment of the goods "from the port: (4) part shipments allowed. You guarantee that "your forwarding agents in Antwerp will load the goods as soon "as possible after arrival, that they will receive the goods on "arrival and store them in their warehouse until they can be "loaded, and that you will extend the letter of credit should there "be any delay in Antwerp."

On October 20, 1952, the Midland Bank wrote to the defendants a letter confirming that they had received cable instructions from Narodowy Bank Polski, Warsaw, to open in the defendants' favour, on account of Impex Metal Katowice, the required credit, valid for six weeks, for 215,400 U.S. dollars conditional upon the bank receiving from the plaintiff within fourteen days 21,540 U.S. dollars representing ten per cent. goods value as full delivery guarantee, valid ten weeks, and to be forfeited unconditionally in buyers' favour in case of non-delivery. Following negotiations between the plaintiff and a Mr. Ettinger, on behalf of the defendants, the plaintiff sent to the defendants what purported to be a guarantee in the following terms: "We herewith guarantee to "deliver 300 metric tons of aluminium ingots of 99.5 per cent. "A1 minimum to your forwarding agents in Antwerp and under-"take to pay to you the amount of $21,540 (twenty-one thousand "five hundred and forty U.S. dollars) which is ten per cent. of the "amount we have sold the goods to you if we default to deliver "the 300 tons. For and on behalf of the Metex Company, J. "Heisler." In a covering letter the plaintiff asked for a confirmation of the letter of credit.

In reply the defendants demanded from the plaintiff an agreed bank guarantee within the next four days, but the plaintiff did not provide a third-party guarantee. The defendants relied on his refusal so to do as an anticipatory breach of contract which, they alleged, they accepted.

In an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants for damages for breach of contract, Devlin J. found for the plaintiff, holding that the personal guarantee given by the plaintiff satisfied the term of the contract and that the defendants were in breach of the contract in failing to provide a confirmation of the letter of credit.

The defendants appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 30. The following judgments were read:

SOMERVELL L.J., having begun to state the facts, continued: The defendants had, of course, no right to demand from the plaintiff, on any view, a deposit of $21,540, and it would appear that the defendants were not in a position to make this deposit themselves. It was, I think, contemplated by the defendants that the credit which would be opened in their favour by Impex would be in terms which would enable them to transfer the benefit of it to the plaintiff in accordance with the contract, and it may be that the plaintiff intended to transfer it to his sellers.

The result of the letter of October 20, 1952, was a conversation between the plaintiff and Mr. Ettinger, on behalf of the defendants, and I will cite the judge's findings as to this conversation: "Discussion arose on that point and I think "it is plain that neither side was talking in terms of suing "the other. Both sides at that stage were anxious to get "the business going. It is quite true—this is common ground "now and I think it was common ground then—that Mr. "Heisler could not be obliged to provide his guarantee until "he got the pre avis (confirmation); but neither side, as I "have said, was talking in terms of suing each other and each "was concerned to find a way out. The way they thought was "a way out at that stage was for Mr. Heisler to say in effect: "'All right. In order to help this business along I will give you "'a guarantee without the pre avis'. It is important perhaps to "see exactly what words were used. I accept Mr. Heisler's "account of what he said to be substantially true, and he put "it in this way: he pointed out in the discussion that what "Impex Metal appeared to be requiring was not a guarantee "but a deposit, and Mr. Ettinger, I think, agreed with that. "Then Mr. Heisler said in evidence: 'I said immediately that "'this was not according to the contract and Mr. Ettinger "'agreed. . . . But, both he and I—I have to say he acted "'always very fair and helpful if he could—wanted to get the "'business through and we wanted to help each other; we did "'not want to fight each other. Finally I agreed, in order to "'help him to get the letter of credit, or first the pre avis of the "'letter of credit, established in my favour, to let him have "'the letter of guarantee as it was understood in the terms of the "'contract'. Then later he said: 'I agreed to send on to Anglo-"'Dal immediately my letter of guarantee in order to have the "'pre avis of the letter of credit established, but I made it clear "'immediately that I did it only . . . , to show him that I was "'willing to help.'"

In the result the plaintiff sent along what purported to be a guarantee in these terms: "We herewith guarantee to deliver 300 "metric tons of aluminium ingots of 99.5 per cent. A1 minimum "to your forwarding agents in Antwerp and undertake to pay to "you the amount of $21,540 (twenty one thousand five hundred "and forty U.S. dollars) which is ten per cent. of the amount we "have sold the goods to you, if we default to deliver the 300 tons. "For and on behalf of the Metex Company, J. Heisler." This was sent with a covering letter in which the plaintiff said that having fulfilled his part of the contract he must now ask for confirmation of the credit. Three days later, on October 27, the defendants wrote back maintaining that they were entitled to a bank guarantee which would enable them to fulfil the conditions of the opening of the letter of credit. They demanded an agreed bank guarantee within the next four days.

Pausing there, that raises the point of construction which is the first point to be decided. Four possible views emerge as to the meaning of the second paragraph of the contract. The plaintiff maintains that the document which he signed fulfilled the terms of that paragraph with regard to the document to be furnished. The defendants maintain in the letter which I have cited that they were entitled to a guarantee either by a joint stock or merchant bank. A third construction was that in any event the word "guarantee" implied an undertaking by some third party, not necessarily a bank. The fourth suggestion was that assuming a third party was intended the absence of any indication as to the nature of the third party made it uncertain and therefore unenforceable.

The defendants, as against the plaintiff's construction, relied on the word "guarantee". It was also submitted that if the undertaking was to be by the plaintiff it was quite unnecesary to provide for the furnishing of a further document; the contract itself could have provided that the plaintiff should pay the 10 per cent. if there was a failure to deliver the goods, the defendants having fulfilled their obligations as to the credit. It was submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that if a bank guarantee had been required it would have been so stated, and if a third-party guarantee other than by a bank the defendants would necessarily have stipulated expressly about the financial standing of the third party. Mr. Pritt, for the defendants, relied on the provisions of the Exchange Control Act, 1947, as supporting his argument that the parties must be taken to have intended a guarantee from a banker or an authorized dealer within that Act.

The judge held that the plaintiff's construction succeeded, and I have come to the conclusion that he was right. The word "guarantee" is often used in other than its legal sense. An example of the word meaning simply an undertaking by the contracting party can be found in Barker v. M'Andrew.[1] Devlin J. said: "Again I think one has to bear in mind that commercial

[1] (1865) 18 C.B.(N.S.) 759, 773.

"men do not look at these things quite from the lawyer's point "of view. To a lawyer to say: 'I guarantee that I will perform "'my contract' is quite worthless, but a commercial man would "regard the guarantee, perhaps furnished in a proper form of "letter, as having some value as underlining, as it were, the "promise that had been undertaken. He does not think in terms "of damages, liquidated damages, penalty clauses and the rest "of it; he says to himself 'I have got it in writing and if for any "'reason these goods do not come forward I will get 10 per cent. "'of their price,' and he may well think that is a valuable "thing."

I have quoted this passage as it concerns the strongest argument against this construction, namely, that the form of a separate document adds nothing to what could have been provided in the contract. On the other hand, I think that there are greater difficulties in the way of the defendants' contention that one should imply the word "bank" before the word "guarantee". It is one thing for a party to undertake a liability in the nature of a penalty—although I am not considering its enforceability—and a different and far more onerous undertaking to produce a bank guarantee for the equivalent of the sum of £7,000. I agree with the judge that if the plaintiff's construction was not a possible one, the provision may well have been void for uncertainty. On that view, however, I find difficulty in holding that the other terms of the contract would have remained operative. I think that the uncertainty of this provision would have voided the whole agreement.

We were referred to Nicolene Ld. v. Simmonds,[2] where certain words were disregarded as meaningless, leaving the remainder of the contract as operative and binding. I cannot think that this case could come under that principle. If it is uncertain it is so because it is impossible to decide from the words used what is the document which the parties intended should be produced. That some document was to be produced is clear. I also think it is clear that it is an important element in the bargain as a whole, and therefore there would be no contract at all because the parties had not agreed on the essential terms. (See Denning L.J.'s judgment.[3]) On the view I take on the construction this point does not arise.

Mr. Pritt, on behalf of the defendants, then submitted that the "guarantee" was valueless because the payment of the dollars referred to would require Treasury permission and the condition of permission should have accompanied the document. I am not satisfied that contractually such permission had to accompany the document, but I am clear that the point cannot now be taken. It was not taken in the correspodence at the time, and in the letter which I have read the defendants demanded the bankers' or approved guarantee, but were not raising the question of Treasury sanction. Mr. Pritt relied on the principle which will be found stated by Greer J. in Taylor v. Oakes, Roncoroni & Co.[4]: "It is a "long established rule of law that a contracting party, who, after "he has become entitled to refuse performance of his contractual "obligations, gives a wrong reason for his refusal, does not thereby "deprive himself of a justification which in fact existed, whether "he was aware of it or not."

This rule is, however, subject to a proviso. If the point not taken is one which if taken could have been put right, the principle will not apply. This has, I think, clear application here. The plaintiff was producing his document before he was under any obligation to do so. If the defendants had accepted it subject to the provision of a Treasury permission it might have been obtained; further, the plaintiff could have said that he was not bound to produce any guarantee until the defendants obtained from the bankers confirmation of the letter of credit. It is doubtful if they could ever have done so, but if they had this might itself have assisted the plaintiff in getting Treasury permission. I think, therefore, assuming the point was a good one, that it fails on the ground that it was not taken and is not one which can now be relied on. A further answer was suggested by Mr. Blackledge for the plaintiff. He submitted that a contract to pay a sum in foreign currency in England could on its true construction be fulfilled by the payment of the equivalent in sterling. He relied in the first instance on an old case, Willshalge and Davidge's case.[5] It is perhaps worth noting that in the report of this case in the English Reports the word "demand", four lines from the end, should be "divide". The case decides that the payer can elect whether he will discharge his obligation in the foreign currency of the contract or in the equivalent sterling. This prima facie principle will be found stated by Bankes L.J. in Anderson v. Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States.[6] On this view the undertaking would be an undertaking to pay dollars or sterling at the option of the plaintiff and no Treasury permission would be required.

For the reasons I have given it is unnecessary to express an opinion upon this line of argument. The principle, which I think is primarily a rule of construction, was understandable at a time when foreign exchange was normally freely obtainable. It may well be related to the well-known fact that if a sum in foreign currency is not paid a writ can only claim the equivalent in sterling. It may well require, as I think, reconsideration as a prima facie rule if and so long as the foreign currency in question is not freely obtainable. It may well defeat the intention of a purchase to construe contracts in those circumstances as giving the payer an option to pay in sterling.

I should perhaps have stated that it was suggested below that the "guarantee" was illegal as an undertaking, and Devlin J., I think, accepted this position. Before us this point was abandoned and the provisions of the Exchange Control Act were examined in more detail than they were below. The argument before us proceeded not on the basis of the undertaking itself being illegal but that if there had been default, and the dollars had become payable, permission from the Treasury would have had to be obtained before payment could have been made.

For those reasons I think that the judge was right in his conclusion that the plaintiff had established a breach of contract by the defendants; and it becomes unnecessary to consider the later correspondence in any detail, or the other points which would have arisen if I had taken a different view of the construction of the contract. Both parties continued to maintain their positions as stated in the letters to which I have referred. The plaintiff, who was obviously anxious that the deal should go through, produced an insurance cover against all risks in case that would help, but ultimately the defendants on November 18 informed the plaintiff that their principals were no longer interested. The plaintiff, who had done all or more than all he was required to do, therefore establishes a breach. It seems clear that the defendants were in fact never in a position to confirm the credit in accordance with the terms of the contract, but they relied on the plaintiff's refusal to produce a bank or third-party guarantee as an anticipatory breach which they allege they accepted. The plaintiff sought to answer this by alleging that this breach, if any, was never accepted and he could himself rely on the defendants' failure to get the required confirmation. On the view which I take it is unnecessary to consider the somewhat intricate arguments which would have had to be considered if the case had turned on these issues. I would dismiss the appeal.

BIRKETT L.J. I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered by my Lord. I have also had the opportunity of reading in advance and considering the judgment about to be delivered by Romer L.J., and with that judgment I agree. I therefore do not desire to add a judgment of my own.

ROMER L.J. It is common ground between the plaintiff and the defendants that the written contract which was signed on October 7, 1952, embodied, comprehensively and finally, the mutual rights and obligations of the parties in relation to the sale and purchase of the 300 tons of aluminium ingots which they had been discussing for some days previously; no terms or provisions were left for further negotiation or were the subject of any collateral oral bargain. From this it follows that the intentions of the parties respectively must be ascertained, and can only legitimately be ascertained, by construing the language of the document in which those intentions were expressed. No extraneous evidence of intention can be admitted in the performace of this task whether such evidence be proffered in the form of oral statements, of letters, or of earlier draft forms of contract which had been submitted by either side for the consideration of the other. It is, however, permissible to note, as one of the surrounding circumstances in which the document was signed, that it was in fact the final outcome of earlier discussions and of the exchange of earlier drafts; its language was deliberate and empirical.

The most important question of construction which arises on the contract is whether the guarantee which the plaintiff undertook to furnish to the defendants meant, or at all events included, the guarantee of the plaintiff himself or whether the undertaking could only be effectually discharged by the production of a guarantee by some third party. The defendants have urged various reasons in support of the latter alternative. First they say that the ordinary, prima facie, meaning of "guarantee" in relation to the performance of a contract is the assumption of liability for its non-performance by someone other than the performer. Secondly, it is contended that the undertaking in this agreement to "furnish" a guarantee tends to attract this prima facie view. Thirdly, the defendants argue that if all that was intended was the plaintiff's own personal undertaking it could very well have been given in the contract itself and that this element, coupled with the production of a separate document which the agreement apparently envisaged, affords further proof that the suretyship of a third party was intended. Fourthly, it is suggested that the plaintiff's own unsupported guarantee would add nothing to the obligation which was imposed on him by the contract itself and would therefore give the defendants nothing in the way of an additional security for the performance of that obligation. And, finally, they say that the guarantee involved the exercise of a power which is possessed by banks, but which the plaintiff did not himself possess, namely, a power to acquire and dispose of dollars; and that this consideration is relevant to the construction of the document.

I doubt whether the first of the above reasons is of any considerable significance. Although among lawyers the word "guarantee" would normally (though not always) imply the promise of some third person, the parties to this contract were not lawyers but were commercial men, as Devlin J. in the course of his judgment pointed out. But, further than this, the expression "guarantee" is used in the last paragraph of the contract in the sense of a personal undertaking, for the defendants "guaran-"teed" that they would extend their letter of credit should there be any delay in Antwerp. Then, as regards the fifth reason, our attention was not directed to any evidence which showed that the plaintiff could not procure the necessary dollar credit and, on the contrary, it is reasonably clear that he could have procured it once the defendants' letter of credit had been opened. I do not think, therefore, that this is an element which is of much assistance in the interpretation of the contract.

However, the considerations upon which the defendants rely are undoubtedly deserving of weight, at all events collectively, the assessment of which can only be determined by comparing them with the points upon which Mr. Blackledge for the plaintiff relied. The first of these is that if the parties in this carefully negotiated contract had intended that the guarantee of some third party should be procured they would surely have indicated who that third party was to be. Not only, however, was the agreement silent as to this, but it gave no indication as to the class from which he was to be drawn. He might be (1) any responsible person nominated by the plaintiff; (2) any responsible person nominated by the plaintiff and approved by the defendants; (3) any "authorized dealer" within the meaning of the Exchange Control Act, 1947; (4) any similar dealer of whom the defendants approved. There may be other categories as well but, even assuming that those which I have mentioned are exhaustive, the plaintiff argues that it is difficult to explain why none was mentioned if any of them were in fact in contemplation.

The second point upon which the plaintiff relies emerges from and is in a sense dependent upon the first. If, it is said, two interpretations of an expression in a document are both reasonably acceptable but one gives rise to uncertainty in its effect and the other does not, the courts will adopt the latter in preference to the former. This principle, which I accept, is applied to the present case as follows. The interpretation of guarantee as meaning the guarantee of the plaintiff himself is reasonably acceptable and leads to no uncertainty in its result; but assuming that it is construed as meaning the guarantee of some third party then, even on the assumption that such construction is also reasonably acceptable, its adoption would involve so great a degree of uncertainty (that is, as to the identity of the guarantor) as might bring about the complete annihilation of the contract. The Court, so the plaintiff contends, should therefore accept the first interpretation and reject the second.

In my judgment the guarantee provision was so important an ingredient in the agreement as a whole, in that it constituted an inseparable part of the consideration moving to the purchasers, that its invalidity would vitiate the entire contract. There may very well be cases in which there are two considerations for a promise and in which the promise will remain binding notwithstanding that one of the considerations fails. Such cases would, however, in general be limited to contracts where the consideration which fails is both subordinate to and severable from the other, and it cannot be said that the contract now in question comes within that category. I am accordingly of opinion that the principle which Mr. Blackledge invokes should be applied and a construction be given to the word "guarantee" which will preserve the agreement rather than one which will destroy it.

HEISLER v. ANGLO-DAL LD.
Romer L.J.

In the result I have arrived at the same conclusion as my Lord, namely, that the arguments in favour of the view that the guarantee which is mentioned in the agreement meant the personal guarantee of the plaintiff considerably outweigh the defendants' arguments to the contrary, and in my judgment the judge came to a correct decision upon this point.

Upon the other matters also which were argued before us, I am in entire agreement with the judgment which my Lord has delivered and there is nothing that I can usefully add to what he has said upon them; and I agree with my brethren that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

The defendant, who was the assignee of the remainder of a long lease of a dwelling-house, held over after the expiry of the lease in 1950. She did not occupy the house herself but since 1946 her daughter had lived there under the terms of an oral agreement with her and had paid her an economic rent. On a claim by the freeholders against the defendant for a sum in respect of dilapidations:—

Held, that the defendant's daughter was not occupying the house "in right of the" defendant's tenancy within the meaning of section 2 (1) (a) of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, and, accordingly, the defendant was not entitled to the protection of the Act and was liable for dilapidations.

ACTION.

On October 9, 1851, the then freeholders of 65, Gloucester Crescent, Regents Park, granted a long lease to head lessees for the term of 99 years at £7 4s. a year. On June 23, 1883, the head lessees granted a sublease from March 25, 1880, for 70 years less three days at the rent of £10 a year.

Some time in 1940 the defendant, Mrs. Margaret Agnes McGann, a neighbouring boarding-house keeper, acquired the top part of the premises in order to lodge some of her guests. In 1942 her daughter, a Mrs. Lewis, began to live in the upper part of 65, Gloucester Crescent, and paid the defendant the weekly rent of 30s. By May 3, 1945, a Miss Butler had acquired the head lease of the premises which was due to expire on March 25, 1950. In November, 1946, a firm of house agents sold or purported to sell to the defendant for the sum of £150 what she believed to be the tag end of a long lease which still had some three and a half years to run. From November 9, 1946, until the present day, the defendant allowed Mrs. Lewis to occupy the whole house at an increased weekly rent of £2 1s.

Early in July, 1947, the then freeholders, who had no knowledge of the existence of any sublease, attempted to serve on Miss Butler a schedule of dilapidations. Miss Butler, however, could not be traced and eventually the plaintiffs, the present freeholders of 65, Gloucester Crescent, got in touch with the defendant; and as a result of certain documents which she produced they thereafter accepted rent from her in accordance with the terms of the head lease, which was the only lease of which they were aware.

After the lease had expired on March 25, 1950, the plaintiffs, having served on the defendant a schedule of dilapidations, took proceedings against Mrs. Lewis for possession. They obtained judgment against her, which was never executed, and brought a claim for £967 2s. 7d. in respect of dilapidations against the defendant.

The defendant denied that she was the legal assignee of the lease and, in the alternative, claimed the protection of sections 2 and 5 of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951,[1] on the grounds that although she herself was not occupying the premises her daughter, Mrs. Lewis, had been residing on the premises immediately prior to and since the expiry of the lease.

RICHMOND
McGANN.

PILCHER J. stated the facts and continued: I have come to the conclusion on the evidence that Mr. Whitworth's contention is right, that is, that there being here admittedly an equitable assignment of this lease to the defendant, she is precluded and estopped from alleging as against the plaintiffs that she had not in fact got a legal assignment which would carry with it the liability to pay the dilapidations which were due at the end of the long lease.

That being so, I have to consider the provisions of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, which I have not found at all easy to understand. It is an Act which makes temporary provision for the protection of occupiers of residential property against the coming to an end of long leases. Section 1 of the Act concerns the continuation of an expiring long tenancy where the tenant himself is in occupation. Section 2 makes provision for a tenant holding over after the expiry of a long tenancy. Section 5 provides: "(1) While a tenancy continues by "virtue of section one or section two of this Act, or while before "the date of expiry the tenant under a tenancy granted for such "a term as is mentioned in the said section one, or a member "of the tenant's family, is residing in a dwelling-house comprised "in the property in right of the tenancy, then—(a) the landlord "shall not be entitled, by action or otherwise, to enforce any "right of forfeiture or re-entry in respect of any failure to comply "with a term or condition of the tenancy, or to bring any action "against the tenant for damages in respect of such a failure."

On the assumption then that the defendant has a legal assignment of the balance of this long lease which expired on March 25, 1950, I must consider whether or not on the facts this particular lease has been extended by this Act so that it has not yet come to an end and the defendant's liability to pay dilapidations has not yet arisen. It also governs the position of Mrs. Lewis to some extent, because she has a judgment against her which the plaintiffs obtained, giving them possession of this house. That judgment has not yet been executed and, of course, if her mother's lease has been extended by the Act it cannot be executed. The section with which I am concerned is section 2.

[His Lordship read section 2 (1) and (2) of the Act, and continued:] If, then, the defendant can satisfy me that Mrs. Lewis was occupying this house at all material times in right of her, the defendant's, tenancy, she has gone some way towards establishing that her tenancy has not expired, but has been extended, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled, at any rate for the moment, to claim from her the sum in respect of dilapidations which is the subject-matter of this action. The material words from my point of view are contained in section 2 (1) (a). The defendant, who was the tenant, was not herself residing in the premises, although her daughter, Mrs. Lewis, was so residing throughout the material period. Now was she residing in this house "in right of the tenancy," which must mean in right of her mother's tenancy?

The first thing to be remembered is, that at all material times Mrs. Lewis was, to put it in ordinary language, her mother's tenant. She held a rent book. She was paying £2 1s. a week rent, which was quite a reasonably substantial rent. In those circumstances, can it be said that she was a member of her mother's family residing in her mother's dwelling-house in right of her mother's tenancy? At first glance, I should have thought that it was very difficult to say so. She was, so it would seem, her mother's tenant and was not a member of her mother's family residing in her mother's house in right of her mother's tenancy. Section 7 of the Act is concerned with the situation of sub-tenants and protects them, in appropriate circumstances, from being turned out. I find it quite impossible to say that Mrs. Lewis, who held this rent book under an oral agreement with her mother, but lived there for years paying her mother an economic rent—a rent at least which I estimate to be economic—was residing in her mother's house in right of her mother's tenancy. I think the exception of clause 2 (1) (a) finds its place in this Act to protect persons like wives or children or, it may be, other relatives, who are permitted by the tenant to whom they are related to live in the tenant's own premises when the tenant himself is absent, and not to protect persons like Mrs. Lewis who are paying their mother, who for this purpose is the legal assignee of the remainder of the lease, an economic rent under a rent book for the occupation of her mother's premises.

Consequently, I have come to the conclusion, without proceeding any further with the requirements of section 2, that the defendant really here fails in limine on subsection (1) (a) because, not only does the defendant have to satisfy me that she comes within subsection (1) (a), but she also has to satisfy me that she fulfils the requirements of (b), (c) and (d); (b) she admittedly fulfils, and probably (d); but I feel very grave doubt whether she does not fail, or would not fail, in satisfying me that she fulfils the provisions of (c), and for very much the same reason that she does not fulfil the provisions of (a).

I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the defendant is not protected in respect of this lease by the provisions of this Act. I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to claim from her dilapidations.

* BUTTERWORTH v. KINGSWAY MOTORS; HAYTON, THIRD PARTY; KENNEDY, FOURTH PARTY; RUDOLPH, FIFTH PARTY.

[1952 B. 225.]

Sale of Goods—String contract—Repudiation—Failure of consideration—Recovery of purchase price—Goods subject to hire-purchase agreement—Vendor having no title at time of sale—Rescission by purchaser—Sale by hirer followed by further re-sales—Subsequent exercise of option to purchase by hirer—Perfection of title—Transmission of ownership—Implied condition that vendor has right to sell—Breach—Damages—Measure—Whether duty owed by defendants to third party to mitigate damage.

Damages—Sale of goods—String contract—Costs of legal proceedings—Whether reasonably incurred and contemplated at time of contract.

R., the hirer of a motor-car under a hire-purchase agreement with B. Ld., sold the motor-car to K., a motor dealer, on August 1, 1951, before she had paid all the instalments due or exercised the option to purchase under the hiring agreement. On August 11, 1951, K. re-sold the car at a small profit to H., a produce merchant who, so far as K. knew, required the car for his own use and not for the purpose of re-sale. H. on the same day re-sold the motor-car to a firm of motor dealers, the defendants, at a profit of £15. H. then knew that they required it for the purpose of re-sale. On August 30, 1951, the plaintiff bought the motor-car from the defendant firm for the equivalent of £1,275 on part exchange terms, and used it for several months. On July 16, 1952, the plaintiff received a letter from B. Ld., informing him that the motor-car was their property and the subject of a hire-purchase agreement between them and R. On July 17 the plaintiff wrote to the defendant firm claiming the return of the purchase price. On July 25, 1952, R. paid to B. Ld. a sum which covered the outstanding balance of instalments and exercised her option to purchase it under the hire-purchase agreement.

The plaintiff sued the defendant firm to recover back the purchase money that he had paid, as on a total failure of consideration.

The defendant firm issued a third party notice against their vendor, H., and there were similar fourth and fifth party notices issued by H. against K. and K. against R. respectively. The substance of each of the claims against the third, fourth and fifth parties was for damages for breach of the implied condition that the vendor had a right to sell.

The value of the motor-car at the date of the hearing of the action was about £450 and its value in July, 1952, was £800:—

Held, (1) that the plaintiff's letter to the defendant firm constituted a rescission of the contract of sale and the plaintiff was thereafter entitled to rescind that contract and recover back the purchase price as money paid on a consideration which had wholly failed in that the defendant firm had no title to the motor-car at the time they purported to sell it.

Rowland v. Divall [1923] 2 K.B. 500 applied.

(2) That when R. exercised her option to purchase the motor-car she acquired a good title as between herself and B. Ld., the owners; and that the title so acquired by the hirer went to feed the previously defective title of the subsequent purchasers, Whitehorn Brothers v. Davison [1911] 1 K.B. 463 applied.

[Reported by E. SOMERSET JONES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

(3) That in computing the loss sustained by the defendant firm in respect of the motor-car as a consequence of the third party's breach of condition of title the value of the motor-car should be taken as at the date when the defendant firm acquired their title to the motor-car, namely, in July, 1952, and, accordingly, the amount of damages recoverable by the defendant firm in respect of such loss was £475, being the difference between the purchase price recovered by the plaintiff from the defendant firm and the value of the motor-car re-acquired by the defendant firm;

(4) That the defendant firm was entitled, in addition to the sum of £475, to recover from the third party as damages the costs payable by the defendant firm to the plaintiff and the costs (taxed on a solicitor and client basis) incurred by the defendant firm in resisting the plaintiff's claim, on the ground that it was reasonable in the circumstances for the defendant firm to resist the plaintiff's claim and that they would do so was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties as a probable result of the third party's breach of condition as to title.

Hammond v. Bussey (1887) 20 Q.B.D. 78; 4 T.L.R. 95; Agius v. Great Western Colliery Co. [1899] 1 Q.B. 413; Kasler & Cohen v. Slavouski [1928] 1 K.B. 78 followed.

(5) That the prima facie liability of the fourth party to the third party for breach of warranty of title was the price of the motor-car, namely £1,015, but his liability should be reduced to the amount of the third party's actual loss, excluding only the loss of profit made by the third party on re-sale, since that re-sale was not in the contemplation of the parties.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Harry Butterworth, brought this action by a specially indorsed writ issued on September 12, 1952, claiming £1,275, the price he had paid to the defendant firm in respect of a Jowett Javelin motor-car purchased by him on August 30, 1951. The transaction was one of part-exchange, the plaintiff paying £550 in cash and delivering to the defendant firm a Standard motor-car valued at £725.

The Jowett Javelin motor-car, the subject of this action, had been taken by Miss Rudolph, the fifth party, as hirer, from Bowmaker Ld. on January 3, 1951, under a hire-purchase agreement which provided, inter alia, for the payment by the hirer of a number of monthly instalments, and that, if the hirer should duly perform the terms of the agreement she should have the option of purchasing the vehicle for the sum of 10s., but, until such option was duly exercised, the vehicle was to remain the property of Bowmaker Ld. and the hirer should not have any right or interest in it other than that of hirer under the agreement; that the agreement was personal to the hirer and the rights and/or obligations of the hirer should not be assignable or chargeable by her. The fifth party paid some of the monthly payments under the hire-purchase agreement. She had not exercised the option to purchase the vehicle when, on August 1, 1951, she purported to sell it for £1,000 to the fourth party, who was a motor dealer. The fifth party continued thereafter to make monthly payments under the hire-purchase agreement.

On August 11, 1951, the fourth party purported to sell the vehicle to the third party at a price of £1,015. The third party, so far as the fourth party knew, required the car for his own use and not for the purpose of re-sale. The third party on the same day purported to sell the vehicle to the defendant firm for the price of £1,030.

In all these transactions each of the vendors acted in good faith believing they had a right to sell the vehicle.

The plaintiff made full use of the vehicle from August 30, 1951, until July 16, 1952, when he received a letter from Bowmaker Ld. informing him that they were the owners of the vehicle and requiring him to deliver up possession of it to them. At the same time Bowmaker Ld., without prejudice to their claim, gave the plaintiff an opportunity to acquire title to the vehicle for the sum of £175 14s. 2d. On July 17, 1952, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant firm claiming the return of the price paid by the plaintiff, on the ground that the defendant firm had had no title at the time of the purported sale. On July 23, 1952, Bowmaker Ld. wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors stating that they had received from the fifth party a cheque dated July 25, 1952, which, if met, would be sufficient to discharge their interests and enable them to release the vehicle to the plaintiff: the cheque was met on July 25, 1952.

The plaintiff's solicitors again wrote to the defendant firm's solicitors on August 9, 1952, requesting the return of the purchase price and seeking instructions with regard to the return of the vehicle. August 14, 1952, Bowmaker Ld. wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors informing them that the fifth party's cheque had been met and that their "interests in this case and in [the vehicle] is "completed." On two further occasions the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant firm's solicitors requesting instructions on the disposal of the vehicle which the plaintiff had ceased to use on July 16, 1952, and had not thereafter used.

There was a fall in the market value of the vehicle between 1951 and 1952 and its value in July, 1952, was assessed at £800. Its value at the date of the hearing of the action being about £450.

The defendant firm by its defence denied, inter alia, that the consideration had wholly failed and alleged that the plaintiff was and had been in undisturbed possession of the vehicle and had a good title to it. The defendant firm brought in the third party claiming to be indemnified against the plaintiff's claim and costs of the action. The substance of the defendant firm's claim against the third party was for damages for breach of the implied condition of title. The third party, making a similar claim, brought in the fourth party, who similarly brought in the fifth party.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

June 10. PEARSON J. The subject-matter of this litigation is a Jowett Javelin motor-car which was first registered in November, 1949. We have no evidence as to what happened to it between November, 1949, and about the end of 1950, but Miss Rudolph, the fifth party, became interested in it late in the year 1950. On January 3, 1951, she took it from Messrs. Bowmaker Ld. on a hire-purchase agreement containing not unfamiliar provisions.

By clause 2 the hirer agreed: "(a) On the signing hereof to "pay to the owners the amount of the first payment set out in "the schedule hereto in consideration of the option to purchase "granted to the hirer and referred to in clause 3 (a). (b) To pay "punctually to the owners without previous demand the amount "of the monthly payments set out in the schedule hereto so long "as the hirer shall desire to continue the hiring."

Clause 3 (a) is very important. It provides: "The owners "agree: (a) If the hirer shall duly make the said payments and "strictly observe and perform all the terms and conditions on his "part herein contined then the hirer shall thereupon have the "option of purchasing the vehicle for the sum of 10s."

Clause 4 provides: "If during the hiring the hirer shall: "(a) make default in punctually paying any of the hire-rents "provided by clause 2 (b) . . . (d) Fail to observe and perform "any of the terms, conditions and stipulations on his part herein "contained it shall be lawful for the owners . . . to put an end "to the hiring immediately and retake possession of the vehicle."

Clause 6 provides: "Unless and until the whole of the sums "due under clauses 2 (a) and 2 (b) hereof shall have been paid "and purchase been made under clause 3 (a) hereof the vehicle "shall remain the absolute property of the owners and the hirer "shall not have any right or interest in the same other than that "of hirer under this agreement."

Clause 9 provides: "This agreement is personal to the hirer "and the rights and/or obligations of the hirer shall not be "assignable or chargeable by him."

Miss Rudolph paid some of the monthly payments due under the hire-purchase agreement, but she had not paid all of them nor, of course, had she exercised the option to purchase by August 1, 1951, when she purported to sell this Jowett Javelin car to a motor dealer named Leonard Kennedy, the fourth party. The price was £1,000 and that was paid by him by means of a cash payment of £350 and the delivery of an A.C. shooting brake, which was valued for the purpose of that transaction at £650. That sale was wrongful because the car still belonged to Bowmaker Ld., and Miss Rudolph had no right to sell it. There was, therefore, a clear breach of the implied condition under section 12 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.[1] It may well be that Miss Rudolph did not then realize that she was acting in an unlawful manner, but it is quite clear that she was.

BUTTERWORTH v. KINGSWAY MOTORS.

Pearson J.

On or about August 11, the fourth party, Mr. Kennedy, purported to sell this car for a little more than he had given for it—namely, £1,015—to Hayton, the third party. Hayton was a produce merchant and, so far as Kennedy knew, Hayton required the car for his own use and not for re-sale. This second transaction was again a completely wrongful sale as the car still belonged to Bowmaker Ld., so that, again, there was a breach of the same implied condition, but I find that he acted in good faith in believing he had a right to sell the car.

On the same day, August 11, Hayton, the third party, purported to sell the car for £1,030, to the defendants, Kingsway Motors, who are motor dealers, and Hayton knew that they were buying the car for re-sale. Here again, the sale was wrongful as the car still belonged to Bowmaker Ld., so that there was a breach of the same implied condition. Hayton also acted in good faith in believing that he had a right to sell the car.

After certain negotiations from about August 15 onwards, the defendants, on or about August 30, 1951, purported to sell the car to the plaintiff for £1,275, which was paid by means of certain cash payments amounting to £550 and the delivery of a Standard car which for this purpose was considered to be worth £725. Here, again, there was a wrongful sale as the car still belonged to Bowmaker Ld. and the defendants had no right to sell it, so there was a breach of the same implied condition. Here, also, the defendants acted in good faith, believing that they had a right to sell.

It appears from the registration book that the plaintiff was registered as owner on January 15, 1952. From the time of its acquisition on about August 30, 1951, until some time in July, 1952, he made full use of the car, fully believing that it was his car and that he had every right to use it. Miss Rudolph continued to make some monthly payments to Bowmaker Ld., under the hire-purchase agreement. In the end, however, she learned that she ought not to have sold the car as she had done and she informed Bowmaker Ld. of the actual position. Her conduct in those two respects, of course, affords strong evidence that she was acting in good faith and not with any intention of deceit, but it was a wrongful sale.

[1] Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 12: "In a contract of sale, unless the "circumstances of the contract are "such as to show a different intention, "there is—(1) An implied condition "on the part of the seller that, in the "case of a sale, he has a right to sell "the goods, and that in the case of "an agreement to sell he will have a "right to sell the goods at the time "when the property is to pass."

On July 15, 1952, Bowmaker Ld. wrote to the plaintiff in these terms: "Re: Jowett Javelin—Regd. No. HGA 4. We "have reason to believe that the vehicle described above is at "present in your possession and we wish to advise you that it is "our property the subject of a hiring agreement into which we "entered with a Miss G. Rudolph. Assuming our information to "be correct, we have to ask you to be good enough to arrange at "once for the vehicle to be returned into the possession of our "Liverpool office, and we shall be obliged if you will confirm that "you have given effect to our requirements. It occurs to us that "you might perhaps like the opportunity to acquire title in the "vehicle and quite without prejudice, we would be prepared to "allow you to do so in consideration of an immediate payment "of £175 14s. 2d."

If the plaintiff had been willing to enter into some arrangement on the lines suggested by Bowmaker Ld., a great deal of trouble would have been saved because no doubt it would have been possible to arrange what ultimately happened in fact, that Miss Rudolph herself would repay the outstanding balance to Bowmaker Ld. The plaintiff would then have had what he had originally bargained for at the price he originally agreed to pay, and did pay, and it would have saved a great deal of expense to everybody. On the other hand, he would have lost the chance he had in 1952 of reclaiming the full 1951 price in return for giving up this motor-car in July, 1952, by which time it had substantially depreciated in its realizable value by reason of a general fall in the market price of second-hand cars, but I do not think those considerations ultimately affect the legal issue here. I only mention them to show that I have not left out of consideration possible arguments on the grounds of hardship. In my view, the plaintiff's position is somewhat lacking in merits.

On July 17, 1952, acting very promptly in the matter, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendants: "We have been "consulted by Mr. H. Butterworth of 44, Dee Lane, West Kirby, "who informed us that he purchased a Jowett Javelin car for "£1,275 on August 30 last. We are instructed that this motor-"car was not yours to sell, and in the circumstances our client "will expect the return of the money paid." That shows that the plaintiff is claiming the repayment of the money and not wishing to retain the car. That second point becomes even more clear in later letters. On July 18 there is a reply from the defendants' solicitors to the plaintiff's solicitors: ". . . The allegation "that the Jowett Javelin car was not the property of our clients "to sell has come as a complete surprise. Our clients purchased "the car from a motor dealer. . . ."

On July 23 Bowmaker Ld. write to the plaintiff's solicitors: "Re: Miss G. Rudolph, Agreement No. ——: . . . Since we "wrote to Mr. Butterworth, we have received from our hirer a "post-dated cheque which, if met, will be sufficient to discharge

Butterworth v. Kingsway Motors.

Pearson J.

"our interests and to enable us to release the vehicle to Mr. "Butterworth. The cheque in question is dated [July 25], so "we propose to write you again during the course of a day or "two."

It is understood and accepted by all counsel that in fact that cheque was made out by Miss Rudolph and made payable to Bowmaker Ld. for the outstanding amount of the hire-purchase payments and, I suppose, for the 10s. necessary to complete the purchase; and that cheque was met on or about July 25, 1952. The effect of that is that Miss Rudolph must be deemed to have exercised her option to purchase, and it follows that as between her and Bowmaker Ld. the ownership passed from Bowmaker Ld. to her. That is only as between those two parties. Bowmaker Ld. were willing to take that cheque, as they pointed out in their letter, in discharge of their interests and as enabling them to release the vehicle. They say in their letter "to release the "vehicle to Mr. Butterworth."

On August 9 there is a further letter from the plaintiff's solicitors to the defendants' solicitors, which reads: ". . . We "are now instructed to apply for the return of the purchase price, "namely, £1,275, and we should be obliged by your letting us "have your instructions with regard to the return of the motor-"car." On August 14 Bowmaker Ld. wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors: ". . . We are pleased to say that the cheque to which "we referred in our last communication has been duly met so "that our interests in this case and in the Jowett Javelin HGA 4 "is completed."

On August 22 the plaintiff's solicitors write to the defendants' solicitors again asking for the return of the purchase price and again asking for instructions regarding the return of the motor-car. On October 11, 1952, the plaintiff's solicitors write again asking for some instructions as to the disposal of the car. The plaintiff did not use the car after July 16, 1952, but the car has remained on his premises ever since that date and, most unfortunately, no arrangement was made for that car to be disposed of in July or August or later in 1952, while its price was still comparatively high.

The proceedings began with a specially indorsed writ issued on September 12. The claim was "for money received by the "defendants to the use of the plaintiff and payable by the defen-"dants to the plaintiff on a consideration which has wholly failed. "The said money, namely, £1,275, was paid by the plaintiff to "the defendants on August 30, 1951, or thereabouts, as the "consideration for the delivery by the defendants to the plaintiff "of a Jowett Javelin motor-car, registration number HGA 4, and "the consideration wholly failed by reason of the fact that the "defendants were not the owners of the said motor-car, and had "no title to the said motor-car. And the plaintiff claims the said "sum of £1,275."

Some adverse comments have been made as to the exact wording of that statement of claim, but I do not think that they are of much moment because I think that that statement of claim makes clear the substance of the plaintiff's claim: it was that the consideration had failed because the defendants had failed to sell the car to the plaintiff and, in the first instance at any rate, had no title to it.

The defence was delivered on October 27, 1952. The material pleas are paragraphs 3 and 4: "3. It is denied that the con-"sideration wholly failed as alleged or at all, on the contrary the "plaintiff is and has been in undisturbed possession of the said "Jowett Javelin, and has a good title to the said Jowett Javelin. "4. If, which is denied, the plaintiff has not a good title, then "the plaintiff accepted the said Jowett Javelin, of which he is "still in possession, and by reason of section 11 (1) (c) of the "Sale of Goods Act, 1893,[2] any alleged breach of any alleged "condition by the seller in the contract of sale can only be "treated as a warranty and not as a ground for rejecting the said "contract." Mr. Atkinson indicated that his argument against the plaintiff would, for the most part, be based on paragraph 3.

There was a third party notice served by the defendants against the third party claiming to be indemnified against the plaintiff's claim and costs of the action on the ground that there was an implied condition that the third party had a good title to the motor-car. There is a statement of claim in those proceedings and the defence. It is sufficient to say that, in substance, the defendants' claim against the third party is now, at any rate, for damages for breach of the implied condition that the third party had a good title. The claim is for damages because any alleged breach of the alleged condition has been reduced to a breach of warranty, either by the events which have happened or by the election of the defendants to deal with the matter on that basis. The main plea in the defence is that the title was perfected afterwards. There is a similar fourth party notice dated November 26, 1952, by the third party against the fourth party and a somewhat similar statement of claim and defence. Then there is a similar fifth party notice dated January 6, 1953, by the fourth party against Miss Rudolph.

On those facts, the first question is the relation between the plaintiff and the defendants, and a very important question is whether the plaintiff, by his letter of July 17, 1952, duly and effectually rescinded the contract of sale between him and the defendants. I hold, first, that that letter of July 17, as a matter of construction, constituted a rescission of that contract of sale. When I say "a rescission of the contract of sale," I am using the wording which was used in the Court of Appeal in Rowland v. Divall,[3] and without prejudice to the question whether it could also be put in rather a different way: that there was a fundamental breach by the defendants and the plaintiff elected to treat that breach as a repudiation of that contract of sale. I do not think that it makes any difference which way one looks at it in the end. Secondly, I hold that, on the authority of Rowland v. Divall,[3] the plaintiff was on that date entitled to rescind that contract of sale. The possible contention for the defendants that such rescission was precluded by the plaintiff's use of the car for a substantial period and the deterioration in its condition and/or depreciation in its market value during that period is answered by the reasoning of Bankes L.J.[4] in that case. Another possible contention that such rescission was precluded by the plaintiff's acceptance of the motor-car when it was delivered or after delivery is answered by the reasoning of Atkin L.J.[5]

[2] Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 11: "(1) In England or Ireland—. . . (c) "Where a contract of sale is not "severable, and the buyer has ac-"cepted the goods, or part thereof, or "where the contract is for specific "goods, the property in which has "passed to the buyer, the breach of "any condition to be fulfilled by the "seller can only be treated as a "breach of warranty, and not as a "ground for rejecting the goods and "treating the contract as repudiated, "unless there be a term of the con-"tract, express or implied, to that "effect."

Pearson J.

The contention mainly relied upon by Mr. Atkinson for the defendants as against the plaintiff was that there was not a total failure of the consideration. That question he said was to be determined as at the date of the issue of the writ, and that, as at that date, the plaintiff was still in undisturbed possession of the car; there was no outstanding adverse claim against him because Miss Rudolph had paid the outstanding instalments and the hire-purchase money, and Bowmaker Ld. were willing to accept such payment in full discharge of their interest in the car and to release the vehicle to the plaintiff. The answer to that contention is that on July 17 the plaintiff was entitled to, and did, rescind the contract of sale and thereby he established, and in a sense crystallized, his right to receive repayment of the purchase price as money paid in consideration for the sale of the motor-car. He could not consistently with that claim for repayment of the purchase price also claim to retain possession of the car, but at all times it was sufficiently clear that he was not adopting any attitude of seeking to retain possession of the car. He was holding the car at the disposal of the defendants. I further hold that after he had written that letter the plaintiff was entitled to, and did, maintain his position of having no claim to possession of the car, but having a right to repayment of the purchase price. Having regard to that, whatever the general merits of his position may be, I hold that the plaintiff is in law entitled to recover, and there will be judgment for £1,275 against the defendants.

The decision which I have given on that question depends on the letter of July 17, 1952. It was argued for the plaintiff that even if that letter had never been written the position would still have been the same on the ground that there was a total failure of consideration as between the two relevant parties, the plaintiff and the defendants. The contention was that even if the letter of July 17 had not been written, still the extraneous act of Miss Rudolph in paying the hire-purchase money to Bowmaker Ld., and the willingness of Bowmaker Ld. to accept that in discharge of their interest and release the vehicle to the plaintiff, would not remedy the defect in the consideration moving from the defendants. It is not necessary for me to express an opinion on that point. I feel some doubts about it because it would seem an extraordinary position if the plaintiff here, on the assumption that he had not previously defined his attitude of election on the subject, was seeking to say: "There has been a total failure of "consideration by purchase of this car, although here is the car "in my possession and I am entitled to retain it against the "world." It does not seem to me to be a reasonable conclusion. I do not express any final opinion on it because I have come to my decision in favour of the plaintiff's claim on the basis of his solicitor's letter of July 17.

[3] [1923] 2 K. B. 500.
[4] Ibid. 503.
[5] Ibid. 506.

The next question is as to the present ownership of the car. The various purported sales all took place at times when Bowmaker Ld. were still the owners of the car, so that all the purported sellers in this rather long chain had no title to it at the times when the sales, or purported sales, were made; but on or about July 25, 1952, Miss Rudolph acquired a good title from Bowmaker Ld. or, at any rate, made a payment to Bowmaker Ld. which extinguished their title and induced them to relinquish any claim they had to the car. I think the right view is that Miss Rudolph did acquire the title as between her and Bowmaker Ld., but I further hold on authority that the title so acquired went to feed the previously defective titles of the subsequent buyers and enured to their benefit. It is a rather curious position but I so hold mainly on the authority of the Court of Appeal decision in Whitehorn Brothers v. Davison.[6] In his judgment Vaughan Williams L.J. said[7]: "It is by reason of this event "that I have come to the conclusion that the question of larceny "by a trick becomes of no importance in this case. The title of "Bruford to the necklace was, at any rate for the time being, "perfected by that transaction, and would go to feed the title "of the defendant, his pledgee, the result being that, if the "defendant's title is not vitiated by bad faith on his part or "notice, he has a good title. . . ." Buckley L.J. said[8]: "If "Bruford had stolen it, [the necklace] he had that which is "sometimes incorrectly called a void title, but which is really no "title at all. Bruford could not then give the defendant a title." There is a passage in the judgment of Kennedy L.J.[9] which is to a similar effect. Blundell-Leigh v. Attenborough[10] (per Bankes

BUTTERWORTH v. KINGSWAY MOTORS.

Pearson J.

L.J.[11] and Atkin L.J.[12]) and Robin & Rambler Coaches Ld. v. Turner[13] are also authorities on this point. Accordingly, I hold that the sales by Miss Rudolph to Kennedy, by Kennedy to Hayton, and by Hayton to the defendants were in a sense perfected on or about July 25, 1952, and that in consequence the newly acquired title of Miss Rudolph passed all along the line and caused the ownership of the car to vest in the defendants on or about July 25. The plaintiff, as I have already stated, has been holding the car at the disposal of the true owner, whoever he may be, and since July 25, 1952, the defendants have been entitled to that car.

The next set of questions is concerned with the rights of the defendants against Hayton, and Hayton against Kennedy, and Kennedy against Miss Rudolph. The defendants are entitled to claim damages against Hayton for breach of the condition as to good title to the car, but that breach of the condition is now reduced to a breach of warranty and damages can be claimed on that basis. In consequence of that breach, the defendants lost the purchase price of £1,275 but, on the other hand, they eventually acquired ownership of the car. For the value of that car which they so acquired, they must give credit in reduction of the prima facie sum of £1,275.

The next question is: At what date is the value of that car to be assessed? One possible argument for the third party would be that it was the duty of the defendants to mitigate the damage by taking all reasonable steps to dispose of the car and it would have been reasonable for the defendants at once, in July or August or thereabouts in 1952, to take the car and dispose of it at the price it would then fetch in order to avoid further depreciation. It may be that there was a duty to mitigate the damage in that way, but the argument to the contrary is formidable: namely, that the defendants at that time were faced with a difficult legal position, and they were entitled to maintain their attitude against the plaintiff that the car belonged to him and it did not belong to them and they were not liable. I think there is a possibility of a good deal of argument as to what the "reasonable" steps to mitigate the damage would be, but I think this problem can be solved much more simply.

What the defendants gained was the ownership and right to possession of that car and, when one comes to assess the value of what they gained, one should take it at the date when it was gained. That is the position here. Then one has to arrive as best one can at the proper value of that car in or about July, 1952. [His Lordship referred to the evidence and continued:] The present value of this car is something like £450 and, making the best assessment I can, I assess its value in July, 1952, at £800. Therefore, the net claim of the defendants against the third party, all questions of the parties' costs being left over, is

[11] [1921] 3 K.B. 240.
[12] Ibid. 242.
[13] [1947] 2 All E.R. 284.

£475; that is to say, the difference between the full claim of £1,275 and the £800 deducted for the value of the car, leaving a difference of £475, and the decision is that the defendants are entitled to recover that sum from the third party.

The next step in the chain is the claim of Hayton, the third party, against Kennedy, the fourth party. This is possibly complicated by the fact that so far as the fourth party knew at the time of the contract of sale, Hayton was buying for his own use and not for re-sale; but Hayton paid £1,015 for the ownership of the car and he received initially no ownership at all so there was at that time a clear breach of contract. Prima facie, his claim would be for the whole sum of £1,015 because he paid £1,015 and received nothing in exchange. In fact, subsequent events have reduced his claim. He has not suffered as much damage as that, but I think the fair view is that the subsequent events have to be taken as a whole and the effect is that his net claim against the fourth party is for £475, always leaving aside any question as to the parties' costs in this matter.

Similarly, I think the same result can be arrived at between Kennedy and Miss Rudolph. The previously mentioned complication does not exist here because Miss Rudolph knew that Kennedy was a motor dealer and was buying for re-sale. I do not think that that ultimately alters the result. Mr. Kennedy's claim against Miss Rudolph is £475, leaving aside the question of costs.

Judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

June 24. After hearing further argument on behalf of the defendants, the third party, the fourth party and the fifth party on costs as such and as items of damages for breach of warranty his Lordship reserved judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2. His Lordship read the following judgment:—For the sake of clarity, I will first set out the contents of the order to be made, and then explain the points which need explanation.

CONTENTS OF ORDER.

A. There will be judgment for the defendants against the third party for:—(1) Damages made up of (a) £475, (b) the costs payable by the defendants to the plaintiff, and (c) the defendants' costs of resisting the plaintiff's claim (to be taxed as between solicitor and client); and (2) The defendants' costs of the third party proceedings (to be taxed as between party and party).

B. There will be judgment for the third party against the fourth party for:—(1) Damages being the lesser of the two following amounts, namely, (a) £1,015, and (b) the aggregate of the damages and costs payable by the third party to the defendants and the third party costs of resisting the defendants' claim against the third party (to be taxed as between solicitor and client) less £15; and (2) The third party's costs of the fourth party proceedings (to be taxed as between party and party).

C. There will be judgment for the fourth party against the fifth party for:—(1) Damages made up of (a) the damages and costs payable by the fourth party to the third party, and (b) the fourth party's costs of resisting the third party's claim against the fourth party (to be taxed as between solicitor and client); and (2) The fourth party's costs of the fifth party proceedings (to be taxed as between party and party).

Explanation.

A. As to the judgment for the defendants against the third party, certain questions arise with regard to the items of damages (b) and (c).

The defendants were to the knowledge of the third party motor dealers buying the car for re-sale to a sub-buyer. The parties must reasonably be supposed to have contemplated, as a probable result of the breach of the condition as to title, that the sub-buyer would reclaim from the defendants the price charged by the defendants to the sub-buyer, and that the defendants would resist the claim if it were reasonable to do so. It has to be considered whether it was reasonable for the defendants to resist the plaintiff's claim. There was no evidence as to negotiations between the defendants and the third, fourth and fifth parties or any of them. I was informed, however, that a meeting was held between them or their respective solicitors, but no agreement was reached. There is no reason for attributing the blame for the failure of the meeting to any particular party or parties. The defendants had an arguable case against the plaintiff, and if they had succeeded their success would have benefited, not only the defendants themselves, but also the third party and the fourth and fifth parties. I find that it was reasonable for the defendants to resist the plaintiff's claim. Accordingly, they are entitled to charge against the third party the costs payable by the defendants to the plaintiff and the defendants' costs of resisting the plaintiff's claim, and those latter costs should be taxed as between solicitor and client: Hammond & Co. v. Bussey[14]; Agius v. Great Western Colliery Co.[15]; Kasler and Cohen v. Slavouski.[16]

B. As to the judgment for the third party against the fourth party, it was argued on behalf of the fourth party that he should not have to pay anything to the third party except perhaps nominal damages and costs, because (1) although, prima facie, he would have been liable to the third party for £1,015 (being the price or value of the car) by reason of the breach of condition or warranty as to title, in the event he has no liability on this ground because eventually the title passed through the fourth party to the third party on its way to the defendants; and (2) the fourth party is not liable to the third party for the third party's actual loss, because that arose out of a re-sale which was not in the contemplation of the fourth party when he made his contract of sale with the third party, whom he knew only as a produce merchant and not as a dealer in cars. That is an attractive argument, but I think it fails for reasons which I have stated shortly in the former judgment and will now elaborate.

The fourth party sold to the third party a car worth £1,015, having no title to it. Prima facie, he is liable to the third party for £1,015. But there occurred a series of subsequent events, which were interconnected and were all outside the contemplation of the fourth party at the time of the contract and were fortuitous and extraneous so far as the fourth party was concerned. There are, I think, four conceivable views as to the effect of these subsequent events on the fourth party's liability:—(i) that all the subsequent events should be disregarded so far as the fourth party is concerned, and he is liable to the third party for £1,015; (ii) that the fourth party's liability is prima facie £1,015, but if the third party's actual loss is less than £1,015 the fourth party's liability should be reduced to the amount of the third party's actual loss; (iii) that all the subsequent events should be taken into account, and the fourth party's liability should be equal to the third party's actual loss, whether greater or less than £1,015; (iv) that the fourth party is entitled to have taken into account only that one of the subsequent events which happens to be to his advantage—namely, the eventual passing of the title through the fourth party to the third party in the course of its longer total transit—and to have all the other subsequent events left out of account.

In my judgment the fourth suggested view must be rejected. It involves an artificial selection of only one out of the connected series of subsequent events. The fourth party did not himself do anything to cure the defect of title, nor was it fully cured in fact: the third party did not acquire an absolute or clear title but only a transient title associated with a liability. The third suggested view is wrong in principle, because the fourth party's liability should not be increased by reason of matters which were outside the scope of his reasonable contemplation at the time of the contract. The first suggested view does not need to be considered, as the third party did not in his fourth party pleading ask for more than an indemnity in respect of his actual loss. In my view the second view is right, namely that the prima facie liability is for £1,015, and this cannot be exceeded, but if the third party's loss has been reduced by the subsequent events, taken as a whole, the fourth party should have the benefit of that reduction. In ascertaining the third party's actual loss the profit of £15, which he made by buying the car at £1,015 and selling it at £1,030, is to be deducted.

Butterworth v. Kingsway Motors.

Pearson J.

C. As to the judgment for the fourth party against the fifth party, the fifth party knew that the fourth party was buying the car as a dealer and therefore for re-sale, and the parties must reasonably be supposed to have contemplated, as a probable result of the breach of the condition as to title, that the sub-buyer would claim repayment of the price or damages from the fourth party and that the fourth party would resist the claim if it were reasonable for him to do so. In the circumstances it was reasonable for the fourth party to resist the claim of the sub-buyer who is the third party.

Court of Appeal—County court—Appeal from—Damages—Assessment of—Personal injuries—Question of fact—No power in appellate court to intervene where amount considered extravagant.
Damages—Personal injuries—County court.

Where a county court judge has awarded damages, an appellate court has no power to intervene merely on the ground that it considers the amount extravagant (or inadequate) for, unless it can be shown that the judge has erred on a point of law, the adequacy or inadequacy of an award by a county court judge is a question of fact on which no appeal lies.

Henderson v. Clifford Watmough & Co. (1939) 161 L.T. 233 applied.

Appeal from Judge Emlyn-Jones, Warrington County Court.

On July 31, 1952, a brewer's lorry with a trailer, owned by the first defendants, J. W. Lees (Brewers) Ld., was being driven along the main road from Queensferry to Birkenhead by their servant. He switched on the lights as he drove along at about lighting-up time, and a few miles further on he stopped the lorry (a) to see that his lights were on and (b) to check his load. At that moment a motor-cycle driven by the second defendant, Frank Berry, on which the plaintiff, Joyce Shave, aged 20, was a pillion passenger, crashed into the back of the stationary vehicle. As a result of the accident, the plaintiff suffered injuries.

She brought an action against the owners of the lorry and the motor-cyclist, alleging negligence against both. By their defence the first defendants said that the trailer had exhibited a red light at all times, and alleged that the accident was caused solely by the negligence of the second defendant; the second defendant denied negligence.

The county court judge accepted the evidence of the plaintiff (a) that there was no red light on the trailer when the accident occurred; (b) that the motor-cyclist was travelling at 30 to 35 miles an hour; (c) that immediately before the accident an oncoming vehicle had dipped its headlights and the motor-cyclist had accordingly dipped his own headlight; and (d) that immediately after he had done so, the accident occurred.

The judge held that the sole cause of the accident was the fact that there was no rear light on the trailer, and that the first defendants were accordingly wholly to blame. He then considered the medical reports, which stated that the plaintiff had been rendered unconscious by the accident, had been an in-patient in hospital for three weeks and an out-patient for three months, suffering injuries to her jaw and laceration of her scalp; that she still suffered some pain in the jaw (though the prognosis was that that pain would disappear in time); and that she had a permanent disability in that she could only open her mouth 90 per. cent. The judge expressed the view that the accident was serious, and awarded the plaintiff £750 damages against the first defendants. He ordered that judgment be entered for the second defendant against the first defendants.

The first defendants, who had originally applied for the case to be remitted from the High Court to the county court, appealed, asking for judgment in their favour; alternatively, that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff against the second defendant, or against both defendants in such proportion as the court should deem just. They also appealed against the award of damages on the ground that these were on the evidence excessive and unreasonable, and asked for a new trial.

at the time, the driver of the vehicle had a heavy onus on him to satisfy the court that that state of affairs existed without any negligence on his part. The county court judge had found that the light was not on at the time of the accident; there was a case on the facts as found by him on which he was justified in finding negligence; and the court could not disturb those findings. Nor could the court disturb the finding that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the motor-cyclist. His Lordship continued:—The last point is one on which, although we have not heard the other side, it does seem that there would be a good deal to be said if it were not for a certain decision. The judge awarded the plaintiff £750 damages. Apart from the point of law, I have looked at the medical evidence, which states that this young woman suffered from some concussion but was only in hospital for three weeks. The only other damage was some injury to her jaw, which results in her being able to open her mouth not more than 90 per cent. The agreed medical report states that she suffers no difficulties as a result of that disability. It seems to me that the sum of £750 was a wholly excessive amount. I think it is a pity that the judge, probably out of sympathy for a young woman who, I dare say, was a good-looking young woman, should give such excessive damages. If this case had been tried in the High Court, a High Court judge would probably have given £100, or £150 at the outside and, so far as I have heard at present, that would have been ample. I have read the very clear medical reports, and I do not think that counsel for the other parties could have persuaded me that there was any ground for suggesting that this was a very serious case, or that this girl would not have been well compensated by the sum I have mentioned. But unfortunately in Henderson v. Clifford Watmough & Co.[1] this court decided that in these cases of excessive or inadequate damages, unless it can be shown that the judge has gone wrong on a point of law, the question as to what somebody should receive as compensation for injuries, pain and suffering, and so on, is a pure question of fact. Mr. Beney, with the frankness that always distinguishes him in any case which he is arguing, called the attention of the court to this case, which he admitted put a difficulty in his way. He could not get over that difficulty. The court in Henderson's case[1] would have overcome the difficulty if they could, because it is obvious from the report that the court there took the view that the damages awarded to the injured plaintiff in that action were inadequate.

In the present case it is the other way round: the damages awarded to this young woman are extravagant; but as the court said it could not interfere in the case of inadequate damages because it was a mere question of fact, it follows here that we cannot interfere because the damages are extravagant. If it could have been shown that the judge had taken something into account by mistake or had considered some matter which he ought not to have taken into account, or of which there was no evidence, that would have been different; but here he has said: "I have "heard all the evidence about it; I have read the medical reports, "which speak for themselves; I think it is a very serious acci-"dent; and £750 is proper compensation." However much we regret it, we cannot interfere. This judgment must stand and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

APPEAL from McNair J. and a jury.

The plaintiff, Leslie Robert Bocock, was employed by the defendants in their rolling mills as a "catcher." His work, which was difficult and required agility and skill, consisted in catching red-hot copper rods with a pair of tongs as they passed through one set of rollers on to a slope, and putting them through another set of rollers. On June 4, 1952, while he was standing near the rollers, something unusual happened and a red-hot rod jumped out and caught the plaintiff's left ankle. He suffered serious injuries to his ankle and foot and his hands were burned. The Achilles tendon of the left foot became virtually useless and he had had to undergo a number of painful operations, involving skin grafting, which had in turn led to an infection of the right leg with the danger of future osteoarthritis in that leg.

At the time of the accident, the plaintiff was 25 years old, and earned nearly £18 a week. At the time of the hearing of the action on April 29, 1954, nearly two years later, he was employed by the defendants as a checkweighman at £8 15s. a week. He had to walk with a stick and his leisure activities had been considerably curtailed. He would never be fit to return to his former work, though he was reasonably sure of keeping his present occupation.

The agreed out-of-pocket loss (including loss of wages) up to the time of the trial of the action was £1,100. The action was heard by McNair J. with a jury, and as liability was admitted, the only issue for the jury was the amount of damages. The judge, at the conclusion of his summing-up, said: "When you "have . . . arrived at your figure, also bear in mind that it ought "to bear some relation in the scale of damages to the damages "which would be awarded for the really grave serious injuries, or "the more serious injuries, such as the loss of limbs and the "loss of eyes."

The jury assessed the total damages at £3,850 (including the out-of-pocket expenses). The Court of Appeal was asked on behalf of the plaintiff to direct a new trial on the ground that the judge had misdirected the jury and that the damages were so low, having regard to the nature of the plaintiff's injuries, that the verdict could not stand.

D. P. Croom-Johnson for the plaintiff.
Bernard Caulfield for the defendants.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the course of the judgment.

Singleton L.J. stated the facts, referred to the specific criticisms of the summing-up, and continued: Mr. Croom-Johnson submits that the judge's concluding remark was an unfortunate one for him to make use of at the end of his summing-up. Everyone knows that recently there have been some very large awards of damages for personal injuries. It appears to me that the judge is saying no more to the jury than this: "This "is a serious injury, but you ought to bear in mind there are more "serious injuries. Be reasonable to both sides." He had pointed out again and again the seriousness of the injury. I cannot see any sign of misdirection in the summing-up of the judge.

Thus I come to the point which Mr. Croom-Johnson made first, which is that the damages, £3,850, are so low in relation to the injuries which this man suffered that this court ought to direct a new trial. Let me say that I think the damages are low; I feel that if I had been sitting alone as a judge of first instance I should have given considerably more. At the same time it has been said more than once that a judge sitting by himself is not in as good a position to assess damages as are twelve members of a jury. They have an opportunity of discussing the matter among themselves, and though they may not have great experience in the matter, twelve heads should be better than one. When a trial is by jury issues of fact are for the jury. The amount of damages to which an injured person is entitled is a question of fact, a serious question of fact, most difficult for judge or for jury. Quite often in this court there is an appeal on damages against a judgment of a judge sitting alone. In such a case, while it is the duty of this court to remember that the judge sees and hears the witnesses, and while his decision on facts ought not to be lightly interfered with, the court does sometimes think it right to take steps to adjust the matter, and to say what the damages should be.

The position is different when the trial is by jury; it has always been so regarded; and this court ought to take care not to do anything to lessen the importance with which verdicts of juries are regarded. The Annual Practice for 1954 in the notes under Ord. 58, r. 4, at p. 1254, sets out the practice quite clearly and accurately: "The Court of Appeal will not set aside "the verdict of a jury as to the amount of damages unless "satisfied that it is out of all proportion to the facts"; and the authority cited in support is Mechanical and General Inventions Co. Ld. v. Austin and Austin Motor Co. Ld.[1] Towards the end of the headnote appear these words[1]: "When it "is decided that a case is to be tried by a jury, that tribunal "is the only judge of the facts, and no appellate tribunal can "substitute its finding for that of the jury. The appellate court "has a revising function to see, first, whether there is any "evidence in support of the issue found by the jury; and, "secondly, whether the verdict can stand as being one which "reasonable men might have come to."

The House of Lords reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeal and restored the verdict of the jury on one part of the case. Lord Sankey said[2]: "The jury were the proper constitu-"tional tribunal to assess the damages and it is impossible to "say they have gone so wrong that their assessment must "be set aside. It is not a case merely for nominal, but for "substantial damages of which the jury were the judges."

Lord Wright said[3]: "The objection in Wood v. Gunston[4] "was that the damages were excessive, and a new trial was there "ordered. The use of the phrase 'miscarriage of juries' is "significant. It indicates what there must be to justify the "appellate court in interfering with or controlling the verdicts of "juries." Later Lord Wright referred[5] to some words of Lord Halsbury (in Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Wright[6]) on juries' verdicts: "If their finding is absolutely unreasonable, a court "may consider that that shows that they have not really per-"formed the judicial duty cast upon them; but the principle must "be that the judgment upon the facts is to be the judgment of "the jury and not the judgment of any other tribunal"; and Lord Wright himself added[7]: "Lord Halsbury in these valuable "observations is, I think, going back to the test applied in Wood "v. Gunston,[8] which was whether there was a miscarriage of "the jury. Thus the question in truth is not whether the "verdict appears to the appellate court to be right, but whether "it is such as to show that the jury have failed to perform their "duty. An appellate court must always be on guard against the "tendency to set aside a verdict because the court feels it would "have come to a different conclusion."

In Davies v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries Ld. (No. 2),[9] Lord Wright considered cases in which the Court of Appeal should, or ought to, interfere with a judgment on damages of a judge sitting by himself, and said[10]: "There is an obvious difference "between cases tried with a jury and cases tried by a judge alone. "Where the verdict is that of a jury, it will only be set aside if "the appellate court is satisfied that the verdict on damages is "such that it is out of all proportion to the circumstances of the "case. . . ."

Though I think the damages given in the present case were low, I am not able to say that the verdict was out of all proportion to the facts. It was for the jury to assess the damages; it is not for this court so to do. If a plaintiff in a case of this kind asks for a jury and obtains one, he may expect to have some advantages, or he would not ask for a jury. There may be disadvantages, too, though I am far from saying that a jury is not a proper tribunal for a case of this kind. Mr. Croom-Johnson told this court that the plaintiff desired a jury on the issue of liability. That was on a question as to whether or not negligence at common law was proved with regard to the defendants' system of work. I should have thought that a judge would be every bit as good as a jury for a plaintiff in such a matter. In fact, the issue of liability was not fought. The only issue before the judge and jury was the amount of damages. The jury were properly directed, and they assessed the damages. They might have given more; but if a party chooses to have a jury, he ought to be bound by the assessment of the jury of the damages unless it can be said that the verdict is out of all proportion to the facts. I find it quite impossible to say that in this case, and though I could wish that the damages had been Landlord and Tenant—Notice to quit—Ambiguity—To vacate "by" specified date—Validity.

Words and Phrases.

A tenant received the following letter from his landlords: "At "a recent meeting the executive committee reviewed the question "of your tenancy of the small office . . . which we agreed you should "rent until March 31, 1954. After some discussion it was decided "that, as we now need the accommodation which you occupy, we "have to terminate the arrangement and I must ask you, therefore, "to accept three months' notice to vacate the office by the date (i.e., "March 31, 1954 . . .":—

Held that, on the true construction of the document as a whole, the words "vacate . . . by" March 31 required the tenant to give up possession on or before that date, that the notice was not ambiguous, and it was accordingly valid.

APPEAL from Judge Blagden sitting at Westminster County Court.

The plaintiffs, members of the Executive Committee of the London Diocesan Council for Moral Welfare (suing on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members) sought possession by these proceedings of a small office or cubicle at 38, Grosvenor Hill, Berkeley Square, London, which was let to the defendant, Dr. Macpherson, on a yearly tenancy commencing on April 1, 1953, and liable to be determined by three months' notice on either side expiring at the end of any year. On December 23, 1953, the following letter had been sent on behalf of the plaintiffs to Dr. Macpherson: "At a recent meeting the Executive "Committee reviewed the question of your tenancy of the small "office at 38 Grosvenor Hill, which we agreed you should rent "until March 31, 1954. After some discussion it was decided "that, as we now need the accommodation which you occupy,

"we have to terminate the arrangement and I must ask you, "therefore, to accept three months' notice to vacate the office "by the date (i.e. March 31, 1954). Yours sincerely." The county court judge held that the notice in requiring the tenant to vacate "by" March 31 was a bad notice, since it required him to have left not later than midnight on the night of March 30/31. The plaintiffs appealed.

Raymond Phillips for the plaintiffs.
The defendant appeared in person.

No case other than the case referred to in the judgment was cited in argument.

EVERSHED M.R. The only point which we are called upon to decide is a curious one with regard to the meaning and effect of an alleged notice to quit consisting of a letter addressed on behalf of the plaintiffs to the defendant, Dr. Macpherson, on December 23, 1953. [His Lordship referred to the facts and continued:] Judge Paton at the trial took the point that the word "by" immediately before "the date (i.e., March 31, 1954)" must mean that this notice called upon the defendant to have left the office not later than midnight on March 30/31, 1954; in other words, it purported to cut off the last day of the tenancy and, therefore, it was a bad notice.

In his judgment the judge gave an example or two, though he said that he did not think they were much help because they were rather examples of the use of the word in relation to a particular point of time. He said: "If I say 'I hope to have "'finished my list by 4.30' that must mean 'I hope I won't "'be sitting one moment after 4.30'." But I venture to think he misled himself by looking up in Chambers's dictionary the word "by" and quoting what must have been the use of the word in relation to place and not to time: Thus the meaning given, he said, for "by" was "at the side of; near to". He continued: "Fusing these definitions would make it equivalent "to 'on the near side of', that is, exclusive of, or before, "March 31, 1954." We were referred by Mr. Phillips to the definition in the Shorter Oxford Dictionary and in relation to time the definition given by the lexicographers is: "in the course "of, at, in, or on"; and the example given is: "by day" or "by night", which is perhaps not very helpful in this case. But later appears "on or before: not later than: within". As a matter of definition, therefore, I should be inclined to think that "by the date" ought to mean on or before the date. In any case, however, this phrase must be construed in the light of the letter as a whole. It is conceded by Dr. Macpherson that the sense of the first paragraph is that the tenancy should continue up to and including March 31. In light of that, when the treasurer in the very next sentence speaks of "vacating the "office by the date (i.e., March 31, 1954)" I must confess it seems to me clear beyond all reasonable doubt that he is stating that he is giving notice to determine the tenancy on the date when it was liable to be determined, namely, March 31. He is, in other words, saying: "Accept three months' notice to "vacate the office on or before March 31." The view that I take finds support in the view taken of a somewhat similar use of language by the majority of the Court of Appeal of the province of British Columbia in J. H. Munro v. Vancouver Properties Ld.[1] We must, as I have said, construe this particular document and I think, with all respect to Judge Paton, that it has to be read in the sense which I have stated.

Dr. Macpherson says fairly enough: "The judge took one "view and you are inclined to take another. That at least shows "there is a measure of ambiguity." In one sense, no doubt, that is true. But when it is said that a notice must be unambiguous, it means, of course, unambiguous when properly construed. The construction which we place upon it must prevail over the construction which the judge took, and the construction which we place upon it makes it an unambiguous notice. We are thankful to Dr. Macpherson for his help, but I fear there is no answer to the plaintiff's claim. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed and that an order as asked for should have been made.

deceased partner the total, or alternatively three-fourths of sums advanced by her to the partnership, which she claimed as money lent by her to the partners or the partnership:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the action to recover money lent was misconceived. No action could lie against the partners individually since the liability of partners was joint; and money lent to a partnership of which the person advancing the money was a partner could be recovered only in proceedings for taking accounts in accordance with the provisions of the Partnership Act, 1890, s. 44.[1]

Richardson v. Bank of England (1838) 4 My. & Cr. 165 applied.

Decision of Oliver J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Oliver J.

On September 14, 1948, the plaintiff, Rachael Green, entered into partnership with the defendants, Sydney Hertzog and Sam Friedlander, and with one Maurice Glass, who died in January, 1951. The partnership deed provided: "On the termination of "the partnership by any means whatever the partners shall be "entitled to share in the assets of the partnership equally not-"withstanding that the amount of capital each shall have "contributed shall have been in different amounts." The capital was contributed in different amounts, the plaintiff bringing into the partnership on its formation a capital sum of £700.

Clause 3 of the partnership deed provided: "Should it at any "future time be found expedient or necessary for further moneys "to be provided by the partners for the purpose of carrying on "the partnership business any moneys so provided by the partners "shall be treated as a loan by the partner providing the same "and such loan money shall carry interest at the rate of . . . per "cent. per annum from the date of each loan respectively." At various dates in 1949 and 1950 the plaintiff provided other sums of money amounting in all to £2,350.

In March, 1953, the plaintiff brought an action against the defendants Hertzog and Friedlander and against Doris Glass as the personal representative of the deceased partner Glass, in which she claimed repayment of the balance of unsecured loans made by her to the defendants, namely, £2,350, less a repayment of £350 with which she credited them. She alleged that the sums in question had been loans to the first and second defendants and the deceased partner, or alternatively, were loans to the firm, and she claimed £2,000 money lent, or alternatively £1,500 money lent. By their defence, the defendants claimed that the sums alleged to be money lent were investments in the partnership; that on the death of Glass, the partnership had been wound up, the assets had been valued at £1,969, and that one-fourth of that sum had been paid to the widow of the deceased partner; that on February 24, 1951, a new partnership had been formed between the plaintiff and the first and second defendants which had failed in September, 1952, and that accountants had been instructed to wind it up and to pay the partnership debts, the balance of assets (if any) to be divided equally between the plaintiff and the first and second defendants.

Oliver J. held that the sums claimed by the plaintiff were not loans to the partners or the partnership, but capital investments; but he concluded that overriding all the matters of fact as to whether the sums advanced by the plaintiff were loans or not was the matter of law that the plaintiff could not succeed in an action for money lent to a partnership of which she was one of the partners, or against any individual in that partnership. He concluded his judgment by saying: "Whichever way one looks at it, "this action is bound to fail. . . . The present action is miscon- "ceived and the plaintiff must lose. . . ." The plaintiff appealed.

B. B. Stenham for the plaintiff.
A. Logan Petch for the first and second defendants.
G. H. Spafford for the third defendant.

Counsel for the plaintiff referred to Richardson v. Bank of England.[2]

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the nature of the claim, read the clauses of the partnership deed set out above, and continued: The partnership deed thus provided that if more money was found to be required for the partnership and one partner was willing to find some money, it was not to be treated as part of the original capital which would have to be shared irrespective of the amounts found by each partner, but was to be treated as a loan.

Mr. Stenham, with a courage which I somewhat envy, argued before us that a partner cannot lend money to a partnership of which he is a partner; but the case to which he called our attention—Richardson v. Bank of England[1]—seems to be exactly to the contrary. Although the words "creditor" and "debtor" are used, there are no creditors or debtors in the ordinary acceptance of those terms, because the liability of partners is joint. Therefore, if money is lent or advanced to a partnership of which the person advancing the money is a partner, he is advancing some of that money to himself, and the only way in which that money can be recovered is by taking the accounts of the partnership. The Partnership Act, 1890, by section 44 (2) [2] expressly provides for that.

Oliver J., who heard the case and dismissed it, did in his judgment say that he thought that these moneys were "investments." I do not quite know what that means. If he meant simply that the plaintiff was increasing her capital in the business, so that she would only be entitled on winding up to be treated, so far as the capital account is concerned, as if she had found only the original £700, I do not think I could agree with it. But the difficulty is that he dismissed the action finally by saying: "Whichever way one looks at this action it is miscon-"ceived."

In my judgment, too, it is a misconceived action. There is no common law claim here for money lent: it is a loan by one partner to the partnership; it is money lent to the partnership, and section 44 (2) of the Partnership Act, 1890, shows how that money is to be reclaimed and dealt with. There must be a taking of the accounts, and, if it be shown that there is enough money in the partnership accounts to repay the plaintiff the money that she has advanced, or some of it, after the creditors of the partnership have been paid, she will get that money in priority to the others.

Reliance was placed on clause 3 in the partnership deed, and the plaintiff brings this action for the full amount of the moneys which she says she lent to the defendants. But in circumstances like this, it was not a loan to the defendants personally in the sense that they were making themselves personally liable. It was a loan—money put into the partnership assets to be treated as an advance to the partnership irrespective of the capital. This ought to have been an action for taking the accounts. The plaintiff might have been able to show that she advanced this money, and she would then be entitled to receive such money as there was up to the amount of her share of the sums which she had advanced, in priority to the other partners. But, in my judgment, it is impossible to say that a common law action for money lent lies against the partners in this case, and therefore, though on rather different grounds from those which Oliver J. found, this court dismisses the appeal.

The judge said that whichever way one looked at the case the action was misconceived. With that I agree. We have not heard the other side, and, therefore, we are not saying whether the judge was right or not in the views which he expressed with regard to the loans, for whether these were loans or advances of capital this action will not lie. Of course, this court, in dismissing this action, cannot say anything which would bind a court hereafter, but, as at present advised, I am bound to say that I think that a different form of action may still be brought in which the accounts of this concern can be investigated and gone into. It would have to be brought in the proper division and on proper pleadings, asking for a proper order in a partnership action. By an agreement dated April 16, 1951, between the plaintiffs and the author of a literary work, the plaintiffs acquired the exclusive right to publish the work in "volume form." The serial rights were not included under this part of the agreement and were referred to elsewhere. The defendants published substantially the whole work in one issue of a weekly periodical with paper covers owned by them:—

Held, (1) that the defendants' periodical was a publication "in "volume form," which expression was used in the agreement to distinguish between publication as a whole and publication by instalments as a serial, so that the plaintiffs' rights had been infringed by the defendants;

(2) That on the true construction of the agreement the plaintiffs were partial assignees of the author's copyright, and were entitled by section 5 (2) of the Copyright Act, 1911, to sue the defendants without joining the author.

ACTION.

By an agreement dated April 16, 1951, made between the plaintiffs, Jonathan Cape Ld., of the first part, and Miss Anita Loos, of the other part, the plaintiffs acquired the right to publish a work by her entitled "A Mouse is Born." The material parts of the agreement provided: clause 1: "The author [Miss Anita "Loos] hereby agrees to grant to the publishers, [Jonathan Cape "Ld.] their successors and assigns, the exclusive right to print "and publish an original work, or any part or abridgment thereof, "provisionally entitled 'A Mouse is Born' in volume form during "the legal term of unrestricted copyright in the English language "throughout the British Commonwealth and Empire as con-"stituted at January 1, 1947, and all territories at that date "under mandate, also Egypt, but excluding the Dominion of "Canada, the rest of the world other than the United States of "America, its dependencies, the Philippine Islands and Canada "to be an open market." Clause 2 provided a warranty in regard to the nature of the work and there were provisions for royalties and the issue of cheaper editions.

The other relevant clauses were: clause 12: "Within the "territories covered by this agreement the publishers shall act "as the author's agents for the sale of the first serial rights (i.e. "publication of instalments in several issues of a newspaper, "magazine or periodical prior to publication in volume form) in "the said work. If they shall obtain any offer for the sale of such "rights they shall forthwith submit the same to the author for "approval and in the event of the author accepting any such "offer and entering into an agreement in writing for the sale or "licence of any such rights the publisher shall be entitled to a "commission . . . on the sums received by the author under such "agreement."

Clause 13: "Within the territories covered by this agreement, "all rights of serialization subsequent to publication in volume "form, all broadcasting, television or microphotographic repro-"duction rights, the right to license publication of extracts or "abridgments in other books or in periodicals and the right to "perform the said work or any substantial portion thereof by any "gramophone record or similar contrivance shall be controlled "jointly by the author and the publishers."

Clause 15: "The publishers shall have entire control of the "publication; and all details of the production including choice of "materials, design of jacket and other embellishments shall be at "their sole discretion."

Clause 17: "The publishers undertake that the name of the "author shall appear in its customary form with due prominence "on the title page and on the binding of every copy of the said "work issued by the publishers or their agents."

Clause 19: "If, in the opinion of the publishers, any extra "editorial work is necessary before the book is ready to be set up "in type, and if the author is unable to undertake this work or "arrange for it to be done, then the publishers shall be at liberty "to employ a competent editor to do the work. Any fee payable "to such an editor shall be paid by the author provided always "that the author shall approve the choice of such editor and the "amount of the fee in question."

Clause 21: "Should the publishers at any time by themselves "or anyone acting on their behalf wilfully fail to fulfil or comply "with any of the conditions accepted by them in this agreement "or should they go into liquidation, other than voluntary "liquidation or a members' winding up, this agreement shall "thereupon determine and the author be free to license any "other person to print and publish the said work, notwith-"standing anything to the contrary contained or implied in any "part of this agreement."

The defendants, Consolidated Press Ld., a company incorporated under the laws of the Commonwealth of Australia, published in the issue of July 2, 1952, of the "Australian "Women's Weekly," a periodical owned by them, substantially the whole of the work which was the subject of this agreement.

The plaintiffs claimed that the defendants' publication of the work was an infringement under the Copyright Act, 1911,[1] of the rights which they had acquired in the work under the agreement of 1951. They asked for a declaration that their rights had been infringed and an inquiry as to damages.

DANCKWERTS J., having stated the facts: The question in this action is whether the publication by the defendants in their paper or periodical is publication of the work "in volume form." I agree with the contention of Mr. Scarman that this refers to the material form of the work, which is referred to in section 1 (2) of the Copyright Act, 1911—"any substantial part thereof in any "material form"—but I do not think that that carries the matter much further.

I have been referred to definitions in dictionaries. In the Shorter Oxford Dictionary, under the word "volume," the material part is: "A collection of written or printed sheets bound "together so as to form a book." Then I was referred to "book" in the same dictionary, and under the word "book" is: "A collection of sheets of paper or other substance, blank, "written or printed, fastened together so as to form a material "whole."

It seems to me that, whether or not those definitions are to be regarded as of the highest materiality, the defendants' publication meets both the definition which I have read of a volume and that of a book. It is a number of sheets which are fastened together so that they form one volume. The whole work, except for certain abridgments, was published by the defendants in this way; and it is immaterial that it is not published in the form of an object with thick cardboard sides and back and merely has a paper cover; and it has in fact a paper cover containing the title, a fancy picture on the outside on which is the name of the book or volume "A Mouse is Born," and a description "As a complete novel beginning overleaf." The whole work is there in substance.

I think that the real point of the agreement of April 16, 1951, is that the distinction is made between the publication of the work as a whole, that, in my view, is what is meant by the word "volume," and the publication of the work by instalments, which is publication in a serial form and is treated in a separate way in the agreement. On that point of construction, therefore, I feel no doubt whatever that the defendants' publication is a publication of Miss Anita Loos' work in the form of a volume. It is very difficult to differentiate the publication merely because it is in rather a flimsy material form and of a size inconvenient to put on a book shelf. It is, after all, common knowledge that on the Continent many works are published as books with paper covers, and I cannot see that there is any difference between those paper covered books and this paper publication, except that of size and shape. It is, therefore, within the rights which were given by the description " in volume form " in the agreement of April 16, 1951, and an infringement of the rights conferred on the plaintiff company.

The other point on which it is necessary for me to reach a conclusion is whether the rights given to the plaintiff company by this agreement amount to a partial assignment of the copyright or some other transfer of rights which enables the plaintiff company to sue alone without joining the author of the work. Several possibilities have been put forward, and this depends, in essence, on subsections (2) and (3) of section 5 of the Copyright Act, 1911. Subsection (2), which was a new provision of the Act altering the former copyright law, provides that the owner of the copyright in any work may assign his rights either wholly or partially, and, of course, subject to territorial limitations; but the subsection also introduces another conception which is apparently of a new kind; he may grant any interest in the right by licence. It is argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that if either of those two things are the result of the agreement to which I have referred, that is sufficient to enable the plaintiff company to bring an action in their own right against the defendant company. It is argued, on the other hand, on behalf of the defendant company that this agreement of April 16, 1951, does no more than create a licence, which may be a defence to an action for infringement but does not give any right to the owner of the licence or grantee of the licence to sue an infringer of the rights of copyright in the work on his own motion.

Again, I feel no real doubt as to the proper construction of the agreement the question is primarily a matter of construction of the words contained in the agreement between the author and the plaintiff company. I have been referred to certain authorities in which the matter is to some extent discussed, but I do not get much assistance in reaching the proper construction of this agreement from those authorities. Reading the agreement in its ordinary and natural way, it is quite plain that there is transferred and assigned to the plaintiff company by the words " the " exclusive right to print and publish an original work, or any " part or abridgment thereof, provisionally entitled ' A Mouse is " ' Born ' in volume form " a part of the copyright conferred upon the author by the Copyright Act, 1911; and the plaintiff company is therefore clearly entitled to bring this action.

It is unnecessary for me to consider the other point, whether the grant of any interest in the copyright by licence is sufficient to confer a right to sue, and I propose to leave it where it was left by Lush J. in British Film Actors v. Glover.[1] I conceive that somewhat difficult questions are raised by subsection (2) of section 5, and it is undesirable that I should make observations which, in view of the conclusions which I have reached, would in this case be merely obiter dicta.

Accordingly, in my view, the plaintiffs' action succeeds.

Road Traffic—Careless driving—Summons, application for.

A police inspector applied to justices for the grant of a summons for driving without due care and attention contrary to section 12 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, but the chairman of the justices refused to issue the summons stating that he was only prepared to grant a summons for dangerous driving under section 11 of the Act. On an application for an order of mandamus:—

Held, that it was for the prosecution, not for the justices, to decide what, on the evidence before them, the appropriate charge should be and, therefore, mandamus should go directing the justices to issue a summons for the lesser charge.

Dictum of Devlin J. in In re Beresford (1952) 36 Cr.App.R. 1, 3, explained.

APPLICATION for order of mandamus.

On April 26, 1954, Edward Parker, an inspector of police, applied to the Nuneaton justices for a summons against one Frank Bostock for driving a motor-car without due care and attention on April 2, 1954, contrary to section 12 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The chairman of the justices informed the inspector that he was prepared to grant a summons for dangerous driving under section 11 of the Act, but that he would not, without further explanation, grant one under section 12. The inspector informed the chairman that it appeared to him most unlikely that a conviction for dangerous driving would be obtained, but the chairman said that, as a matter of principle, no summonses for careless driving would be issued by him unless he was satisfied that there could not possibly be a conviction for an offence under section 11.

In an affidavit the chairman gave as his reasons, inter alia, for refusing to grant the summons, that on several occasions the justices had felt that proceedings which had been brought for an offence under section 12 had merited a conviction under section 11; that his attention had been drawn to the remarks of Devlin J. in In re Beresford *; and that he felt that if there was any doubt whether an offence under section 11 or section 12 had been committed, an information should be laid under section 11.

Paul Wrightson for the prosecutor.

The justices did not appear and were not represented.

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts, and continued: The chairman of the justices in an affidavit referred to certain remarks made by Devlin J. in In re Beresford.[1] Devlin J. was there concerned with the question whether it was desirable to charge a defendant with manslaughter where death had taken place. He said[2]: " . . . speaking generally, when dangerous driving results " in death, there is likely to be, at any rate, a prima facie case " of manslaughter. The degrees of negligence that are appro- " priate to the two crimes cannot be precisely defined and this " makes the question ordinarily one to be determined by a jury. " The police can never be criticised if the jury thinks it right to " reduce the charge, nor even if the judge thinks it proper to " withdraw it from the jury, but they can be criticised if they " usurp the functions of the proper tribunal by determining in " advance what ought to be a triable issue. Similar considerations " apply to the two charges of dangerous driving and careless " driving. There are, I believe, too many cases where the justices " are prevented from dealing with dangerous driving as such " because the police have preferred the lesser charge."

I desire to point out that in that passage the judge was not giving directions, but was making a recommendation to the police as to the charges the police should make. That is one thing, but it is a different thing for the justices to say: " We are not going " to issue a summons for the lesser offence; you must take out a " summons for the more serious offence." It must be for the Director of Public Prosecutions or the police to decide what charges should be preferred. If it was found that the police were being unduly lenient in not preferring a charge of dangerous driving in cases where the evidence showed that there was dangerous driving, the justices would be quite right to call the attention of the chief constable of the county to it and, if necessary, the Home Office, but I do not think that the justices can have a right to say when a prosecutor comes before them and asks for leave to prefer a charge: " You must prefer the more serious charge," because that is, to a certain extent, prejudging a case. For these reasons, I think that an order of mandamus must go and that the justices must issue the summons for which the police ask.

LYNSKEY J. I agree. Devlin J., when he made his remarks in the Beresford case,[2] was dealing with the particular case before him, but my experience on circuit has been that those remarks have been to some degree misconstrued and misunderstood. I am sure that Devlin J. was not laying down, as I have found it was thought that he was laying down, that in every case where death occurs as the result of driving, there should be a charge of manslaughter; nor was he laying down that in every case where some driving takes place to which objection can be made that it must be dangerous driving.

The position, as I understand it, is this, that it must be left to the prosecution in the first instance to decide what, on the evidence before them, the charge amounts to. It would certainly, in my view, lead to a grave miscarriage of justice if one charged a man with an offence which the evidence before the police would not support. Take the cases of careless driving and dangerous driving; careless driving is one thing, generally dealt with by the justices, and very often, if it is ordinary careless driving, admitted by the defendant. If, on the same facts, he is charged with dangerous driving, one has the possibility and very often the probability of a trial by quarter sessions and a jury, with heavy expense, all on evidence which cannot be supported by the prosecution. It must not be thought that it is laid down that in every case where death occurs it should be manslaughter, or in every case where there is some defect it should be dangerous driving; it is a matter for the prosecution. On the other hand, the offence of dangerous driving or careless driving is a very serious one, and the police ought always, in my view, where the facts support it, to bring the more serious charge rather than the lighter charge; but they are not bound to bring the more serious charge where the evidence will not support that charge. I only add that, not by way of differing from Devlin J., but by way of attempting to explain what I think he meant by giving that decision.

PARKER J. I agree.

[1953 M. No. 2386.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Definition—Shop—Demised land and premises used for horticulturist's business—Premises as a whole used as a retail shop for the sale of horticultural products—Horticultural processes carried on in substantially the whole of the premises ancillary to main use—Whether premises an "agricultural "holding"—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 63), ss. 1, 3, 94.

Demised land and premises, in all about one-third of an acre, used by the tenant for the purposes of a horticulturist's business, consisted of a one-storey shop and glass conservatory where flowers and plants were displayed for sale with, behind, greenhouses and an area of cultivated stock garden used for raising plants, either grown on the premises or purchased elsewhere. Sixty-five per cent. of the turnover of the business came from the sale of cut flowers, pot plants, shrubs and wreaths, and one-sixth of that (equivalent to one-tenth of the total turnover) was in respect of plants and shrubs grown on the premises, the rest of the plants and shrubs being purchased elsewhere. The remainder of the turnover represented the purchase and sale of horticultural products such as seed potatoes, fertilizers and horticultural sundries. On the expiry of the lease the landlord claimed possession and the tenant contended that the premises were an agricultural holding within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and that, accordingly, he was entitled to the protection of section 3:—

Held (on a finding that although horticultural processes were carried on in substantially the whole of the premises, viewed as a matter of substance the premises as a whole were being used for the purpose of a retail shop for the sale of horticultural products, and that the raising, caring and culture of horticultural products on part of the land was merely ancillary to its main use) that in the case of a composite holding the test was not whether substantially all the land comprised in the tenancy was used in connexion with, though not mainly or primarily for, the purposes of those parts of the land which were purely agricultural, but that the Act applied only where the tenancy as a whole was in substance a tenancy of agricultural land, and that, therefore, since the demised land taken as a whole was in substance not land used for agriculture, it was not an agricultural holding within the Act.

ACTION.

By a lease made on September 28, 1942, the plaintiffs' predecessors in title let to the defendant premises and land known as Nos. 112 and 114 Station Road, Redhill, Surrey, for a term of 10 years from June 24, 1942. The premises had for some time been used by the defendant for the purposes of a horticultural business, and by clause 11 of the lease the defendant covenanted not to use them for any purposes other than that of a horticulturist without the previous consent in writing of the lessors.

1954

The defendant remained in possession of the premises after June 24, 1952, the date of the expiry of the term of years created by the lease, and the plaintiffs, alleging that the lease had expired by effluxion of time, brought proceedings claiming possession and mesne profits.

The defendant, relying upon the facts that by the terms of the lease the land and premises were let expressly for use for the purpose of a horticulturist, that he had throughout the term used and continued to use them for the business of horticulture, and that the land had upon it a substantial conservatory, planthouse and other horticultural buildings, claimed that the land and premises were an agricultural holding within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and that, accordingly, upon the expiry of the lease on June 24, 1952, he became a tenant of the holding pursuant to section 3 [1] of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, which tenancy had not been determined.

The following findings of facts as to the nature of the land and premises and their user are taken from the judgment of McNair J.: The demised land consisted of a rectangular plot of land with a frontage of 48 feet on to Station Road, Redhill, and with a depth of some 340 feet, comprising in all an area of about 16,500 square feet, or about one-third of an acre. Fronting on to Station Road, in the middle of a row of small retail shops, was a one-storey shop built on to the front of an old residence used as an office and for storage purposes and, in addition, a glass conservatory in which flowers and plants were displayed for sale. The shop and the conservatory presented an attractive shop front such as is commonly used by good class florists and seedsmen in the suburbs. Behind the conservatory was a wreath-making room and two heated greenhouses. Further back lay other store rooms, a garage and a stokehole, together with two more greenhouses, one derelict, a potting shed, and a number of cold frames and forcing sheds in a semi-derelict condition. Finally, at the rear of all the buildings, was an area of open ground described as a cultivated stock garden, which itself comprised about one-third in area of the whole of the demised land.

The defendant with his father before him had occupied the premises for many years for the purposes of his business, which,

(2) . . . the expression "'agricultural land' means land "used for agriculture which is so "used for the purposes of a trade or "business . . ."

S. 3: "(1) A tenancy of an agricul- "tural holding for a term of two "years or upwards shall, instead of "terminating on the expiration of the "term for which it was granted, "continue . . . as a tenancy from "year to year . . ."

in May, 1949, was described as the business of florists, seedsmen, horticultural sundriesmen and nurserymen. At the material date the business consisted in substance of the retail sale of horticultural products and horticultural sundries. Sixty-five per cent. of the turnover came from the sale of cut flowers, pot plants, shrubs and wreaths.

Some of the plants and shrubs purchased outside were grown on in the premises, either because they did not meet a ready sale as purchased or because as a matter of policy it was desired to bring them on from an immature condition until fit for sale; but a fair figure for the value of the growth or raising on the premises was about one-sixth of that 65 per cent. of the total turnover, which was equivalent to about one-tenth of the total turnover. The remainder of the turnover represented the purchase and sale of other horticultural products such as seed potatoes, fertilizers and horticultural sundries, including seeds packaged on the premises in the defendant's own containers after some testing on the premises.

The stores were for the most part used for the storage of the seed potatoes, fertilizers and horticultural sundries, though part were used on occasion for the packaging of seeds. The greenhouses were used both for the holding and growing of all plants purchased from outside and for the raising of seedlings and cuttings raised on the premises and the growing from bulbs of cut flowers for sale. The open ground at the rear was used according to the season for bulbs, chrysanthemum, gladioli and geranium, and for raising some potting-out plants and vegetable plants and for raising flowering shrubs purchased elsewhere.

Of the staff of about six men and women employed, one man worked a little over half time in the nursery, with occasional help from an odd job man and from the girls in the wreath-making department.

to determine the statutory tenancy from year to year. The sole question, accordingly, which I have to determine is whether or not on June 24, 1952, the land and premises comprised in the lease were or were not an agricultural holding within the meaning of that Act, and it is agreed that the onus of proving the affirmative lies on the defendant. [His Lordship made the findings of fact set out above, and continued:]

Although undoubtedly horticultural processes were carried on in substantially the whole of the premises, if the preparation for sale of products grown in the premises is included in the term "horticultural process," my conclusion, viewing the matter broadly as a matter of substance, is that the premises as a whole were at the material time being used for the purpose of a retail shop for the sale of horticultural products and that the raising, caring and culture of horticultural products on part of the land was merely ancillary to its main use.

I next have to consider whether on the facts so found the demised premises are in law an agricultural holding. The relevant provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, omitting immaterial words, are as follows. [His Lordship read section 1 (1) and (2), section 94 (1), and continued:] Unfettered by authority I should be disposed to hold that the inclusion of the word "aggregate" in the definition of "agricultural holding," in section 1 (1), necessarily involved that in the case of a tenancy which comprises both land, whether in one or more parcels, used for agricultural purposes and land not so used, the aggregate of the land used for agricultural purposes constituted an "agricul- "tural holding" and the remainder of the land was excluded.

Admittedly, this construction involves very serious difficulties in its application to further sections of the Act, in particular to section 3. It is clear, however, from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Howkins v. Jardine,[1] that this construction is not open to me, and that the definition referred to does not in the case of a composite or mixed holding work a severance into agricultural land and non-agricultural land. I consider, too, that the reasoning underlying this decision also leads to the conclusion that the Act applies only if the tenancy as a whole is in substance a tenancy of agricultural land: see per Somervell L.J.[2] and Jenkins L.J.[3] If this is the correct reading of the effect of this authority, then on my findings the defendant must fail.

Mr. Blundell, however, contends that the principle stated in Howkins v. Jardine[4] applies only to take agricultural land out of the protection of the Act if there is comprised in the holding some part which is not used for any agricultural purposes at all and that if, on the facts of any particular case, it is found that substantially all parts of the land comprised in the tenancy are used in connexion with, though not mainly or primarily for, the

[1] [1951] 1 K.B. 614.
[2] Ibid. 619.
[3] Ibid. 628.
[4] Ibid. 614.

purposes of those parts of the land which are purely agricultural, then the case falls within the protection of the Act. For this principle Mr. Blundell cites the decision in Dunn v. Fidoe.[5]

In my judgment, this decision cannot be regarded as laying down any such general principle. Tucker L.J. having reached the conclusion that the findings of the county court judge clearly indicated that he regarded the premises in which the tenant lived as a necessary part of the agricultural land, was content to hold that on the facts as found the tenancy as a whole was an agricultural holding. With this view of the facts the remaining members of the court agreed and refrained from expressing any view of the law. I treat the decision in Dunn's case[5] as strictly a decision on the very peculiar facts of that case.

If, however, contrary to my view, any statement of principle is to be deduced from Dunn's case[5] which is contrary to the principle stated in Howkins v. Jardine,[6] the distinction between the two cases is, in my opinion, too fine for practical application, and I feel bound to follow the later and considered judgment of the Court of Appeal in Howkins v. Jardine.[6] I accordingly hold that the land demised here in question, taken as a whole, was in substance not land used for agriculture. The result is, that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for possession and mesne profits.

damage by enemy action, wished to remove the licence to premises in another part of London. Consent was granted by the sub-committee of the City of London licensing planning committee and this was confirmed by the County of London licensing planning committee, subject to the condition that a written undertaking be given to the licensing justices that no intoxicating liquor would be sold for consumption off the premises and that only one bar would be provided during certain restricted hours for the general public. A written undertaking to this effect was lodged with the justices.

On application being made to the licensing justices in accordance with section 58 of the Licensing Act, 1953, the justices refused to grant a planning removal of the licence on the grounds that they had no jurisdiction to do so, since in their opinion the condition was one which the licensing planning committee could not impose on a full licence, and further that the undertaking, being of a permanent and continuous nature, was one which had not been, and could not be, complied with before application was made to the justices as required by section 58 (2) (c) of the Act. The applicants moved for an order of mandamus:—

Held, that in considering applications under section 58 of the Act the licensing justices cannot investigate the validity of conditions imposed by the Minister or the licensing planning committee, but only whether or not the conditions have been satisfied. As the applicants in giving a written undertaking had done all that was required of them the justices should have granted the removal, and accordingly an order of mandamus must go.

APPLICATION for order of mandamus.

The applicants were a director of a licensed catering company, Mecca Ld., and the general manager of one of their restaurants, the Dunster House Restaurant, Mark Lane, London, E.C.3. In January, 1943, other premises of the company, The Swan and Horseshoe, 32 Little Britain, London, E.C.1, for which the company held a full licence, were seriously damaged by enemy action and business there was discontinued. The licence was preserved by legislation passed during the war, and the company now wished to transfer the licence from the Swan and Horseshoe to Dunster House Restaurant.

On April 12, 1954, the applicants applied to the City of London licensing planning sub-committee who gave unconditional consent and submitted the proposal to the County of London licensing planning committee. On June 14, 1954, the licensing planning committee confirmed the proposal and gave its certificate of no objection, subject to the condition that the applicants should forthwith give an effective written undertaking to the licensing justices of the City of London (a) that they would not sell any intoxicating liquor under the licence for consumption off the premises, and (b) to provide only one public bar for use by the general public and to close the same during the evening permitted hours except during such times as the said restaurant was used for the purpose of organized functions to which admission would be by special arrangement. On July 6, 1954, the applicants lodged the required written undertaking at the offices of the clerk to the licensing justices and on July 14, 1954, applied to the justices for the removal of the licence in accordance with section 58 (2) of the Act.[1]

At the hearing the justices indicated that they were of the opinion that they had no jurisdiction to grant the removal as the condition imposed by the licensing planning committee involved an undertaking of a permanent nature and was, therefore, such as could not be and had not been complied with before the application to the justices as required by section 58 (2) (c) of the Act. There was an adjournment until September 15, 1954, to enable the justices to consult the licensing planning committee. At the resumed hearing the justices said that although the licensing planning committee considered themselves entitled to impose the condition they (the justices) did not agree and accordingly refused the application. If they had jurisdiction under section 58 (2) (c) they would have been satisfied as to the conditions imposed by section 58 (2) (a) and (b).

The applicants moved for an order of mandamus on the grounds that the applicants had complied with the condition imposed by the licensing planning committee by giving the written undertaking; that the question of whether or not the undertaking was of a permanent nature was irrelevant when investigating whether or not the applicants had complied with the condition; that in the premises the justices not only had jurisdiction to grant the order, but were obliged to do so.

REGINA
v.
CITY OF LONDON
LICENSING JUSTICES.
Ex parte
STEWART.

Lord
Goddard C.J.

"City pursuant to the provisions of section 58 of the Licensing "Act, 1953."

The matter arises in this way: the Licensing Act, 1953, Part II, provides for various matters in what are called war-damaged areas. Under legislation passed in the war licences of premises which were destroyed by enemy action were kept alive and then legislation had to be enacted as to what was to happen to those licences when rebuilding took place or before rebuilding took place so as to enable licences to be removed. In London, the matter has to go before two bodies. First, before a sub-committee of the licensing planning committee, and, if they recommend that one of these old licences can be removed to other premises, the matter goes to the licensing planning committee for confirmation.

In the present case the applicants held a full on-licence at The Swan and Horseshoe. They also owned a large restaurant in Mark Lane which had not a licence, so it was very natural that they should apply first of all to the sub-committee and then to the full planning committee to be allowed to remove the licence from the demolished Swan and Horseshoe to the Dunster House Restaurant. The sub-committee recommended the full planning committee to grant the removal without any conditions, but the planning committee have power to modify the proposals of the sub-committee under a provision in section 65 (3), which re-writes another subsection which applies to London, and the licensing planning committee approved the removal, but required the applicants to give a written undertaking to the licensing justices, "(a) to sell no intoxicating liquor under the licence for consump-"tion off the premises and (b) to provide only one bar for use "by the general public and to close the same during the evening "permitted licensing hours except during such times as the said "restaurant is used for the purpose of organized functions to "which admission shall be by special arrangement." When they were about to make their application to the licensing justices, the applicants gave a written undertaking to the justices. The justices, however, thought and were advised that the licensing planning committee had no power to insert that condition and, accordingly, refused to proceed with the hearing of the application because in their opinion these undertakings which the applicants were required to give were ultra vires and they had no power to grant the licence subject to that undertaking as it was an old licence which was free of any conditions or undertakings in the past.

[His Lordship read section 58 (2) and continued:] It may be that the justices or their advisers have not perhaps distinguished between the condition which was imposed by the licensing committee, which was that they should give a written undertaking, and the undertakings themselves. The justices have thought there was a difficulty about the particular undertakings. If there is, that must be dealt with if the matter arises as to a breach of undertaking, but it seems to me that the applicants have complied with the condition which was imposed, which was: "You, the applicants, shall give a written undertaking to the "justices that you will not do this, that or the other," and that they have done. Therefore, it seems to me with all respect to the justices, who obviously had a new point before them, and I dare say not an altogether easy one, that the applicants have complied with the condition imposed upon them and, therefore, by section 58 (2), the justices are bound to grant the licence. For these reasons I think the order must go.

LYNSKEY J. I agree. Under section 58 (2), which provides the powers of the licensing justices on an application for planning removal, the justices' jurisdiction is very limited. The effect of the subsection is to give them jurisdiction to inquire first, whether the premises are fit and convenient for the purposes of a licence; secondly, whether the applicant is a fit person and not disqualified, and thirdly, whether the conditions specified in the proposals have been complied with. It seems to me that all they have power to do is to look at the conditions imposed by either the Minister or the planning committee. If those conditions have in fact been complied with, the licensing justices have no power or discretion to refuse the grant of the planning removal and, in those circumstances, it seems to me that they are not entitled to investigate the question whether the conditions imposed by the planning committee are good or bad conditions. That will possibly be a matter for other persons at other times, but one would add that the powers given to the planning committee to make modifications and proposals are extremely wide and no limitation is applied to them. In those circumstances, it seems to me that the licensing justices had no option but to grant the planning removal, and they must now do so.

PARKER J. I agree with both the judgments which have just been delivered.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Insanity—Care and treatment—Absence from mental hospital for cure of fractured leg—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 1 (1) (d), (2) (a) (d).

A husband was admitted to a mental hospital pursuant to a reception order in 1925. In 1951 he was discharged "relieved" and immediately readmitted as a voluntary patient. As a result of a fractured leg it was necessary to send him from the mental to another hospital, where he stayed from January, 1953, to May, 1953, returning to the mental hospital when the leg was healed. The court was satisfied that he was incurably of unsound mind. On a petition for divorce:—

Held, that although the husband's name had remained on the books of the mental hospital, to which regular reports were made, the continuous care and treatment required by the statute had been broken while the fractured leg was being cured, and the petition must, accordingly, be dismissed.

PETITION by wife for divorce on the ground of insanity.

The parties were married in 1918 and there was one child born in 1924. On December 3, 1925, the husband was admitted to a mental hospital pursuant to a reception order dated November 28, 1925. He remainded under care and treatment until, in December, 1951, he was discharged "relieved" and readmitted as a voluntary patient on the same day. He remained at the hospital until he became an in-patient at the Southern Hospital, Dartford, on January 10, 1953, following a fracture of his leg. He returned to the mental hospital on May 11, 1953. Evidence was adduced that he went to the Southern Hospital with the approval of the medical superintendent for the purpose of attention to his leg, that arrangements were made for reports to the medical superintendent, that his name had been kept on the books of the mental hospital throughout, and that after his return to the mental hospital he had remainded there until his wife presented a petition for divorce on the ground that he was incurably of unsound mind.[1] The court was satisfied as to the insanity; but the question arose whether the husband could be said to have been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition in view of the period spent in the Southern Hospital.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. MR. COMMISSIONER GRAZEBROOK Q.C. stated the facts, referred to the requirement of section 1 (1) (d) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, and continued: It is quite clear that there can be no detention in the case of a voluntary patient. This is apparent from section 1 (1) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, which refers to a person "voluntarily submitting himself to "treatment," from section 1 (5) of that Act, which provides for a patient leaving on giving 72 hours' notice of such intention, and by section 2 (3), which provides for the discharge of a voluntary patient on the expiration of 28 days after he became incapable of expressing himself as willing or unwilling to continue to receive treatment. The reference to the patient giving notice of his intention to leave the hospital is a reference to a final departure by the patient from the hospital or institution. There are no provisions in the Act of 1930 for absences on leave or trial, or escapes of voluntary patients.

The Southern Hospital, Dartford, where the patient was sent for treatment to his fractured leg, is not an institution as defined by section 21 (1) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, and it has not been approved by the Minister of Health as "a hospital, "nursing home or place" for the purposes of section 1 (1) of the Act. Various authorities were cited to me in the course of the argument but I think that it is unnecessary for me to refer to those authorities because they seem to give no assistance in the determination of the question which arises in this case. The husband was not in a prescribed institution and was not and cannot be said to have been receiving treatment for mental illness while he was at the Southern Hospital, Dartford. That seems quite clear on the facts of the case. In those circumstances, the husband cannot, in my view, be said to have been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. The petition, therefore, fails and must be dismissed.

Petition dismissed.

* CHAPMAN v. CHAPMAN (BY HER GUARDIAN AD LITEM).

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Insanity—Care and treatment—Admission under an "urgency order"—Regrading as voluntary patient—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 11 (1)—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 1 (1) (d), (2) (a), (d).

A wife was admitted to a mental hospital under an urgency order made in compliance with section 11 (1) of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Within seven days she was regraded as a voluntary patient; and after she had remained in hospital under treatment for a period exceeding five years the husband presented a petition for divorce. The court was satisfied that she was incurably of unsound mind:—

Held, (1) that admission under an "urgency order" is "detention" within the meaning of section 1 (2) (a) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950;

(2) that as the treatment as a voluntary patient followed without any interval the previous detention, the necessary grounds for a decree of divorce under section 1 (1) (d) of that Act had been established.

PETITION by husband for divorce on ground of insanity.

The parties were married in 1922 and there were no children. In January, 1935, the husband went to California but the wife did not follow him as arranged, remaining in England. He returned to England in 1945 and on rejoining the wife he noticed a change in her mental condition. He was again in America between 1947 and April, 1951, and for two years of that period he was ill; on his return he learnt that the wife was in a mental hospital.

The wife had been admitted to a mental hospital on July 30, 1948. She was then suffering from arterio-sclerotic-dementia, and the court was satisfied that when the husband presented his petition for divorce in November, 1953, she was incurably of unsound mind.

The wife had been admitted on July 30, 1948, under an urgency order issued under section 11 of the Lunacy Act, 1890,[1] but on August 5, 1948, she was regraded as a voluntary patient under section 1 of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930. The court was satisfied that she had received treatment as a voluntary patient ever since. The question arose whether the reception and detention under section 11 of the Act of 1890

[1] Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 11 (1) [as amended by the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, ss. 17, 20, 22 (2) and Sched. IV]: "In cases of urgency "where it is expedient, either for the "welfare of a person alleged to be of "unsound mind, or for the public "safety, that the alleged person of "unsound mind should be forthwith "placed under care and treatment, he "may be received and detained in an "institution for persons of unsound "mind . . . upon an urgency order, "made (if possible) by the husband "or wife or by a relative of the "alleged person of unsound mind, "accompanied by one medical certi-"ficate."

amounted to "detention" within the meaning of section 1 (2) (a) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.[2]

Michael Talbot for the husband.

Stuart Horner for the Official Solicitor as guardian ad litem for the wife contended as alleged in the answer that the wife had never been "detained under any order or inquisition under the "Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890–1930."

The cases cited are referred to in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

MR. COMMISSIONER GRAZEBROOK Q.C. stated the facts, and continued: The matter which I have to determine is whether the detention under the urgency order dated July 30, 1948, is detention under an order within section 1 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. [The commissioner referred to section 11 (1) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and said that by section 341 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, a reception order was stated to include an urgency order. The commissioner continued:] An urgency order is clearly a temporary order, and by section 11 (6) of the Act of 1890 it can only remain in force for seven days. In the present case the urgency order was discharged by operation of law when it was about to expire (the wife having expressed her willingness to sign the form necessary for her admission as a voluntary patient) and she was immediately readmitted as a voluntary patient on the discharge of the urgency order. She has remained in the hospital ever since.

There appears to be no authority directly in point on the question which I have to determine. Certain cases were cited to me in the course of the argument. In Crutchfield v. Crutchfield,[1] Jones J. considered section 20 of the Act of 1890. That section is parallel with section 11, the section applicable in the present case; and it concerns the reception and detention of a pauper alleged to be of unsound mind. Jones J. held that the respondent had not been detained in a mental hospital or institution pursuant to an order or inquisition under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930.

CHAPMAN v. CHAPMAN.

Mr. Commr. Grazebrook Q.C.

I was also referred to Whitley v. Whitley.[2] That case also concerned section 20 of the Act of 1890, and Barnard J. held that the respondent had not been detained pursuant to an order or inquisition under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930. In the course of his judgment he did refer [3] to an urgency order as being an order under those Acts, but that reference was not necessary for the purposes of his decision and it is not binding on me in this case. Whitley v. Whitley [4] was taken to the Court of Appeal; but although the appeal was dismissed it was dismissed on the fact (as it turned out on further investigation at the instance of the Court of Appeal) that there had been no compliance with certain requisite provisions, and the ground upon which Barnard J. decided the case was not considered by the Court of Appeal.

I was also referred to Benson v. Benson.[5] That was a case under section 5 of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, concerning temporary treatment of certain persons for a period not exceeding six months. Lord Merriman P. held that an order made by the Board of Control under section 5 (13) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, extending the period of six months, was an order under section 3 (a) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, which at that time was the section equivalent to section 1 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.

Although Crutchfield v. Crutchfield [6] and Whitley v. Whitley [7] related to detention of a temporary nature or of short duration, the decisions were based on the fact that there was no detention under an order under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930. Section 1 (2) (a) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, refers to "any order . . . under the Lunacy and Mental "Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930"; and although, quite clearly, an urgency order is of a temporary nature and is of very short duration, it is, in fact, an order under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930. In those circumstances I am satisfied that the wife was detained under an order, and that the husband has proved his case in accordance with section 1 (d) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.

Road Traffic — Disqualification — Conditional discharge — Third party insurance—User of uninsured vehicle—No special reasons for not disqualifying—Conditional discharge inappropriate—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 35—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 58), ss. 7 (1), 12 (2).

Justices who convicted a driver of using an uninsured motor-vehicle on a road contrary to section 35 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, did not find that "special reasons" existed why they should not disqualify him from holding a licence, but they granted him a conditional discharge:—

Held, that the justices could not avoid the necessity of disqualifying by giving a conditional discharge unless there were "special "reasons" which justified them in so doing; and that, as no such special reasons existed, they were bound to order disqualification.

Dennis v. Tame, post, 1338, applied.

CASE STATED by Surrey justices sitting at Wallington.

An information was preferred under section 35 [1] of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, against the defendant, Robert Benewith, alleging that on January 25, 1954, he used a motor-vehicle on a road without there being in force in relation to the user of the vehicle such a policy of insurance or such a security in respect of third party risks as complied with the requirements of the Act.

The following facts were proved or admitted before the justices: At 11.25 a.m. on January 25, 1954, the defendant arrived at Wallington station driving a passenger in the car in question which was being used for private hire. At the request of the prosecutor, a police sergeant, the defendant was unable to produce a certificate of insurance covering the use of the car; moreover, at his home, a search only revealed a certificate relating to another car which he had previously sold and which, in any case, did not cover private hire work. Later the same day the defendant produced a cover note issued at 5 p.m. on that day which covered the car for private hire.

The defendant had been a cab driver and had recently decided to change over to private hire. He sold his previous car on January 14, 1954, and took over the car in question on Friday, January 15, 1954. He started working the car on Monday, January 18. He discovered that his own insurance company did not insure for private hire, and he approached a colleague, who gave him the name of the agent of another office. The defendant attempted but failed to contact the agent on the telephone before he (the defendant) started work on January 18, and similar attempts failed on January 19 and 20, but he left messages with the agent's wife. On January 22, the defendant approached his colleague who then attempted to find the agent both on January 22 and on the morning of January 25. Finally, the agent was found on the afternoon of that day. In the meantime the agent had tried to contact the defendant on January 22 and 23, but failed to do so. When he issued the cover note on the afternoon of January 25, the agent was unaware that the defendant had been stopped by the police earlier on that day.

The defendant submitted special reasons why he should not be disqualified from holding or obtaining a licence for 12 months pursuant to section 35 (2) of the Act. Alternatively, he asked that the justices should order an absolute or conditional discharge under section 7 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948.[2] The defendant gave evidence and called witnesses in support of his submission which was not challenged by the prosecutor.

The justices were not satisfied that the defendant had established special reasons why he should not be disqualified from holding or obtaining a licence pursuant to section 35 (2) of the Act of 1930, since the reasons shown by him were not special to his offence as laid down in Whittal v. Kirby[3] and other cases. They nevertheless took into account: (1) that the defendant (being confronted with the fact that his previous insurance company did not cover private hire risk) had made several attempts to get in touch with the insurance agent of a new company; (2) that men of the defendant's class were not very conversant with insurance practice and were used to doing their insurance business with local agents; and (3) that there was no question raised against the character of the defendant. Furthermore, they were satisfied both by the defendant's demeanour in the witness box and by the whole of the evidence that he did not deliberately or intentionally attempt to evade the law. They were consequently of the opinion that it was inexpedient to inflict any punishment and they accordingly discharged him conditionally for 12 months pursuant to section 7 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948.

The prosecutor appealed.

The following cases, not referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Quelch v. Collett[4]; Gardner v. James.[5]

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by justices for the county of Surrey before whom the defendant was charged with using an uninsured vehicle on the road; the justices convicted him but gave a conditional discharge. The effect of their decision was that by virtue of the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, no disqualification could follow. But, although the reasons given by the justices for their decision show that they applied their minds very carefully to the point at issue, the facts as found by them show that this was a bad case.

The defendant started working his private car hire business on January 18, 1954. He discovered that his own insurance company would not insure for private hire, and approached a colleague who told him the name of an agent of another office. He did not contact that agent until January 25, which was the day on which he was stopped by the police. Meanwhile, he had been driving the car uninsured for almost a week. That seems to the court a serious matter. If during that time he, while using the car, had met with an accident, there would have been no insurance company who would have been on risk.

Mr. Wrightson has called our attention to a case decided as recently as May, 1954, Dennis v. Tame,[1] in which this court held, after considering Taylor v. Saycell,[2] that justices can only use the machinery of conditional discharge to avoid a disqualification if there are circumstances in the case which would amount to special circumstances. If there are circumstances in the case which would amount to special circumstances, the court can use conditional discharge, which avoids the necessity of imposing any penalty and the requirement that the licence be endorsed. Conditional discharge concerns a matter of punishment and, therefore it is quite open to the court in a particular case to deem it inexpedient to give any punishment; and if there are special circumstances they need not give any punishment; they can give a conditional discharge, but they cannot avoid the necessity of disqualifying by giving a conditional discharge unless there are special circumstances which justify them in so doing. In this case there were no special circumstances found by the justices and the case must go back to them; but I do call attention to the fact that owing to what I think is an unfortunate oversight in the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the disqualification will have to date back to the conviction, and as the conviction was on March 10, 1954, more than six months have elapsed since then and, consequently, the defendant may apply for the disqualification to be removed.

CASE STATED by Bedfordshire justices.

Niall MacDermot for the prosecutor.
Paul Curtis-Bennett for the defendant.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by justices for the county of Bedford, before whom the defendant pleaded Guilty to unlawfully using an uninsured motor-car on a road. He is a leading aircraftsman in the Royal Air Force, and he drove out from the main gate of the Royal Air Force Station at Cardington onto the main road, when he was stopped by a policeman who asked him to show his insurance certificate, to which the defendant replied that he had not got one. He said that he was driving to a neighbouring town to see if he could get the car insured.

The justices, having been informed by an officer that the defendant had been dealt with by his commanding officer for a breach of discipline in driving an uninsured car on the road and given seven days' confinement to camp, thought fit to give him a conditional discharge. I can understand the view of the justices. They felt that they did not want to punish a man twice for the same offence. But the effect of giving a conditional discharge was that by reason of the provisions of section 12 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, they could not disqualify. [His Lordship read the subsection and continued:] It is not for us to consider whether or not Parliament had in mind in passing that section disqualifications imposed by the Road Traffic Act; it is enough to say that the words are wide enough to cover it. But this court has laid down on more than one occasion that the provisions with regard to conditional discharge must not be used to avoid disqualifying in cases where the Road Traffic Act, 1930, requires disqualification unless such special circumstances exist as would, apart from conditional discharge, justify the justices on conviction from refraining from disqualification. If there are special circumstances, and the justices for certain reasons think fit not to impose a penalty, they can grant a conditional discharge; but where there is no evidence of any special reasons which would justify them in refraining from imposing disqualification, they must disqualify because that is what the Road Traffic Act requires; and it is wrong to use the machinery of conditional discharge to avoid imposing that disqualification. The section regarding conditional discharge states that the court can grant a conditional discharge where, in their opinion, having regard to the circumstances, including the nature of the offence and the character of the offender, it is inexpedient to inflict punishment.

In the present case no doubt the justices considered that it was not one in which they should punish in the sense of imposing a penalty, because the man has been dealt with by his commanding officer. That would be a reason for imposing only a nominal penalty. But they must disqualify because Parliament has said that there is to be disqualification unless there are special reasons. There are no special reasons here. What the defendant did he did deliberately, and with knowledge that he was not insured, and the fact that he had been punished by his commanding officer was a matter which related to the offender and certainly did not relate to the offence. It was nothing to do with the offence at all. In the leading case of Whittall v. Kirby [1] it is laid down that the reasons must be special to the offence and not the offender, and if there is any doubt as to how far Taylor v. Saycell [2] goes, I should desire to make it perfectly clear that this is what the court understands: Neither the provisions relating to absolute nor conditional discharge are to be used to avoid disqualification unless the justices can see that there are circumstances which would amount to special reasons. If they amount to special reasons, and the justices for other reasons think that no penalty need be inflicted, conditional discharge is quite proper. Conditional discharge is not to be used in these motor-car cases unless there are special reasons which would justify the justices in refraining from disqualifying.

The case must, therefore, go back to the justices with directions that they must impose a penalty, which can be of nominal amount, and they must impose disqualification because no special reasons exist. But they may, if they see fit, and I hope they will, impose disqualification only from driving the particular class of motor-car to which this case relates, that is to say, a private motor-car; and that will leave the respondent free to drive service vehicles.

Revenue—Income tax.

By a deed of dissolution of a partnership the continuing partner covenanted with the retiring partner that he would "pay and "satisfy all debts and liabilities of the . . . partnership and . . . "at all times hereafter keep the retiring partner indemnified "against the said debts and liabilities." The trading profits of the partnership were assessed to income tax for the year during which the dissolution took effect and the retiring partner paid half the assessed tax. He then claimed that he was entitled to be indemnified by the continuing partner the amount which he had paid:—

Held, that the partners were jointly liable for the whole of the tax due (after deducting any reliefs to which they might individually be entitled) and, therefore, the liability was a partnership debt within the scope of the indemnity contained in the deed of dissolution.

City of London Income Tax Commissioners v. Gibbs [1942] A.C. 402; [1942] 1 All E.R. 415; 24 T.C. 221 applied.

APPEAL from Judge Gordon Clark sitting at Guildford County Court.

On February 26, 1951, Sidney Albert Stevens and John Britten, who were partners, made a deed dissolving the partnership on the terms there set out. The defendant Britten took over the whole of the partnership business with its goodwill from the plaintiff Stevens in consideration of a cash payment. By clause 4 of the deed Britten covenanted with Stevens to "pay "and satisfy all debts and liabilities of the said partnership and ". . . at all times hereafter keep the retiring partner indemnified "against the said debts and liabilities." The dissolution was expressed by the deed to have taken effect on December 10, 1950, and an assessment to income tax on the trading profits of the company was made in the partnership name in respect of the year ending April 4, 1951. The plaintiff paid half of the assessed amount (a sum of £37 9s. 6d.). He then claimed that by virtue of clause 4 of the deed of dissolution he was entitled to be indemnified by the defendant, but the defendant denied liability. The plaintiff brought proceedings, but the county court judge found that the demand by the collector of taxes for payment by the plaintiff of the assessed tax was not a liability or debt of the partnership firm and, accordingly, he found for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

L. B. Schapiro for the plaintiff.
Gershon Ellenbogen for the defendant.

In addition to the case referred to in the judgment the following was cited in argument: Conway v. Wingate.[1]

EVERSHED M.R. referred to the facts set out above, and continued: In respect of the year which ended on April 4, 1951, it appears that an assessment was made upon the firm for income tax. I say "it appears" because there was produced a receipt from the collector of taxes which shows on the face of it that the name of the person assessed was Stevens & Britten, which was the firm name under which these parties had carried on their partnership business. The receipt was for the sum of £37 9s. 6d., which was the share of the total assessment which the plaintiff appears to have paid and, I understand, that was in fact one half of the tax. Under the last heading on the receipt "Paid by cash" the collector wrote somewhat inappropriately, that the sum paid was "on account." The plaintiff, having paid that sum of tax, claimed that, by virtue of clause 4 of the deed of dissolution, he was entitled to be indemnified by the continuing partner, the defendant. The defendant denied liability under the covenant and this action was brought.

I have stated already that the assessment was in respect of the year 1950/1951. I observe (and this is not said with the intention of being critical of anybody) that the payment was made in fact in March, 1954. We have been referred to sections of the Income Tax Act, 1952. Whether the provisions of that Act would be applicable in strictness to all the various problems which might arise when the tax was assessed and eventually paid does not matter, because it appears from what we have been told that section 144 of the Act of 1952 is a re-enactment of what previously was rule 10 of the rules applicable to Cases I and II of Schedule D to the Act of 1918, so that, if the case is not strictly within section 144 of the Act of 1952 it would fall within rule 10 of that schedule to the earlier Act. It seems plain from section 144 that where persons are carrying on business in partnership, it is an obligation of "the precedent acting partner" to make a return of the income tax for which the firm is chargeable in respect of the firm's profits: "Where a trade or profession is carried on by "two or more persons jointly, the tax in respect thereof shall be "computed and stated jointly and in one sum, and shall be "separate and distinct from any other tax chargeable on those "persons or any of them, and a joint assessment shall be made "in the partnership name." From that it seems to follow as the night the day that when the precedent partner has fulfilled his obligation of making his return an assessment is made in the name of the partnership firm, which is a joint assessment for the tax chargeable in respect of the trading profits. By what is now section 223 of the Act of 1952, the partners in a firm may, if they so desire, for the purpose of their partnership assessment, claim any reliefs to which they are entitled under any other parts of the income tax legislation in so far as those reliefs have not been already allowed to them under what I will call their private or individual assessments; and if that be done the result is to reduce by the amount for which the partnership is chargeable the total of the reliefs of all the partners. I have used the word "partnership" because that is the word which is to be found in section 144, but it is axiomatic that, generally speaking, a partnership in English law is merely a compendious description of the individual persons who compose the firm.

In City of London Income Tax Commissioners v. Gibbs[1] the significance of the use of the word "partnership" in the then Income Tax Act was discussed. As Lord Macmillan observed[2]: "Justification is thus not wanting for the view" which Romer L.J. had expressed in an earlier case, "that for taxing purposes "'a partnership firm is treated as an entity distinct from the "'persons who constitute the firm.'" But when it comes to liability, in the sense of liability at law for payment of the tax and for the penalties in the case of non-payment, it seems clear that the individuals are themselves liable for the "partnership" tax. It seems equally clear that their liability is joint, though not, be it observed, joint and several.

I think the legal position which I have tried to state by reference to the sections of the Act of 1952 is correctly set out in Simon's Income Tax, 2nd ed., vol. I, at p. 337: "The tax "assessed in the firm name is a partnership debt for which all "who were partners at the time when the debt was incurred, or "who have held themselves out to the Revenue to be such, are "jointly liable. This means that any or all of those persons may "be sued for the whole of the tax due (when the assessment "becomes final) without reference to their respective shares under "the partnership agreement." At p. 338 the effect of section 223 in regard to reliefs is stated, and that statement is in accord with what I have already said upon that section.

It appears that the collector of taxes, as I dare say had been the practice, looked to each partner for half of the sum comprised in the partnership assessment, and the receipt indicates that the plaintiff paid one half of the assessed amount, and I assume the defendant paid the other half. But in law both partners were jointly liable for the whole sum, and if the plaintiff had failed to pay this sum of £37 9s. 6d. the collector of taxes could have demanded and recovered from the defendant, or if the case had been the other way round and the defendant had failed to pay his share, the plaintiff could have been made to pay. In those circumstances, the question is whether this sum which the plaintiff paid was within the ambit of clause 4 of the deed. I find it impossible to come to any other conclusion than that it was, for the amount due to the Crown for income tax was, as I have already stated, a liability of the two partners jointly, and as such it was a partnership debt in the ordinary usage of words. It seems to me, therefore, to follow that the phrase "all debts "and liabilities of the said partnership" must comprehend a debt of this kind for which both partners were liable and which, let it be added, was a debt which owed its existence wholly and exclusively to the trading operations of the two partners without regard to what their private resources might have been.

The county court judge took another view. In the brief note of the judgment he said that in his view the argument that this was a partnership debt was not sustainable. He said: "I do "not think it is a partnership debt in that sense of the word," referring to the passage in Simon on Income Tax which I have already read. He then referred to a passage in Gibbs' case [3] and continued: "Lord Simon went on: 'by rule 10, when a trade is "'carried on by two or more persons jointly . . . a joint assess-"'ment shall be made in the partnership name' . . . I agree "with Mr. Dunlop that this is a matter of machinery, for the "purposes of assessment only." With all respect to the judge, I am unable to agree with that conclusion. In a sense, I suppose, it may be said to be a matter of machinery, but when considering the impost of taxes the distinction between machinery and liability is not always substantial. The question is, who was liable for this tax? And the tax being a tax due in respect of trading profits and nothing else, it seems to me, not only as a matter of machinery but as a matter of substance, that this was a partnership liability.

I, therefore, have come to the conclusion that this appeal ought to be allowed. Whether the effect will be to reopen the accounts between the retiring and continuing partner I do not know. I can understand the point of view of the respondent who on this view is paying the whole tax, though it may be the profits have been shared on a different assumption. Whether, therefore, he can recover anything back I need not say, but I should observe that clause 2 [4] may be a difficulty in his way. I am, however,

[3] [1942] A.C. 402.

[4] Clause 2: "The retiring part-"ner hereby releases the continuing "partner and the continuing partner "hereby releases the retiring partner "from all actions claims and demands "in relation to the said partnership "and from all the covenants clauses "and agreements matters and things "in the said partnership deed con-"tained."

satisfied that it is impossible, whatever may have been in the mind of the defendant, to read clause 4 so as not to include an indemnity for this sum. I think it could be only done by reading into the clause the words "other than income tax," and it need not be said that, according to ordinary principles of construction, only the most cogent and powerful reasons to be derived from an examination of other parts of the deed and the surrounding circumstances could possibly justify such an insertion into the written terms of the document. I think there is no basis which would justify such a reading in to the plain language. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the judgment below was wrong and that the plaintiff should have obtained judgment for £37 9s. 6d.

HODSON L.J., after stating the facts. The only question for consideration was whether the words "debts and liabilities" include this sum of income tax payable by the partnership. I think that sum was clearly a debt due to the Crown, and was none the less a debt because the actual amount of tax for which the partners might personally be liable varies with the circumstances of each partner. To my mind, it seems that there is no escape from that position and, accordingly, the plaintiff ought to have judgment for the sum claimed.

ROMER L.J. I agree. It seems to me that as a general proposition it is impossible to deny that a sum due for tax, pursuant to an assessment made on a partnership under what is now section 144 (1) of the Act of 1952, constitutes a debt or liability of the partnership in whose name the assessment is made; because each partner is liable to pay the whole just as much as each partner is liable to pay the whole of any sum due for rates or any other debt which has been incurred in carrying on the business of the partnership. Indeed, Mr. Ellenbogen himself was somewhat impressed, as the discussion proceeded, with that view, and attempted to take the point that as a matter of construction of the dissolution agreement one could read the phrase "all debts "and liabilities of the partnership" as being confined to ordinary trading debts and liabilities, or, at all events, such debts and liabilities as do not depend in any way in their ultimate evaluation on any personal characteristic or qualification of an individual partner. But that is taking liberties with the terms of the document which no canon of construction that I have heard of can justify. Where one finds language which is plain and unequivocal, as in my opinion clause 4 is plain and unequivocal, in relation to the debts and liabilities of the partnership, no court has any right to inject into the language used something which is not there merely because one of the partners against whom the clause according to its ordinary language operates thinks it operates harshly and unfairly. Whether it does so operate I express no opinion because I do not know what the facts were as between the parties themselves. I, accordingly, agree with my brethren that this appeal must be allowed.

Court of Appeal—County court—Appeal from—New point—Action to enforce promissory note — Plantiffs' claim in county court based on allegation that they were holders in due course — Action dismissed—Basis of plaintiffs' claim on appeal changed—New point of law not open to plaintiffs—Legal aid.

Hire-Purchase—Void provision—Agreement incorporating promissory note—Validity of promissory note—Hire-Purchase Act, 1938 (1 & 2 Geo. 6, c. 53), ss. 4, 5 (c).

By a hire-purchase agreement dated July 18, 1952, the defendant agreed to purchase an ice cream conservator for £87. The agreement provided, in pursuance of section 4 of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, that the hirer might put an end to the agreement subject, in effect, to payment of half the instalments, and, further, that the hirer should give to the owner a promissory note as collateral security for due payment of the instalments. The promissory note, which was executed by the defendant, was at the foot of the agreement and was separated from it by perforations. The plaintiffs, a company whose business included that of financing hire-purchase contracts, having paid the purchase price to the owners had acquired from the owners the benefit of the hire-purchase agreement. The defendant failed to pay the last four instalments under the hire-purchase agreement and the plaintiffs sued on the promissory note, claiming as holders in due course.

The defendant in his defence claimed that the promissory note was rendered void by section 5 (c) of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938. At the hearing before the county court judge the plaintiffs' claim was argued on the footing that they were holders in due course of the promissory note and, therefore, entitled to sue upon it whatever its earlier history, and that it was a wholly separate instrument from the hire-purchase agreement and unaffected by any invalidity which might attach to any provisions of that agreement. The defence was that the promissory note and the agreement were one single agreement and its effect was to enable the note to be sued on even though the defendant had terminated the hiring. The county court judge dismissed the action.

On the appeal the plaintiffs did not claim to be holders in due course or that the promissory note was an instrument distinct from the hire-purchase agreement, but contended that a written agreement which modified the liability of the maker of a promissory note was good as between the original parties, and the plaintiffs could sue upon it, their right being limited by the conditions in the agreement. The defendants objected that this was a new point and not available to the plaintiffs:—

Held, that what amounted to a new point of law was a matter of common sense to be considered in the light of all the circumstances of a particular case. In the present case, although the general issue of the validity of the hire-purchase agreement and whether any invalidity affected the right of the holder of the promissory note to sue upon it had been raised by the pleadings, the new way of putting the plaintiffs' case was entirely at variance with the earlier submission that it was quite separate from the agreement, and amounted to a new point of law. An appellant from a county court could not be allowed, unless the other party consented, to raise a new point of law not raised below. The plaintiffs could not rely on the new contention which they had raised and the appeal must be dismissed. That the defendant was legally aided on appeal was entirely irrelevant.

Smith v. Baker & Sons [1891] A.C. 325; 7 T.L.R. 679 applied.

APPEAL from a decision of Judge Block sitting in the Mayor's and City of London Court.

The plaintiffs, United Dominion Trust Ld., appealed from a decision of Judge Block dismissing their claim to recover the sum of £12 17s. 4d. upon a promissory note dated July 18, 1952, made by the defendant Marcel Bycroft and indorsed to the plaintiffs for value.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Evershed M.R.

Maurice Lyell Q.C. and John Rankin for the plaintiffs.

Christopher Shawcross Q.C. and Maurice Share for the defendant.

Reference was made in argument to Byles on Bills, 20th ed., pp. 106, 107; Bowerbank v. Monteiro [1]; Modern Light Cars Ld. v. Seals [2]; Maillard v. Page [3]; McManus v. Bark. [4]

EVERSHED M.R. This was an action on a promissory note to recover the sum of £12 17s. 4d. The plaintiffs are a long established company whose business includes that of financing hire-purchase contracts; that is to say, in a case in which, like the present, a hirer contracts with an owner to pay the hire-purchase price by a series of instalments, the plaintiff company pays the full hire-purchase price to the owner, subject to an appropriate discount, and then acquires from the owner the benefit of the obligations of the hirer under the hire-purchase contract. The owner in the present case is a firm known as Munday (Walthamstow) Ld., and the article which was the subject of the hire-purchase contract was known as an Elwood ice cream conservator, a title which perhaps sufficiently describes its nature. The hire-purchase price was £87. The story of the defendant's entry into this transaction is, from his point of view, a somewhat melancholy one.

The defendant paid all but four of the instalments, £12 17s. 4d. representing the last four instalments together with a sum of 4s. for interest. Having paid 14 instalments, it appears that the ice cream conservator, which was in the physical possession of one Stebbings, had disappeared. The suggestion is that it had been irregularly parted with or stolen. The defendant not unnaturally thereupon refrained from making any further payments under the hire-purchase contract, and the result was that the present action was brought against him.

The hire-purchase agreement was dated July 18, 1952, and was made between Munday (Walthamstow) Ld. and the defendant. In pursuance, or purported pursuance, of the terms of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, the agreement contains the following further provisions. Under the heading "Notice" there is a provision that the hirer "may put an end to this agreement by "giving notice of termination in writing . . . He must then pay "any instalments which are in arrear at the time when he gives "notice. If when he has paid those instalments the total amount "which he has paid under the agreement is less than £43 10s."—viz., half the total of the purchase price—"he must also pay "enough to make up that sum." Then on the back of the document is a number of conditions of which the first is significant: "1. The hiring shall be deemed to commence on "the date of this agreement and unless determined by the hirer "or the owner as herein provided shall continue for the period "of hire set out in the schedule. The hirer shall, upon the "making of this agreement, pay the initial instalment and shall "punctually pay the several instalments of the balance of hire "as set out in the schedule. The hirer shall pay interest at the "rate of 6 per cent. per annum on all overdue instalments until "payment thereof. The hirer shall simultaneously with the "making of this agreement make and give to the owner a "promissory note as collateral security only for the due payment "of such instalments (other than the initial instalment) and not "as payment thereof." The promissory note referred to appears at the foot of the agreement and is separated from the body of the agreement by a perforation. It is plain that it was intended to be detached and was in fact detached. The terms of the promissory note are: "For value received I promise to pay to "the order of"—then the owner's name is set out—"the sum "of"—and then the figure is the hire-purchase price less the first instalment—"payable in 18 consecutive monthly instalments"—the dates of which are given. "Payable at the office of" the plaintiffs; and it is signed by the hirer. The promissory note bears a serial number which corresponds to the serial number on the hire-purchase agreement.

Section 4 of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, gives to the hirer the right at any time before the final payment to determine the agreement by notice, when his liability is limited to what has accrued due before the termination or to one half the purchase price, less anything paid, whichever is the greater. That provision is reflected in the terms of the agreement. Section 5 provides: "Any provision in any agreement—. . . (c) whereby a "hirer, after the determination of the hire-purchase agreement ". . . in any manner whatsoever, is subject to any liability which "exceeds the liability to which he would have been subject if "the agreement had been determined" in accordance with the provisions of section 4 "shall be void."

The plaintiffs sued upon the promissory note, which had been detached and which had come into their possession in the way that was obviously contemplated. Their claim, when they issued their writ, was as holders in due course of the promissory note. To that claim the defendant had first put in a defence in a somewhat general and untechnical form and, when the case first came before the judge, on May 11, 1954, counsel for the defendant indicated in plain terms that one of the main points for which he was going to contend was that this promissory note was affected to the detriment of the plaintiffs by the invalidity of the agreement or a provision of it by reference to section 5 (c). That point had not been really raised in the informal defence. Therefore, the case was adjourned to permit an amendment of the pleadings.

The defendant thereupon put in a formal and elaborate defence. It contained, among other provisions, the following: "The plaintiffs at the time of the negotiation of the said promis-"sory note, if any, which is denied, had notice of a defect in the "title of the person who negotiated the said promissory note "in that the said promissory note was drawn pursuant to "condition 1 of a hire-purchase agreement to which it was "attached. The said hire-purchase agreement was within the "protection of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938 . . . The issue "and/or subsequent negotiation on the said promissory note was "affected by illegality, the said condition 1 being illegal and "void by reason of the section 5 (c) of the Hire-Purchase Act, "1938, and/or the plaintiffs were at all material times aware of "the existence of the said condition and that the said promissory "note was drawn pursuant thereto." Later, the defence states: "In the further alternative the said promissory note is an agree-"ment which is rendered void by section 5 (c) of the Hire-"Purchase Act, 1938." I take that merely to be an allegation that the promissory note is void, as a separate agreement, whereas the earlier paragraph merely stated that condition 1 was void. To that defence a formal traverse by way of reply was put in.

In such condition the case came on for trial a fortnight after the first hearing. The course that the trial took emerges plainly enough from the full and careful judgment of the judge. I think it manifest that at the trial the plaintiffs founded themselves from first to last on the propositions either that they were holders in due course of this promissory note and, therefore, entitled to sue upon it, whatever had been its earlier history; or that, at least, it was a wholly separate instrument from the hire-purchase agreement itself and was, in any event, therefore, unaffected by any invalidity which might attach to any provision of that agreement.

On the other hand, Mr. Share, for the defendant, insisted that the agreement and the promissory note were one single agreement, and he founded his argument for invalidity upon the proposition that the effect of condition 1 was to enable the promissory note, which was but part of the agreement, to get into the hands of somebody who could sue for it even though the defendant had terminated the hiring.

That view of the course of the trial is made plain by these passages in the judgment. The judge said: "In the event, can "it be said that in this complete document any provision which "makes the hirer liable to pay more than he would otherwise "have had to pay under the Act make it void? In my view it "can, because it is not disputed that, in the hands of an "unscrupulous finance company, Bycroft could, after the pay-"ment of, shall we say, one instalment, have returned the "machine and, under the Act, would then become liable to pay "half of the purchase price, which would be £43 10s. If an "unscrupulous finance company, being holders in due course, "could enforce the payment of the full amount under the pro-"missory note, that clearly in my view would make the agreement "void." The judge then referred to the wording of the Act and said that, in his view, the hirer became, as a result of the condition, liable to pay more than he otherwise would have to pay, and accordingly that the provision in the agreement was void.

Before that passage in the judgment the judge had read the pleadings. He had read without any comment the two passages to which I have referred in the defence, and he had then said: "It was argued by Mr. Share that this agreement should be "regarded as one agreement, that is to say, the document headed "'Hire-Purchase Agreement' and the detachable promissory "note at the bottom referred to in condition 1 of the hire-"purchase agreement; and, in my view, that submission is "correct." Later the judge said: "If I am wrong in regarding "the document as a whole as an agreement, and Mr. Rankin "[counsel for the plaintiffs] is right that the promissory note "should be treated as a separate agreement, then, in my view, "the wording of section 5 is wide enough to include this promis-"sory note as a separate agreement." I am not quite sure, with all respect to the judge, that I entirely follow his argument, but thus, brevi manu, he disposed of Mr. Rankin's submission, having already held that the premise upon which it was founded was incorrect.

In this court Mr. Lyell, in opening the appeal, put his case quite plainly in an entirely different way. He no longer claimed that his clients were holders in due course; nor did he claim that the promissory note was an instrument wholly distinct from the hire-purchase agreement and unaffected by any disabilities which might attach to the hire-purchase agreement. Indeed, he accepted in limine the proposition that in the hands at any rate of the plaintiffs, who had negotiated it from the owners, the promissory note was necessarily affected by any disqualification which might affect the right of the owner to sue upon the hire-purchase agreement itself. Mr. Lyell quoted from Byles on Bills, 20th ed., pp. 106, 107: "A written agreement on a distinct "paper, to renew, or in other respects to qualify, the liability "of the maker or acceptor, is good as between the original "parties." In support of that general principle Mr. Lyell referred us to Bowerbank v. Monteiro,[1] and to certain other cases designed to show that the right of the plaintiffs, as holders of the promissory note, to sue upon it, was limited by the conditions in the agreement to which the promissory note had originally been attached, the two being to that extent dependent one upon the other.

That submission is completely at variance with Mr. Rankin's earlier submission that the promissory note was quite separate from and unaffected by the agreement itself, and also it involved a negation of that which, according to the judge, had been conceded, namely, that in the hands of an unscrupulous finance company the defendant could have been sued after termination of the agreement; for, however unscrupulous the finance company (I am not suggesting that the plaintiffs are unscrupulous), their unscrupulousness would have availed them nothing, according to the present argument, since they would, in the supposed circumstances, have been necessarily disabled by the fact that the owners under the hire-purchase agreement could not themselves sue.

When that point had been put and argued with skill and persuasiveness by Mr. Lyell, Mr. Shawcross for the defendant replied that this was, to use his own language, a turning of the plaintiffs' case inside out. He raised the question that this was really a new point which, not having been taken in the court below, according to well-known principles, must be treated as not available to an appellant from a county court judgment in this court.

I agree, of course, that the general issue of the validity of the agreement and whether any invalidity affected the right of the holder of the promissory note to sue upon it has been raised by the amended pleading, but I have myself come to the conclusion that, although within the scope of the general issue, this was such a new way of putting the plaintiffs' case as to amount to a new point within the meaning of that formula, as it has been used and applied in these courts ever since Smith v. Baker & Sons,[2] in 1891. I make no attempt to define "a new point" for this purpose or to declare what are its characteristics. I think it is perhaps a matter in the end of common sense in the light of all the circumstances of a particular case, but in the present case I am satisfied that this way of putting the case is a new point of law. I rest my conclusion perhaps most strongly upon this consideration, that the judgment, extracts from which I have read, seems to me to be in no way whatever related to it; indeed, it seems to me to have proceeded upon a basis which was absolutely inconsistent with the way in which Mr. Lyell now puts his case.

As a matter of principle, the Court of Appeal has always been strict in applying the rule that an appellant from a county court, unless the other party consents, cannot be allowed in this court to raise a new point of law not raised below. After all, the county court is intended to serve litigants of relatively small means, and it is not in accordance with the public interest that a party, who has fought a case in a county court and been defeated, should then come to this court and raise in this court a new point, and put his case in an entirely different way as a matter of law and so make the other party, hitherto successful, litigate the matter again at the risk of having to pay the costs not only below but in this court.

I am aware that the defendant is legally aided, but that I hold to be an entirely irrelevant consideration. The scheme of the Legal Aid Act is to put the litigant, who is not affluent, in the same position as that of what is sometimes known as a Dives litigant; nor does it affect the case, as I think, that the issue now raised is one of importance to the plaintiffs. The Legal Aid Act was devised to assist those whom it finances in the course of litigation and not indirectly to assist other parties, or even the general public, in determining points of interest. I therefore do not further develop this matter except to say, if analogy is of any use, that one can well conceive that where, on a given set of facts, the question is whether a person is liable to account to another as a trustee and that is the general issue, within the scope of that general issue, the case might be put in many ways, and it would not be difficult to imagine the putting of a case in an appellate court in so different a way as to amount quite plainly to a new point of law.

I add one further point. As Mr. Shawcross observed by reference to Smith v. Baker & Sons,[2] one consideration which has moved the courts in applying this rule is that if the point taken in the appellate court had been earlier taken, evidence might have been obtained to meet it. Stebbings, from whose possession the conservator has apparently disappeared, has become insolvent and such also has been the fate of Munday (Walthamstow) Ld.; but, had the present point been clearly put on the face of the pleading below as it was argued here, it might well have been the duty of those advising the defendant to see if they could not establish some relationship between Stebbings and Munday (Walthamstow) Ld., which would have disabled the latter from suing and which on this argument would also have disqualified the plaintiffs.

[2] [1891] A.C. 325; 7 T.L.R. 679.

UNITED DOMINIONS TRUST LD. v. BYCROFT.

Evershed M.R.

Having stated my conclusion on that matter, it is unnecessary to consider the other points raised in this case and, indeed, it would not be right for me to go into them, since all that I said would in the circumstances be obiter. I have made clear, in fairness to the judge, that the language of the judgment which I have read was directed to the plaintiffs' case as it was then put, and does not bear at all upon the case as it was put here. It cannot, in my judgment, be fairly treated as expressing an opinion upon the matter as it has been argued before us. Indeed, I doubt whether, if the case has been put as Mr. Lyell has put it, the judge would have decided the case in the way he did, or at least would have used the language which I have quoted.

There may be other grounds available under the Act for successfully impeaching the validity of the condition and thereby disqualifying the plaintiffs. On that I express no view. I observe that Mr. Shawcross did intimate that there was a point about interest and also other points; but, as this matter was debated, it may be perhaps convenient if I say that I do not, as at present advised, accept the argument of Mr. Shawcross that, if as a result of something done, not as the agreement contemplated and in pursuance of its terms but in complete disregard of its terms and in breach of them, in effect, in fraud of the hirer, with the result that the promissory note should get, if it could get, into the hands of an innocent third party to whose suit the hirer would have no answer, there is infringement of section 5 (c). It would not appear to me, on those facts alone, that an infringement of the terms of section 5 (c) is shown, for such a result would involve reading the words in the paragraph "is subject to" as "may become subject to." I refer again to the language; it is "any provision in any agreement whereby a hirer after "determination of the agreement in any manner whatosever is "subject to a liability exceeding the liability he would have been "subject to on" determination in accordance with section 4. On the facts that I have supposed, the dealings would have been in complete disregard of the condition, which in terms states that the promissory note is to be collateral only to the main obligation; and if, therefore, in breach of that condition transactions took place as a result of which a party appeared who could say that he was the holder in due course without any notice of the hire-purchase agreement, then the liability, which might impose itself upon that hirer, would not be a liability under the agreement or one to which he had been made subject or was subject by virtue of any provision of the agreement.

In the view I take, applying what I believe to be the proper and salutary rule in these courts, I think it is too late now for the plaintiffs to put their case upon a basis quite inconsistent with that upon which hitherto they had fought it. I think, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Bankruptcy—County court—Transfer of proceedings to High Court—Application of petitioning creditor for transfer—Object of application to secure benefit of legal aid—Effect of legal aid certificate in favour of person not entitled to sue—Discretion of court—Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, r. 21.
Legal Aid.

In bankruptcy proceedings in a county court the petitioning creditor desired the trustee to take proceedings against the debtor and another person to set aside certain transfers made by the debtor. The trustee was unwilling to do so unless he received a proper indemnity against the costs which he would incur and, if unsuccessful, have to pay.

The petitioning creditor who was unable to give such an indemnity and wished to have the proceedings transferred to the High Court so that she could have the benefit of legal aid, obtained a certificate entitling her to legal aid "to take proceedings in the "High Court of Justice, Bankruptcy Court, for (a) application to "the court for leave to bring proceedings in the name of the trustee "in bankruptcy to avoid settlements made by the bankrupt, and "(b) to take such proceedings against the bankrupt, and to enforce "any order for costs."

On an application for the proceedings to be transferred to the High Court:—

Held, (1) that as those responsible for the operation of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, had not yet thought fit to bring it into operation in relation to county court proceedings, it would not be a proper exercise of judicial discretion to make an order of transfer solely on the ground sought; (2) that as the only person entitled in law to take the proposed proceedings, the trustee, could not take the benefit of the legal aid certificate as granted, it would not be right to make an order solely for the purpose of affording legal aid to a person who had no title to sue.

APPLICATION.

An application was made to the High Court by a petitioning creditor in bankruptcy proceedings, that those proceedings, which were in the Wandsworth County Court, might be transferred to the High Court. The reason for the application was stated in an affidavit of the petitioning creditor, which was to the following effect:

On November 6, 1952, a receiving order was made in the Wandsworth County Court against the debtor on a petition presented in respect of a final judgment obtained by the petitioning creditor for £268 17s. On January 28, 1953, the official receiver was appointed trustee of the property of the debtor. As a result of the investigations made by the trustee in bankruptcy certain transactions came to light with regard to the debtor's affairs. The trustee in bankruptcy declined to institute proceedings to avoid certain conveyances with which those transactions were concerned, without being furnished by the petitioning creditor with a complete indemnity in respect of his costs in those proceedings and also in respect of the possibly adverse costs, if the proceedings were taken in his name.

The petitioning creditor further stated in her affidavit that she had not the means to provide the indemnity and she applied for and was granted, on May 10, 1954, a legal aid certificate to take proceedings in the High Court of Justice in Bankruptcy for (a) an application for leave to bring proceedings in the name of the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor to avoid settlements made by the debtor, and (b) to take such proceedings against the debtor and to enforce any order for costs.

By reason of those matters the petitioning creditor submitted that this was a case where the proceedings should be transferred from the county court to the High Court of Justice in Bankruptcy under rule 21 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952.[1]

Case referred to in argument: Reg. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee.[2]

UPJOHN J. This is an application by the petitioning creditor for the transfer of bankruptcy proceedings now in the Wandsworth County Court to this court. The relevant facts are these: that on the petition of the petitioning creditor a receiving order was made against the debtor, who was the husband of the petitioning creditor, the amount of the petitioning creditor's judgment debt being some £268, and the only other debt being a sum of £147 due to some other person. The debtor was duly adjudicated bankrupt, and the official receiver was appointed and remains the trustee of the property of the bankrupt.

[1] Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, r. 21: "The judge of the High Court may "order the proceedings in any matter "under the Act to be transferred from "a county court to the High Court, "or from the High Court to a county "court."

In due course investigations of the bankrupt's affairs were made, and, putting it very shortly (for it is undesirable at this stage that I should say more than is absolutely necessary), it is considered that there is a reasonable prospect of setting aside certain conveyances and transfers made by the debtor to a third party under section 172 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. As the official receiver has insufficient funds in hand, he is not willing to bring those proceedings unless he has a proper indemnity against the costs which he will incur and against the costs which he will be ordered to pay if the application is unsuccessful.

The petitioning creditor states in her affidavit that she has insufficient means to provide the required indemnity. She may be able to provide a sufficient indemnity against costs which the official receiver may be ordered to pay, but she cannot at the same time provide an indemnity against the official receiver's own costs. She has therefore made this application for transfer to this court in order that she may receive the benefit of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and she has already obtained a certificate, to which I shall refer in detail later, enabling her, so she says, to bring proceedings here under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, in the name of the official receiver against the bankrupt and the transferee of the various properties. Therefore, the whole basis of this application to transfer is to enable her to receive the benefit of that statute, which, of course, is not yet available to her in proceedings in the county court.

The relevant rule in relation to transfers is rule 21, and it confers a complete discretion on the court in the matter of ordering a transfer, but, of course, that discretion must be exercised judicially. The usual ground, of course, is for some geographical reason—the assets or the trustee or the main body of creditors or the bankrupt may be situate in a particular area to which it would be convenient to move the proceedings—but transfers may of course be made for other reasons; such, for instance, as the magnitude of the application proposed. No such grounds are suggested in this case. It depends solely on the question which I have already stated, that the petitioning creditor desires to have the benefit of legal aid.

The Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, provides that legal aid may be made available in the county court as well as in the High Court, but those responsible for the operation of the Act have not yet thought fit to bring it into operation in relation to proceedings in the county court; and, in my judgment, it would not be proper for a court to make an order of transfer solely on the ground sought. It seems to me a matter entirely for those responsible for the operation of the Act to consider whether it is desirable that legal aid should be available in the county court, and, if it is not so, it would not, in my judgment, be a proper judicial exercise of the discretion conferred by rule 21 to order a transfer, so that legal aid may be available in proceedings where, in the natural and proper forum, it has not yet been thought right to make it available.

Upjohn J.

I have not overlooked the fact that these are bankruptcy proceedings, nor the fact that, had the debtor, instead of being resident immediately to the south of the Thames in Wandsworth, been resident just to the north, the whole of the bankruptcy proceedings would have taken place in this court, and that, subject to the point on the certificate, to which I shall turn in a moment, legal aid would have been available. Although the circumstances under which the county court is exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction are quite different from the ordinary county court proceedings, nevertheless, it does seem to me wrong to order a transfer of the proceedings solely to obtain the benefit of the Act. It is a matter for others to consider whether that Act should be made available in the county court or not. It is not a matter on which I express any opinion.

The other point depends on the form of the legal aid certificate. It is, so far as is relevant, in this form: It is a certificate that the petitioning creditor "is entitled, in accordance with the Legal Aid "and Advice Act, and the regulations and schemes made there-"under, to legal aid as applicant in connection with the following "proceedings: (1) To take proceedings in the High Court of "Justice, Bankruptcy Court, for (a) application to the court for "leave to bring proceedings in the name of the trustee in bank-"ruptcy of [the bankrupt] to avoid settlements made by the "bankrupt and (b) to take such proceedings against the "bankrupt, and to enforce any order for costs."

Supposing that the proceedings are transferred, it is clear that in this court any application to set aside these conveyances and transfers must be made in the name of the official receiver, the trustee of the property of the bankrupt. Therefore, the court would have before it, as applicant, the trustee, and, as respondent, the transferee of these various properties, but one would not have in name before the court the petitioning creditor. In that state of affairs, when the court comes to consider the question of taxation of costs, it is quite clear that, if the official receiver loses, there will be an unconditional order against him to pay the respondent's costs. Against that liability, it may be that the petitioning creditor can give satisfactory security, but when the official receiver asks for his costs to be taxed under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, it will at once become apparent that the certificate is not for the benefit of the official receiver but for the petitioning creditor, who is not a party to the application, and on that form of certificate it seems to me that it would be quite impossible to order any taxation for the purposes of the Act of the official receiver's costs.

As was pointed out in Reg. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee [1]: "The truth of the matter is that at the moment there "are no specific provisions dealing with the position of a trustee "in bankruptcy in relation to the income test," and it seems to me clear that the only provision of legal aid that would be of assistance to the official receiver and to the petitioning creditor in this case would be a certificate in the name of the official receiver, which has not been obtained.

It was suggested that that difficulty could be overcome by joining the petitioning creditor as applicant in these proposed proceedings so that her costs could be taxed for the purposes of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, thereby covering those of the trustee in bankruptcy. I cannot think that that could possibly be right. She has no title to sue in her own name. It is perfectly true, as Mr. Lewis has pointed out, that she would be in substance the applicant and the principal person to benefit if successful, but in law she would not. The applicant would be the trustee; and I do not feel disposed to order a transfer solely for the purpose of facilitating proceedings for which the State may become bound to pay although the assisted person has herself no title to sue. On that ground, therefore, also, in my judgment, this application fails.

The real truth of the whole matter may be summed up in one sentence, that the petitioning creditor, quite reasonably from her point of view, is trying to get round the fact that legal aid is not available in the forum where these matters ought to be litigated, and I do not think that it is the duty of this court to assist her to obtain legal aid by transfer to this court. Accordingly, the application fails.

Application dismissed.

them for about five weeks for light industrial purposes within the meaning of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Orders, 1948 and 1950. The premises were then unoccupied until February 15, 1950, when they were let to optical manufacturers who also used them for light industrial purposes. On November 11, 1953, the county council served an enforcement notice on the owner which alleged that there had been a development without permission and stated: "Beginning the use of the land described . . . for the "purpose for which the same is now used namely as an industrial "building within the meanings of the Town and Country Planning "(Use Classes) Order, 1948, and the Town and Country Planning "(Use Classes) Order, 1950"; and the notice required the owner to determine such use. The owner appealed to the magistrate under section 23 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, alleging, first, that the notice was too vague and secondly, that as the development by the builders had taken place more than four years before the date of the notice, the notice could not in law relate to that development. The magistrate dismissed the appeal. On appeal:—

Held, first, that the notice was not too vague since it stated clearly that the complaint was made with regard to the current user at the date when the notice was served.

Held, secondly, in the circumstances, that the magistrate had no power under section 23 to inquire whether the development had taken place prior to the user by the optical manufacturers; he had to assume that the notice was regular and his sole jurisdiction under the section was to ascertain whether permission had been granted or was not required.

CASES STATED.

The appellant, Gerald Keats, preferred complaints before the magistrate at Old Street Magistrates' Court that he was a person aggrieved by three enforcement notices dated November 11, 1953, relating to the ground, first and second floors of 127 Southgate Road, Islington, served on the appellant by the London County Council under section 23 [1] of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and that he desired to appeal against those notices by virtue of the provisions of that section.

[1] Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 23: "(1) If it appears "to the local planning authority that "any development of land has been "carried out after the appointed day "without the grant of permission ". . . the local planning authority "may within four years of such "development being carried out, if "they consider it expedient so to do "having regard to the provisions of "the development plan and to any "other material considerations, serve "on the owner and occupier of the "land a notice under this section. "(2) Any notice served under this "section (hereinafter called an 'en-"'forcement notice') shall specify "the development which is alleged to "have been carried out without the "grant of such permission . . . may ". . . require . . . the discontinuance "of any use of land . . . (4) If "any person on whom an enforce-"ment notice is served under this "section is aggrieved by the notice, "he may, at any time within the "period mentioned in the last fore-"going subsection, appeal against "the notice to a court of summary "jurisdiction for the petty sessional "division or place within which the "land to which the notice relates is "situated; and on any such appeal "the court—(a) if satisfied that per-"mission was granted under this "Part of this Act for the develop-"ment to which the notice relates,

With regard to the ground floor, the magistrate found the following facts: On July 1, 1948 (the appointed day under the Act of 1947), the use of the premises was residential. In October, 1949 (namely, more than four years before the service of the enforcement notice), a firm of builders went into occupation and used the premises for making window-frames, sashes, doors and other woodwork and continued to do so for about five weeks. (It was agreed that such user, if proved, would be user of the premises as a light industrial building within the meaning of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950.) Thereafter the premises remained empty until about February 15, 1950 (namely, less than four years before the service of the enforcement notice), when they were let to and used by a firm of optical manufacturers for light industrial purposes within the meaning of the Order of 1950, and thereafter continued to be let and used for such purposes by various persons up to the date of the hearing. About March, 1951, the premises were sold to the present owner, the appellant. On November 11, 1953, the London County Council served an enforcement notice on the owner.

The notice alleged that certain development had been carried out after July 1, 1948, without the grant of permission by the county council. The alleged development specified by the notice was in the following terms:—"Beginning the use of the land "described in the Second Schedule hereto for the purpose for "which the same is now used namely as an industrial building "within the meanings of the Town and Country Planning (Use "Classes) Order, 1948, and the Town and Country Planning "(Use Classes) Order, 1950."

The owner contended that the notice was too vague in that it did not specify the development sufficiently clearly, and that it was out of time, as the development had been carried out more than four years before the date of the notice.

The county council contended that the notice specified the development sufficiently clearly, that the notice was in time since the use of the premises as an industrial building should be held to have begun on or about February 15, 1950, and that in any event the court had no jurisdiction to quash the notice even if it accepted the owner's contentions.

The magistrate, rejecting the owner's contentions, was of the opinion that on the facts he was required by section 23 (4) to dismiss the appeal unless no permission was required for the development to which the enforcement notice related; that the use by the optical manufacturers constituted a "beginning the "use" as an industrial building—a development to which the enforcement notice related and for which permission was required;

"or that no such permission was "required in respect thereof, or, as "the case may be, that the condi-"tions subject to which such permis-"sion was granted have been com-"plied with, shall quash the notice "to which the appeal relates; . . . "(c) in any other case shall dismiss "the appeal."

KEATS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

and that his jurisdiction to quash an enforcement notice was strictly confined to the matters set out in section 23 (4) (a).

In the case of the enforcement notice relating to the first floor the facts, contentions, and opinion did not differ materially from those set out above. On the enforcement notice in respect of the second floor, which was in the same terms as the notice relating to the ground floor, the owner's only contention, which was rejected by the magistrate, was that the notice was too vague.

A. P. Marshall Q.C. and F. R. McQuown for the owner.
J. S. Daniel for the London County Council.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Lincolnshire (Parts of Lindsey) County Council v. Wallace Holiday Camp Ld.[2]; Perrins v. Perrins[3]; Mead v. Chelmsford Rural District Council.[4]

PARKER J. stated the facts, and continued:

The magistrate took the view that his jurisdiction was strictly limited by the Act; and it is necessary to look at section 23 to see how the matter came before him. Section 23 provides: "(1) If it appears to the local planning authority that any "development of land has been carried out"—and by section 12 (1) of the Act "development" includes the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or land—"after the "appointed day without the grant of permission . . . the local "planning authority may within four years of such development "being carried out, if they consider it expedient so to do having "regard to the provisions of the development plan and to any "other material considerations, serve on the owner and occupier "of the land a notice under this section." By subsection (2) that enforcement notice shall specify the development which is alleged to have been carried out and may require the discontinuance of any use of land. By subsection (4) it is provided: "If any person on whom an enforcement notice is served under "this section is aggrieved by the notice, he may, at any time "within the period mentioned in the last foregoing subsection, "appeal against the notice to a court of summary jurisdiction "for the petty sessional division or place within which the land "to which the notice relates is situated; and on any such appeal "the court—(a) if satisfied that permission was granted under "this Part of this Act for the development to which the notice "relates, or that no such permission was required in respect "thereof, or, as the case may be, that the conditions subject to "which such permission was granted have been complied with,

"shall quash the notice to which the appeal relates; . . . (c) in "any other case shall dismiss the appeal."

It is to be observed from those words that the magistrate's jurisdiction is strictly limited—and this court has so held—to the question whether permission was granted for the development to which the notice relates or that no such permission was required. By section 24 it is provided that in any subsequent proceedings to enforce the notice, the owner or occupier shall not be entitled to dispute the validity of the action taken by the local planning authority on any ground which could have been raised by such appeal.

Two points were raised before the magistrate and before us. The first is that in all these notices the description of the development is too vague. Mr. Marshall has contended that it should at least state the time of the development, the nature of the development, and the class into which the development falls. He points out that the class is of some importance, because there is no change of use within the meaning of the Act if premises are used for a different purpose, provided it is within the same class. On that point, if the wording had been merely "the use of the "land as an industrial building" there might well be complaint that it was not specific enough; but this notice says: "for the "purpose for which the same is now used." It thus becomes perfectly clear that the complaint is made with regard to the current use at the time—which, in this case, was the use by the firm of optical manufacturers.

The other point taken arises on the particular facts of this case. It is said that this notice complains of a beginning of the use of the land described for that purpose. In so far as it was a user on which the enforcement notice could, as it were, bite, it must be a user by these optical manufacturers; but, it is said, the development under this Act had already taken place when the firm of builders first used the premises at the end of October, 1949. Accordingly, as the user by the optical manufacturers and by the builders falls within the same class, no further permission was required for the use of the premises by the optical manufacturers.

It seems to me that the answer to Mr. Marshall's argument must be that that was not a matter for the magistrate. The magistrate has to approach the matter under section 23 (4) on the basis that the local authority are satisfied that the development referred to in the notice has taken place. He must assume that the notice is regular and his sole jurisdiction is to ascertain whether permission was granted or was not required. That has already been decided by this court in Mead v. Chelmsford Rural District Council,[1] where the enforcement notice served was irregular on its face because the necessary date on which it was to take effect did not appear. There was in that case no appeal to the magistrates, but when it was sought to enforce the notice and the prosecution took place, the point that the notice was irregular was then taken, and this court held that that was a point which could then be taken. Lord Goddard C.J. said [2]: "The "recipient can say: 'This notice never ought to have been served "'on me because I had received, or did not require, permission,' "or: 'I have carried out the conditions subject to which per-"'mission was granted', or: 'This notice exceeds what is "'reasonable for me to be called on to do.'" That is what he can contend before the magistrates. The Lord Chief Justice went on [2]: "The sub-section does not provide for an appeal "against the notice on the ground that it is a bad notice because "that involves, not an appeal against the notice, but a conten-"tion that the recipient never had a notice served on him at all, "which is what the appellant contends in this case."

KEATS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

Mr. Marshall relied strongly on a more recent decision of this court in Lincolnshire (Parts of Lindsey) County Council v. Wallace Holiday Camp Ld.,[3] where it was held that an enforcement notice was a bad notice, but that nevertheless the justices were entitled to quash it; and Mr. Marshall says that that supports his contention here. When one looks at the case more closely, however, it will be seen that the development complained of there was a development which took place before the appointed day, development which, it was said, contravened previous planning control; but the enforcement notice and the appeal to the magistrates was on the basis that section 23 applied; and this court said in effect that the magistrates in the special circumstances of that case were entitled to quash the notice because in fact no permission was required, since the development took place before the appointed day.

I am quite satisfied that the magistrate here had no jurisdiction to embark on the inquiry on which he was invited to embark, and that his decision when he refused to quash the notice should be upheld. What I have said with regard to the complaint that the development is alleged too vaguely applies to all three cases. The second point taken only arises in regard to the ground floor and the frrst floor; there is no distinction between the two. Accordingly the magistrate was right in all three cases and the appeal should be dismissed.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Practice and Procedure—Trial—Witness list—Chancery Division—Interlocutory applications after case has appeared in list.

An action, having been set down for trial on July 2, 1954, appeared in the list on July 26 and was fixed for hearing on October 28. On October 20 a summons by one of the defendants asking for particulars of the statement of claim came before the master and was dismissed on the grounds (a) that paragraph 6 of the Practice Direction (Witness List) dated April 2, 1954 [1954] 1 W.L.R. 693, which states that "all applications with "regard to cases appearing in the Witness List are to be made "to . . . the judge in charge of the list" deprived the master of jurisdiction to hear the application, and (b) that all necessary parties had not been made respondents to the application.

The second defendant now applied for postponement of the trial of the action to enable the application for particulars to be dealt with.

J. G. Strangman Q.C. and G. B. H. Dillon for the plaintiffs.
Raymond Walton for the first defendant.
G. H. Crispin for the second defendant.

HARMAN J. said that the intention of paragraph 6 of the Practice Direction of April 2 was that applications as to the hearing of cases appearing in the witness list were to be made to an indicated judge; it did not affect the ordinary practice with regard to interlocutory applications which should, as hitherto, normally be made by summons returnable before a master. In the case before him, his Lordship refused to postpone the hearing of the action and directed that the application for particulars should be adjourned into court to come on with the trial of the action. If the judge then thought that further particulars should be given, he would so order.

The appellants were charged with aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring H. in the commission of the offence of using a goods vehicle with an "A" licence for the carriage of goods without the necessary permit. H.'s driver had approached the appellants' manager for an order for the carriage of goods on a return journey. The manager asked the driver if he had a permit to carry the goods and on the driver saying "Yes," but failing to produce the permit, the manager required him to sign an assurance that his employers held the necessary documents and if required would produce them. In fact there was no permit for such carriage. In giving the assurance the driver misinformed the appellants' manager, but acted in ignorance in so doing. The justices, being of the opinion that the appellants gave the order for the carriage of the goods without requiring the production of the permit or authorisation and without making sufficient inquiry as to the necessity for or existence of such permit or authorisation, found the appellants guilty. On appeal:—

Held, that the appellants' manager, having been assured by H.'s driver that a permit existed and having received an undertaking in writing from him that his employers would produce the permit if required, had taken reasonable precautions to prevent the commission of an offence and therefore could not be said to be aiding and abetting the commission of the offence.

Carter v. Mace [1949] 2 All E.R. 714 distinguished.

CASE STATED by Newport justices.

The appellants, Davies, Turner & Co. Ld., were charged on an information preferred by James Arthur Brodie, on behalf of the licensing authority for goods vehicles (South Wales Traffic Area) with aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring Arthur Vincent Hill, a partner in the firm of Hills Transport, in the commission of an offence in that on October 29, 1953, between Newport and Newark, he used a goods vehicle authorised in a public "A" carriers licence granted under Part I of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, on a road for the carriage of steel for hire or reward outside the permitted radius of 25 miles from its operating centre other than under the authority of a permit granted in accordance with the provisions of section 52 of the Transport Act, 1947, contrary to section 9 (1) of the Act of 1933, and contrary to section 35 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952.

The justices found the following facts. On October 29, 1953, the goods vehicle in question owned by Hills Transport and driven by their employee, Durrance, was being used on a return journey from Newport to Newark for the carriage of steel, which carriage required a permit, but none had been granted. For some months prior to and until a day or two before October 29, Durrance had been driving one of the three vehicles owned by Hills Transport which did not require permits for the carriage of goods. Durrance had previously obtained orders from the appellants for the carriage of goods on return journeys. Durrance was unaware that he required a permit for the carriage of steel on October 29 and as far as he personally was aware there was no difference between the carriage of goods on that day and carriage on previous occasions. On October 29, Durrance applied to and obtained from the appellants, who were forwarding agents, an order for the carriage of steel. Prior to giving the order the appellants' manager, Evans, asked Durrance if he had a permit to carry the load and on Durrance answering in the affirmative, but failing to produce any permit, Evans required him to sign an assurance on behalf of his employers in the following terms: "Goods are "handed to you on your express assurance that you hold the "necessary documents and will produce them if required to and "on the express condition that you are legally able to collect and "effect delivery to the destination." Durrance did not know much about permits and Evans was aware of that. Evans realized that it was his duty to see that vehicles engaged by him could legally carry the loads for which he engaged them. He also knew that a driver was required to carry any necessary permit with him. In giving the assurance, Durrance misinformed Evans, but acted in ignorance in so doing. Evans, in accepting the assurance, also acted in ignorance of the fact that no permit or authority covering the carriage had been granted. Evans acted in accordance with the appellants' usual practice.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that for them to be found guilty it was necessary to prove, either that they knew that the vehicle was being used without a permit when a permit was required or that they suspected that it was being so used and connived at the offence.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the appellants were under a duty to see that a permit had actually been granted, that that duty was not and could not be discharged merely by obtaining a written assurance from the driver and that by failing to make further inquiries after the driver had failed to produce his permit the appellants closed their eyes to a contravention of the Act, and the respondent relied on Carter v. Mace.[1]

The justices were of the opinion that the appellants were guilty of the offence alleged because they gave the order for the carriage of the goods without requiring the production to them of the permit or authorisation for such carriage and without making proper or sufficient inquiry as to the necessity for or existence of such permit or authorisation.

[1] [1949] 2 All E.R. 714.

DAVIES, TURNER & CO. LD. v. BRODIE.

The questions for the opinion of the court were whether in law the appellants were under a duty to require production of the permit itself and whether there was any evidence on which the justices could find the appellants guilty of the alleged offence.

Gilbert Dare for the appellants.
J. P. Ashworth for the respondent.

The following cases were cited in argument: Johnson v. Youden *; Carter v. Mace †; and Churchill v. Norris.‡

ORMEROD J., delivering the first judgment, stated the facts and continued: It appears to be clear, from the opinion expressed by the justices and from the questions on which they ask the opinion of this court, that in coming to their conclusion, that the appellants' manager, Evans, had not made sufficient or proper inquiry as to either the necessity or the existence of a permit in this particular case, they were dominated by the view that not only was it the duty of the driver to carry this permit, but it was also the duty of Evans to demand production of it; and if he had demanded production of it and it had not been forthcoming, presumably the situation might have been different.

It is contended for the appellants that there is no evidence here of aiding and abetting on the part of the appellants because, before they allowed this load to be put onto this motor-lorry, they did in fact obtain from the driver Durrance an assurance that the licence was in order and would be produced at any time if necessary. That appears, on the face of it, to be a contention to which there is no answer. Mr. Ashworth, however, on behalf of the respondent, referred the court to Carter v. Mace.[1] That was a case in which the appellant carried on a business which appears to be very much on the same lines as the business carried on by the appellants in the present case, the business of a transport clearing house, and he appears to have hired a lorry for the transport of copper cathodes, a lorry which could not carry that particular load. The evidence in that case was that the appellant made no inquiry of any kind whether the owner of the lorry was licensed or permitted to carry this particular load, and in that case Lord Goddard C.J., in his judgment, used these words [2]: "The appellant carries on a business which is described "as a clearing house for transport. That means that he executes "orders from people who want goods transported. He does not "transport the goods himself, but he gets other people to do so. "He engages the lorry owners to do the work and pays them "rather less than he receives. If the appellant undertakes this "class of business, he must see that contracts are carried out in "a legal manner, and that the people whom he employs can "lawfully carry out the contracts which he has made." Then a few lines further on he says: "In these circumstances, it "seems to me perfectly clear that the appellant was aiding and "abetting the commission of the offence by Alderson."

On the strength of that judgment Mr. Ashworth argued that it was the duty of Evans to make inquiries, and that the inquiries which were made by Evans were not sufficient, as the justices have found, and that as that is a question of fact, quite clearly the justices were entitled to convict. I think that is the way Mr. Ashworth put his case, relying entirely on Carter v. Mace.[3] I think it is proper to say that Carter v. Mace[3] was one of those cases which was decided on its particular facts, the case of a man engaged in this sort of business who made no inquiries as to the existence or otherwise of licences, and not a case such as the one under consideration, an entirely different matter, where inquiry was made and an assurance given by the driver that there was a licence in existence and the additional precaution taken by the manager of the appellants' firm of an undertaking in writing that the permit was in existence and would be produced if required at any future time. In those circumstances, it seems impossible to say that these appellants, having taken this precaution—it may have been they could have done other things—which was a perfectly reasonable precaution, and inquired about the existence of a permit and received an assurance both orally and in writing, were aiding and abetting this offence. In those circumstances, this appeal must be allowed.

LORD GODDARD C.J. I agree. I only repeat what I said, with the assent of the other members of the court, in Johnson v. Youden[4]: "Before a person can be convicted of aiding and "abetting the commission of an offence he must at least know "the essential matters which constitute that offence." If a person shuts his eyes to the obvious or refrains from making any inquiry where a reasonably sensible man would make inquiry, I think the court can find that he was aiding and abetting, certainly if he shuts his eyes to the obvious.

The case on which so much reliance has been placed, Carter v. Mace,[5] which has got into some of the reports, was in fact a case which laid down no principle of law. It was decided entirely on its own particular facts. They were very striking. The man made no inquiry, but was taking any lorry that came along and using it, and the court said that he could not be heard to say that he was not aiding and abetting. In this case, I do not say that the people took every precaution or made every inquiry, and

I do not think that is necessary, but once it is shown that they were acting in good faith—and in this case the justices found that they were—and got this assurance which they took in good faith, and incidentally was given in good faith, I do not see how it can be said that they aided and abetted an offence when they had no reason to suppose that the facts were present which would constitute an offence; that is the point: you must know the essential matters which constitute the offence. For these reasons, I think that the appeal should be allowed.

Revenue—Profits tax—Company—Principal and subsidiary companies—Notice given by principal requiring profits of subsidiary to be treated as its own profits—Subsequent exemption of principal from profits tax—Principal not thereafter liable to profits tax in respect of subsidiary's profits—Finance Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 54), s. 22 (1) (2)—Finance Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 35), s. 31 (2).

The appellant company, H., was a subsidiary company of S. On September 28, 1948, S. gave a notice, which was accepted, to the Inland Revenue Commissioners under section 22 [1] of the Finance Act, 1937, requiring that the profits of H. should be treated as the profits of S., the principal company, for the purposes of profits tax.

By a notice given in September, 1952, the commissioners directed that the income of S. should be deemed to be the income of the members and apportioned accordingly, pursuant to section 21 of the Finance Act, 1922. In consequence, by virtue of section 31 (2) of the Finance Act, 1947,[2] the income of S. became exempt from liability for profits tax.

[1] Finance Act, 1937, s. 22: "(1) Where a body corporate resident in the United Kingdom is a subsidiary of another body corporate so resident (hereafter in this section referred to as 'the principal company') the principal company may, by notice in writing given to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue before the expiration of any chargeable accounting period of the subsidiary or within two months thereafter, require that the provisions of subsection (2) of this section shall apply to the subsidiary as respects that period and all subsequent chargeable accounting periods throughout which it continues to be a subsidiary of the principal company. . . . (2) Where such a notice is given, the profits or losses arising in any chargeable accounting period to which the notice relates from the trade or business carried on by the subsidiary shall be treated, for the purpose of the provisions of this Act relating to [profits tax] . . . as if they were profits or losses arising in the corresponding chargeable accounting period from the trade or business carried on by the principal company."

Subsequently assessments, which were disputed, were made on H. for profits tax in relation to the profits for the chargeable accounting periods ending in 1948 and 1949. It was contended for the taxpayers that the effect of the notices given by S. to the commissioners in 1948 and by the commissioners to S. in 1952 was, that (a) the liability of H. to profits tax was transferred to S.; (b) S. had ceased to be liable to profits tax, so that (c) H. was not liable for the tax. The Crown contended that there was an inherent assumption underlying section 22 of the Act of 1937 that S., the principal company, must be liable for profits tax, and that if S. was not so liable, the section was inoperative. The special commissioners affirmed the assessments. On appeal:—

Held, that there was nothing in the language of section 22 to justify the assumption contended for by the Crown, or to restrict the meaning of "principal company" to a company which was itself liable to profits tax; so that the assessments must be discharged.

The relevant facts are stated in the judgment.

L. C. Graham-Dixon Q.C. and John Creese for the appellant.
Geoffrey Cross Q.C. and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

The case cited in argument is referred to in the judgment.

UPJOHN J. This appeal relates to profits tax, and the case depends on a short point of construction of section 22 of the Finance Act, 1937, section 19 of which introduced the tax for the first time under its former name of National Defence Contribution. [His Lordship read or summarized sections 19, 20, 21 and 22 and continued:] It is admitted that the appellant, Heelex Investments Ld., is and at all material times was a subsidiary of a company known as Sidcup Investments Ld.

On September 28, 1948, Sidcup Investments Ld., to which I will refer as Sidcup, gave a notice, under section 22 (1), requiring that the provisions of subsection (2) of that section should apply to the appellant company for the relevant years. The notice was out of time, but no question arises on that. The

[2] Finance Act, 1947, s. 31 (2): "The said section 19 [the principal charging section of the Act of 1937] shall not apply to any trade or business carried on by a body corporate during any chargeable accounting period if, for a year or period which includes, or for years or periods which together include, the whole of the chargeable accounting period, the actual income of the body corporate from all sources is apportioned under or for the purposes of section 21 of the Finance Act, 1922, and all the persons to whom it is apportioned are individuals."

HEELEX INVESTMENTS LD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

Upjohn J.

notice given was treated, and has always been treated, as a valid notice for the purposes of section 22.

The result of giving such a notice is that it applies not only to the relevant period for which it is given but to all subsequent chargeable accounting periods, and comes to an end only when the appellant ceases to be a subsidiary of Sidcup.

As a result of giving the notice, assessments to profits tax for the years 1947, 1948 and 1949, which I will call the relevant years, were made on Sidcup in respect of the profits of both companies. There was no appeal, and tax was paid on those assessments.

In 1947, the scope of the profits tax was to some extent enlarged, in that different rates of tax were prescribed according to whether the profits were retained by a company or were distributed by it. In another way the scope of the tax was somewhat reduced, because, whereas under the original Act individuals carrying on business, not being exempt as engaged in professional occupations, were equally liable, although at a different rate, with corporations carrying on business, by section 31 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, individuals and partnerships were exempted from profits tax. Down to that date a company might have been subject both to profits tax and to a direction under section 21 of the Finance Act, 1922, directing that, in certain cases, its profits, putting it shortly, should be subjected to surtax as though it was an individual. But, when individuals ceased to be subject to profits tax, it appeared to the legislature that it would be right, if any direction was given under the Finance Act, 1922, to treat the profits of the company as though they were that of an individual, that, in those circumstances, the company should be exempt from profits tax. That was brought into effect by section 31 (2), which reads: "The said section 19"—that is, the principal charging section under the Finance Act, 1937—"shall "not apply to any trade or business carried on by a body cor- "porate during any chargeable accounting period if, for a year "or period which includes, or for years or periods which together "include, the whole of the chargeable accounting period, the "actual income of the body corporate from all sources is appor- "tioned under or for the purposes of section 21 of the Finance "Act, 1922, and all the persons to whom it is apportioned are "individuals."

Pursuant to section 21 of the Finance Act, 1922, on September 29, 1952, the special commissioners by notice to Sidcup directed that its income from all sources for the relevant years should be deemed to be the income of its members and the amount thereof should be apportioned among the members. It is common ground that, at that time, all the members of Sidcup were individuals. Accordingly, assuming that direction to become final and binding for the relevant years, Sidcup will be exempt from profits tax under and by virtue of section 31 (2) of the Act of 1947.

Mr. Graham-Dixon, for the appellant, took a subsidiary point that the direction under the Finance Act, 1922, was still under appeal and had not become final and binding, and, therefore, that the assessments which I must mention in a moment were premature. However, I indicated that, if that point were pressed, I would decide it, but I should be disinclined to decide the main point if I decided the subsidiary point in Mr. Graham-Dixon's favour, for that would mean there would be a judgment on an important point which would be entirely obiter. Faced with that, Mr. Graham-Dixon preferred to abandon his subsidiary point, and this appeal has been argued on the footing that the direction under the Finance Act, 1922, has become final and binding.

In respect of the relevant years, on the footing that Sidcup was exempt from the payment of profits tax, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have repaid to Sidcup the profits tax already paid by them. Mr. Cross, for the Crown, concedes that, technically, the commissioners might not have been compellable so to repay the tax; but at all events they have done so. However, in respect of the profits tax in those years, they have raised separate assessments on the appellant for two of the relevant years. This appeal raises the question of the validity of those assessments.

The Crown claims to make those assessments to profits tax on the appellant on the ground that, where the principal company, Sidcup, is itself not liable to profits tax, then section 22 (2) of the Finance Act, 1937, can during that period have no operation. Therefore, the profits of the appellant cannot be treated as profits of the principal company, but remain its own profits on which it is assessable to profits tax. That is the short point which I have to determine.

Mr. Cross concedes that a notice may be given under section 22 (1), although the principal company may be exempt. It may be exempt because it is a statutory undertaking; it may be exempt for the reason, as in this case, that a direction has been made on it under the Act of 1922. But, although the notice applies during the period for which it is given, and during all subsequent chargeable accounting periods, Mr. Cross submits that, in fact, it can have no operation during the period for which the company is exempt for whatever reason that may be. He submits that the words in section 22 (2) of the Act of 1937, "the profits or lossses "arising in any chargeable accounting period . . . shall be treated, "for the purpose of the provisions of this Act relating to the "national defence contribution," mean in effect for the purpose of charging those profits to profits tax; and that it is inherent in that section, or there is an assumption underlying that section, that the principal company is itself to be liable in respect of the relevant period to profits tax for the section to operate. In other words, this is really a collection section, which assumes that the principal company is liable, and, if the principal company is not so liable, it can have no operation. That is the whole point.

HEELEX INVESTMENTS LD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

Upjohn J.

The argument is supported by an authority, to which I must refer, Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Birmingham District Power and Traction Co. Ld.,[1] a decision of the House of Lords. The case there arose on a somewhat similar provision in the Finance Act, 1920, which created something called then the corporation profits tax. There was a provision, verbally different, but in substance very much the same as the provisions of section 22, whereby a parent company could give a notice requiring the profits of a subsidiary company or companies to be assessed with those of the parent company for the purposes of that tax. In that case the Birmingham District Power and Traction Co. was an exempt company for the period from January 1, 1920, to December 31, 1922. That appears from section 52 (2) of the Finance Act, 1920. Therefore, it was exempt for the relevant period. But it had three subsidiary companies which were not exempt. The principal company gave a notice which was accepted by the Inland Revenue. In that case an attempt was made by assessment on the principal company to obtain tax upon the profits of the subsidiary companies. Those assessments were upheld by the commissioners, and by Rowlatt J.; but were discharged by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords on the perfectly simple ground that the company was exempt.

In the course of the speeches in the House of Lords the question was canvassed, although it was completely obiter, as to whether the notice given by the principal company was a valid notice having regard to the fact that the principal company was itself exempt. Lord Buckmaster said this[2]: "The judgment of "the Court of Appeal means that the profits which can properly "be charged with tax in the hands of the company by whom "those profits are earned are exempted from taxation by reason "of the special character of the company which holds its ordinary "shares. This position is of course due to the application of the "respondents made under section 53 (3) having been as I think "erroneously granted by the commissioners." That is not quite verbally accurate. What the learned Lord obviously meant is the notice having been accepted as valid by the commissioners. "It must be remembered that the respondent company had been "expressly exempted from January 1, 1920, to December 31, "1922, but subsection (3) assumes that the company entitled to "make the application is the company whose profits are subject "to the provisions of the statute, for the profits of the subsidiary "company are to be treated for the purposes of the Act as the "profits of the principal company. The purposes of the Act do "not in this case apply to the profits of the principal company "at all, and although there is underlying the subsection the "assumption that assessment is possible upon the company that "makes the application this is impossible if the company satisfies

"the conditions mentioned in section 52 (2) (b) (i). Further, "the provisions at the end of subsection (3), providing that the "subsidiary companies shall not be separately assessed, to my "mind suggest that there is to be an assessment on the "company that makes the application, while the concluding words "of the subsection, which relate to the amount of tax that is to "be payable by the principal company, assume that the result "of the application is that some tax at least must be levied from "them. The application, however, having been made and granted "and the assessments on the subsidiary companies discharged on "that basis, it is necessary to consider what is the right con-"clusion upon the hypothesis that the application was rightly "made." There is in that passage very strong support for the view submitted by Mr. Cross. Lord Sumner delivered a speech of two words, and Lord Carson of three words agreeing with Lord Buckmaster, but we do not know whether they also agreed with Lord Buckmaster's obiter dicta which I have just read.

Lord Wrenbury plainly did not accept Lord Buckmaster's view. He said this [3]: "In my opinion the appellants fail. The "Finance Act, 1920, s. 52 (2) (b) (3), defines a company by "words which include the Birmingham District Power Co. The "company is therefore within the Act. The proviso contained "in section 52 (2) (b) (i) enacts that 'this part of this Act shall "'not' during a relevant time apply to the profits of a com-"pany which carries on certain defined undertakings of which the "undertaking of the Birmingham company is one. It results "that the company is within the Act, but its profits are not. "Being within the Act the company could and did make an "application under section 53 (3), the result of which was that "the profits of the three subsidiary companies are to be treated "'for the purposes of this part of this Act as being the profits' "of the Birmingham company as if the subsidiary companies "were branches of the Birmingham company. The profits of the "Birmingham company are not assessable under the Act. It "follows that the profits of the subsidiary companies which are "to be 'treated for the purposes of this part of this Act as being "'the profits of the principal company' are not assessable." It is quite plain from that that Lord Wrenbury was giving a much more literal construction to the Act, and refused to import any underlying assumption such as the one Lord Buckmaster was prepared to introduce.

Lord Warrington was of the same opinion as Lord Wrenbury although he put the matter in rather a different way. He said this [4]: "The only remaining point to consider is whether a "company, the profits of which are exempt from taxation, is "capable of making an application under the section in question. "There is no exception in terms of such a company from the "generality of the expression 'a company,' and I cannot infer

Upjohn J.

"such an exception from the fact that its absence produces a "result which may not have been foreseen."

There is one cardinal distinction between that case and this case, apart from the fact that all the expressions of opinion I have read were obiter, and it is this. In that case, at the time the notice was given, everyone knew that the principal company was an exempt company. In the present case, at the time the notice was given and acted upon, everyone was bound to assume that Sidcup was not an exempt company. Whether Lord Buckmaster would have expressed the views that he did express in a case such as this I do not know.

With all respect to the arguments addressed to me, and with all respect to the observations of Lord Buckmaster, it seems wrong in a taxing statute to introduce any underlying assumption, or any inherent idea, unless the words of the statute compel one to do so. It seems to me that the words here are quite plain. A notice can be given and will continue to operate for the stated period. Where the notice is given, then, for the purposes of the Act—not merely for those of section 19—the profits of the subsidiary company must be treated as the profits of the principal company. If one introduces any underlying assumption, one is really placing a restriction on the meaning of the words "principal company"; because the essential part of the argument is that it is only where the principal company is itself liable that this section operates. I see nothing whatever in the section which justifies that construction. It seems to me that any company, provided that it is resident in the United Kingdom, may give a notice. There is no other restriction contained in section 22 (1). Then, when the notice is given, it automatically follows that the profits of the subsidiary companies of that principal company must for the purposes of the Act be treated as the profits of the principal. If it is found, for some reason or another, for example, that the principal is a statutory undertaker, or that it is subject to some direction under the Finance Act, 1922, the principal itself is not to be taxed because it is exempt. That is the position.

In my judgment, the commissioners came to a wrong conclusion on the matter, and these assessments were not properly made. Accordingly, the appeal will be allowed; the assessments to profits tax must be discharged, and the Crown must pay the costs of the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Will—Construction—Annuity—One third of income of residuary trust fund payable to widow for life—If insufficient to provide £6,500 in any year "free of English income and super-tax" trustees to pay balance "out of the income of the trust fund"—Whether annuity a continuing charge on income.

A testator, who died in 1929, by clause 12 of his will directed his trustees to pay to his widow one third of the income of his residuary trust fund and "if one third of the income of the trust "fund shall in any year during the life of my said wife amount "to less than £6,500 per annum free of English income and super-"tax my trustees shall in respect of that year pay or cause to be "paid to my said wife out of the income of the trust fund in "addition to one third of the income thereof such further sum as "will give to her a net income for that year of £6,500 free of "English income and super-tax." By clause 13 the testator directed that "subject to the interest of my said wife in part of the income "of the trust fund under the last preceding clause hereof" his trustees should hold the income of the trust fund on certain trusts.

Although the estate was of considerable value, difficulties arose in the administration of the trust fund, as a result of subsequent legislation increasing the rates of income tax and surtax. Owing to the insufficiency of the income since the year 1938 to produce the net sum required, the executor took out a summons for the direction of the court as to the manner in which the terms of the will in relation to the annuity should be carried out.

Held, that, from the context, and under the terms of clause 12, a limitation of the income to the income of a particular year must be implied; and that the phrase "subject to the interest of my "said wife in part of the income of the trust fund under the last "preceding clause hereof," at the beginning of clause 13 was inconsistent with the conception that income was only to be dealt with subject to a continuing charge by the annuitant on each and every part thereof; so that the widow had no power to resort to accumulations of income or to the income of the accumulations in right of her annuity.

ORIGINATING SUMMONS.

By his will dated June 2, 1927, the testator Alastair Cameron (who died on February 23, 1929), after giving certain specific and pecuniary bequests and directing his trustees to sell and convert into money his real and personal estate, and directing the payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies, directed by clause 12: "My trustees shall pay or cause to be paid one-"third of the income of the residue of the said moneys (which "moneys and the property for the time being representing the "same are hereinafter called 'the trust fund') to my said wife

"for her life and so that during coverture the same shall be "without power of anticipation I declare that if I shall have in "my lifetime not made any settlement in favour of my said "wife and if one-third of the income of the trust fund shall in "any year during the life of my said wife amount to less than "£6,500 per annum free of English income and super-tax my "trustees shall in respect of that year pay or cause to be paid "to my said wife out of the income of the trust fund in addition "to one-third of the income thereof such further sum as will give "to her a net income for that year of £6,500 free of English "income and super-tax."

Clause 13 (1): "Subject to the interest of my said wife in "part of the income of the trust fund under the last preceding "clause thereof my trustees shall upon my [son] attaining the "age of 25 years hold the income of the trust fund upon . . . "protective trusts for my said son during the remainder of his "life."

Clauses 14 to 18 of the will, which are sufficiently set out in the judgment, contained directions to the trustees with regard to the application of income towards the maintenance of the testator's son until he attained 25 years and to accumulate the residue of such income and hold such accumulations and the resulting income for the person or persons who should eventually become entitled to the principal sum from which the same should have proceeded, and in the event of the failure of these trusts the trust fund was to be held in trust for certain specified persons.

The testator had only one son. He was born on October 5, 1916, and died on August 19, 1940, so that he attained 21 but did not attain 25.

A summons was taken out by the executor of the will to determine (inter alia): (3) whether on the true construction of the will and in the events which had happened, and having regard to the insufficiency since the year 1938 of the income of the trust fund to provide the testator's widow with such a further sum as would give her a net income of £6,500 (as reduced in amount by the joint effect of section 25 of the Finance Act, 1941, and section 20 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945), free of income tax and surtax (a) accumulations of surplus income made pursuant to clause 16 of the said will during the lifetime of [the son] and [subject to any answer which might be given to question 4]; (b) the income arising from accumulations so made were or was applicable for the purpose of providing the testator's widow with the said net income of £6,500 (so reduced as aforesaid); (4) whether there was an intestacy as to the income arising from the said accumulations subsequently to the expiration on February 23, 1950, of the period of 21 years from the testator's death and, if so, whether such income ought to be applied in the first place in or towards discharge after statutory charge for £1,000 and interest to which the widow of the testator would be entitled under such partial intestacy.

Cases referred to in argument: In re Coller's Deed Trusts *; In re Platt.†

ROXBURGH J. This is not an easy case, and I am surprised to find that there is not in the reports any case bearing any resemblance to it; because, though it is a type of case which would have been unlikely to occur before the war, there must be many settlements in existence under which it must be occurring nowadays.

The short point is this: The testator, who was a man of great wealth, provided that his widow should receive a specified portion of income, with a proviso that if it fell short of a certain sum free of income tax and surtax, it (that is to say, the aliquot portion of income of residue) should be made up to a specified sum. Of course, the whole approach to the problem must necessarily be artificial, because if there is one thing that can be predicated with certainty it is that this testator, who died in the year 1929, never considered the possibility that, owing to the lamentable events since that date, the income of his estate in any particular year might fall short of the amount required to provide the full sum which he intended his widow to have. I stress that, because much has been said about giving priority to an intention to benefit his widow. It is obvious, from the large sum which he has given her, that he intended her to be amply, or perhaps more than amply, provided for; but the question which I have to determine is one which I am sure he could not, as a reasonable man, have contemplated. Therefore, I resile altogether from the suggestion that it is possible to interpret this will in any other manner than by looking strictly and particularly at the words which he has used. Again I resile from the suggestion that there is some kind of presumption of law which should actuate me in my approach.

There is, of course, the well-known case of In re Coller's Deed Trusts [1] (none the less difficult because well known). The difficulty, as Mr. Bagnall in his short but extremely able argument pointed out, is the reconciliation of the absolute principle laid down by Romer L.J.[2] with the approbation of the decision in In re Platt.[3] A reconciliation there may well be, and I think it is perhaps material for me to say this much for the purposes of the present case: if there is a continuing charge on income, then, as the annuitant has a charge on each and every part of income, nobody, strictly speaking, during the life of the annuitant can have anything without the consent of the annuitant; but, of course, as everybody knows, though there may be a charge on each and every part of a fund, that does not in the least mean that each and every part of the fund will be required to meet the charge. That doctrine, if given unfettered play, would produce such ridiculous results that it becomes necessary to invoke the idea that if the trustees pay over some part of the income to some other beneficiary without the consent of the annuitant, technically they have committed a breach of trust, but it is a breach of trust which is justified. If that is the reconciliation, it does not make a great appeal to me, but I do not know of any other. At any rate, Romer L.J. did say one thing with absolute certainty, and it is on this that I think this case will largely turn, namely [4]: "But what is to happen to the surplus remaining in any year "after the annuity and all arrears up to that time have been "satisfied? I cannot think that the answer to this question "admits of any doubt. Where any property is charged with or "is subject to a trust for payment of an annuity the annuitant "is entitled to demand and can, by taking the appropriate steps, "ensure that every part of that property is made available for "payment of the annuity, and the right of the annuitant must "prevail whatever may be the nature of the property that is "charged or is the subject-matter of the trust. Where, there-"fore, the property in question is the income of a fund, the "annuitant is in strictness"—and I would emphasize those two words "in strictness"—"entitled to require that the surplus "income in any year, after keeping down the current instalments "of the annuity and any existing arrears, shall, within the limits "permissible by law, be accumulated for the purpose of meeting "subsequent instalments. If this be the right, as I think it is, "of an annuitant whose annuity is a continuing charge upon "the income of a fund until paid in full, any directions in the "instrument creating the annuity that are inconsistent with that "right indicate that the annuity is not meant to be so charged."

Having regard to the extraordinary incidence of a continuing charge, if strictly applied—and I must confess I do not know if I am right in thinking that the words "in strictness" mean "according to the principles of equity," but I think that they must—one would be slow, I should have thought, to find a continuing charge except in a very clear case. I do not altogether relish a situation in which the law says that a man has an equitable right but that he would be so unreasonable in enforcing it that the court would never assist him. That appears to be the position with regard to these continuing charges in certain cases.

[4] [1939] Ch. 277, 281.

One thing that is clear is that this question is a question of construction in the first instance. The words of the gift are quite unusual in their form, though not unusual in substance, and are as follows: "My trustees shall pay or cause to be paid one-third "of the income of the residue of the said moneys," which are defined as "the trust fund," "to my wife for her life." So far, that is simple, and then this is the additional clause which creates what I think is undoubtedly an annuity in law: "and if one-third "of the income of the trust fund shall in any year during the "life of my said wife amount to less than £6,500 per annum free "of English income and super-tax"—the word "English" is there because this testator had many interests abroad—"my "trustees shall in respect of that year pay or cause to be paid to "my said wife out of the income of the trust fund in addition to "one-third of the income thereof such further sum as will give "to her a net income for that year of £6,500 free of English "income and super-tax." As everybody knows, a fantastic gross income is now required to produce that net sum. I have lost the faculty of calculating anything so vast; and, of course, the gross income of this estate, great though it is, is quite insufficient to provide that sum, even though it is reduced by the operation of section 25 of the Finance Act, 1941. The will goes on: "Subject to the interest of my said wife in part of the income of "the trust fund under the last preceding clause hereof my "trustees shall upon my [son] attaining the age of 25 years hold "the income of the trust fund upon (subject as hereinafter men-"tioned) protective trusts for my said son during the remainder "of his life."

The testator had only one son. He was born on October 5, 1916. He died on August 19, 1940; so that he attained 21, but he did not attain 25. He was married, but there is no provision under this will for any wife of his. He was quite a small boy when the testator died, and he had no issue.

Clause 14 directs: "After the death of my said son my "trustees shall (subject to the interest aforesaid of my said wife "in part of the income of the trust fund during her life) stand "possessed of the capital and future income of the trust fund in "trust for the issue of my said son in such shares and in such "manner" as his son should appoint. As he had no issue, he could not exercise the power of appointment, and the trusts in favour of issue in default of appointment also failed.

Clause 15 directs: "If at my death my said son shall be "under the age of 25 years my trustees may until he attains the "age of 25 years apply or cause to be applied the whole or such "part as they in their discretion shall think fit of the income "which my said son would if he had attained the age of 25 years "be entitled to receive under the trusts hereinbefore contained "for or towards his maintenance education or benefit and may "either themselves so apply the same or may pay the same to

CAMERON, DECD., In re. CURRIE v. MILLIGAN.

Roxburgh J.

"the guardians or guardian of my said son for the purpose "aforesaid without seeing to the application thereof and shall "accumulate the residue of such income and hold such accumu-"lations and the resulting income thereof for the person or "persons who shall eventually become entitled to the principal "fund from which the same shall have proceeded with power at "their discretion to apply the said accumulations or any part "thereof during the infancy of my said son as if the same were "income arising in the then current year"; and clause 16 provides: "Upon my said son attaining the age of 21 years and "until he shall attain the age of 25 years"—and, of course, he did attain 21, though he never attained 25; so this clause came into operation—"my trustees shall pay to him out of the income "referred to in the last preceding clause hereof such sums as "with any income provided for him by any settlement will make "up his income to the sum of £1,000 per annum at least and "shall accumulate the remainder (if any) of such income and "hold such accumulations and the resulting income thereof in "the same manner and for the same purposes as if they were "made in pursuance of the last preceding clause hereof." That clause also raises great difficulties, to which I will revert presently.

By clause 18: "If the trusts hereinbefore declared shall fail "or determine then subject to the trusts powers and provisions "hereinbefore declared and contained and to the powers by law "vested in my trustees and to every or any exercise of such "powers my trustees shall hold the trust fund and the income "thereof in trust for such of my said sisters," and he mentions the persons specifically, "as shall be living at the failure or "determination of the prior trusts hereinbefore contained," with a clause of substitution. I have already held that the failure or determination of the prior trusts will not happen until the death of the testator's widow. She is still alive.

I must confess that if clause 12 (which, of course, is the primary clause) stood alone, I should, on the whole, be inclined to say that there was not a continuing charge on income. That depends on how I construe the words "shall in respect of that "year pay or cause to be paid to my said wife out of the income "of the trust fund in addition to one-third of the income thereof "such further sum as will give to her a net income for that year "of" so much. Mr. Swingland, in a very able argument, said: the testator does not say "out of the income of the trust fund "in that year," and therefore presumably he meant "out of the "income of the trust fund generally"; but, on the whole, though it is a matter of first impression, it seems to me that, from the context in this clause which I have already read, must be implied the limitation of the income to the income of the particular year. That seems to me to be exactly what the testator meant: that and nothing else.

However, I should be very slow to decide the case on that ground if I could find no other, because that, after all, is a question of first impression and I can well believe that it might strike other people differently. Some people may not be so impressed as I am by the extreme improbability that anybody in a will of this sort would want to create a continuing charge on income when it has the vast consequences indicated by the judgment of Romer L.J. in In re Coller's Deed Trusts.[5]

I think that the matter is really concluded by clause 13, because it begins: "Subject to the interest of my said wife in "part of the income of the trust fund." There are two things to notice about that. It may be of some significance that he uses the word "interest" and not the word "charge" or simply the words "subject to." He says "Subject to the interest," an unusual phrase which, so far as I am concerned, seems to me to point away from rather than in the direction of a charge. But that is a small point compared with the next point which Mr. Bagnall urged, which is that, if there is a continuing charge, its very nature involves a charge on each and every part of the income, as Romer L.J. said quite specifically. Therefore, it seems to me that by saying that it is an interest in a part of the income of the trust fund—and he said it more than once, but it gains no additional strength by repetition—he has in effect said that it is not a continuing charge. That seems to me to be a devastating point. The fact that not all the income would ever be expected to be required in the days when the will was made is, to my mind, beside the point. If there is a continuing charge, it is because the will is construed as saying that income is only to be dealt with subject to a continuing charge by the annuitant on each and every part thereof; and this phrase, in my opinion, is quite inconsistent with that conception.

I think that there are other indications which point in the same direction, but I must confess that I regard that one as almost conclusive.

There is one different line of argument which I must now consider. Clause 15 gives an express power to resort to accumulations. If there is one thing that is clear about that power, it is that it was not inserted for the benefit of the widow in respect of her annuity, and I do not think that by accident it was limited to infancy. It was so said in terms, and I do not think that it was an accident. I have been asked to strike out the words "during the infancy," so as to construe it as giving a power to resort to accumulations in aid of the widow's annuity. I can see no ground at all for striking out those words. It seems to me that they were intended to be there. So far as clause 16 is concerned, I think that something has gone wrong, because I do not think that was intended to be confined to

CAMERON, DECD., In re. CURRIE v. MILLIGAN.

Roxburgh J.

infancy, and I think that it would be difficult to construe it otherwise. However, I need not pursue that point, because if I were disposed to do violence to clause 16, which I am not, I should merely extend the power to resort to accumulations during the period between the date when the infant attained 21 years and the date when he would have attained 25 years if he had lived, and accordingly I would not, even if I did anything to it, extend it in such a way as to enable resort to be had to it now after his death.

That being so, I have come to the conclusion that there is no continuing charge on income. It has not been contended that there is a charge on capital. The result is that the widow has no power to resort to the accumulations or to the income of the accumulations in right of her annuity. I say that because she may be entitled under a different title.

I now must mention that the period allowed by law for accumulation ended on February 23, 1950; so, of course, there can be no lawful accumulation after that date, and I think that it is agreed that as from that date the widow is entitled to the income from the accumulations in right of intestacy. It has not been contended that the widow is not entitled to the income of the accumulations since that date. I suppose that she receives the surplus income, if any, but there will not be any; so it does not matter.

Declarations accordingly.

The duty "to provide . . . the services of specialists" placed on the Minister of Health by section 3 (1) (c) of the National Health Service Act, 1946, is not limited to the provision of specialists but extends to the provision of treatment by those specialists. Accordingly a specialist appointed under the section, when performing an operation on the plaintiff, was acting as the agent of the Minister in execution of an Act of Parliament or a public duty, and was entitled to rely on the protection of section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, so as to bar the plaintiff's right of action in a claim for alleged negligence brought by her against the specialist more than one year from the date of the operation.

Decision of Lord Goddard C.J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Lord Goddard C.J.

The defendant, Laurence Alfred Howard Snowball, was a part-time surgeon engaged as a specialist under the National Health Service. The terms of his engagement were contained in a letter of January 5, 1950, written to him by the Secretary of the South-East Metropolitan Regional Hospital Board, as follows: "I am instructed by the South-East "Metropolitan Regional Hospital Board to offer you a part-"time appointment as general and orthopaedic surgeon with "effect from January 1, 1950, to the staff of the hospitals "maintained by the following hospital management com-"mittee(s) Eastbourne (general surgery—two notional half-"days); (orthopaedic surgery—two notional half-days)." The letter stated further that the duties attached to the appointment were "the provision of hospital and specialist services under "section 3 of the National Health Service Act, 1946,[1] within "your appointment," and continued: "The average number of "hours per week for which, it is estimated, these duties and the "travelling time necessary for the performance of these duties will "require your attendance is fourteen and this number of hours "represents four notional half-days." His salary, £795 9s. 1d., for the part-time work he was to do was then stated. The appointment incorporated the terms and conditions of service issued in a pamphlet by the National Health Service. On January 11, 1950, Mr. Snowball accepted the terms of the appointment.

On November 23, 1950, Mr. Snowball performed an operation on the plaintiff, Gloria Maria Razzel, at the St. Mary's Hospital, Eastbourne. Two years later, on November 28, 1952, the plaintiff brought an action against Mr. Snowball alleging negligence in his conduct as a surgeon. On a preliminary point, the defendant claimed that the proceedings were out of time, since he had performed the operation in the course of his duty, and that he was protected by the one-year limitation provided by section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939 (repealed by the Law Reform (Limitation of Actions) Act, 1954) in that he was "acting in execution or purported execution of a public duty or

J. R Cumming-Bruce for the defendant.

The following cases were cited in the argument: Gold v. Essex County Council[3]; Nelson v. Cookson[4]; Higgins v. North West Metropolitan Hospital Board and Bach[5]; Cassidy v. Minister of Health[6]; Collins v. Hertfordshire County Council[7]; Roe v. Minister of Health[8]; Griffiths v. Smith[9]; Drake v. Bedfordshire County Council.[10]

DENNING L.J. delivered a judgment which he later revised to read as follows. He stated the facts, and continued:—I am glad to say that since the Law Reform (Limitation of Actions) Act, 1954, the problems arising from the Public Authorities Protection Acts will no longer trouble the courts. Since June, 1954, the period of limitation is the same for everybody whether they are public authorities or not, namely, three years. But this case is not affected by that Act. The question here is whether the surgeon is within the protection of the Limitation Act, 1939. Section 21 protects the surgeon if the act was done "in pursuance, or "execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or "of any public duty or authority." The surgeon says that he comes within that section because it was the duty of the Minister of Health under the National Health Service Act, 1946, to provide treatment by means of specialists; that, when he was operating on the plaintiff, he was only an agent of the Minister carrying out the Minister's duty; and that he is therefore protected by the Act; whereas the plaintiff says that the Minister was under no such duty. The Minister's duty, she says, was only to provide the specialists and not the treatment; and that when the surgeon performed the operation he was not carrying out the Minister's duty but only the surgeon's private duty. The question therefore is, what is the Minister's duty under the Act? Is it to provide treatment or merely to provide specialists? This depends, of course, on the true interpretation of the Act.

By section 1 it is the duty of the Minister to "promote the "establishment in England and Wales of a comprehensive "health service . . . and for that purpose to provide or secure "the effective provision of services in accordance with the "following provisions of this Act." One of the services which he has to provide is "hospital and specialist services," and in regard to them section 3 (1) of the Act says that "it shall be "the duty of the Minister to provide throughout England and "Wales, to such extent as he considers necessary to meet all "reasonable requirements, accommodation and services of the "following descriptions, that is to say:—(a) hospital accommo-"dation; (b) medical, nursing and other services required at or "for the purposes of hospitals; (c) the services of specialists, "whether at a hospital, a health centre provided under Part III "of this Act or a clinic or, if necessary on medical grounds, at "the home of the patient." As I read that section in the light of the other sections of the Act and of the regulations, it is the duty of the Minister to provide all necessary services at the hospitals. He is to do it by means of doctors and nurses under paragraph (b) and by means of specialists under paragraph (c). He does not discharge his duty merely by appointing competent doctors and nurses and competent specialists. He has not merely to provide the staff. He has to provide their services; and, inasmuch as their services consist of treating the sick, it is his duty to treat the sick by means of their services.

An attempt was made to distinguish between doctors and nurses under paragraph (b) and specialists under paragraph (c). It was conceded that doctors and nurses were carrying out the duty of the Minister but it was said that specialists were not. I cannot see any justification for this distinction. All of them, doctors, nurses and specialists, are carrying out the Minister's duty to treat the sick.

Turning back now to the contract by which Mr. Snowball was engaged, there can be no doubt that the regional board appointed Mr. Snowball as a specialist to perform the duty which the Act laid on the Minister, namely, to treat the sick by means of specialist services: and that being so, Mr. Snowball was simply carrying out the Minister's duty and is protected by the Limitation Act.

In support of this interpretation of the Act I would refer to the observations which Lord Greene M.R. and Goddard L.J. made in Gold v. Essex County Council.[1] The terms of the Act then in question were those of the Public Health Act, 1936. They were not nearly so strong as the terms of the National Health Act, 1946, but nevertheless both Lord Greene M.R. and Goddard L.J. were clearly of opinion that the effect was to impose a duty on the hospital authority not merely to provide staff but also to provide treatment—in short to treat the sick.

It is no new thing to find the doctors and surgeons of public hospitals protected by the Limitation Act. In Nelson v. Cookson,[2] Atkinson J. held that medical officers of the West Middlesex County Hospital were entitled to the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Act. In Higgins v. North West Metropolitan Hospital Board and Bach,[3] Pilcher J. held that a part-time specialist who was performing duties in the hospital was protected under section 21 of the Limitation Act.

In the present case Lord Goddard C.J. followed those cases. He stated the true position when he said: "I think that the "surgeon is an agent, both of the Minister and of the hospital "board, because the Minister and the hospital boards have "specific duties to carry out; that is to say, to offer medical "and surgical treatment." As an agent of a public authority, he is entitled to the protection of the Limitation Act just as the public authority itself.

Mr. Bernstein pressed us with some observations in the cases about consultants. He said the defendant was a part-time consultant, and that a consultant was in a different position from the staff of the hospital. I think Mr. Cumming-Bruce gave the correct answer when he said that, whatever may have been the position of a consultant in former times, nowadays, since the National Health Service Act, 1946, the term "consultant" does not denote a particular relationship between a doctor and a hospital. It is simply a title denoting his place in the hierarchy of the hospital staff. He is a senior member of the staff but nevertheless just as much a member of the staff as the house surgeon. Whether he is called specialist or consultant makes no difference. He, like all the others, is just carrying out the duties of the Minister and is entitled to the protection of section 21 of the Limitation Act. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT L.J. By section 1 of the National Health Service Act of 1946, it was the design of Parliament that there should be instituted a comprehensive free health service, which the Minister of Health was enjoined and empowered to set up; and it was that health service to which Mrs. Razzel appealed when she went for the operation to her toes. By section 3, the Minister is empowered to provide that health service. It is quite true that the section is split up by saying: "to provide through-"out England and Wales, to such extent as he considers "necessary to meet all reasonable requirements, accommodation "and services of the following descriptions, that is to say:—

" (a) hospital accommodation " with which we are not concerned and " (b) medical, nursing and other services required at or for " the purposes of hospitals " with which we are concerned. Mr. Bernstein says that if in (b) there had been put in brackets " including specialists' services " he would have nothing more to say; but because in the Act of Parliament specialists' services were put under (c) by themselves—" the services of specialists, " whether at a hospital, a health centre provided under Part III " of this Act or a clinic or, if necessary on medical grounds, at " the home of the patient "—he says that the protection of section 21 cannot apply; that the draftsman had in mind that all that the Minister was empowered to do was to provide the man, namely, the specialist, and that this elaborate machinery of the regional board and so on was designed with that end in view. My mind is coloured a great deal by this fact, that after (a), (b) and (c) have been set out in section 3, it concludes: " and any accommodation and services provided under this " section are in this Act referred to as ' hospital and specialist " ' services ' "—linking them all together. It would be simple to go through this Act of Parliament and see how in section after section that same phraseology is employed. The two are linked together; in section 11, for example, regional hospital boards, management committees, boards of governors, and so on, are to be constituted by the Minister " for such areas as he may " by order determine, for the purpose of exercising functions " with respect to the administration of hospital and specialist " services in those areas." In sections 12, 13, 14 and so on, one finds that, although the draftsman has certainly separated (a), (b) and (c), they are all linked together in " hospital services." It seems quite impossible to contend that what the Act was aiming at and saying was: " Your duty, Mr. Minister, is to find " the men." It must mean that what the Minister is to be empowered and enjoined to do is not merely to select the men but the specialists to perform the services which alone make the health service of any value whatsoever. It is not merely providing the men but also the service. It is quite plain that when Mrs. Razzel went under the service for her treatment it was under the National Health Service Act. She was treated by the orthopaedic surgeon who had been appointed by the regional board as one of the specialists for that area on the terms set out. I see that in the regulations in one of the schedules there is this heading: " Category I: Work which is within the scope of the " hospital and specialist services provided under section 3 of the " Act," and there follows a long list of things which can be done and a long list of what cannot be done, hospital and specialist services being inextricably linked together. It seems plain that what Mr. Snowball was doing was that which the Minister through the board had appointed him to do. The act that he did, therefore, was done as an agent of the regional board, or the agent of the Minister, and in so doing he brought himself entirely within the words of section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act. He was doing it in execution of the Act of Parliament, that is, the Act of 1946, which itself created the health service; and it was a public duty which had been imposed by Parliament on the Minister who was acting through his agent. I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

MORRIS L.J. It was the duty of the Minister to promote a comprehensive health service. In the course of performing that duty it was his function to provide hospital and specialist services as well as hospital accommodation. It was, therefore, his duty to provide the services of medical men in the hospital, the services of nurses, the services of the hospital staff and also the services of specialists. It is clear that the position in this case cannot be affected by the circumstance that Mr. Snowball was engaged only as to part of his time; nor can it in any way affect the position that he was exercising his skill in a manner for which he was specially qualified, so that it would be inappropriate for anyone to interfere while he was in the actual course of doing what he thought best in a particular case. He was engaged by the Minister to give certain services which were a part of the hospital and specialist services which it was the duty of the Minister to provide. It would follow that Mr. Snowball was performing a public duty and that what he did and the services that he rendered were acts done in the execution or intended execution of an Act of Parliament.

We were referred by Mr. Cumming-Bruce to a passage in the speech of Lord Maugham in Griffiths v. Smith,[4] who said[5]: "It is sufficient to establish that the act was in substance done "in the course of exercising for the benefit of the public an "authority or a power conferred on the public authority not "being a mere incidental power, such as a power to carry on "a trade." In Nelson v. Cookson,[6] Atkinson J. expressed himself as follows: "The council could not exercise that authority "by their own hands, but must act through other people, and "on the relevant occasion their authority was being exercised by "these two medical men. It seems to me idle to say that they "were not acting in pursuance of a public duty and authority "conferred on the Middlesex County Council. They were per-"forming this public duty or authority, whichever you may like "to call it, as agents or delegates for and on behalf of the "council, and they are entitled to the benefit of the Act of "1893." Similarly in this case it can be said that Mr. Snowball was doing what he did as the agent or delegate for or on behalf of the Minister, and that he is entitled to the protection of section 21 of the Limitation Act. It follows from that that it is not necessary here to consider any application of the doctrine of respondeat superior to the work done by Mr. Snowball.

[5] [1941] A.C. 170, 185.

[6] [1940] 1 K.B. 100, 105.

Similarly it is not necessary to express any opinion as to the position of a medical practitioner to whom section 33 of the Act applies; nor to express any opinion on any special case such as one which might arise under section 29 of the Act. Mr. Cumming-Bruce has pointed out that there are certain differences in language in other sections which may have to be considered if and when the occasion arises. I am satisfied that the provisions of section 21 were available for Mr. Snowball, and I am in agreement with the judgment of Lord Goddard C.J.

Appeal dismissed.

* WELLS v. WELLS.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Condonation—Confession of adultery by wife with X—Act of intercourse following confession—Effect of condonation not destroyed by husband later learning extent of adulterous association with X. Restitution of conjugal rights—Desertion—Bona fide offer by deserted but guilty wife to resume cohabitation—Husband paying maintenance—Decree for restitution of conjugal rights—Mutual affection not necessary. Desertion.

A husband had intercourse with his wife immediately after she had confessed to him that she had committed adultery with and was pregnant by another man. Later he learned that she had committed adultery with the same man on a number of occasions. He thereupon left the matrimonial home, and refused to return, although his wife begged him to do so; but he continued to support her and the child of their marriage. Later the wife filed a petition for restitution of conjugal rights, and by his answer the husband alleged just cause for leaving her, namely, the adultery and other complaints not amounting to matrimonial offences. Having seen the answer, the wife wrote him a letter accusing him in turn of many unkind acts during their married life. The husband thereupon amended his answer to allege that she had not a sincere desire to resume cohabitation with him:—

Held (1) that an act of intercourse with knowledge of adultery with a man was condonation in law, the effect of which was not destroyed by later more specific knowledge of the extent of the adultery with him.

(2) That where the wife showed a genuine desire for the matrimonial home to be re-established, the court was bound to grant a decree for restitution of conjugal rights, irrespective of whether the parties had any affection for each other; a fortiori, in the present case where the wife's motive was not solely to obtain maintenance. Her letter was in the nature of a tu quoque.

Price v. Price [1951] P. 413; [1951] 2 All E.R. 580n. considered.

Decision of Mr. Commissioner Grazebrook Q.C. reversed on both points.

APPEAL from Mr. Commissioner Grazebrook Q.C.

The parties were married in 1941, and there was one child of the marriage. In May, 1951, the wife confessed to her husband that she had committed adultery with another man and was pregnant by him. On the same day, having heard his wife's confession and believing that she had committed adultery more than once, the husband had intercourse with her; but he had no further sexual relations with her after that day. He continued to live in the matrimonial home until, in November, 1951, he found a letter in her handbag which she had written to the other man, giving details which showed that she had committed adultery with him on at least eight occasions. The husband did not discuss the letter with his wife, but told her that in future he would look after himself; and in December he found other accommodation, left the matrimonial home, and did not return. She wrote to him many times, begging him to return, but he refused to do so, though he continued to maintain her and the child of the marriage, sending her £4 a week. Shortly after, she gave birth to the child of the other man, and registered it as the child of her husband.

In December, 1952, the wife filed a petition for restitution of conjugal rights. By his answer the husband admitted that he had refused to live with her since December, 1951, but that he had just cause for not doing so; and he set out various complaints of matters during the married life, and in particular the complaint that his wife had committed adultery.

After his wife had seen that answer, she wrote a letter to him, in which she accused him of many forms of unkind conduct during their married life. The husband thereupon amended his answer, alleging, in reliance on that letter, that his wife had not a sincere desire to resume cohabitation with him.

The commissioner, on June 18, 1954, distinguishing Henderson v. Henderson [1] on the facts, held that the occasion on which the husband had had intercourse with his wife after the confession of adultery did not amount to condonation in law, because at the time he had not been in possession of all the material facts. He held, further, that the wife was not sincere in her desire to have her husband return to her as she had not satisfied the court that she wanted him back with all that his return entailed, namely, the rendering to him of marital rights; and he refused to grant the decree prayed for.

The wife appealed.

D. R. Stuckey for the wife.
Victor Russell for the husband.

The following cases were cited in the argument: Williams v. Williams [2]; Palmer v. Palmer [3]; Harnett v. Harnett [4]; Price v. Price [5]; Timmins v. Timmins [6]; Russell v. Russell [7]; Greene v. Greene.[8]

LORD GODDARD C.J. Although I feel bound to say that I think the decision of the commissioner, refusing the wife an order for restitution of conjugal rights, must be reversed, I have very considerable sympathy for the view which he took, because the law seems to be in a somewhat curious position in regard to this matter. We have had a number of cases cited to us, and it is not easy to reconcile them all.

[His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] We feel that we cannot say that there was no condonation here without knowledge of the facts. It was always the same man. It was not as if the wife had committed adultery on eight occasions with eight different men. She had told her husband that she had been unfaithful to him, and committed adultery with the father of the expected child, and the husband admitted that he did not suppose it was one solitary act. It is impossible for this court now to say that where a man has intercourse with his wife with knowledge that she has committed adultery, she does not wipe out that adultery entirely, and that the act of intercourse that takes place with knowledge of his wife's unfaithfulness is not a complete condonation. Indeed, Lord Simon L.C., delivering the opinion of the House in Henderson v. Henderson,[1] made it quite clear that where intercourse takes place with knowledge of adultery, it is a complete and absolute condonation.

I cannot see that it matters in the least whether the husband has admitted that at the time he had this act of intercourse with his wife he suspected that she had been guilty of more than one act of adultery. In fact, she never said on that occasion that she had been guilty of only one act of adultery. She told him she had committed adultery. She told him that she was "in "the family way" by this man. Whether she had committed adultery once, twice, or eight times has no bearing on the subject at all. The husband had intercourse with his wife, and thereby condoned the adultery.

After he had left her she wrote many letters to him, begging him to come back. The husband admitted that he thought she did want him back. It is only fair to the husband to say that he has been supporting his wife and, at any rate, the one child of their marriage, by sending her £4 a week.

She then filed a petition for restitution of conjugal rights, and the husband put in an answer in which he accused her of various matters of conduct to show that she was not a good wife to him, although not alleging any matrimonial offence, other than this particular act of adultery which the court has said is condoned. After he put in that answer, she wrote him a very angry letter, in which she said: "You have committed adultery. You know "quite well you have committed adultery"; and she catalogued various other causes of complaint, which she had against him; but I am bound to say that, taking as dispassionate a view of this case as I can, it is very much in the nature of what a schoolboy would call a tu quoque. As he had in his answer set out various complaints against her, she said: "How about you! "Think of all the complaints I have against you."

The commissioner held that he was not satisfied that she had a sincere desire to return to her husband. It seems to me that he has, perhaps, misunderstood or not given due consideration to the expression "lack of sincerity" as used in the cases. I need not refer to all the cases cited because Price v. Price[2] is, at any rate, one which impresses me very much. The wife there admitted that she hated her husband; she said she hated her husband; nevertheless, this court held that, as she obviously desired that the home should be re-established, she was entitled to a decree.

On the question of sincerity, or the question whether there is a sincere wish for the husband to return and live with the wife, although there were various expressions used about living together as man and wife in a true and happy way, the court cannot go into what Hodson L.J. described as the emotional reasons. The fact that the spouse commits a matrimonial offence does not mean that she does not genuinely desire the return of the husband, and if she does, the court awards a decree.

In the present case, the wife is being supported by the husband. She does not contend that she is not receiving support. That fact alone seems to show that she really does want him to return to her. He need not return to her if the decree is made. The court does not force him to go back, but it does give her the right to obtain a sum of money. She is already obtaining a sum of money. Whether she wants any more, or is likely to get any more, I do not know. It is also possible that if he did go back, he would go away very quickly. However that may be, the cases show that if she does obviously want her husband to go back to her—and I think the facts show that—although she may have no affection for him and he none for her, the court is bound to grant a decree. Therefore, the appeal must be allowed, although I decide so with some regret.

Sale of Goods—C.I.F.—Bank guarantee—Provision for bank guarantee by buyers to sellers on first presentation of documents—Repudiation by sellers before receipt of guarantee — Event guaranteed — Time when guarantee to be provided.

A contract made on August 11, 1952, for the sale of Canadian barley c.i.f. Antwerp-Hamburg range provided for shipment during October/November, 1952, payment to be net cash in London upon first presentation of documents, the buyers to give the sellers through their London bank a guarantee that the documents would be taken up on first presentation. as to the date of the guarantee. On September 10 the sellers purported to cancel the contract alleging that they were entitled so to do as the guarantee had not been received. On September 10 also the buyers' London bank informed the sellers that an irrevocable letter of credit had been opened by the buyers in favour of the sellers, but the sellers maintained their refusal to carry out their obligations under the contract and on September 16 the buyers referred the matter to arbitration.

An appeal committee found or held that the buyers' obligation was to provide the guarantee within a reasonable time before the first shipment date, namely, October 1, 1952; that such reasonable time had not arrived by September 10; that the sellers had wrongfully repudiated the contract; and that the buyers accepted that repudiation on September 16 and were entitled to damages accordingly.

By special case the following question was submitted for determination by the court: "Whether on the true construction of the "documents and the facts as found the sellers were entitled to "treat the contract as determined":—

Held, affirming the award, that the committee had not erred in law in favour of the buyers.

APPEAL from Devlin J.[1]

On August 8, 1952, an English company, Oilcakes and Oilseeds Trading Co. Ld., obtained approval from the Bank of England Foreign Exchange Control under the terms of a notice "Mer-"chanting Trade-Resale of Dollar Raw Materials to E.P.U. "countries" (F.E.C. 461) to purchase in America for resale in Western Germany a quantity of Canadian Barley c.i.f. for a sterling return of £580,000. On August 11, 1952, Oilcakes and Oilseeds Trading Co. Ld. entered into a contract with an American corporation, Sinason-Teicher Inter-American Grain Corporation, whereby they agreed to buy and the American corporation to sell 9,500 tons, 1,016 kilos. each No. 2 Canadian barley, for shipment during October-November, at a price of U.S.$75.15 per 1,000 kilos net, in bulk, delivered weight, c.i.f. Antwerp-Hamburg range, buyers' option, discharging expenses for sellers' account. Payment was to be net cash in London on first presentation of documents, the buyers to give the sellers through their London bank the guarantee that the documents would be taken up on first presentation. The contract incorporated the conditions of the London Corn Trades Association Ld. The contract was part of a switch transaction and the German firms to which the goods were ultimately to be sold guaranteed "the ordered liquidation of the above contract." A number of organizations were concerned in the switch transaction, which was organized by the Commission Internationale Futtermittel G.m.b.H. of Frankfurt-Main, who also acted as agents for the American sellers. The English buyers' agents were a German firm, Lichtenstein and Mannheimer, Hamburg. The terms of the guarantee required by the sellers were communicated to the buyers on August 12. On August 19 the sellers sent their contract of sale dated August 11 through their agents to the buyers, having previously been informed that the buyers' guaranteeing bank in London was Hambros Bank, but that the bank guarantee called for by the contract could only be established after the German bank guarantee had been obtained. The sellers did not mention to the buyers at that stage, nor was any insertion made in the contract, of a date by which the bank guarantee was to be supplied. On August 31 the sellers informed their agents that they expected the guarantee to be supplied by September 2, and on September 4 they informed the German buyer that they would extend this date to September 9. This information was passed on to the buyers' agents.

Meanwhile, the buyers concluded the formalities required by the Bank of England by submitting, on September 8, 1952, the required sterling transfer forms and the firm contracts for the bank's approval. On September 9 Hambros Bank cabled the sellers stating that they had been instructed by the buyers to issue a guarantee in the sellers' favour subject to Bank of England approval. On September 10 the sellers communicated with their agents, referring to the cable from Hambros Bank and stating that they were compelled to cancel the sale by reason of the failure of the buyers to furnish the guarantee in time, and requesting them to inform the buyers accordingly. This message was duly communicated to the buyers' agents. Also, on September 10, Bank of England approval having been received, Hambros Bank cabled to the sellers the terms of an irrevocable letter of credit opened by the buyers in favour of the sellers, the terms of which were substantially the same as those required by the guarantee provided for by the sellers. On the same day the sellers informed the buyers by cable that as the cable received from Hambros Bank on September 9 had not contained the payment guarantee the "deadline" for supplying the "performance "guarantee" had expired without performance and they had "cancelled the deal" that night. Thereupon, the buyers informed the sellers that no deadline had been received or accepted, and that as the guarantee had already been sent in the form of a letter of credit they insisted upon the execution of the contract. The sellers repeated that they considered the sale cancelled, and did not reply to further communications made to them by the buyers. On September 15 the buyers asked the sellers for a declaration that delivery would be executed within twenty-four hours, and no reply being received, referred the matter to arbitration.

At the hearing by the appeal committee of the London Corn Trades Association Ld. of an appeal by the sellers from the umpire's decision awarding damages to the buyers for the wrongful repudiation of the contract, it was contended for the sellers inter alia (1) that the buyers through their agents had agreed that the date for the opening of the guarantee should be September 1, and also to the extended date of September 9; (2) that if there was no agreed express date then the buyers' obligation under the contract was to secure that the guarantee was given as soon as reasonably possible, that they did not do this, and that, therefore, they were in default, and the sellers were entitled to treat the contract as at an end; and that it had been properly determined on September 10, 1952; (3) that the letter of credit dispatched by the bank was too late and its terms immaterial in law, but that if it were material the document did not comply with the contract because it was not a bank guarantee.

It was contended for the buyers (1) that it was not a term of the contract that the buyers should cause the bank guarantee to be opened at any date prior to September 10; (2) that the buyers' obligation in relation to the bank guarantee was to cause it to be available to the sellers by the first shipment date under the contract, namely, October 1, 1952; or, alternatively (3) within a reasonable time before the first shipment date, and that such reasonable time had not arrived by September 10; (4) that the sellers having repudiated the contract before the arrival of the letter of credit opened by the buyers were not entitled to rely on the matters complained of in relation thereto as justifying repudiation; (5) that the opening of a letter of credit was a proper and customary compliance with the buyers' obligation under the contract; and (6) alternatively, that if it were not so, that non-compliance did not evince an intention on the part of the buyers to repudiate the contract.

The committee found, inter alia, that, although the sellers purported to require the guarantee by September 9, the buyers had never agreed to any fixed date nor had they authorised their agents so to do. In so far as it was a question of fact they found, and in so far as it was a question of law, they held (1) that the buyers' obligation was to provide a bank guarantee within a reasonable time before October 1, 1952, being the first shipment date, and that such reasonable time had not arrived by September 10, 1952; (2) that as Bank of England approval was not obtained until September 9, the buyers were entitled to a reasonable period of time after that date to obtain such guarantee, and that such reasonable time had not elapsed by September 10. They found further that the letter of credit opened by the buyers was a sufficient compliance with the contract, and that the sellers did not object to its form, but repudiated the contract before its receipt and maintained that repudiation thereafter. They therefore awarded that the sellers had wrongfully repudiated the contract on September 10, 1952, which was accepted as a final breach by the buyers on September 16, 1952, and awarded damages to the buyers.

In the special case stated by the appeal committee the question of law stated for determination of the court was whether, on the true construction of the documents and the facts as found, the sellers were entitled to treat the contract as determined. Devlin J. answered the question in the negative.

Cases cited in argument: Pavia & Co. S.P.A. v. Thurmann-Nielsen [2]; Heisler v. Anglo-Dal Ld.[3]

DENNING L.J. This arbitration arises out of a "switch "transaction." An English company, a buyer, called Oilcakes and Oilseeds Trading Co. Ld., bought 9,500 tons of Canadian seed barley from an American company, Sinason-Teicher Inter-American Grain Corporation, who were the sellers. The contract provided that payment was to be in United States dollars. At the same time the English buyers agreed to re-sell the barley to a German concern and under that contract payment was to be in sterling. In order to carry out the "switch transaction," the German concern was to give to the English company a guarantee for the sterling, and the English buyers were to give a guarantee to the American company for the dollars. As the transaction involved the exchange control, it could not be carried out except with the consent of the Bank of England. The essence of it was that the English buyers were paying in dollars and re-selling to the Germans for sterling.

The contract between the American seller and English buyer was concluded on August 11, 1952. The goods were to be delivered c.i.f. Antwerp-Hamburg range. Shipment was to be October/November, 1952, and there was this clause as to payment: "Payment: Net cash against documents on first "presentation in London. The buyers will give the sellers "through their London bank the guarantee that the documents "will be taken up on first presentation." The contract contained no express provision as to the time when the English buyers should give the bank guarantee: and the question is when it should have been given. The American sellers said that it should have been given at latest by September 9, 1952, and that because it was not given by that time they were entitled to, and did, cancel the contract on September 10, 1952. The English buyers said that they were not bound to give the guarantee by that date and that the cancellation by the American sellers amounted to a repudiation of the contract.

The American sellers, at the time that they cancelled, had got a wrong view of the contract. They thought that they had a right to be given the guarantee immediately after the making of the contract, which was certainly not the case. Their attitude is well shown by the cable of September 9, 1952, which they sent to the German concern, in which they said: "At sale barley "cargo August 11 agreement was immediate guarantee Hambros "Bank. At buyers request we granted deadline till September 1, "re-extended deadline till September 5 and at urgent request "again until today"—that is, September 9—"Today, instead "of guarantee we receive cable from Hambros Bank that "guarantee still dependent on Bank of England and further "details will follow soonest. Consequently see ourselves com-"pelled to cancel sale herewith and request you inform buyers "accordingly." That was their cancellation. It was made on the basis that the agreement was for an immediate guarantee to be given by Hambros Bank; that they had the right to lay down deadlines; that the last deadline they laid down was September 9; and that, when the guarantee was not given by that date, they were entitled to cancel the contract. Mr. Ashton Roskill, for the American sellers, had to admit that that was not correct. There was nothing about an immediate guarantee and the sellers had no right to lay down those deadlines.

It must have been plain to everyone that the English buyers could not be expected to give the bank guarantee at once. Several things had to be done first. The German importers had to get their import authorization. They had also to give their guarantee to the English company that the sterling would in due course be paid. Then the matter had to be submitted to the Bank of England for approval; the Bank of England would only give their approval if they were satisfied that the purchasing contracts from Germany were all in order and that the payment in sterling would be received. It was not until the Bank of England consent had been received that the English buyers could proceed to give their bank guarantee to the American sellers. All those acts had to be done before the guarantee could be provided.

At the hearing before us the American sellers no longer contended that they had a right to an immediate guarantee (which they had contended in their cable of cancellation) nor did they contend that the guarantee should be given as soon as reasonably possible (which they had contended before the appeal committee). They contended simply that the guarantee should have been given within a reasonable time in all the circumstances. They said that it was not given within that time: and asked for the case to be remitted for a finding on that point.

The English buyers, on the other hand, contended that their obligation was only to provide the guarantee within a reasonable time before the shipment date, that is, within a reasonable time before October 1, 1952, and that that time was still open on September 10, 1952, when the American sellers cancelled the contract. In any case they say that, if the obligation was to provide the guarantee within a reasonable time in all the circumstances, that time had not elapsed by September 10, 1952. They point out that they did in fact provide the guarantee (in the form of a letter of credit) on September 10, 1952.

We were referred to Pavia & Co. S.P.A. v. Thurmann-Nielsen.[1] I agree with what Devlin J. said about that case. It does not decide that the buyer can delay right up to the first date for shipment. It only decides that he must provide the letter of credit at latest by that date. The correct view is that, if nothing is said about time in the contract, the buyer must provide the letter of credit within a reasonable time before the first date for shipment. The same applies to a bank guarantee: for it stands on a similar footing.

The appeal committee of the London Corn Trade Association found all the facts in a most comprehensive statement, and they said: "The sellers were at all times aware of the practice and "procedure with regard to this switch transaction and the need "to obtain the German guarantees before the English buyers "could establish their guarantee or letter of credit. In so far "as it is a question of fact we find, and in so far as it is a matter "of law we hold, that the buyers' obligation was to provide a "bank guarantee within a reasonable time before October 1, "1952, and that such reasonable time had not arrived by "September 10, 1952." That finding of the appeal committee is decisive against the sellers here today.

But, furthermore, the appeal committee found that on any view, even if the obligation was simply to provide the guarantee in a reasonable time in all the circumstances, the guarantee was provided within that time: they said that the proper form "was "lodged with the Bank of England on September 8 and approval "obtained on September 9, 1952. Until such approval by the "Bank of England had been obtained the buyers could not "furnish a guarantee or letter of credit to the sellers and the "buyers were entitled to a reasonable period of time after such "approval to obtain such guarantee; and so far as it is a question "of fact we find, and in so far as it is a matter of law we hold, "that such reasonable time had not elapsed by September 10."

I read that as a finding that, having regard to the amount of work which had to be done on the German side and on the English side before the bank guarantee could be furnished, a reasonable time had not elapsed by September 10, 1952. The result is that, in whichever way the obligation as to time is viewed, the appeal committee has found against the sellers. There is no error of law in the conclusions of the appeal committee or in the judge's judgment, and I think this appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT L.J. I am of the same opinion. The point which has to be determined by this court is in its essence one of simplicity and I think it is one which is capable of a simple straightforward solution. The contract with which we are concerned was made subject to the arbitration clause and the form in the contract of the London Corn Trade Association. The matter finally came before what we were told, and I readily believe, was a very expert committee with full knowledge of the Corn Trade Association and of contracts of this nature.

The question in the case which was stated was put in this way: "We were requested by counsel on behalf of the sellers "to state our award in the form of a special case under the "provisions of section 21 (1) of the Arbitration Act, 1940, upon "the following questions of law: Whether upon the true con-"struction of the documents and the facts as found"—No. 1 no longer matters. "(2) The sellers were entitled to treat the "contract as determined." To answer that question would mean in the ordinary way that the whole of the circumstances of the contract ought to be investigated, but it was I think agreed that the answer to this question really turned upon the clause in the contract respecting payment: "Net cash against documents "on first presentation in London. The buyers give the sellers "through their London Bank the guarantee that the documents "will be taken up on first presentation."

Nearly the whole of the contest in this case has been simply that the sellers were saying: "You failed in that contractual "obligation in that you did not provide the guarantee which was "there specified"; the buyers, on the other hand, were saying: "We did and, alternatively, you repudiated the contract before "we had time to do so and you wrongfully broke the contract "in that way." It is to be observed at once that this clause upon which the controversy turns makes no mention of time. It seems to me that it would have been a perfectly simple thing to say: "The buyers give the sellers through their London Bank "a guarantee that the documents will be taken up on first "presentation and they will give that guarantee immediately" or by a specified date. But no time is mentioned, and that is how the difficulty has arisen here. It is common ground, I think, between sellers and buyers, that the time which is not specified in that provision must be ascertained by saying what is a reasonable time. It is said that that reasonable time was to be a reasonable time in all the circumstances of the case.

One of the complaints of the sellers is that the appeal committee and Devlin J. have not considered all the circumstances of the case. My Lord has already pointed out that the sellers took a view about this matter which was not in any sense to be justified by the terms of the contract, for when they announced their repudiation in a cablegram, which was received in London on September 9 and would appear to have been dispatched from New York on September 9, they said: "At sale barley cargo "August 11 agreement was immediate guarantee Hambros Bank "at buyers' request we granted deadline till September 1,

Birkett L.J.

"re-extended deadline till September 5, and at urgent request "again until today. Today, instead of guarantee we receive cable "from Hambros Bank that guarantee still dependent on Bank of "England and further details will follow soonest. Consequently "see ourselves compelled to cancel sale herewith and request "you inform buyers accordingly." Mr. Ashton Roskill, for the sellers, conceded that that was a mistaken view of the contract. Plainly there was nothing said about the immediate giving of a guarantee. Plainly nothing in the contract justified the fixing unilaterally of a deadline of September 1, 3 or 9, and in that respect they were wrong. To repudiate upon that ground would be to repudiate upon a wrong ground.

But, said Mr. Ashton Roskill for the sellers, if at the time there existed a good ground for their repudiation, that matters not at all and there was in fact a good ground for repudiation. He said that when the committee considered this matter they approached it in the wrong way and applied wrong principles of law, because when they came to their conclusion they said this —and I now put a gloss upon the precise wording of the clause— "Well, we have considered this matter and we observe that by "the contract of August 11 the shipment dates were October/ "November, that is to say, the earliest date of shipment was "October 1. Having regard to the commercial purpose of this "clause relating to payment we think it must bear some relation "in its interpretation and construction to that date of October 1. "The guarantee through the bank is that the documents will be "taken up on first presentation." If the first shipment date is October 1 that date must have some relation to it, and they came finally to the conclusion that the date must be a reasonable time before October 1 and certainly at the date of repudiation, September 10, a reasonable time had not elapsed. Therefore, the sellers were in default in saying: "We are entitled to repudiate "this contract."

Mr. Ashton Roskill says that doing that the committee drew down a curtain and began to go back from the date of October 1, which was a quite reasonable way of doing it. The difficulty that I feel is that in this case stated I do not think the submission of Mr. Roskill is really justified, because by clause 15, under the general heading of "We find the following facts," when they begin to set them out they say: "The buyers had to obtain the "authority of the Bank of England on the E.2 form within one "month of the date of the approval of the switch transaction, "which approval was given on August 8, 1952. The E.2 form "was lodged with the Bank of England on September 8 and "approval obtained on September 9, 1952. Until such approval "by the Bank of England had been obtained the buyers could "not furnish a guarantee or letter of credit to the sellers and the "buyers were entitled to a reasonable period of time after such "approval to obtain such guarantee and so far as it is a question "of fact we find, and in so far as it is a matter of law we hold,

"that such reasonable time had not elapsed by September 10." As I read that particular paragraph that is not looking backwards from October 1, the first shipment date, but is looking forward from August 11.

I find it very difficult to believe that these very expert people who were sitting in this arbitration, with full knowledge of the corn trade, failed to consider all the facts of the case. They had before them counsel who presented their various points, and I think that clause 15 indicates that they were looking at it as a matter of fact both backward and forward. They say: "If you "look forward there comes a date before which the guarantee "could not be given. After that date you are entitled to a "reasonable time and the reasonable time had not elapsed when "the sellers took it into their head to repudiate the contract." In the other way they say the first shipment date was October 1. Looking at the purpose of this clause respecting payment, they say a reasonable time before October 1 had not elapsed at that self-same date of September 10. I must say for my own part that I do not think that it is made out that the committee failed to take into account all the facts of the case and that they came to their conclusion as to reasonable time on any restricted or narrow view of the matter. I think they came to their view upon full consideration of the whole of the case as it was before them.

We have not, of course, had before us all the documents which were used in the various proceedings which took place before the matter came to this court, but I would be content to say that, judging from the material which we have, judging from the findings of fact made by the committee and the very comprehensive way in which this case is stated, it is not made out that they did not give proper legal consideration to this matter. I would agree with the conclusions of Devlin J., supporting the findings of the appeal committee, and say that this appeal should be dismissed.

MORRIS L.J. I am of the same opinion. As has been pointed out, there were two points of law raised when counsel on behalf of the sellers asked the committee to state their award in the form of a special case. We have been concerned only with one of those two. That point is whether upon the true construction of the documents and facts as found the sellers were entitled to treat the contract as determined. Devlin J. has answered that question in the negative, and in my judgment he was correct. It seems to me that ultimately this case depends upon the construction of the terms of this particular contract. I think that it is helpful to have in mind, as Mr. Eustace Roskill for the buyers has reminded us, that there is a difference in the language in the last paragraph and the language in the paragraph in relation to payment. The document that we have before us is, of course, a translation. The last paragraph against the side heading "Remarks" reads as follows: "The firms C. Sachs, Nürnberg,

Morris L.J.

"Königstrasse 61, and Internationale Produkten-Handels-Gesell-"schaft m.b.H. Munich, Tal 13, guarantee to the firm Sinason-"Teicher Inter-American Grain Corporation, New York, the "orderly liquidation of the above contract." There is a contrast between those words and the words against the heading "Payment." The wording there is: "Net cash against "documents on first presentation in London. The buyers give "the sellers through their London Bank the guarantee that the "documents will be taken up on first presentation." That being a translation, the phrasing is perhaps not as happy as it would have been if the document had in the first place been drafted in the English language. But I think it is common ground that the words mean that the buyers are to give the sellers through their London Bank the guarantee. Had the sellers wished to have the guarantee that they specified within some particular time it would have been so easy for them to stipulate this. But no time is specified and, therefore, in my judgment, it becomes a question of construction, having regard to the whole terms of the contract and the purpose of the contract, as to when the sellers can require the guarantee to be given. It seems to me that as this is a guarantee in relation to payment, and as what the sellers were ensuring was payment, it is reasonable to look at this obligation in relation to the date of shipment or the date of the first presentation of documents.

It does not seem to me that anything turns on the fact that what was presented was a letter of credit and not a guarantee. As has been pointed out, it is found in the award, paragraph 15, that some time before August 21 the sellers had been requested to state the terms of the guarantee that they desired. The terms so desired are not annexed to the award, but there is the finding that "On September 10, 1952, Hambros Bank cabled to the "sellers a form of letter of credit substantially in the terms of "the guarantee required by the sellers." It still was not, of course, a guarantee. The reason I think why nothing turns on that is because, as is found in paragraph 19, "The sellers never "did raise any objection to the form of the letter of credit—"indeed they repudiated the contract before its receipt and "maintained that repudiation thereafter." The way in which the matter was put on behalf of the buyers is quite clear from the award and, indeed, it is the way in which Mr. Eustace Roskill has principally put the matter before us today. Paragraphs 5 and 6 of the contentions in the award read: "(5) That the buyers' "obligation in relation to the said bank guarantee was to cause "it to be opened so that it should be available to the sellers by "the first shipment date under the contract, namely, October 1, "1952"—that refers to the Pavia case.[2] "(6) Alternatively "that the buyers' obligation in relation to the said bank guarantee "was to cause it to be opened so that it should be available to

[2] [1952] 2 Q.B. 84.

"the sellers within a reasonable time before the first shipment "date, namely, October 1, 1952, and that such reasonable time "had not arrived by September 10, 1952."

Mr. Eustace Roskill has referred us to the decision in this court in the Pavia case,[3] in which the answer which was given by McNair J. was approved in this court. McNair J. said[3]: "Accordingly, it seems to me that, unless the sellers are to be "deprived of their right of shipment at any time during the "contract period, it necessarily follows that the credit must "be both opened and confirmed, if reasonably practicable, within "such time as will enable the sellers to ship at any moment of "their permissible period." It is, I think, clear that of the two submissions to which I have last referred made to the appeal committee and repeated here by Mr. Eustace Roskill, the committee decided on the basis of the second of those two. That is clear from their findings in paragraph 14, to which reference has been made: "In so far as it is a question of fact we find, and "in so far as it is a matter of law we hold, that the buyers' "obligation was to provide a bank guarantee within a reasonable "time before October 1, 1952, and that such reasonable time had "not arrived by September 10, 1952."

It seems to me that if it can be said there was any error in that at all it was an error in favour of the sellers and I am quite unable to see that the decision that the sellers were not entitled to repudiate the contract was erroneous as a matter of law. On that ground I consider that the learned judge answered this question correctly and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

COMPTROLLER OF CUSTOMS.

Evidence—Expert—Foreign law—Competency of experienced layman—"Specially skilled"—"To the best of my knowledge." Exchange Control.

Not only the general nature, but also the precise character of the question upon which expert evidence is required, have to be taken into account when deciding whether the qualifications of a person entitle him to be regarded as a competent expert witness. Accordingly, the practical knowledge of a person who is not a lawyer may be sufficient in certain cases to qualify him as a competent expert on a question of foreign law.

Vander Donckt v. Thellusson (1849) 8 C.B. 812, 814, approved.

There is nothing in sections 56 and 57 of the Evidence Ordinance of Nigeria, which enacts in section 56 that the evidence of a person "specially skilled" on a point of foreign law is admissible as expert evidence, which is opposed to that view. The knowledge which entitles a person to be deemed "specially skilled" on some points of foreign law may be gained in appropriate circumstances by a person whose profession is not that of law.

Where, therefore, it was established that a branch bank manager, who had been engaged in banking business in Nigeria for 24 years, had to, and did, in the course of his business keep in touch with current law and practice with regard to notes that were legal tender in French West Africa, his evidence that a number of French colonial bank notes which the appellant had admittedly attempted to export from Nigeria were at the time legal tender in French West Africa was admissible to, and did, prove that fact, and the appellant had therefore contravened section 22 (1) of the Exchange Control Ordinance, 1950, of Nigeria, which prohibited the exportation, amongst other things, of "any notes of a class which are . . . "legal tender in the United Kingdom . . . or in any other "territory."

Judgment of the West African Court of Appeal affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 16 of 1953) from a judgment of the West African Court of Appeal (Verity P. (C.J., Nigeria), O. Jibowu and Coussey JJ.) (February 19, 1952) dismissing an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Nigeria (Bairamian J.) (November 19, 1951). The Supreme Court had by its judgment dismissed an appeal from a judgment in the magistrates court (August 11, 1951) in favour of the respondent.

The respondent, who was the Comptroller of Customs of Nigeria, claimed in the magistrates court against the appellant a penalty of £61,778 2s. 6d. and the forfeiture of 9,884,500 French colonial franc notes on the ground that the appellant had on June 15, 1951, attempted to export the said notes, the exportation of which was prohibited by section 22 (1) of the Exchange Control Ordinance, 1950. On this appeal the appellant did not dispute that he attempted to export 9,884,500 notes from Nigeria on June 15, 1951. It was further not disputed that the respondent was entitled to succeed in this appeal if it was held that section 22 (1) of the Exchange Control Ordinance prohibited the exportation of the 9,884,500 notes.

Section 22 (1) prohibited the exportation, amongst other things, of:—"any notes of a class which are or have at any time

"been legal tender in the United Kingdom or any part of the "United Kingdom or in any other territory. . . ."

It was not disputed on this appeal that French West Africa came within the meaning of the word "territory" in section 22 (1).

It was contended by the appellant that the evidence led by the respondent in the magistrates court did not establish a fact sought to be proved in, and held to be proved by, the courts in Africa, namely, that the notes in question were legal tender in French West Africa on June 15, 1951. That was the sole point raised by the appellant and the sole point for decision by their Lordships of the Board.

November 8. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by MR. L. M. D. DE SILVA, who stated the facts sets out above, and continued: It was necessary to call an expert to prove that the francs were legal tender in West Africa on June 15, 1951, and the expert evidence called by the respondent was that of one Mr. Greenway. The whole of his evidence, given in examination-in-chief, consisted of the following: "Manager, Barclay's Bank, "Kano, in banking business 32 years, 24 years in Nigeria, I look "at these notes, they are to the best of my knowledge French "colonial franc notes, they were legal tender in French West "West Africa on June 15 this year. On that day these francs "were worth 490 to £1 English note. The English value of "9,884,500 francs is therefore, £20,172."

He was not cross-examined and no evidence was led by the appellant to contradict what he said. After the respondent had closed his case the appellant did not give evidence, nor was any evidence led on his behalf.

AJAMI
v.
COMPTROLLER
OF CUSTOMS.

The appellant concedes that Mr. Greenway is a credible witness, but contends that upon the facts deposed to by him he cannot be regarded in law as a competent expert witness. It is further contended that even if it be held that Mr. Greenway was competent to give evidence as an expert, he has so qualified his evidence that it cannot be regarded as proving the facts sought to be established.

It has been argued strenuously that upon a matter which involves a question of law no person who is not a professional lawyer could be regarded as a competent expert. Their Lordships do not agree. In Vander Donckt v. Thellusson,[1] it was held that a person who though not a lawyer, had become conversant with a point of foreign law by " carrying on a business which made it " his interest to take cognisance " of the point, was a competent witness on that point. Their Lordships share this view. A number of other cases were cited to their Lordships which, although they contain observations relevant to the facts of each case do not, in their Lordships' view, qualify in any way the principle stated in the case referred to above. Their Lordships do not propose to refer to each of these cases separately. A principle which emerges from them considered together is that not only the general nature, but also the precise character of the question upon which expert evidence is required, have to be taken into account when deciding whether the qualifications of a person entitle him to be regarded as a competent expert. So the practical knowledge of a person who is not a lawyer may be sufficient in certain cases to qualify him as a competent expert on a question of foreign law.

Their Lordships observe that there is nothing opposed to the views they have expressed above in the relevant statute law of Nigeria, which is to be found in sections 56 and 57 of the Evidence Ordinance of Nigeria and is to the following effect:

" 56.—(1) When the court has to form an opinion upon a " point of foreign law, native law or custom, or of science or art, " or as to identity of handwriting or finger impressions, the " opinions upon that point of persons specially skilled in such " foreign law, native law or custom, or science or art, or in " questions as to identity of handwriting or finger impressions, " are relevant facts (2) Such persons are called experts. " 57.—(1) Where there is a question as to foreign law the " opinions of experts who in their profession are acquainted with " such law are admissible evidence thereof, though such experts " may produce to the court books which they declare to be works " of authority upon the foreign law in question, which books the " court, having received all necessary explanations from the " expert, may construe for itself. (2) Any question as to the " effect of the evidence given with respect to foreign law shall,

[1] (1849) 8 C.B. 812, 814.

"instead of being submitted to the jury, in the case of trial with "a jury, be decided by the judge alone."

The Ordinance enacts that the evidence of a person "specially "skilled" on a point of foreign law is admissible as expert evidence. The knowledge which entitles a person to be deemed "specially skilled" on some points of foreign law may, in their Lordships' opinion, be gained in appropriate circumstances by a person whose profession is not that of the law.

In the case before them, their Lordships have to be satisfied on two points before they can regard Mr. Greenway as competent. Firstly, that he conducted a business which made it his interest to take cognisance of what notes were legal tender in French West Africa. Secondly, that he did in fact take cognisance of what notes were legal tender in that country.

It would have been prudent for the respondent to have led evidence more clearly directed to establishing both these points. As the recorded evidence is very much compressed their Lordships have had some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion.

It appears from a notification in the Gazette of November 9, 1950, that Barclays Bank had been appointed an "authorized "dealer in foreign currency" within the meaning of that term in the Exchange Control Ordinance (No. 35 of 1950) of Nigeria. It is also clear from sections 5 and 42 (to which their Lordships do not think it necessary to make detailed reference) of that Ordinance that dealings in foreign currency could normally be conducted only by an "authorized dealer."

It is difficult to imagine that an "authorized dealer" would not keep himself informed as to the notes that were legal tender in French West Africa, an adjoining territory, unless special circumstances existed which rendered it unnecessary for him so to do. No such special circumstances have been proved or even suggested in the evidence in the case.

It was suggested by counsel for the appellant that the Gazette had not been properly produced in the courts below as there is no notice in the record of the occasion when this was done. There is, however, a reference to the fact that Barclays Bank was an authorized dealer in the judgment of the magistrates' court, and a reference to the Gazette itself in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. Their Lordships are of the view that the Gazette was properly before the courts in Africa although no entry has been made in the record of its production.

Counsel for appellant argued with force that, although it has been shown that Mr. Greenway was a manager of a branch of Barclays Bank, it has not been shown that as part of his duties he kept in such close touch with the currency of French West Africa as to make him competent to give the evidence which he did give. After anxious consideration their Lordships are of the opinion that the argument should not be accepted. Mr. Greenway is a manager of a branch of Barclays Bank in Nigeria, and has been in banking business for 32 years, 24 years of which have been spent in Nigeria. He has been regarded without challenge by the courts below as a credible witness, and he must also be regarded as a person with a sense of responsibility. Therefore the opinion which he has expressed cannot be the result of mere conjecture. It has been suggested by counsel for the respondent that upon a fair view of the evidence as a whole it must be presumed that Mr. Greenway was speaking from adequate personal experience. This suggestion their Lordships accept.

It has also been contended that the use of the words "to the "best of my knowledge" by Mr. Greenway so qualified his evidence as to render it of no probative value. Their Lordships do not agree. The meaning of the words mentioned could be best appreciated by the judge who saw the witness and heard the evidence given and the qualification cannot be said to deprive the witness's evidence of all probative value. No attempt was made by the appellant to contradict what Mr. Greenway said, and their Lordships are of the view that his evidence must be held to have established the facts to which he deposed.

For the reasons given their Lordships are of the opinion that it must be held that Mr. Greenway was a person who in the course of his business had to, and did, keep in touch with current law and practice with regard to notes that were legal tender in French West Africa. They are of the opinion that the notes of which exportation was attempted must be held to be notes which were legal tender in French West Africa on June 15, 1951. They will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellant must pay the respondent the costs of this appeal.

Statute—Workability. Compulsory Purchase.

By section 4 (4) (b) of the Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act, 1907, of New South Wales, as subsequently amended and in particular by the War Service Land Settlement and Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act, No. 48 of 1948, and the War Service Land Settlement and Closer Settlement Validation Act, No. 14 of 1950: "The compensation to be paid in respect of any such resumption "[of land under the Act] shall . . . be the value of the land as "assessed by an advisory board, or where an appeal has been made ". . . as determined by the Land and Valuation Court: Provided "that where any such resumption is made for the purposes of "section 3 of the War Service Land Settlement Act, 1941, as "amended by subsequent Acts, the following provisions shall "apply:—

"(i) in the case of any such resumption where the owner has "agreed not to claim compensation in excess of the value of the "land as assessed by an advisory board the value of the land as so "assessed shall not exceed by more than fifteen per centum the "value which would have been so assessed or determined in respect "of an identical resumption as at the tenth day of February, "1942, . . .;

"(ii) in the case of any such resumption other than a resump- "tion where the owner has agreed not to claim compensation in "excess of the value of the land as assessed by an advisory board, "the value of the land as so assessed or determined shall not exceed "the value which would have been so assessed or determined "in respect of an identical resumption as at the tenth day of "February, 1942, . . ."

On the resumption on September 1, 1950, for the purposes of section 3 of the War Service Land Settlement Act, 1941, by the Governor of New South Wales under the provisions of the Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act, 1907, as amended by subsequent Acts, of certain freehold land owned by the appellants, the compensation payable was, on the construction of the Act as amended read as a whole, rightly based on its value as at February 10, 1942, and not on its current value on or about the date of resumption, which admittedly very greatly exceeded the value in February, 1942.

The fact that under the Act the compensation was to be determined by the advisory board in its report before the purpose of the resumption was finally determined by the Governor and confirmed by Parliament, while technically presenting some difficulty, involved no actual difficulty in practice and did not render the Act unworkable. In the present case the advisory board obviously knew of the intention of the Minister and assessed the compensation accordingly, and the requisite steps prescribed by the Act were taken in due course. There was no justification for the view that the advisory board could not know the purpose of the resumption until it had finally been effected, for while it was true that the Minister prescribed the general area from which a choice of the land to be resumed was made, the advisory board were the body by whom both the actual land to be resumed and its value were to be determined. They therefore knew when they were making their report the purpose for which the land was to be resumed and the owner; could make their assessment of value on that basis; and could give the owner his option under the proviso to section 4 (4) (b) of electing to accept the value in the report or rejecting it. The objection was theoretical only, for in fact the advisory board do, and in the present case did, know both the purpose of the resumption and the owners concerned.

Further, the words of the proviso to section 4 (4) (b), "provided "that where any such resumption is made," were descriptive of the purpose of resumption and had no temporal connotation, and should not be construed as meaning "where any such resumption "has been made." Accordingly, the wording of that proviso also gave no support to the contention that the value of land to be resumed could not be assessed until after the resumption was accomplished.

Lastly, where the Minister informs the advisory board that his intention is to resume the land for closer settlement on behalf of those who have been engaged on war service, that body must make the valuation on the basis of the prices which prevailed on February 10, 1942, and before issuing their report must give the owner the opportunity of electing whether he will accept or refuse the figure arrived at, but in the present case a contention that they had failed to do so formed no part of the case stated by the Land and Valuation Court, and even if it did, the appellants having proceeded to that court could not now retain the right to contend that the option given by section 4 (4) (b) (ii) was still open for them to exercise.

Order of the High Court of Australia (1953) 87 C.L.R. 469, affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 3 of 1954), by special leave, from an order of the High Court of Australia (March 10, 1953) allowing three appeals (consolidated by order of the High Court) by the Minister for Lands of the State of New South Wales from orders of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (July 22, 1952) and answering in a contrary sense to the Supreme Court certain questions of law in cases stated by the Land and Valuation Court of New South Wales (Sugerman J.) (May 28, 1952).

The question involved in the appeal was the proper measure of compensation to be paid in respect of the resumption (i.e., compulsory acquisition) of land in New South Wales, which was formerly the freehold property of the appellants, but was resumed by the Governor of New South Wales on September 1, 1950, under the provisions of the Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act, 1907, as amended by subsequent Acts.

Before that date the appellants were the respective owners in fee simple of three parcels of land in New South Wales which were worked together as one estate known as Ghoolendaadi, and it was that estate which (except for an area of less than one-tenth of the whole) was resumed under the Act of 1907.

The substantial question for decision on this appeal was whether the compensation payable to the owners on the compulsory acquisition of their land was to be based on its value in February, 1942, or on its current value on or about the date of resumption. Admittedly the current value very greatly exceeded the value in February, 1942.

In the Land and Valuation Court, Sugerman J. held that on the true construction of the relevant legislation the value of the resumed land must be determined, not as at September 1, 1950, which was the date of the resumption, but as at February 10, 1942. The then respondents appealed to the Supreme Court (Street C.J., Owen and Herron JJ.) by way of case stated, and the decision of Sugerman J. was reversed.

The Minister for Lands, being dissatisfied with that decision, appealed to the High Court (Dixon C.J., McTiernan, Williams, Fullagar and Kitto JJ.) which in its turn reversed the decision of the Supreme Court and restored that of Sugerman J.

The relevant statutory provisions, the construction of which and their workability being the main question in the appeal, appear from the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

November 4. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD PORTER, who stated the facts set out above and continued: The resumption was effected under the provisions of the Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act, 1907, which has been many times amended. That Act may be referred to as the Act of 1907. Section 4 (4) makes provision as to the compensation payable in respect of resumptions under the Act. The decision of the present appeals therefore depends upon the true construction of that section in conjunction with the other provisions of the Act. In particular, it depends upon the construction of a proviso which was inserted by the Act No. 48 of 1948 and amended by the Act No. 14 of 1950.

Before they deal with the construction of the Act, however, their Lordships think it essential to recount the sequence of certain changes in it and the reasons for which they were made, but do not think it necessary to set out all the amendments. That task has been fully and accurately performed by the Supreme Court and need not be repeated.

The first Act of 1904 is still referred to as the Principal Act and provided authority to the Governor on taking the prescribed steps either to purchase or to resume land privately owned, i.e., to acquire land for closer settlement. The relevant terms of that Act, as amended, will require to be set out at a later period, but for the moment their Lordships, in order to clarify the position, need only mention in passing that in 1941 the legislature passed a War Service Land Settlement Act which, by section 3, empowered the Minister, by notification published in the Gazette, to set apart any area of land acquired under the Closer Settlement Acts, as amended by subsequent Acts, to be disposed of exclusively to any one or more of the following classes of persons:—

PYE
v.
MINISTER FOR LANDS FOR NEW SOUTH WALES.

(a) members of the forces; (b) discharged members of the forces; (c) discharged soldiers; (d) other eligible persons.

In their Lordships' view it is not necessary to deal with the form of the provisions of the Closer Settlement Acts in their earlier stages, but in order to explain the course taken by the New South Wales Government, the relevant provisions in force up to the amending Act of 1946 have been conveniently assembled in a document provided for their Lordships' use and at the date in question contained the following provisions:—

"2. (1) The Governor may, for the purposes of this Act, "constitute three boards to be called Closer Settlement Advisory "Boards, and may dissolve and reconstitute any such board. "Any such board is hereinafter in this Act referred to as an "'Advisory Board.'

"3. (1) Every such board shall, at the request of the Minister "and within such time or extended time as he may appoint, "report to him as follows:—

"(a) whether any, and if so what, land within an area to be "specified by the Minister is suitable to be acquired for closer "settlement;

"(b) the estimated value of such land;

"(c) the price at which the board recommends the acquisition "of the land, and the method of arriving at such price; . . .

"(f) on any matter as to which the Minister requires a report.

"4. (1) Where an advisory board reports that any land is "suitable to be acquired for closer settlement, the Governor "may,—

"(a) subject to this Act, purchase it by agreement with the "owner, or

"(b) resume it under this Act.

"(2) Every purchase or resumption shall be subject to "approval by resolutions of both Houses of Parliament.

"(3) Before resuming any land, the Governor shall, by "proclamation in the Gazette, notify that he proposes to consider "the advisableness of acquiring such land for the purposes of "closer settlement.

"7. (1) The resumption of land under this Act shall be "effected by notification in the Gazette.

"On such notification being made, the land shall, subject to "the right of retainer hereinafter provided, vest in His Majesty "for the purposes of the Closer Settlement Acts and be dealt "with thereunder.

"9. (1) Where any land is resumed under this Act, any "person interested in such land who is dissatisfied with the "value of the land as assessed by the advisory board may appeal "to the Land and Valuation Court against such assessment in "accordance with the rules of court of that court.

"(2) Notice of appeal shall be lodged within twenty-eight "days after the date of publication in the Gazette of the notifica-"tion of resumption or within such further time as the Land and "Valuation Court may, either generally or in any particular case, "allow.

"10. The Land and Valuation Court shall have jurisdiction "to hear and determine the appeal."

There does not appear to have been any express provision in the Act then in force providing the amount to be paid as compensation to the owner of the resumed land, though in section 5, which is concerned with land the value of which is to be increased by the construction of public works, there is a sub-subsection 5 (7) (e) enacting "compensation to be paid on any such resump-"tion shall unless an agreement is entered into under section 11 "of this Act be the value of the land as assessed by the advisory "board or as determined by the Land and Valuation Court on "Appeal," and section 11 gave the Governor power notwithstanding the resumption of any land and any proceedings consequent thereon at any time to agree with the owner as to the price to be paid for the land. But no doubt the intention was that in other cases the price recommended by the advisory board should be adopted.

Under this scheme no difficulty in carrying out its provisions arose. The value as fixed by the board or, in case of an appeal, that fixed by the Land Court, would be the compensation payable unless an agreement with the owner was reached.

The necessary steps preceding resumption would then be: (1) The Minister's request to the board to report; (2) the report; (3) proclamation in the Gazette by the Governor that he proposes to consider the advisableness of acquiring the land for closer settlement; (4) resumption; (5) approval by resolution of both Houses of Parliament; (6) notification of resumption in the Gazette.

On October 5, 1945, whilst this scheme was still in force, there was published in the New South Wales Government Gazette, No. 102 of that date, a proclamation by the Governor of his intention to consider the advisableness of acquiring the present appellants' estates for closer settlement under section 4, Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act, 1907, and on November 8, 1945, before any further steps were taken, the Commonwealth purported to enter into an agreement with the State to provide for the settlement of ex-servicemen and other eligible persons and to bear a portion of the expense. Under the scheme so made the State was to resume land for such closer settlement—the actual provision, so far as is relevant, is contained in clause 11 (ii) (b) of the scheme and was in the following terms:—"The "State shall acquire compulsorily or by agreement and at a value "not exceeding that ruling on the tenth day of February, one "thousand nine hundred and forty-two, private land or lands "held under lease from the Crown comprised in an approved "plan of settlement."

This agreement was approved and ratified by the Government

v.
MINISTER FOR LANDS FOR NEW SOUTH WALES.

of New South Wales by the War Service Land Settlement Agreement Act, 1945, passed on January 7, 1946.

Act No. 14 of 1946, of which the short title was "War Service "Land Settlement and Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act," was then enacted, by which certain additions and amendments were made to the Closer Settlement Act. Those material to the present dispute were in the following terms:—"4 (4) (b) The "compensation to be paid in respect of any such resumption "shall . . . be the value of the land as assessed by an advisory "board, or where an appeal has been made in terms of section 9 "of this Act, as determined by the Land and Valuation Court. "Provided that where any such resumption is made for the "purposes of the scheme contained in the agreement approved "and ratified by the War Service Land Settlement Agree-"ment Act, 1945, the value of the land as so assessed or "determined shall not exceed the value which would have been "so assessed or determined in respect of an identical resumption "as at the tenth day of February one thousand nine hundred and "forty-two, excepting the value of any improvements effected on "such land since that date."

In 1948 further amendments were made by inserting a provision under paragraph 4 (4) (a) of the 1946 Act permitting the price, in case of purchase, to be increased to a sum not exceeding 15 per cent. over the price recommended by the advisory board, and in case of resumption to be increased to a like extent provided that the owner agreed not to claim compensation in excess of the value of the land as assessed by the board but not otherwise.

In the present case no report had been made to the Minister before the decision in the High Court of the case of P. J. Magennis Pty. Ld. v. Commonwealth of Australia,[1] in which it was held that the provisions in the agreement between the Commonwealth and the State providing for the assessment of compensation for resumed property on the basis of 1942 values was contrary to the "just terms" provision of the Commonwealth Constitution and that the agreement was ultra vires the Commonwealth; that there was accordingly no valid agreement on which the State War Service and Closer Service Settlement (Amendment) Act No. 14 of 1946 could operate and that the State Act was to that extent ineffective.

The War Service Land Settlement Agreement Act was then repealed by the War Service Land Settlement and Closer Settlement Validation Act, 1950, which was by section 2 to be read and construed with the War Service Land Settlement Act, 1941, in the Closer Settlement Acts and was to be deemed to have commenced on January 7, 1946. The substantial result of these changes was to throw back the State upon its own Act of 1941, and to strike out all reference to and dependence upon the agreement with the Commonwealth.

The result was that, so far as is material, section 4 of the Act of 1907 took the following form:—

"4.—(1) Where an advisory board reports that any land is "suitable to be acquired for closer settlement, the Governor "may—

"(a) . . .

"(b) . . . resume it under this Act.

"(2) Every . . . resumption shall be subject to approval by "resolutions of both Houses of Parliament.

"(3) Before resuming any land, the Governor shall, by "proclamation in the Gazette, notify that he proposes to consider "the advisableness of acquiring such land for the purposes of "closer settlement. . . .

"(4) (a) The price to be paid in respect of any such purchase "shall not exceed the price at which an advisory board has "recommended the acquisition of the land: Provided that where "any such purchase is made for the purpose of section three of "the War Service Land Settlement Act, 1941, as amended by "subsequent Acts, the price at which an advisory board recom-"mends the acquisition of the land shall not exceed by more "than fifteen per centum the price which it would have recom-"mended in respect of an identical purchase as at the tenth "day of February, one thousand nine hundred and forty-two, "excepting the value of any improvements effected on such land "since that date.

A further change, however, was made by the War Service Land Settlement and Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act, No. 48 of 1948, which amended section 4 (4) (b) by striking out the proviso to that sub-subsection and inserting in lieu thereof the following:—

"(i) In the case of any such resumption where the owner has "agreed not to claim compensation in excess of the value of the "land as assessed by an advisory board the value of the land as "so assessed shall not exceed by more than fifteen per centum

"the value which would have been so assessed or determined in "respect of an identical resumption as at the tenth day of "February one thousand nine hundred and forty-two, excepting "the value of any improvements effected on such land since that "date;

"(ii) In the case of any such resumption other than a "resumption where the owner has agreed not to claim compen-"sation in excess of the value of the land as assessed by an "advisory board, the value of the land as so assessed or deter-"mined shall not exceed the value which would have been so "assessed or determined in respect of an identical resumption "as at the tenth day of February, one thousand nine hundred "and forty-two, excepting the value of any improvements effected "on such land since that date."

The Act of 1950 received the Royal Assent on May 3, 1950. Up to this time the advisory board seems to have made some attempts to come to terms with the present appellants and also to have held their hand pending a settlement of the legal position, but on May 4 of that year they valued the lands, subject to an agreed retention of 3,631 acres by Richard Anthony Pye, on a freehold basis inclusive of improvements, in accordance with section 4 (4) (b) (2) of the Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act, 1907, as amended, as at February 10, 1942, and recommended their resumption accordingly.

Thereupon, on September 1, 1950, there was published in the New South Wales Government Gazette a declaration by the Governor that the lands in question were resumed, and that (as the fact was) both Houses of the Parliament of New South Wales had approved of the resumption of these lands.

On September 28, 1950, the appellants lodged notices of appeal to the Land and Valuation Court, against the assessments of value of the resumed land made by the Closer Settlement Advisory Board. Each of those notices of appeal set out the grounds of appeal as follows: "1. That the value of the land "assessed by the Closer Settlement Advisory Board is too low. "2. That the advisory board arrived at the value of the land on "an incorrect basis. 3. That the advisory board did not have "proper regard to the items going to make up the value of the "land in accordance with the relevant Act. 4. That the advisory "board in arriving at the value of the land did not have proper "regard to the productive capacity of the land."

At the hearing before the Land and Valuation Court certain evidence was sought to be given, viz.: (1) questions with the object of establishing the value of the land at the date of resumption, and (2) questions for the purpose of showing that the appellants were not given an opportunity under section 4 (4) (b) (ii) of agreeing not to claim compensation in excess of the value of the land as assessed by the advisory board.

Both these classes of evidence were rejected, the first on the ground that only 1942 values could be considered, and the second on the ground that under the terms of the proviso to section 4 (4) (b) (ii) the owner was not entitled as of right to be given the option of agreeing not to claim compensation in excess of the valuation put upon his land by the advisory board, though possibly he might be entitled to an increase limited to 15 per cent. if he claimed to exercise such an option.

Before Sugerman J. as, indeed, before the three courts in Australia and before their Lordships, the argument turned upon whether the statute in the present form was workable.

On behalf of the appellants Sir Garfield Barwick forcefully and analytically contended that it was unworkable. The prescribed sequence of events would not, it was said, permit a valuation based on 1942 values. Substantially the argument ran in the following form: (i) The Minister prescribes an area from which the advisory board may select all or any parts and, until they have done so, the land which will be resumed and its owner are both unknown. (ii) Two at least of the duties which the board must perform are to report the estimated value of the land and the price at which it recommends its acquisition and the method of arriving at such price. (iii) At that time the board cannot tell the purpose for which the Governor may resume the land except that it is for some form of closer settlement, nor can they tell what portion of the prescribed area will be resumed or who will be the owner affected. (iv) Prima facie their duty is to estimate the current value of the land and, until a notification is published in the Gazette under section 7 (1) and that notification is declared under section 4 (4) (c) to be for the purpose of section 3 of the War Service Act, 1941, there is no assurance that the resumption will be for the purpose of that Act and, indeed, even then the resumption is still subject to approval of both Houses of Parliament. (v) The board, therefore, in ignorance of the purpose of the resumption and of what land will be chosen for war settlement or other closer settlement, and accordingly ignorant of who the relevant owner may be, will have no means of deciding what land is to be valued at 1942 values or what owner is affected. (vi) How, then, until resumption has actually taken place is it possible to determine which land is to be valued at current and which at 1942 values? (vii) There is no provision in the Act for the estimation of value to be deferred or for a second valuation to be made. (viii) Moreover, even if an owner could be ascertained, section 4 (4) (b) (i) and (ii) contemplate an opportunity for the owner to agree before the report is made, whereas, having regard to the ignorance of the board as to the purpose of the resumption, no such opportunity is possible, nor in the particular instance was such an opportunity given.

In face of these arguments the judge put aside the problem as so presented and distinguished between the position of the board and that of the Land and Valuation Court. Let it be assumed, he said, that if the matter had stopped at the report of the board, the provisions of section 4 (4) (b) (i) and (ii) are unworkable. But it has not stopped there. There has been an appeal to the Land and Valuation Court against the assessment and that court has jurisdiction to hear it—see section 9 (1) and (2). The jurisdiction given to that court is called an appeal, but it is in fact a rehearing at which evidence (if relevant) and argument can be presented. When the matter reaches that stage, the resumption has taken place, the owner is known and the purpose is conclusively evidenced by section 4 (4) (c). The argument against workableness therefore falls to the ground and the court is not faced with any difficulty in applying the sections, nor does any question of evidence arise inasmuch as the court is compelled to adopt 1942 values. Moreover, although the Government may give the owner the opportunity of agreeing not to appeal, it is not obliged to do so, and in any case having appealed against the assessment he has thereby chosen not to accept the assessed value.

At the hearing in the Land and Valuation Court the judge was requested to state a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court upon a number of questions all directed to the basis upon which compensation is payable on the true construction of the Act of 1907. None of these questions dealt specifically with the contention that the owners should have been given an option under section 4 (4) (b) to elect to accept the value assessed by the board, nor is such a contention to be found in the grounds of appeal, but undoubtedly the question was raised and dealt with by the judge in annexure A to the case stated. He, however, was of opinion that the wording of section 4 (4) (b) (ii) applied exactly to the case in issue, that under that subsection 1942 values plus an increase up to 15 per cent. of those values was the utmost that could be given, and that in appealing to the court the owners were appealing on the basis that their case came under section 4 (4) (b) (ii) and could only appeal on that basis.

The appellants appealed to the Supreme Court from the judgment of Sugerman J. in the case stated. In that court the judgment was reversed, but upon narrow grounds. It is true that the Supreme Court accepted the argument that the board's assessment must take place prior to resumption and that the taking of 1942 values could only operate after a resumption had been made and made for a purpose which could not be known until a notification of resumption had been published in the Gazette. Accordingly they said: "the proviso cannot apply to "an advisory board when making an assessment and report, "and that board's only duty is, therefore, to assess on the basis "of the general law, namely, on the basis of the values current "at the date of its report. The proviso appears to have been "drafted upon the erroneous assumption that the assessment of "value by the board comes after, and not before, resumption, "whereas the true position is that its only power is to assess "before resumption. The appellants then submit that when an "appeal is brought to the Land and Valuation Court after "notification of resumption, that court must put itself in the "same position as the board and do what it should have done, "namely, fix a value on the basis of the values current at the "date of the board's assessment."

On the other hand, they agreed with Sugerman J. as to the duties of the Land Valuation Court. Their words were: "It is at "this point that we find ourself in disagreement with this line "of argument. It is true that the matter reaches the Land and "Valuation Court under the name of an 'appeal' from the "board's assessment, but what the Land and Valuation Court is "required to do is to fix the compensation payable on a resump-"tion which has by that time taken place. On this 'appeal' the "basis on which the advisory board at some earlier preresumption "date assesses the value is irrelevant. The function of the "court is to fix the amount payable by way of compensation, "and not to inquire whether the board, in making its assessment, "went right or wrong. This was clearly the position under "section 9 of the 1907 Act in its original form. Though "instituted in name by a 'notice of appeal,' the right given to "an owner who was dissatisfied with the board's valuation was to "apply to have the 'fair market value of the land and improve-"'ments' determined by the court constituted under that Act. "An appeal in the strict sense is an inquiry by the appellate "court whether the order of the tribunal from which the appeal "is brought was correct on the materials which that tribunal "had before it. Under this legislation there is now no prior "hearing in open court or at all and no record of what materials "the board had before it except so far as may appear from its "report. The Land and Valuation Court cannot even rehear the "case, since there has been no prior hearing. Its duty is to "inquire and determine for itself, regardless of the board's views "as reported to the Minister, what is the true value for resump-"tion purposes of the property in question, paying due attention "to any statutory directions given in that regard and in the light "of the facts then existing."

So far the Supreme Court agree with Sugerman J., but they disagree with him in the result because in their view it is a condition precedent that the owner should be given an opportunity of electing whether he would accept the board's valuation or not. The board, as they construe the section, (1) must give this opportunity before it enters on the task of assessing values; (2) must make its report before any resumption takes place, and (3) the 1942 basis of valuation introduced by the proviso is applicable only after a resumption has been made and made for the purpose stated in the proviso. Their view was perhaps most clearly expressed when they said: "It is implicit in the legis-"lative scheme that the owner should first be given an oppor-"tunity of deciding whether he will accept the valuation which "the board is later to make, since it is not until the board

"knows whether or not the owner is prepared to accept its assess"ment as final and abandon his right of 'appeal' in exchange "for the possibility of obtaining an additional 15 per cent. on the "1942 values, that it can know what standard of values it is to "apply. Yet this condition precedent to the application of 1942
"values cannot be fulfilled, because by the very terms of the "Act in which the proviso appears the board must make its "assessment before, and not after resumption, and therefore
"before the purpose for which the resumption is made can be "known."

In support of this view the Supreme Court pointed out that section 4 (4) (b) (i) and (ii) form part of a general scheme and must be read together, and that under (i) an owner has to be given an opportunity of agreeing to accept the compensation assessed by the advisory board, not that determined by the Land and Valuation Court. As they had already indicated in their opinion, the values given by the advisory board must necessarily be exercised prior to resumption, and until the board knew of the purpose of the resumption no such opportunity could be or was in fact given.

The grounds of this decision were, as their Lordships think, accurately expressed by the High Court in the words: "The "value to be stated in the report must be the value at the date "of the report. The assessment of that value by the advisory "board having necessarily been completed before the resumption,
"the proviso attempted to achieve an impossibility, when it
"purports after the resumption has been effected to give the "advisory board a direction as to the manner in which it shall go
"about a task already performed."

The Supreme Court accordingly held that "some of the "language used by Parliament is so intractable that it cannot be "given any operative effect" and answered question 2 of the stated case, (A) No, (B) Yes, (C) No, i.e., that the compensation payable was the value at the date of resumption.

From that decision an appeal was taken to the High Court, which allowed the appeal and held that compensation was payable on the values taken by the board, i.e., the values on February 10, 1942. They resolved the difficulty posed by the Supreme Court by holding that the proviso is not in the nature of a command to the advisory board prescribing the basis upon which it shall perform its duty of valuation, but a notice to the board that unless it limited its assessment by reference to 1942 values the assessment would not be effective. Their words are:
"the solution which the draftsman adopted was to add a proviso "to the subsection which fixed the owner's compensation at the "amount of the value as assessed by the advisory board, and
"to rely upon the practical effect which this would necessarily "have upon the mind of the board when making its valuation.
"Thus the key to the problem was found in the fact that in "actual practice the advisory board would be certain to know

"the purposes for which the resumption was likely to be made, "and a proviso added to section 4 (4) (b) while not a command "obligatory upon the board when valuing, would nevertheless "operate as notice to the board at that time that unless it limited "its assessment by reference to the 1942 value (or that value plus "15 per centum if the owner had agreed not to appeal), the "assessment would not be effective to determine the compensa-"tion in the event of the resumption being in fact made for the "stated purposes."

As to the alleged necessity of giving an opportunity to the owner, they held that this provision was inserted for the benefit of the Crown so that if so minded it might offer an inducement to the owner to refrain from appealing. In their view it was an option which the Crown might or might not exercise and, if it did not, the owner had no ground of complaint.

From that judgment the appellants appeal to their Lordships' Board.

Their Lordships agree with the decision of Sugerman J. and of the High Court, though they do not wholly adopt the grounds of their judgments. That decision depends entirely upon the construction of the Closer Settlement Act, as now amended, and the Act in its present form must be read as a whole.

In approaching their decision their Lordships have borne in mind the warning contained in Magor and St. Mellons Rural District Council v. Newport Borough Council[2] that the duty of the court is limited to interpreting the words used by the legislature and that it has no power to fill in any gaps disclosed, but in the meaning which they have put upon the Act as now framed their Lordships have refrained from adopting any such course and have confined themselves strictly to interpretation.

In reaching a conclusion as to the meaning to be placed upon an Act of Parliament it must always be remembered, as Lord Dunedin stated in Murray v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[3]: "It is our duty to make what we can of statutes, knowing that "they are meant to be operative, and not inept, and nothing short "of impossibility should in my judgment allow a judge to declare "a statute unworkable." A similar view was expressed by Lord Simon L.C. in Nokes v. Doncaster Amalgamated Collieries Ld.[4] in the words: "if the choice is between two interpretations, the "narrower of which would fail to achieve the manifest purpose "of the legislation, we should avoid a construction which would "reduce the legislation to futility and should rather accept the "bolder construction based on the view that Parliament would "legislate only for the purpose of bringing about an effective "result."

With these principles in mind their Lordships approach the

v.
MINISTER FOR LANDS FOR NEW SOUTH WALES.

interpretation of the statute which in the hearing before them has been elaborately analysed. The gravamen of the charge that it is unworkable lies in two contentions already referred to, viz.: (1) that the compensation is to be determined by the advisory board in its report before the purpose of the resumption is finally determined by the Governor and confirmed by Parliament; and (2) the owner must be given an opportunity of electing to accept the value in the report or rejecting it and no such opportunity can be or has been given in the present case.

The second of these objections may, in their Lordships' opinion, be shortly dealt with. They agree that, where the Minister informs the advisory board that his intention is to resume the land for closer settlement on behalf of those who have been engaged on war service, that body must make the valuation on the basis of the prices which prevailed on February 10, 1942, and before issuing their report must give the owner the opportunity of electing whether he will accept or refuse the figure arrived at, but as has been already indicated, in the present instance a contention that they failed to do so forms no part of the case stated by the Land and Valuation Court, and even if it did, the appellants having proceeded to that court cannot now retain the right to contend that the option given by section 4 (4) (b) (ii) is still open for them to exercise.

The first contention, however, has still to be considered. Technically it presents some difficulty, but in practice no actual difficulty has been encountered. In the present case the advisory board obviously knew of the intention of the Minister and assessed the compensation accordingly, and the requisite subsequent steps were taken in due course. Except for the contention that the board were obliged to take current values no criticism of the procedure gives rise to complaint.

In their Lordships' view the argument that the board could not know the purpose of the resumption, until it had finally been effected, is not justified.

The Minister can have a purpose which he can intimate to the board so soon as he makes his request under section 3 (1) of the Act. No doubt it is conceivable that he or the Governor might change their intention, but in such a case the proper course, if it were intended to resume the land for other closer settlement purposes, would be to withdraw the original request and resubmit the matter to the advisory board.

It is true that the Minister prescribes the general area from which a choice of the land to be resumed is made, but the advisory board are the body by whom both the actual land to be resumed and its value are to be determined. They therefore (1) know when they are making their report the purpose for which the land is to be resumed and the owner; (2) can make their assessment of value on that basis, and (3) can give the owner his option under section 4 (4) (b) (ii).

The objection is theoretical only. In fact the advisory board do, and in this case did, know both the purpose of the resumption and the owners concerned.

But it is contended that the wording of the proviso to section 4 (4) (b) "Provided that where any such resumption is "made" shows that the 1942 value can only be applied after resumption has taken place, and it is urged that this expression should be read as equivalent to "where any such resumption has "been made." In their Lordships' opinion no such meaning need be, or should be, ascribed to it. The words, in their view, are descriptive of the purpose of resumption and have no temporal connotation. It is not "has been made," although the High Court in one passage so transcribe it, nor is it "in course "of being made" as the respondent appears at one time to have argued. The simplest and most accurate paraphrase, to their Lordships' minds, is to substitute the words "in a case where "the resumption is made for the purposes of section 3 of the "War Service Land Settlement Act, 1941, as amended," i.e., it indicates the object for which the resumption is made, and does not mean that the value is not to be assessed until after resumption has taken place.

It follows that the wording of the proviso gives no support to the contention that the value of the land to be resumed cannot be assessed until after the resumption is accomplished.

Nor does any difficulty arise from the fact that the approbation of the Governor and of Parliament is required. The Minister represents the Government and the Governor acts as Governor in Council: there is consequently no dichotomy between the Minister who requires a report and the Governor who resumes. Parliament in its turn will be presented with a scheme for resumption for the purpose of the War Service Act, 1941, and it will be for that body to approve or disapprove that scheme.

For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the case was rightly determined by the High Court. The grounds of their decision leave it unnecessary to pronounce upon the view held by Sugerman J. (1) that, whatever the value assessed by the advisory board, it is the duty of the Land and Valuation Court to embark upon a fresh inquiry as to values in no way trammelled by the value assessed by the advisory board, or (2) that the facts known when an appeal is made entitle that court to adopt a different basis of valuation from that adopted by the board.

If that were the only ground on which a 1942 valuation could be supported, then, if the advisory board were under a duty or entitled to insert current values in their report, the owner who had been given the advantage of such a valuation might well avoid any appeal, and in such a case it is difficult to envisage any course which the Government could take except under the power given by section 6 (2) to cancel the proclamation made under section 4 (3).

It will be observed that their Lordships have placed no reliance on the provisions of section 3 (1) (f) of the Closer Settlement Act. In their view that subsection enables the Minister to request a report on matters additional to subsections (a) to (e) but does not confer a power to omit or change the requirements of those subsections. Nor do their Lordships think that on its true interpretation the Act provides for the making of two or more reports or for the alteration or amendment of one already made.

PYE v. MINISTER FOR LANDS FOR NEW SOUTH WALES.

For the reasons which they have set out above, however, their Lordships are of opinion that the case has been rightly decided by the High Court and will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs incurred by the respondent before their Lordships' Board.

The following cases were cited in argument in addition to those referred to in the judgment: Harrison v. National Coal Board [1]; Stapley v. Gypsum Mines Ld. [2]

PEARSON J. The plaintiff, Mr. Herbert Laszczyk, claims against the defendants, the National Coal Board, for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty in respect of a shot firing accident which occurred on March 11, 1953, at the defendant's Bickershaw colliery. The plaintiff, who is of Polish origin, came to England in 1947, having previously had some one and a half years' experience as a coal miner. He was then trained in Wales as a haulage worker, but was not trained as a coal face worker. After some work at other mines he came to Bickershaw Colliery about three years prior to the accident, which would be early in 1950, and he worked there as a haulage worker. The combined team of haulage workers would, no doubt, on some occasions be bringing the extracted coal back from the coal face along the main roads, but at other times they would be bringing the materials required—timber and iron bars—from what may be called the underground "tramway terminus," along the main roads to a place near the coal face, and then one or more would have to bring the materials along to the coal face to give them to the working colliers who needed such materials. The plaintiff, throughout the three years' period up to and including March 11, 1953, when the accident occurred, did in fact from time to time execute some of this work of bringing materials along the coal face and distributing them to the persons working there.

On February 11, 1953, one Hindley, who was the Bickershaw Colliery training officer, found the plaintiff at the coal face and he told him he had no right to be there, explaining, in effect, the safety requirements under the appropriate training regulations. He then took the plaintiff to some place on the main haulage road and pointed out a particular mark or position beyond which he told the plaintiff he must not go. The plaintiff worked on certain parts of two different shifts. On part of the afternoon shift he was under a deputy or fireman whose name was Sinclair and on part of the day or morning shift he worked under another officer of the same rank, Thompson. On that same day, February 11, 1953, the colliery training officer left for the first of these deputies, Sinclair, this note: "H. Laszczyk is being used on the "face. He is not face trained in any respect; please avoid "using him on the face." Sinclair received this message and I think that he probably did pass it on to the plaintiff. The attitude of the other deputy, Thompson, was quite different. He instructed the plaintiff to continue doing the same work of distributing the required materials at the coal face, but to keep out of the way of the colliery training officer if he should happen to be there. The plaintiff carried out these instructions, although he and Thompson knew that this was in breach of the mines safety requirements. Preferring the evidence of the plaintiff to that of Thompson I find that these instructions were given after the colliery training officer's conversation with the plaintiff.

On March 11, 1953, a shot-firer named Melling was about to fire a shot in the stint of a miner called Burton and in accordance with the relevant shot firing regulations he posted himself for security at one end of the determined danger zone and he posted Burton at the other end. Burton gave the necessary warning to another miner, but he failed to give any warning to the plaintiff, who was coming along the coal face in the direction of the determined danger zone. Burton was not keeping a proper look-out and not performing his duty as a shot-firer's sentry with diligence and failed to see the plaintiff at all. The plaintiff went into the danger zone and was severely injured when the shot was fired. The accident was plainly caused by the negligence on the part of the sentry, Burton, and for his negligence the defendants must be held responsible, but there is a question whether some deduction should be made from the full amount of damages by reason of the contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff himself.

Section 74 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, provides that "Every "person shall observe such directions with respect to working as "may be given to him with a view to comply with this part "[Part II] of this Act or the regulations of the mine or with a "view to safety." The colliery training officer had given to the plaintiff directions with a view to safety and I think these directions could also be regarded as being given with a view to complying with that part [Part II] of the Act and with the relevant training regulations. At any rate they were given with a view to safety and these directions were disobeyed by the plaintiff, acting under the instructions of his deputy, Thompson.

There are also to be taken into account the Coal Mines (Training) General Regulations, 1945. Regulation 1 provides: "No person shall be employed in or about a mine on any work on "which he has not been employed before the coming into force "of these Regulations [January 1, 1947] except under "competent instruction and supervision, and unless and until "he has been adequately trained and is competent to do the "work without supervision." Regulation 4 (1) provides: "Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of regulation 1 "of these Regulations, no person who has not been employed on "work at the coal face"—which I think must mean not so employed, looking back at regulation 1, before January 1, 1947—"shall be employed, otherwise than at a training face, on such "work until . . . (c) there has been issued by a training officer "appointed under these regulations a certificate (in the pre-"scribed form) that such person has duly received such training "as aforesaid and is competent to be employed at the coal face;". No such certificate had been issued in the case of the plaintiff. Regulation 17 (1) defines the expression "work at the coal face" as including, "any work performed within ten yards of a face "(other than work performed by any person employed on the "haulage or on a conveyor-loader in handling or filling tubs, or "as a conveyor-engine attendant, in any part of the area com-"prised within the face and the sides of the road as if the sides "were extended to the face) but does not include work per-"formed at a training face."

In the present case the plaintiff was working within ten yards of the coal face and, therefore, the work which he was doing was work within that definition of "work at a coal face" unless the parenthesis applies. He was employed on haulage, but not, at the material time, in any part of the area comprised within the face and sides of a road as if the sides were extended to the face. As I understand the expression, therefore, he was being employed on work at the coal face in breach of regulation 4, and in that breach—primarily an employer's breach—he was abetting.

There is then the question: Was the plaintiff's breach of section 74 and regulation 4 (1) one cause of the accident? Upon this there was reference to National Coal Board v. England[1] and there was also offered to me the shorthand transcript of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Walsh v. National Coal Board.[2] Having regard to the lines of reasoning in these cases I hold that the plaintiff was wrongfully working at the coal face; and that his act was sufficiently proximate to the accident to be regarded as one cause of it.

The next question which arises is what percentage represents the plaintiff's share of responsibility for the accident on the facts, when he had been allowed and ordered wrongfully to be working at the coal face over the whole period of three years. He had been instructed by the official—the deputy who was his "boss" for the time being—to continue this wrongful working and to keep out of the way of the colliery training officer if he should happen to be there. I hold that the proper share must be quite small and I assess it at five per cent.

[His Lordship reviewed the medical evidence and continued:] Having regard to these facts I assess the general damages at £5,500, and to that there has to be added the agreed special damages of £229 5s. 7d. which makes the full amount £5,729 5s. 7d. Five per cent of that has to be subtracted, and in the result there will be judgment for £5,442 16s. 4d. for the plaintiff and costs.

Will—Construction—Omission—Clause ungrammatical and illogical unless words supplied from precedent—Judicial notice that precedent available—Words inserted.

Where part of a clause in a will which gave a general power of appointment was pure nonsense, and the rest was grammatical on the face of it, but was illogical in the construction of the will as a whole, and the words used appeared to be taken from part of a precedent from Key & Elphinstone's Precedents in Conveyancing (11th ed., vol. 2, pp. 901–2) which was available at the date of the will, and the insertion of omitted words made grammatical sense and created a special power of appointment which was logically consistent with the rest of the will:—

Held, by the court with compelling conviction, that the testatrix had intended to include in the clause the rest of that precedent; and that the will should be construed, therefore, as if the rest of it had been inserted with the appropriate substitutions.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Georgina Sarah Follett made her will on August 31, 1923, and the codicil thereto on March 14, 1924. After creating two life interests in her residuary estate in favour of two nieces, she provided in clause 5: "Upon the death of both my said two "nieces I direct my trustees to pay the total income from my "residuary trust fund . . . to . . . Beryl Edmonds [the first "defendant, now Mrs. Dovell] during her life . . . On and after "the death of the said Beryl Edmonds my trustees shall hold "my residuary trust fund and the future income thereof in trust "for all or such one or more exclusively or others of her child "or children or remoter issue or any other person or persons "as she should by deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable or by "will or codicil without transgressing the rules against per-"petuities appoint and in default of or subject to any such "appointment in trust for her next-of-kin."

By the codicil she made the following disposition: "Whereas "I have made no provision in my said will in the event of Beryl "Edmonds dying before she becomes entitled to her share of my "estate now therefore in the event of the said Beryl Edmonds "dying before she becomes entitled to any share in my estate "I give devise and bequeath the share or interest to which had "she lived she would have been entitled to my two nephews Cecil "Biddell Follett and Wilfred Howell Follett in equal shares "absolutely. . . ."

The testatrix died on July 21, 1932. The two nieces died in 1950 and 1951 respectively, and the first defendant, who had no children, thereafter received the income from the residuary estate. In purported exercise of the power of appointment conferred by the will she appointed by deed dated June 16, 1953, the whole of the residuary trust fund to herself absolutely. She had requested the trustees to make over to her the capital of the residuary estate, but they were doubtful whether under the terms of the will she had power to appoint in her own favour.

By this summons the court was asked to determine whether on the true construction of the will and codicil and in the events which had happened, the power of appointment conferred on the first defendant in clause 5 of the will was: (1) a general power of appointment enabling her to appoint the fund to herself absolutely, or (2) a special power enabling her to appoint the fund in favour of her children or remoter issue, and in default thereof in favour of any persons (i) including herself or (ii) not including herself.

Key and Elphinstone's Precedents in Conveyancing, 11th ed., which was published in 1923, contained the following precedent (vol. 2, pp. 901–2): "[After the death of my wife] my trustees "shall stand possessed of the capital and future income of the "trust fund in trust for all or such one or more exclusively of "the others or other of my children or remoter issue, [at such "age or time, or respective ages or times, if more than one in "such shares, and with such trusts for their respective benefit "and such provisions for their respective advancement (either "during the life of my wife or after her death) and maintenance "and education at the discretion of my trustees] or any other "person or persons, as my wife shall from time to time by any "deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil "without transgressing the rule against perpetuities appoint, and "in default of and subject to any such appointment as aforesaid, "etc."

It was argued by counsel for the second defendant that after the word "exclusively" the words "of the others or other" should be substituted for the words "or others" and that the words within the second brackets should be inserted in the will between the words "remoter issue" and "or any other person or "persons."

Roxburgh J., having stated the facts: The peculiar language of the codicil has the effect of interposing (in an event which did not happen) two life interests in equal shares between the first defendant and her issue if she had any. I only refer to the codicil in passing, because one is entitled to read the will and codicil together; although they bear different dates, they both constitute the testatrix's testamentary disposition, and anything more completely muddled than that codicil it would be difficult to conceive. However, if that were all, I would accede to the construction in favour of the first defendant.

The first defendant has treated the clause which I have read from the will as conferring on her a general power of appointment, and has accordingly appointed the residuary estate to herself absolutely, and she now claims the fund. The question is: Was she entitled to do that? If the clause is construed quite literally—and it is possible to construe it quite literally—I am satisfied that she was entitled to do what she did. It seems to me that in this rather absurd clause "other" must be in contrast with issue and not in contrast with herself. But Mr. Arnold has convinced me that this sentence does not embody the intention of the testatrix.

The difficulty, of course, in this connexion, is not to find out what is the law, but to apply it. The law is completely stated in the judgment of Vaisey J. in In re Smith,[1] where, after citing from a number of authorities, he said that "necessity"[2] in this connexion (and he was quoting from Wilkinson v. Adam[3]) meant "'not natural necessity, but so strong a probability of intention, "'that an intention contrary to that which is imputed to the "'testator cannot be supposed.'" That he himself summarized as "a compelling conviction,"[4] and I am happy to adopt that phrase. Vaisey J. also quoted from Jarman and adopted this citation: "Where it is clear on the face of a will that the "testator has not accurately or completely expressed his meaning "by the words he has used, and it is also clear what are the "words which he has omitted, those words may be supplied in "order to effectuate the intention, as collected from the context."

[3] (1812–3) 1 V. & B. 422.
[4] [1948] Ch. 53.

I have reached a compelling conviction on both points, and I do not know what objective test there is. I do not think that there is any objective test, and I do not know what more can be said so far as this court is concerned.

I must, however, give my reasons, because they are of a very particular nature. I have already alluded, as a matter of minor importance, to the absurdities of the codicil, but now I must consider the clause on which everything depends; it is this: "in "trust for all or such one or more exclusively or others of her "child or children or remoter issue." Pausing there, that is pure nonsense; nobody can deny that that does not give effect to any intention at all. There obviously is an accidental omission. Is there any doubt what the accidental omission is? I do not think that there would be any doubt even if no reference books were to hand, but I think that I must be entitled to treat the testatrix, when she sat in her armchair to make her will, as having at her elbow recognized books of precedents. There is no doubt that she did not compose this language for the first time; and, from an examination of Key and Elphinstone's Conveyancing Precedents, 11th ed., vol. 2, p. 901, the edition which was in operation at the date when the will was made, the solution is obvious. There can be no doubt that what she was trying to say was "in trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the "others or other." That seems to me to be quite obvious.

It is that which leads me to accept Mr. Arnold's contention; but for that, I should not have accepted it, because otherwise I should have said that, while I thought that I knew what had gone wrong with the will, I could not be quite sure. The will continues: "in trust for all or such one or more exclusively or "others of her child or children or remoter issue or any other "person or persons." That is not sense from the logical point of view, though it is grammatical sense; because if the intention was to enable Mrs. Dovell to appoint to any person or persons including herself, which is the intention which Mr. Lindner seeks to impute to the testator, there was no conceivable reason for mentioning the child or children or remoter issue, still less for saying exclusively of anybody or anything. The answer might, of course, have been: "Well, the other words are, after all, "merely tautological. Sense can be given to the passage, and "the court ought not to interfere with it."

When I have once been, as I think compulsorily, referred to Key and Elphinstone by reason of the first blunder, I find no difficulty in continuing to read on at the page to which I have thus been compulsorily referred, which goes on: "at such age "or time, or respective ages or times, if more than one in such "shares, and with such trusts for their respective benefit and "such provisions for their respective advancement (either during "the life of my wife or after her death) and maintenance and "education at the discretion of my trustees or any other person "or persons as my wife shall from time to time by any deed or "deeds revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil without "transgressing the rule against perpetuities [which has not been "forgotten in the will] appoint. . . ."

I have not the least doubt that those words "any other person "or persons" came from that precedent, and that it was by inadvertence that the words preceding were omitted. I have a compelling conviction to that effect, and I think that all the words in the precedent after "remoter issue" and before the words "any other person or persons" were intended to be inserted—substituting, of course, the appropriate life tenant—in the clause.

The result of that is, of course, that this is but a special power of appointment enabling her to appoint the fund in favour of her children or remoter issue only. I say no more, because I may have been wrong in reaching that compelling conviction; but the story fits like a glove.

* DRUMMOND v. BRITISH BUILDING CLEANERS LD.

[1951 D. No. 2398.]

Negligence — Safe system of work — General precautions — Window-cleaning—Outside of sash window cleaned by window-cleaner standing on sill—Method recognized by trade—Fall of window-cleaner—Practicability of instituting system reducing hazards—"Transom "method"—Employers' liability.

The plaintiff, an experienced and efficient window-cleaner employed by the defendants, was cleaning the outside of a first-floor sash window by standing on a sloping sill outside the window and holding on with one hand by a finger grip under the bottom of the top sash when his foot slipped, his finger hold was wrenched away and he fell to the ground. The window and sill were of sound construction and in good condition. Above the top sash was a transom and above that a fanlight. Although the plaintiff had a safety belt none of the windows in the building had eye-bolts or hooks to which it could be attached. The plaintiff was not instructed to hitch the rope attached to his safety belt round the transom above the window nor to use a ladder provided by the defendants. In an action by the plaintiff alleging negligence on the part of his employers and claiming damages in respect of his injuries:—

Held, that it had been clearly shown by evidence in this and other cases that the practice of cleaning windows by standing on the sill was dangerous and the employers therefore were under a common law duty to do all they could to reduce the risk and to insist on their workmen taking precautions for their own safety; that the evidence of witnesses for the employers established that the transom method was a reasonably practicable way of securing safety, and the employers were guilty of negligence in failing to inquire into the possibility of attaching the safety belt to a transom, or to instruct their workmen to use that method when available.

Observations of Lords Jowitt, Oaksey and Reid in General Cleaning Contractors Ld. v. Christmas [1953] A.C. 180, 188, 189, 193–4; [1952] 2 All E.R. 1110 applied.

Decision of Pilcher J. [1954] 1 W.L.R. 501 reversed.

APPEAL from Pilcher J.[1]

The plaintiff, an experienced and efficient window-cleaner with a good head for heights, had for about three years been in the employment of the defendants, a company carrying out the general cleaning and window-cleaning of offices and other premises. The defendants' practice was to pay their employees 50 per cent. of the contract price for any particular job, a system under which the men had an incentive to work expeditiously and usually earned more than if they had been paid by time. One of the defendants' contracts was for the monthly cleaning of windows in Bovril's factory, a building with some 700 windows which, during his employment by the defendants, the plaintiff and his squad had cleaned many times.

On November 14, 1949, the plaintiff was cleaning a first-floor window, some 21 feet above the ground, in Bovril's factory at Bunhill Row, in the City of London. It was an ordinary sash type window with two panes in the top and two in the bottom sash. Above the top sash was a transom and above that a fanlight. Both sashes were about three feet in height and the whole construction of the window and its woodwork was solid and well maintained. In order to clean the outside of the window the plaintiff, adopting the "jumping" method, stood on a sloping sill, also in good condition, outside the window. Having cleaned the panes of the top sash he pushed the bottom sash nearly down, leaving himself a finger grip under the bottom of the top sash. He was holding on to this with his right hand and squatting down to clean the bottom of the left hand pane with his left hand when his right foot slipped, his finger, or hand, hold was wrenched away, and he fell into the yard below, receiving serious injuries.

The plaintiff was provided with a safety belt, with an eight-foot rope with a spring hook attached to it at the end, but there were no eye-bolts or other solid object fitted to any of the windows of the factory, and no instructions had been given to the plaintiff and his fellow workmen to attach their safety belts to a transom when that precaution was available.

The trial judge held that the evidence did not justify a finding that in causing or permitting the plaintiff to clean the window from the sill the defendants were in breach of their common law duty to provide a safe system of work; that the method adopted by the plaintiff was the one by which upper storey sash windows were almost invariably cleaned and was the normal and general method in the trade; and that the defendants acted as reasonable and prudent employers and had not been guilty of any lack of care for the plaintiff's safety.

1954
Drummond v. British Building Cleaners Ld.

The plaintiff appealed.

Marven Everett Q.C. and Jonathan Sofer for the plaintiff.
F. W. Beney Q.C. and Stephen Chapman for the defendants.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Smith v. Baker & Sons [2]; Paris v. Stepney Borough Council [3]; Winter v. Cardiff Rural District Council [4]; General Cleaning Contractors Ld. v. Christmas [5]; and Roberts v. Dorman Long & Co. Ld. [6]

Denning L.J. referred briefly to the facts, and continued: It is clearly shown by the evidence in this case, and in other cases which have come before the court, that the practice of cleaning windows by standing on the sill is dangerous. In those circumstances the employers are under a duty to do all they can to reduce the risk. They should insist on the men taking precautions for their own safety. It is no answer for the employers to say: "We cannot help it. The men will stand on "the sill." The employers should always be on the look-out to see if there is any more that can be done for the safety of the men. As Lord Reid pointed out in General Cleaning Contractors Ld. v. Christmas [1]: "Where a practice of ignoring an obvious "danger has grown up I do not think that it is reasonable to "expect an individual workman to take the initiative in devising "and using precautions. It is the duty of the employer to "consider the situation, to devise a suitable system, to instruct "his men what they must do and to supply any implements "that may be required such as, in this case, wedges or objects "to be put on the window sill to prevent the window from "closing. No doubt he cannot be certain that his men will do "as they are told when they are working alone. But if he does "all that is reasonable to ensure that his safety system is "operated he will have done what he is bound to do."

In this case the plaintiff suggested several methods of cleaning the window which he said should have been devised by the employers for cleaning this window. The judge disposed of all of them in favour of the employers, and I need say nothing about them except for one particular method which is described as the "transom method." It was said on behalf of the plaintiff that if the employers had examined the windows of this particular building, they would have found that the men could have used their safety belts, by putting the rope around a transom, and that they should have instructed the men to do this. By a strange irony, it was the employers themselves who first suggested this method. They raised it by way of a plea of contributory negligence against the plaintiff himself. They said that he was provided with a safety belt and a rope, there was a strong transom at the top of this window, and he ought to have fastened his rope over the top of the transom and attached it to his safety belt. When the plaintiff's advisers saw this plea, they turned it to their own advantage. They amended the statement of claim so as to charge the employers with negligence in not ordering the men to use the transom method. They said, with some force: If the employers can think of this method now for the purposes of their defence, why did they not think of it before the windows were cleaned? The plaintiff's advisers sought thus to hoist the employers with their own petard, just as happened in General Cleaning Contractors v. Christmas.[1]

At the trial it was the employers themselves who proved that the transom method was practicable. [His Lordship read from the evidence of the defendants' witnesses as to the practicability of using the transom method, including that of the works manager of one of the big firms in the window-cleaning industry, who had agreed that if the transoms appeared to be of suitable strength, it would be the right course to ask the occupier if he minded the transom being used. His Lordship continued:] The employers also called an expert, and the only objection which he raised to the use of the transom was the possibility of damage to the paintwork. It is quite clear, therefore, that the transom method was a practicable way of securing safety subject only to the possible objection of the occupier; but I do not see that the employers can raise that objection. They ought to have asked the occupier whether he minded or not.

In my opinion the employers were guilty of negligence in that they failed to inquire into the possibility of attaching the safety belt to the transom or to instruct their men to use that method. Window-cleaning is a trade which is more dangerous than many other trades, and it is the duty of employers on that account to take all the more care to protect their workmen. They know that their workmen often stand on the sills to do their work; and they know of the many accidents which have happened in so doing. In this small firm, employing 20 men, in the course of 15 or 20 years there had been two fatal accidents, two cases of broken legs, and several other injuries. The employers are not able to prevent danger to the men altogether, but they ought to

C. A.
1954
Drummond v. British Building Cleaners Ld.
Denning L.J.

do everything possible to lessen it. Their expert said that the only satisfactory method was to have a safety belt fastened by a rope on to something secure. The London County Council have made regulations with regard to work over the highway, in which they insist on a safety belt attached to something secure. So here, when the employers undertook the task of cleaning the windows of this building, which has 700 windows, they ought to have inspected the building to see what could be done to safeguard the men and particularly to see if there was a secure support to which a safety belt could be fixed. If they had done so, they would have discovered that there were stout transoms which could be used.

If there was any possibility of damage to the paintwork they should have asked Messrs. Bovril whether they minded. Not having asked that question, it does not lie in the defendants' mouth to say that Messrs. Bovril would have refused. It does not look as if Messrs. Bovril would have refused, inasmuch as after the accident they inserted eyes outside the windows so that safety belts can be attached. It seems to me that the employers, not having done any of these things, were guilty of negligence. I know it is the general practice in this trade for men to work on the sills, but that does not excuse the employers from simply folding their hands and doing nothing.

The judge disposed of the "transom method" by saying that he thought that the men "if ordered to take this precaution "before getting out on to the sill would have regarded such an "intervention by their employers as unreasonable and grand-"motherly." But it seems to me that, unless the employers took the step of ordering these men to use their ropes on the transoms, they are not excused. If employers take all proper steps and give all proper instructions, they have done all that they can; and if the men do not obey them it is the men's own fault; but the employers must, first of all, take all proper steps to protect their men and give them proper instruction. In my judgment, therefore, this appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the amount of damages which the judge assessed at £1,750.

Morris L.J. It was pointed out that the work of the plaintiff was by its nature risky and dangerous. That is beyond question. It was said in the pleadings that the plaintiff had voluntarily run the risks of his employment in that, with full knowledge of the risks involved in a window-cleaner's calling, including the risks of standing on a window sill, he had voluntarily and deliberately decided to run those risks by engaging in that calling and could not now be heard to complain on that account. Alternatively, it had been pleaded that on the occasion in question he voluntarily ran the risk involved in standing on the window sill, although he had a ladder available, and could not now be heard to complain on that account. That matter was only very faintly put before us, but, although the plaintiff in embarking on this particular occupation may have run the risks that were inevitable in it and the dangers that were unavoidable, it could not, in my judgment, be said that the plaintiff had run the risks which reasonable care, diligence and forethought on the part of his employers could have obviated. There can be no question that the employers knew that the plaintiff would be called on to do something which was fraught with danger.

It was said in the evidence that the sill method, that is to say, the method of standing on a narrow sloping sill with a considerable drop if a grip was lost, was as safe a method as could be devised. But it was plainly something that was fraught with considerable peril, and, therefore, it was the duty of the employers to apply their minds constantly to the question of doing all that reasonably could be done to minimize the dangers and the perils. I do not think that anyone in this case suggested that it would be the duty of employers to lay down specifically in regard to each window what a workman was to do. But the photograph which is before us in this case shows that there are several windows similar to that from which the plaintiff fell. If the employers could have laid down some system, even though referable to some only of the windows that the plaintiff would be called on to clean, which would have obviated dangers or lessened the risks, then it was the duty of the employers to do their best reasonably to adopt and prescribe such a system.

In General Cleaning Contractors Ld. v. Christmas, Lord Reid said [2]: "The need to provide against the danger of a sash moving "unexpectedly appears to me to be so obvious that, even if it "were proved that it is the general practice to neglect this "danger, I would hold that it ought not to be neglected and "that precautions should be taken. It is at this point that lack "of evidence causes difficulty, for there is no evidence as to "what would be reasonably practicable or effective precautions. "But I cannot believe that there would be any great difficulty "in devising a simple method of preventing the lower sash from "closing. I do not know what the best method would be. "Generally the plaintiff ought to put forward some method which "can be tested by evidence. But in this case I am assisted by "the fact that the appellants in their defence allege negligence "against the respondent." Then Lord Reid sets it out: "'(b) if "'he knew of the said defect, [the tendency of this window to "'move easily] in taking no or no adequate steps to wedge or "'secure the said window; (c) if he did not know of the said "'defect, in taking no or no adequate steps to ascertain whether "'it was safe to rely on the sashes of the said window for "'handhold.'"

A very similar and comparable position arose in this case, therefore, as arose in the Christmas case,[3] for here what was said by the employers as one part of their defence to the claim presented against them was that the plaintiff was negligent in failing to take any or any adequate steps to ascertain whether there was anything to which to attach the rope to his safety belt, which it was said could have been fixed to the transom below the fanlight. Further particulars were asked and the employers said: "The rope could have been attached to the "transom below the fanlight by passing it around the transom "and then hooking it on to itself." They added: "It could "also have been attached to one of the short ladders, the latter "being put up against the window or laid lengthwise across the "window's breadth." They were therefore saying to the plaintiff as one answer to his claim: "You ought to have attached the "rope to the transom."

When the matter was investigated at the trial the employers were at some pains to show that the method would have been very difficult because it would have caused damage to the paint, and further because it would have been necessary to get the permission of the owners of the building. Those objections when examined do not seem to me really to have substance. In any case they lie somewhat ill in the mouth of the defendants, who themselves have said that there could have been some measure of safety if the plaintiff had attached the rope to the transom. The objection in regard to the paint was investigated and considered by the judge. In regard to getting permission the defendants might have asked for permission and it does not lie in their mouth to say that if they had asked they would not have been given permission; every likelihood is the other way.

It was laid down in General Cleaning Contractors Ld. v. Christmas [3] that it is not enough merely to advance vague general suggestions; there should be something which the court can examine. Lord Jowitt said [4]: "It may be, in some other case, "that evidence will be called to prove that there is some other "method of securing the end of the safety belt, or indeed that "there is some safer method of cleaning windows for which no "hook is available than standing on a narrow sill, such, for "example, as the provision of a plank projecting on the outside "of the window and in some way secured on the inside. There was "no such evidence called in the present case." But in this present case there has been such evidence. The method of attaching a rope to the transom was first mentioned by the defendants themselves. The plaintiff not unnaturally then said that if he had been given instruction in regard to such method of securing the rope to the transom, his fall to the ground could have been avoided. Lord Oaksey, in the Christmas case, said [5]: "It is, I "think, well known to employers, and there is evidence in this "case that it was well known to the appellants, that their work-"people are very frequently, if not habitually, careless about [3] [1953] A.C. 180. [4] Ibid. 188. [5] Ibid. 189.

"the risks which their work may involve. It is, in my opinion, "for that very reason that the common law demands that "employers should take reasonable care to lay down a reasonably "safe system of work. Employers are not exempted from this "duty by the fact that their men are experienced and might, "if they were in the position of an employer, be able to lay down "a reasonably safe system of work themselves. Workmen are "not in the position of employers. Their duties are not performed "in the calm atmosphere of a board room with the advice of "experts. They have to make their decisions on narrow window "sills and other places of danger and in circumstances in which "the dangers are obscured by repetition."

That passage, in my judgment, meets many of the submissions that have been made to us here. It was said that the plaintiff was an experienced man, that he was best fitted by his knowledge to deal with all situations, and that it was reasonable to leave matters to him. There was evidence which suggested that window-cleaners do not think constantly of the risks that they run. Mr. Gissane said that they did not think of the risks. Mr. Hobday gave evidence to the same effect. It may be a very happy circumstance that those who do perform this work do not constantly get obsessed by the perils that beset them. But it is that very circumstance which makes it so necessary that those who employ them to do this dangerous work should take reasonable care to seek to devise a reasonably safe method.

In this case it has been shown by the evidence that the method of attaching a rope to the transom would have been effective. Mr. Gissane gave evidence of his experience of accidents of which he had knowledge. [His Lordship read from the evidence as to accidents in the firm over the last 20 years, and continued:] Mr. Harrington, in a passage to which our attention was called, referred to his experience as an architect and surveyor of investigating some hundreds of cases where there had been accidents, so that it cannot have been a matter of safety precautions that should not have been constantly in the minds of the employers. Mr. Gissane was asked: "Were you "employing more or less men during those years?—About 20. "And in this one little firm in that period of 20 years two of its "men were killed on window-cleaning work?—That is right. "What sort of method were they using when they were killed?—"Much the same as the court has heard about this last hour or "more. And you made no alteration?—No. And there were "other accidents?—Yes. Pilcher J.: What? Using the jumping "method? Mr. Marven Everett to the witness: What you call "'the in and out'?—We were going on through the years much "the same." Later Mr. Gissane, in answer to the question: "Do you not ever discuss these matters with any of your com-"petitors in the trade?" said "I do not discuss any matters "with competitors." One might have hoped that in a matter affecting the whole trade every possible idea might be pooled, every suggestion tested, and every conceivable course tried, in order that, in the interests of all concerned in the community, the maximum degree of safety might be achieved.

C. A.

Drummond v. British Building Cleaners Ld.
Morris L.J.

There is no suggestion here that these employers were in any way callous or anything of that kind; nobody has suggested that. But this case has shown once again what are the risks in this occupation. One can only hope that in time some additional safety suggestions other than those referred to in the evidence in this case may be considered. But the fact remains that on the evidence here it is shown that the method of attaching the rope to the transom was a practicable method. Mr. Gissane said that very plainly.

[His Lordship read from the evidence of the witnesses as to the practicability of the transom method, and continued:] Mr. Harrington, when he was called, raised the point as to damage to the paint that might result from this method, and in answer to the question: "If they put their rope round the transom the "plaintiff would probably not have fallen. It is not by any "means every window that has got a transom, is it?" he said "Very few proportionately. And I am quite sure that if the "men were told to do that they would not do it." It may be that that was the passage which the judge had in mind when he used the words in regard to this part of the case which my Lord (Denning L.J.) has cited.

It seems to me that that approach is covered precisely by the words of Lord Reid in the Christmas case [6]: "It is the duty of "the employer to consider the situation, to devise a suitable "system, to instruct his men what they must do and to supply "any implements that may be required such as, in this case, "wedges or objects to be put on the window sill to prevent the "window from closing. No doubt he cannot be certain that his "men will do as they are told when they are working alone. "But if he does all that is reasonable to ensure that his safety "system is operated he will have done what he is bound to do." It seems to me, therefore, that there was evidence here proving that the method of attaching the rope to such windows as had a firm transom was a method that could have been laid down, and that had such method been prescribed for windows such as that on which the plaintiff was working at the time of this accident, he would not have fallen. Therefore I consider that on the evidence in this case the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Parker L.J. I agree. The only allegation which calls for serious consideration in this court is that the defendants failed in their duty in not instructing the plaintiff to attach the rope from his safety belt to a transom when he was working on a window with a sound transom. With regard to the many other points raised, I entirely agree with the conclusions reached by the judge in his careful judgment. In the absence of eyes fitted into the walls of a building to which the rope of the safety belt can be attached, the usual method of cleaning windows on the outside is by standing or squatting on the sill holding on to the sash. That was the method used by the plaintiff at the time of his accident. Moreover, this method was held by the House of Lords in the Christmas case [7] to be a reasonably safe method in the absence of those eyes, provided, of course, that precautions are taken to see that the sashes are sound and that they do not creep. The fact, however, that this method is reasonably safe in cases where no other safety measures are possible does not exonerate employers from considering all practicable methods of making it safe by providing, as it were, a second line of defence. After all, the duty is not to subject the employees to unnecessary risk.

In the present case, the defendants appear to have been content to accept the view that a window-cleaner's job is inherently risky in the absence of eyes fitted into the wall, and to have given no consideration at all to further methods of making it safe. Yet, be it observed, as soon as the accident has occurred they themselves, by their pleadings, allege that the plaintiff could have used the transom. In those circumstances they cannot well say that if they had thought about the matter before the accident they would not and could not have devised this method or have said that it was not practicable. On the evidence it is perfectly clear that the use of the transom is a perfectly practicable method. The witnesses almost entirely agree on that. The only doubt which some witnesses had was that it might dirty or injure the paint. On that I desire to add nothing more to what my Lords have said. What the defendants seem to have done is to have left the initiative to the plaintiff, and indeed by their pleading they allege that he was lacking in initiative in not using the transom, when it was really their duty to think of it and to instruct the plaintiff in regard thereto. In that connexion I would refer to the observations of Lord Reid in the Christmas case.[8]

In saying that, I hope that I remain conscious of the fact that there may be a real difference between the failure of a workman to devise some method ad hoc for his own safety and the failure of an employer to devise a safe system of working. A window-cleaning employer cannot, for example, be expected to lay out the job window by window, whereas the employee at all times must take reasonable care for his own safety. In the present case the evidence is that the defendants had a contract with Bovril's to clean their windows once a month, an operation which took a matter of four or five days, on which the plaintiff's gang, either alone or with others, appears to have been always engaged. Again the evidence is that these premises had, according to one witness, 700, and, according to another witness, 1,000 windows. There was, it is true, no direct evidence as to the number of windows with transoms of the type on which the plaintiff was engaged.

Counsel for the defendants urged that we should approach the case on the basis that the only evidence was that the one window from which the plaintiff fell had a transom. Speaking for myself, I feel that I cannot approach the case in this way. The agreed photograph, which is part of the evidence in the case, shows eight windows of that type along one wall of the building, four on the first floor and four on the second floor, and it would be, in my view, highly unlikely that those eight windows were the only windows of this type in this very large block. I feel bound to assume that the building had, to say the least, a considerable number of windows of this type, and the evidence being that the whole building was of very sound construction, that the transoms of the other windows were sound as was the transom of the windows in question. Moreover, the defendants, whose duty it was to consider the risks and the method of minimizing them, are unable to show that they gave this method any consideration at all or that, if it be the case, the number of windows of this character at the Bovril job was so small that specific instructions with regard thereto were impracticable or unnecessary.

In my view the judge in giving judgment on this point took too broad a view in treating the defendants' duty in relation to windows generally rather than in relation to the windows of the job on hand, namely, the monthly cleaning of the windows at Bovril's premises. Further, it may be, as the judge finds, that the plaintiff in this case, even if instructed to use his safety belt on the transom, might have refused. Indeed, there was evidence that window-cleaners refused to use the safety belt even when eyes were fitted. Accordingly, it may be that he would not have used the safety belt and that the accident would not have been avoided. In my view, however, the defendants having failed in their duty by not giving him instructions to use the rope, cannot be heard to say that even if they had he would not have used it: see a passage of Lord Goddard C.J. in Roberts v. Dorman Long & Co. Ld.[9] For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

Fatal Accidents Acts.

In a writ issued under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846–1908, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, the plaintiff widow was described in the title of the action and the statement of claim as "administratrix," but the indorsement of the writ stated: "The plaintiff's claim is for damages" under the Acts. Letters of administration were not granted to the plaintiff until more than a year after the commencement of proceedings. In determining whether the writ had been issued in a representative capacity to which the plaintiff was not entitled and was, therefore, a nullity:—

Held (Romer L.J. dubitante), that the construction of the indorsement on the writ was the crucial matter for, according to R.S.C., Ord. 3, r. 4, it was in the indorsement that representative capacity, if relied upon, was to be shown; and the statements contained in the title and in the statement of claim that the plaintiff was administratrix were merely misdescriptions as to status not affecting the description as to capacity in the indorsement, the wording of which was wide enough to cover the plaintiff's claim as a widow. The writ was therefore good.

APPEAL from Ormerod J.

On February 12, 1951, one Thomas Henry Bowler died as the result of an accident in the river Thames. On October 19, 1951, his widow, Winifred Bowler, brought an action against the former employers alleging negligence or breach of statutory duty. The proceedings were in the following form: The title of the action was "Between Winifred Bowler (administratrix of Thomas "Henry Bowler, deceased) plaintiff, and John Mowlem & Co. Ld. "defendants." The indorsement of the writ read: "The plain-"tiff's claim is for damages for negligence and/or breach of "statutory duty under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846–1908, and "under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934." The statement of claim, which was delivered on the same day with the writ, said in the first paragraph: "The plaintiff is the

Bowler v. John Mowlem & Co. Ld.

"administratrix and lawful relict of Thomas Henry Bowler "deceased, hereinafter called the deceased, and brings this action "for the benefit of the deceased's estate under the provisions of "the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and for "the benefit of his dependants under the Fatal Accidents Acts, "1846/1908." Particulars of the persons on whose behalf the action was brought were then set out, namely, the widow, a son aged 14 and a daughter aged 7, and the prayer was: "And the "plaintiff claims: Under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Pro-"visions) Act, 1934, damages: Under the Fatal Accidents Acts, "1846/1908, damages."

Letters of administration were, in fact, not granted to the plaintiff until November 10, 1952.

At the trial of the action before Ormerod J. and a jury in November, 1953, the employers were found liable and damages were agreed between both sides at £3,375. A point which had been adumbrated at the beginning of the trial was then taken, that the writ was a nullity and the whole trial misconceived because the writ had been issued by the plaintiff, as administratrix, at a time when she was not the administratrix of the deceased's estate.

Ormerod J. held that he was bound by previous authority to enter judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

N. R. Fox-Andrews Q.C. and Ronald Hopkins for the plaintiff.

Marven Everett Q.C. and Norman Richards for the defendants.

The cases cited in argument appear in the judgment.

Denning L.J. referred to the facts set out above and continued: The fact was that, at the date when the writ was issued, the plaintiff was not the administratrix of the estate of Thomas Henry Bowler. No letters of administration had been taken out at that time: they were not in fact taken out until November 10, 1952. It is said that on that account the writ was a nullity and that all the proceedings are bad. It is said to be incurably bad because it cannot be amended, and a new writ would be of no avail in regard to the Fatal Accidents Acts because proceedings under those acts had at all material times to be brought within one year of the matters complained of. The one year has long since past, though I am glad that for future cases the period has now been extended to three years by the Law Reform (Limitation of Actions, etc.) Act, 1954.

The law on this subject as laid down by several decisions of this court is this: if a plaintiff brings an action in a representative capacity as administratrix, then that action is a nullity if she was not at that date by law administratrix with a proper grant. Even if she obtains a grant within a week, a month or a year afterwards it does not relate back. The writ is a nullity from the beginning. That has been established by the decisions of this court in Ingall v. Moran [1]; Hilton v. Sutton Steam Laundry [2]; Burns v. Campbell [3] and Finnegan v. Cementation Co. Ld. [4] The whole question in the present case is: Was this action brought by the plaintiff in a representative capacity as administratrix of her husband? In the title of the writ she is described as administratrix but, in my opinion, that does not denote a representative capacity. That is simply a description of her status as it was believed to be. The indorsement on the writ is the crucial matter. Under R.S.C., Ord. 3, r. 4, the indorsement is the place where representative capacity must be shown. That rule says: "If the plaintiff sues, or the defendant or any of "the defendants is sued, in a representative capacity, the indorse-"ment shall show . . . in what capacity the plaintiff or defendant "sues." In this indorsement it is nowhere said that the plaintiff claims as administratrix. In the previous cases in this court, which I have mentioned, the indorsement clearly said that the plaintiff claimed "as administratrix." This indorsement does nothing of the sort. There is no mention of any representative capacity in the indorsement. The statement of claim does not in law affect the matter one way or the other, but even there it is not said that the plaintiff brings the action as administratrix. It simply says that she is the "Administratrix and lawful relict of "the said Thomas Henry Bowler." That is a description of her status and not a statement of any representative capacity.

In those circumstances I am of opinion that this writ was not a nullity from the beginning, because the indorsement is completely clear of any suggestion of representative capacity. It is true that the plaintiff described herself as administratrix in the title of the action and in the statement of claim, but a misdescription in the title is not fatal; it does not make a writ a nullity any more than does a misdescription of a woman as a spinster when she is in fact a married woman. A misdescription in the title is never fatal; it can always be cured by amendment in the same way as a misnomer can. The thing which cannot be cured is the bringing of an action in a representative capacity which does not exist. But the indorsement is the place to find her capacity, and that does not make the error. In my opinion the point which has been raised on behalf of the defendants does not succeed. The appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the amount ordered by Ormerod J.

HODSON L.J. I have come to the same conclusion. By section 3 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, it was provided that:

Bowler v. John Mowlem & Co. Ld.
Hodson L.J.

"every such action shall be commenced within 12 calendar "months after the death of such deceased person." That section refers to actions brought by personal representatives. The action if it was brought in a representative capacity, which the plaintiff did not possess, must necessarily fail. That has been made clear by this court in Hilton v. Sutton Steam Laundry[5] and Finnegan v. Cementation Co. Ld.[6]: in other words, a wrong capacity cannot be properly cured by amendment so as to destroy the defendant's right to rely on the period of limitation. In the two cases which I have mentioned it was abundantly clear from the indorsement on the writ that the plaintiff was claiming as administratrix of the estate of her husband for damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts.

The sole question which arises in the present case is whether it is true that the plaintiff in this case is so claiming, the materiality being, of course, that under the Fatal Accidents Act of 1864, section 1, where there is no personal representative "in "every such case such action may be brought by and in the "name or names of all or any of the persons (if more than one) "for whose benefit such action would have been, if it had been "brought by and in the name of such executor or administrator, "and every action so to be brought shall be for the benefit of "the same person or persons, and shall be subject to the same "regulations and procedure, as nearly as may be, as if it were "brought by and in the name of such executor or administrator; This section enables the plaintiff to sue as widow where, as here, there was no personal representative. I have said already that in the two authorities to which I have referred there was no question but that the plaintiff's claim was as administratrix. In the second of those cases[7] reference was made to a decision of Donovan J. in Stebbings v. Holst & Co. Ld.[8] which was very near the case now before this court on its facts, but no disapproval of it was expressed in Finnegan's case, the distinction being, as Morris L.J. pointed out in his judgment,[9] that there was a variation in the language of the indorsement. Instead of the plaintiff's claim being indorsed as administratrix, as in Hilton's[10] and Finnegan's[11] cases, in Stebbings v. Holst & Co. Ld.[12] the words were: "'The plaintiff's claim is for damages under the "'Fatal Accidents Acts and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous "'Provisions) Act, 1934, as Widow and Administratrix of the "'estate of Alfred Stebbings deceased.'" I compare that with the language of the indorsement here: "The plaintiff's claim is "for damages for negligence and/or breach of statutory duty "under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846/1908, and under the "Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934." There is no reference in the indorsement in this case either to the plaintiff as the widow or to the plaintiff in her capacity as administratrix. The question is whether that indorsement ought, as the defendants contend, to be treated as an indorsement by a plaintiff suing in her capacity as administratrix. I have come to the conclusion that it ought not to be so construed. I recognize that it is not an easy case, for indeed in the title of the action the plaintiff was wrongly described as administratrix. In the statement of claim, which cannot cure defects in capacity shown on the indorsement and similarly ought not to be allowed to detract from the indorsement, she is described as administratrix and lawful relict. The vital matter to be construed is, I think, as my Lord has said, the indorsement itself. In my judgment the language of that indorsement is wide enough to cover the plaintiff's claim as widow. She was the widow of the deceased and there being no administratrix she was entitled to bring this action under the Fatal Accidents Act. In my judgment there is no technical objection to her so doing, and I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

Romer L.J. I confess that if this matter had had to be decided by myself unaided, I should have found great difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the appeal should be allowed. I do not propose to elaborate the grounds of my doubts because I understand that questions of this kind are not likely to arise again. I do feel that there is considerable force in at least one of the submissions which Mr. Marven Everett made on behalf of the defendants when he put it in this way: He said that when a defendant receives a writ he is entitled to know, because it is the object of the writ to tell him, what he is being sued for and by whom. The defendant on receiving this writ and looking at it would see the plaintiff was Winifred Bowler, and then in brackets "Administratrix of Thomas Henry Bowler, deceased." Then the defendant is required to enter an appearance in the action at the suit of Winifred Bowler, again "administratrix of "Thomas Henry Bowler, deceased." If he looked to see what relief was claimed he would find a claim under two statutes, the Fatal Accidents Act and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act. Of those two Acts relief under the second one can only be sought by a personal representative, and that relief therefore conforms to the description of the plaintiff. The other relief, damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, is relief which may be sued for by a personal representative. Again, therefore, there is nothing inconsistent with relief under that Act with the description of the plaintiff. There is no reference in the indorsement to the plaintiff's widowhood. I feel therefore, that the natural conclusion of the defendant to be derived from the writ, framed in that way, would be that he was being sued by the plaintiff in a representative capacity, and none the less because the requirements of R.S.C., Ord. 3, r. 4, had not been expressly complied with. That is, in brief, the submission which Mr. Marven Everett put, and which I think is an attractive one, and if I had had to decide this case unaided I would have accepted it. As, however, my brethren take a different view, the appeal must be allowed.

C. A.

Bowler v. John Mowlem & Co. Ld.

Appeal allowed.

Chapman v. Chapman—Variation of trusts—Inherent equitable jurisdiction — Statutory jurisdiction — Contingent interests of infant beneficiaries mortgaged by orders of court — Scheme to clear incumbrances by dissolution of trust—Purchase by trustees of life tenant's interest an administrative matter—Trustee Act, 1925 (15 Geo. 5, c. 19), s. 57.

Under a settlement made in 1919, F. received a protected life interest in the trust funds, with remainder to his then wife (the first defendant) for life, with remainder as to capital and income to the issue of F. by any marriage as he should by deed or will appoint; and in default of appointment to the children of F. by any marriage who should attain 21 or being a female marry, and if more than one in equal shares. The marriage between F. and the first defendant, of which there was no issue, was dissolved in 1924. In 1927 F. remarried; of the second marriage there was issue, the second and third defendants, who were of age, and the fourth defendant who was aged 19 at the date of the hearing of the summons.

F. died in 1941 without having exercised the power of appointment. It having become necessary to obtain funds for the maintenance of the children, the sum of £2,100 was obtained between 1942 and 1945 from one D. under a mortgage and charges sanctioned by the court, on the terms that D. should not call in the loans until the expiration of a year from the death of the life tenant (the first defendant), but that nevertheless the borrowers should have liberty to redeem at any time by the payment of the principal and all interest due at the rate of 5 per cent.

In 1952 D. died, and his executors desired that the mortgage debt and interest should be repaid. In 1953 a demand was made for some £500 in respect of estate duty accruing due on the death of F. It was agreed by all the beneficiaries that the trusts of the settlement should be determined, and a summons was taken out to sanction the execution of a draft deed of family arrangement whereby the first defendant was to surrender her life interest to the trustees for a sum less than its actuarial value, the defendants of full age were to be paid out, and the infant defendant's share put aside until he attained 21. On the hearing of the summons:—

Held, (1) that, under the general jurisdiction of the court, the dissolution of the settlement trusts could not be sanctioned, as the circumstances did not warrant the application of the principle of salvage.

Chapman v. Chapman [1954] A.C. 429; [1954] 2 W.L.R. 723; [1954] 1 All E.R. 798 applied.

(2) That the purchase by the trustees of the interest of the tenant for life could be properly sanctioned under section 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925, as an expedient act in the management or administration of the trust.

Quaere, whether section 57 could have been applied if the mortgage transaction had not been sanctioned by the court.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By a settlement made in 1919 a sum of £10,000 was vested in trustees (of whom the plaintiff was the survivor) on trust to pay the income to Eric Forster for life on protective trusts, and after his death to pay the income to his wife (the first defendant) if she should survive him for her life; and after the death of the survivor of them to hold the capital and income for the issue of Eric Forster by any marriage as he should by deed or will appoint, and in default of and subject to such appointment for all or any the child or children of Eric Forster by any marriage who should attain the age of 21 or being female marry under that age, and if more than one in equal shares.

There was no issue of the marriage of Eric Forster and the first defendant, which was dissolved in 1924. In 1927 Eric Forster remarried, and had issue three children, the second, third and fourth defendants, who were born in 1928, 1931, and on October 9, 1935.

On the death of Eric Forster in 1941 intestate and without having exercised the power of appointment, the income of the trust fund became payable to the Custodian of Enemy Property, as the first defendant had married an Austrian national and was resident in enemy territory. The children of the second marriage were in urgent need of money for their maintenance, and by orders of the court made in 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945, authority was given for capital sums amounting to £2,100 in all to be advanced for this purpose by one Henry Dagger, on the security of their contingent reversionary interests in the trust funds, on the terms that the mortgagee should not call in the loan until the expiration of a year from the death of the first defendant, but that nevertheless the mortgagors should be at liberty at any time to redeem by payment of the principal together with all the interest due at the rate of 5 per cent. from the date of the mortgage. The orders of the court were not made pursuant to section 57 [1] of the Trustee Act, 1954.

In 1952 Henry Dagger died; no further advances could be made from his estate, and his executors and trustees became anxious that the mortgage should be paid off together with accrued interest, which amounted to some £1,140 at the date of the summons. Further, in 1953, that a demand was made for some £504 in respect of estate duty leviable on the death of Eric Forster.

The value of the trust fund was some £7,750; it was invested in mortgages at 4 per cent., 4½ per cent., and 5 per cent. It was considered desirable by all concerned that the incumbrances and claim for estate duty should be paid off, and that the trust fund should be freed from further accumulations of mortgage interest. A draft deed of agreement was accordingly agreed and prepared, under which the first defendant was to accept a capital sum of £2,000 out of the trust fund in consideration of the release of her life estate, which sum was substantially less than its actuarial value; the trusts of the settlement were to be determined, the shares of the defendants of full age being paid to them, and the contingent interest of the infant defendant being made absolute, and his share set aside for him until he reached his majority. This summons was taken out on May 4, 1954, asking the sanction of the court to the execution of the deed.

Cur. adv. vult.

November 24. Harman J., reading his judgment, after stating the facts, continued: The originating summons recently came before me in chambers when I directed it to be adjourned into court for argument; for it seemed to me at first sight that to sanction the scheme was beyond the powers of the court having regard to the recent decision of the House of Lords in Chapman

[1] Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57 (1): "Where in the management or "administration of any property "vested in trustees, any sale, lease, "mortgage, surrender, release, or "other disposition, or any purchase, "investment, acquisition, expendi-"ture, or other transaction, is in the "opinion of the court expedient, but "the same cannot be effected by "reason of the absence of any power "for that purpose vested in the "trustees by the trust instrument, if "any, or by law, the court may by "order confer upon the trustees, "either generally or in any particular "instance, the necessary power for "the purpose, on such terms, and "subject to such provisions and condi-"tions, if any, as the court may "think fit and may direct in what "manner any money authorized to be "expended, and the costs of any "transaction, are to be paid or borne "as between capital and income."

v. Chapman.[1] When the case came on for argument a difference of opinion appeared between counsel concerned to prevail upon me to accede to the application. Mr. Walton, for the adult defendants, appeared to agree that Chapman's case [1] was a bar to success under the general jurisdiction of the court, but argued that the transaction was one which it was open to the court to sanction under section 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925. Mr. Winterbotham, for the infant beneficiary, while disclaiming the possibility of bringing the application within section 57, suggested it might be effected under the general jurisdiction of the court; and pointed out that it appeared to be exactly such a transaction as was referred to by Lord Morton in Chapman's case where, seeking to distinguish In re Trenchard [2] and holding, as Lord Simonds L.C. had already done, that no compromise in the true sense was there involved, he suggested that the order might have been justified in these words [3]: "This decision appears to me to "be no more than the sanctioning by the court of a purchase "by the trustees of the widow's rights." I confess to being puzzled by these words, which seem to suggest that there is some general power in the court to sanction a re-arrangement of the beneficial interests, and this is the very thing which the House declined to allow except in what are called salvage cases. In my judgment, I am not at liberty to sanction such a transaction under the court's general jurisdiction unless it can be brought within the salvage principle as explained by Sir Robert Romer L.J. in In re New [4] quoted by Evershed M.R. in In re Downshire Settled Estates.[5] Is there such a situation here? In my judgment, there is not. True it is that £500 must be raised to meet the claim for estate duty. No doubt also it is desirable to put an end to the accumulation of interest on the mortgages sanctioned by the court during the war. But these transactions, having been so sanctioned, cannot be treated as improvident or improper, and I do not think their existence raises such an emergency as will entitle the court to interfere. The infant defendant will attain his majority in less than two years and will be able then to consent to the winding up of the trust if he is so minded. Under these circumstances, I do not feel that the applicant has brought the case within the salvage principle, and in its absence I am of opinion, for the reasons given, that the court has no jurisdiction to interfere under its general jurisdiction.

It remains to consider whether the proposed transaction, or at least the first step in it, can be brought within section 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925. Counsel putting forward this view was content in the end to submit that there was jurisdiction under the section to sanction the purchase by the trustees of the life tenant's interest, this being, as he submitted, a purchase, acquisition or other transaction expedient in the management or administration of the trusts of the settlement but beyond the powers of the trustees. This kind of question is now not without authority. First, Wynn-Parry J., in Municipal and General Securities Co. Ld. v. Lloyds Bank Ld.,[6] sounded a note of warning in these words. I ought to say that the nature of the transaction is explained at the beginning of his judgment[7]: "The summons asks that there may be conferred on the trustees, "so as to be exercisable at the request of the managers for the "time being of the trust, a power to sell the stocks issued under "the three Acts in question, as to which I have held that, on the "terms of the trust deed as it stands, there is no power to sell. "It is further asked that there be a general power to sell all or "any other stocks or securities, if any, which may from time to "time hereafter be received by the trustee, so as to form part "of a unit pursuant to any statutory provisions for compensation. "That is a power looking to the future and anticipating further "possible schemes for nationalization. It is further asked that "power shall be given to reinvest, not only the net proceeds of "the sale of any of the stocks coming within the purview of the "power of sale to which I have referred, but also the whole or "part of the net proceeds of any sale of investments or rights "effected in accordance with the existing provisions of the trust "deed and the supplemental trust deeds, in a manner set out in "detail in this question. That manner, in effect, would involve "investing the proceeds in buying further ordinary shares of the "holding which at the time of the proposed investment was the "smallest in value of the holding of ordinary shares comprised "in each unit, and so on upwards with a view to achieving, so far "as possible, a perfect balance in the spread among the invest-"ments constituting the units. The first point which I have to "decide is whether there is jurisdiction in the court under "section 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925, to make an order, giving "authority to sell or authority to reinvest. The section is "couched in wide language, and there is little guidance in the "reported cases, a circumstance which, of course, is explained "by the fact that most applications under this Act are heard in "chambers. It appears to me that there must be some limit to "the scope of this section. It cannot be construed as having "such wide import as would allow a complete re-writing of a "trust deed or a substitution of a completely different object "from that for which the trust was brought into being." He then discusses the matter in detail and decides that the section has a very limited effect.

This aspect of the matter was emphasized by Roxburgh J. in his judgment in In re B.'s Settlement.[8] He was considering there the question whether a transaction could be effected under the Trustee Act, 1920, and he says that he was being asked to sanction the transaction under the general jurisdiction of the court or under the Trustee Act. He then turns to the statutory provisions and, having looked through them, he says that section 57 of the Trustee Act and section 64 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, should be construed together. That view, however, has been differed from in the Court of Appeal; but what he says about section 57, in my opinion, stands. He says this[9]: "It "was argued that the leglislature cannot have intended by these "elaborate sentences to leave the rule in In re New[10] unchanged. "It certainly has not done that. The jurisdiction is no longer "'extraordinary.' It extends to transactions which are neither "urgent nor of an emergency character, but does it extend to a "re-writing of the trusts of the settlement, to a re-arrangement "of the beneficial interests thereunder for the advantage of the "beneficiaries generally where there is no administrative problem? "As I look at these two sub-sections together, it seems to me that "they have been carefully framed so as to imply a negative "answer. If it be asked why, in that case, the Act does not "in its express terms supply the negative answer, I would reply "that it could not do so without defining the boundary between "administrative action and re-writing the trusts, and that is a "boundary which is incapable of precise definition. It seems to "me that neither section authorises a transaction which is not "of an administrative character, and that the court cannot confer "on tenant for life or trustees the power to execute a re-settle-"ment or deal with the trust estate on the footing that a "re-settlement has been executed. No language could be less apt "than this for conferring such a novel and extensive power on "the court. If I am wrong in this view, I would hold in the "alternative that the legislature has by its language given clear "indication that the court ought not to exercise its discretion in "favour of a transaction or series of transactions which, in its "opinion, are not of an administrative character, but involve a "substantial re-writing of the trusts in order to re-arrange "beneficial interests to greater advantage." This part of the judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in In re Downshire Settled Estates,[11] where Evershed M.R., giving the majority decision, says this: "In our opinion the word 'administration' "is not capable, in the context in which it appears, of bearing "the meaning which the appellants seek to attach to it. It is "clear, in our judgment, that the subject-matter both of "'management' and of 'administration' in section 57 is trust "property which is vested in trustees; and in our opinion 'trust "'property' cannot, by any legitimate stretch of the language, "include the equitable interests which a settlor has created in "that property. We think that the reason for the appearance of "the word 'administration' as an alternative to 'management' "in the section is that, although the words do largely overlap, it "was thought possible that an unduly narrow interpretation "might be adopted, if only one word were to be used without "the other. Be that as it may, we are satisfied that the applica-"tion of both words is confined to the managerial supervision "and control of trust property on behalf of beneficiaries. Such is "the natural scope of both expressions, and to attribute to them, "or either of them, an additional association with the beneficial "interests themselves, would be to superimpose upon their "ordinary significance an interpretation that is both unnatural "and unwarranted." Then he says [12]: "the object of section 57 "was to secure that trust property should be managed as advan-"tageously as possible in the interests of the beneficiaries and, "with that object in view, to authorize specific dealings with the "property which the court might have felt itself unable to "sanction under the inherent jurisdiction, either because no "actual 'emergency' had arisen or because of inability to show "that the position which called for intervention was one which "the creator of the trust could not reasonably have foreseen; but "it was no part of the legislative aim to disturb the rule that "the court will not rewrite a trust, or to add to such exceptions to "that rule as had already found their way into the inherent "jurisdiction." This part of the judgment formed no part of the appeal to the House of Lords which disapproved the rest of the Court of Appeal's decision in that case.

[8] [1952] 2 T.L.R. 489; [1952] 2 All E.R. 647.

With these warnings before me, I must consider what are the limits of "administrative" purposes. The courts have long come to the rescue in cases where tenants for life have so encumbered their interests that there is no money to support the family. In such a case the court authorizes capital money to be expended in paying off the encumbrances on the life interest and provides for its replacement as a rule by a policy of insurance. In re Salting [13] was such a case, and it is to be observed that the order there was made under section 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925, and no doubt has since been expressed of the court's jurisdiction, except for the point, not here material, about discretionary trusts, which was discussed by the Court of Appeal in In re Downshire Settled Estates.[14] If then, it is argued, the court can authorize the use of capital to buy up the tenant for life's debts, why may it not sanction a similar expenditure of capital to purchase the life tenant's interest? One answer suggested is that this comes at least very near to altering the beneficial interests of the tenant for life.

I have the gravest doubt whether in an ordinary case this is a power which can be conferred on trustees under section 57, but this is not an ordinary case. Here the court has already authorized four transactions, namely, the charges executed in 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945, which have affected the beneficial interests under the settlement of the remaindermen. The result is that these interests are subjected to an annual wastage, and it seems clearly expedient to stop that wastage if possible. The trustees must also raise out of capital the money necessary to pay the estate duty on the death of Mr. Forster. At this juncture, the tenant for life comes forward and offers to sell her life interest at an advantageous price. If the trustees may lay out money in accepting the offer, that will free the rest of the fund and make it possible to pay off the charges and the estate duty at once, so preserving something for the remaindermen. In my judgment, this is a matter of management or administration in the circumstances, and it being, in my judgment, expedient, I propose to confer on the trustees the necessary power.

[13] [1932] 2 Ch. 57.
[14] [1953] Ch. 218.

The order I make will be to confer on the trustees power to purchase at a price not in excess of £2,000 the interest of the first defendant in the trust fund.

Order accordingly.

Practice—Parties—Misdescription—Amendment—Defendant sued in his trade name—Defendant appearing and defending action—Judgment for plaintiffs—Proceedings abroad to enforce judgment—Defendant's name differing from trade name—Leave to amend title of action.

The plaintiffs, having obtained judgment in the courts of this country against "Bernhard Bartels" for breaches of contracts, sought to enforce that judgment in Germany, but were met by the defendant with a plea that the judgment of the British court was invalid and unenforceable because his forename was "Josef" and there was no such person as Bernhard Bartels. The defendant had entered into the contracts as Bernhard Bartels, and had defended the action in that name. In anticipation of possible difficulties in the German courts the plaintiffs asked leave to amend the title of their action to "Josef Bartels trading as Bernhard Bartels":—

Held, that since the substantive judgment would not thereby be altered, the court had jurisdiction to correct such misnomer or misdescription at any time, whether before or after judgment was given; and that the amendment should be made.

Pearlman (Veneers) S. A. Pty. Ld. v. Bernhard Bartels.

Appeal from Slade J.

In 1950 the plaintiffs, Pearlman (Veneers) S.A. (Pty.) Ld., entered into contracts in writing with a concern which described itself on its notepaper as Bernhard Bartels, of Langenberg in Germany. In 1951, the plaintiffs, complaining that Bernhard Bartels had not fulfilled their contracts, brought an action for damages in the English courts and were in June, 1952, awarded £47,353 damages by Sellers J. When, however, the plaintiffs sought to enforce the judgment in the German courts they were met by the defendant with a plea that the judgment was invalid and unenforceable, on the ground that the defendant's name was Josef and not Bernhard Bartels; that Bernhard Bartels was only the name in which he traded, and therefore the judgment was directed against a supposed natural person who did not exist. The court of first instance in Germany rejected the defendant's contention, but an appeal having been entered by the defendant in Germany the plaintiffs applied to a master for leave to amend the name of the defendant to "Josef Bartels trading as Bernhard "Bartels." The master made the desired amendment and on appeal it was approved by Slade J.

The defendant appealed.

Gerald Gardiner Q.C. and Neil Lawson for the defendant.

Maurice Lyell Q.C., for the plaintiffs, was not called upon for argument.

Denning L.J. The plaintiffs, Pearlman (Veneers) S.A. (Pty.) Ld., entered into contracts in writing with a concern which described itself on its notepaper as Bernhard Bartels of Langenberg in Germany. The contracts were made in 1950. Afterwards the plaintiff company complained that Bernhard Bartels had not fulfilled the contracts and they brought an action for damages in the English courts. It was tried for four days in June, 1952, before Sellers J., and in the result the judge ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for £47,353 and costs.

In due course the plaintiff company sought to enforce that judgment in the German courts. In answer to that application in the German courts Bernhard Bartels said that the judgment was invalid and unenforceable, upon the ground that the true name of the defendant was Josef Bartels, that Bernhard Bartels was only the name in which he trades, and that there was no such person as Bernhard Bartels. He said that the judgment was directed against a supposed natural person who did not exist.

That plea sounds very ill in the mouth of the defendant, who instructed solicitors in this country in the name of Bernhard Bartels, made a contract in the name of Bernhard Bartels, entered appearance and fought the whole action in this country in the name of Bernhard Bartels and now, when it is a matter of enforcing the judgment in Germany, says there is no such person as Bernhard Bartels, but only Josef Bartels.

In that situation, to overcome this very technical point, the plaintiff company apply to the English courts and say "Please "amend the name of the defendant to the name which he now "says it is, change it to Josef Bartels trading as Bernhard "Bartels." The master and Slade J. have made the necessary amendment. An appeal comes to this court in which it is said that these courts have no jurisdiction to amend a judgment once it has been entered. Reliance was placed on the decision of this court in MacCarthy v. Agard.[1] The distinction between that case and the present was drawn by Slade J. in a judgment with which I fully agree. In MacCarthy v. Agard[1] the plaintiff did not seek only to amend the name or the description of the defendant, he sought to alter the very judgment itself, which was in a special form applicable to a married woman. He sought to get rid of the operative and substantive part of the judgment. This court, by a majority, held that that could only be done by way of appeal. Nevertheless, in the course of that case it appears that this court gave leave to amend the title of the action.

When the substantive judgment is not being altered, but only the title of the action, it is to my mind plain that this court has ample jurisdiction to correct any misnomer or misdescription at any time whether before or after judgment. That is what the master and the learned judge have done in the present case. The judgment is not altered or amended in any way; it is for £47,353 2s. 6d., with costs against the defendant. All that is necessary to be done, which this court has ample power to do, is to alter the title by describing the defendant in the name which he now says is his correct name, Josef Bartels, but adding, so that there should be no possibility of misunderstanding, "trading "as Bernhard Bartels." It is to be hoped, this amendment being made, that there should be no difficulty in this judgment being enforced in Germany according to its true intent. I think this appeal should be dismissed.

HODSON L.J. I agree. I also agree with the careful judgment of Slade J., and with his analysis of what happened in MacCarthy v. Agard,[2] to which reference has been made. There is, in my view, no question of altering the judgment itself, which could not be done either under the slip rule or under the general power to amend contained in R.S.C., Ord. 28, r. 12, which provides: "The court or a judge may at any time, and on such terms as "to costs or otherwise as the court or judge may think just, "amend any defect or error in any proceedings, and all necessary "amendments shall be made for the purpose of determining "the real question or issue raised by or depending on the "proceedings." In think the wording of that rule is wide enough to cover the amendment of the title and I do not accept the objection which Mr. Gardiner has raised that the rule must necessarily only apply to proceedings before judgment.

Pearlman (Veneers) S. A. Pty. Ld. v. Bernhard Bartels.
Hodson L.J.

The only question which to my mind has caused doubt is whether the court ought to have been troubled with this matter at all. Judgment was given against Bernhard Bartels. He went to the German courts and said that the first name of those two was wrongly attributed to him; it was only a trading name and his real name was Josef. How he acquired the name of Josef I do not know and the German courts seem to have taken the view which I have suggested was the obvious one, namely, that there was really nothing in the point and no need to amend. There has been an appeal from the court of first instance in Germany and the plaintiffs, out of abundance of caution, have come to this court to have the title of the judgment altered in order that they may be quite certain that no technical difficulty will arise on the appeal. In think, in the circumstances, the learned judge having dealt with the matter, his decision ought not to be disturbed and the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

* BAMBRIDGE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

Revenue — Income tax — Transfer of assets to company incorporated abroad — Death of transferors — Settlement of shares in company — General bequest of shares — Liability of beneficiary to tax — "Associated operation" — Finance Act, 1936 (26 Geo. 5 & 1 Edw. 8, c. 34), s. 18 (1), (2).

In 1933 the taxpayer's father and mother transferred certain assets to Kamouraska Investments Ld., a company incorporated in Canada. By two identical settlements, dated January 12, 1934, each of them transferred certain shares and debentures in the company to trustees on trust to pay the income from each settlement to the settlor during his (or her) life, and on the death of the settlor to pay the whole income to the other spouse during his (or her) life, and on the death of the surviving spouse to pay the whole of the income to the taxpayer during her life. The settlements were revocable.

The taxpayer's father died on January 18, 1936, without having revoked his settlement. The mother revoked her settlement on June 16, 1937. She died on December 19, 1939, and by her will, dated December 6, 1938, the taxpayer became entitled under a general bequest to a life interest in her mother's residuary estate, which included the shares and debentures in the company formerly comprised in her mother's settlement.

The Crown claimed that the income of the company was deemed to be the taxpayer's income for income tax purposes by section 18 of the Finance Act, 1936:—

Held, (1) that the taxpayer was liable to tax in respect of the securities received under her father's settlement, since her rights were acquired by means of the transfer in conjunction with an associated operation—the settlement—within the meaning of section 18 (2).

(2) that she was also liable to tax in respect of the securities received under her mother's will which was the means by which the taxpayer acquired her interest and was an "associated operation" within the meaning of section 18 (2) in relation to all the property disposed of by the will, and there was no justification for distinguishing a general from a specific bequest.

The deaths of the parents were not "associated operations" but merely incidents leading to the falling into possession of the rights.

Quaere whether devolution of similar property on intestacy could amount to an associated operation.

Congreve v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1948] W.N. 197; [1948] 1 All E.R. 948; 30 T.C. 163 applied.

Decision of Harman J. [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1265; [1954] 3 All E.R. 86n. varied.

APPEAL from Harman J.[1]

Mrs. Elsie Bambridge, appealed against assessments to income tax under Schedule D for the years 1948–49 and 1949–50, and to assessments to surtax for the same years, on the ground that these assessments incorrectly included the income of a Canadian company, Kamouraska Investments Ld.

The circumstances in which these claims for tax were raised against Mrs. Bambridge were as follows:

On December 14, 1933, the parents of Mrs. Bambridge, Mr. and Mrs. Rudyard Kipling, made transfers of assets to Kamouraska Investments Ld., a company formed by them in that year and incorporated in the province of Prince Edward Island. They had already in 1915 transferred certain investments to another Canadian company, Sussex Investment Co. Ld., incorporated in the province of Nova Scotia, but that company was later put into liquidation and all its assets were acquired by Kamouraska Investments Ld. It was agreed, for the purposes of the appeal, that the matter could be regarded as if all the assets acquired by Kamouraska Investments Ld. had been directly transferred to it by Mr. and Mrs. Kipling on December 14, 1933.

On January 12, 1934, Mr. Kipling settled the shares and debentures in Kamouraska Investments Ld., which he had received as consideration for the assets transferred by him, upon trusts whereunder, so far as material, Mr. Kipling received a first life interest with remainder to Mrs. Kipling for life, with remainder to Mrs. Bambridge for life. The settlement reserved a power of revocation to Mr. Kipling, which was never, in fact, exercised.

On the same date, Mrs. Kipling made a settlement in similar terms of the shares and debentures in Kamouraska Investments

Ld. which she had received as consideration for the assets transferred by her to that company. The trusts of her settlement closely resembled those of the settlement made by Mr. Kipling, the only difference being that the first life interest was taken by Mrs. Kipling with remainder to Mr. Kipling for life, followed by a remainder to Mrs. Bambridge for life, as in Mr. Kipling's settlement. There was also in this settlement a similar power of revocation exercisable by Mrs. Kipling which, as will appear in a moment, was in fact exercised.

On January 18, 1936, Mr. Kipling died; on December 19, 1939, Mrs. Kipling died, and Mrs. Bambridge, on the death of both her parents, became entitled in possession to the life interest given to her under Mr. Kipling's settlement. Mrs. Kipling, after Mr. Kipling's death, wholly revoked the trusts of her settlement, that revocation being dated June 16, 1937. On December 6, 1938, Mrs. Kipling made a will containing a residuary gift under which her residuary estate was to be held on trusts which included a first life interest to Mrs. Bambridge. That will contained no specific reference to Mrs. Kipling's shares and debentures in Kamouraska Investments Ld.

Mrs. Kipling died on December 19, 1939. She never revoked or altered her will and it was duly proved on February 19, 1940. As a result Mrs. Bambridge became entitled to virtually the whole of the share and loan capital of Kamouraska Investments Ld., and it was claimed by the Crown that in those circumstances she had acquired the rights by virtue of which she had power to enjoy the income of Kamouraska Investments Ld. within the provisions of section 18 of the Finance Act of 1936 [2]; that the whole of the income should be treated as being hers for the purposes of income tax and surtax, and she was assessed accordingly.

(1B) The last two fore- "going subsections shall not apply if "the individual shows in writing or "otherwise to the satisfaction of "the Special Commissioners either— "(a) that the purpose of avoiding "liability to taxation was not the "purpose or one of the purposes for "which the transfer or associated "operations or any of them were "effected; or (b) that the transfer "and any associated operations were "bona fide commercial transactions "and were not designed for the "purpose of avoiding liability to "taxation."

The special commissioners upheld the assessments. On appeal Harman J. held that the assessments should stand so far as they related to the proportion of the income of Kamouraska Investments Ld. attributable to the shares and debentures comprised in Mr. Kipling's settlement; but the judge held that the assessments should be discharged so far as they related to the proportion of the income of Kamouraska Investments Ld. attributable to the shares and debentures taken by Mrs. Bambridge under her mother's will. The judge's reason for that view was that, inasmuch as the will did not dispose specifically of Mrs. Kipling's shares and debentures, the making of it could not be said to be an operation effected "in relation to" any relevant assets within the meaning of subsection (2) of section 18 and, therefore, could not be regarded as an "associated operation" for the purposes of the section. As regards Mrs. Bambridge's interest under Mr. Kipling's settlement the judge held that the settlement was an associated operation within the meaning of the section and, consequently, that the claim to tax was made out as regards the corresponding part of the income of the Canadian company.

Both parties appealed, the Crown contending that the special commissioners' decision should be restored, and Mrs. Bambridge contending that the assessments should be wholly discharged, as neither Mr. Kipling's settlement nor Mrs. Kipling's will could rightly be regarded as associated operations within the meaning of the section.

Bambridge v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.

Jenkins L.J.

elaboration but, in truth, the matters debated before us fall within a narrow compass. There is no doubt that Mr. and Mrs. Kipling did, within the meaning of section 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, make transfers of assets by virtue of which or in consequence whereof, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, income became payable to a person resident or domiciled outside the United Kingdom, namely, Kamouraska Investments Ld. There is further no doubt that Mrs. Bambridge did, within the meaning of the section, acquire rights by virtue of which she had power to enjoy the income of Kamouraska Investments Ld., partly under the provisions of her father's settlement and partly under the provisions of her mother's will. But it is contended on the part of Mrs. Bambridge that she did not acquire those rights by means of the transfers, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, within the meaning of the section.

The argument for the Crown as regards Mrs. Bambridge's interest under her father's settlement is to the effect that she acquired the rights in question by means of the transfer to Kamouraska Investments Ld. made by her father, in conjunction with an associated operation in the shape of his settlement of his shares and debentures in Kamouraska Investments Ld.; and this argument was accepted by the judge.

The argument for Mrs. Bambridge as regards this same interest is to the effect that she acquired the rights in question not by means simply of the transfer and the settlement, but by means of those two transactions together with the deaths of her father and mother. It is said that those deaths constituted essential links in Mrs. Bambridge's title to the rights in question; that the links were not associated operations within the meaning of the section; and that, in order to bring the rights in question within the mischief of the section, it must be shown that Mrs. Bambridge acquired them strictly in the way postulated by the section, that is to say, by means either of the transfer alone or of the transfer in conjunction with associated operations, and by no other alternative or ancillary means.

I agree with the submission that the deaths of Mr. and Mrs. Kipling were not associated operations within the meaning of the section, but I cannot accept the conclusion sought to be adduced from that submission. In my opinion, Mrs. Bambridge did acquire the rights in question by means of the transfer and settlement within the meaning of the section, and the deaths of Mr. and Mrs. Kipling were merely events upon the happening of which the rights acquired by Mrs. Bambridge by means of the transfer and settlement, or, in other words, her interest under the settlement, fell into possession by virtue of the terms and provisions of the settlement itself. It would, to my mind, be an abuse of language to say that Mrs. Bambridge acquired her interest under the settlement by means of the deaths of her father and mother. An interest in remainder, or, for that matter a contingent interest, given by a settlement is given by means of the settlement and not by means of the happening of the event which brings the interest into possession or, as the case may be, which fulfils the contingency. The prior interest or, as the case may be, the contingency, is in the nature of a qualification upon the interest given, and forms no part of the instrumentality or the means whereby the interest is given by the settlor or acquired by the beneficiary, which consist in the settlement and nothing but the settlement. The point is not one which can be usefully further elaborated, and on this part of the case I am content to accept the judge's conclusion and the reasons on which it is based.

As regards Mrs. Bambridge's interest under her mother's will, the argument on her side was to the effect that while the making of the will might have been an associated operation, if it had referred specifically to Mrs. Kipling's shares and debentures in Kamouraska Ld., the mere making of the will effected nothing, as it was also necessary, before Mrs. Bambridge could acquire any interest under it, that Mrs. Kipling should die in the lifetime of Mrs. Bambridge, leaving her will unrevoked. It was further argued that as the will only disposed of Mrs. Kipling's shares and debentures in Kamouraska Investments Ld. by means of the general residuary gift contained in it, the making of the will was not an operation "in relation to the assets transferred" within the meaning of subsection (2) of section 18. The judge rejected the former branch of this argument but accepted the latter. In my opinion he should have rejected both.

I agree with the submission made on Mrs. Bambridge's side that the compound event in which alone the provision made for Mrs. Bambridge in the residuary gift could become effective, namely, the death of Mrs. Kipling in Mrs. Bambridge's lifetime leaving the will unrevoked, was not an associated operation within the meaning of the section; but I think that the happening of this compound event amounted to no more than the fulfilment of the conditions essential to the efficacy of any testamentary disposition. In the events which happened, the testamentary disposition in this case became effective and, accordingly, Mrs. Bambridge acquired the relevant interest under and by virtue of, or in other words by means of, her mother's will. Certain events might have happened which would have prevented her from so taking, but none of them happened. One event had to happen before she could take anything under the will, namely, the death of her mother, the testatrix, and that event, of course, happened. But it does not follow that she acquired her interest otherwise than by means of the will, which, by its very nature, could only take effect on the death of the testatrix. I would say that Mrs. Bambridge took by means of the will on the happening of the event in which alone the will could take effect.

As to the second branch of the argument on this part of the case, which the judge accepted, namely, the argument to the effect that the residuary gift, although it undoubtedly disposed of the shares and debentures in question, did not suffice to make the will an operation "in relation to" such shares and debentures, I confess I find myself wholly unable to follow it. I fail to see how a will which disposes of property can reasonably be said not to have been made "in relation to" the property of which it disposes; nor can I see any justification for distinguishing between property specifically disposed of and property comprised in a residuary gift, and holding that the will relates to the former but not to the latter. It seems to me abundantly plain that where a testator has made a will containing a residuary gift, he has made a will in relation to every item of property comprised in that gift, just as much as he would have done if he had disposed specifically of each item comprised in the residuary gift. I am not impressed by the argument, by way of reductio ad absurdum, which the judge seems to have found conclusive, to the effect that if a will containing a residuary gift, under which relevant assets passed, amounted to an associated operation, any will containing a residuary gift would amount to an associated operation, even though made before the date of any transfer, provided only that a transfer was made between the date of the will and the date of the testator's death, and that on the happening of the latter event relevant assets passed under the residuary gift. It is not necessary for the purposes of the present case to decide whether this would be so or not, but if the supposition is well-founded I cannot see anything manifestly absurd in it. If a testator makes a will containing a general residuary bequest, and then embarks on what I may call "a section 18 transaction," as a result of which he receives shares and debentures in a foreign company, and leaves his will unrevoked, he must be taken to know that if he retains the shares and debentures until his death they will pass under the residuary gift, and he must be taken to intend that result, just as much as if, after acquiring the shares and debentures, he had made a fresh will in identical terms.

Bambridge v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.
Jenkins L.J.

Mr. Borneman and Mr. Watson for Mrs. Bambridge urged upon us as a reason for rejecting the Crown's arguments the extension of liability to an indefinite succession of persons, which acceptance of those arguments would entail. The answer to this submission in terrorem, if I may so describe it, seems to me to be that once it is recognized, as in view of the decision of the House of Lords in Congreve v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[1] it must be recognized, that liability under the section extends to persons who are in no way parties to the offending transfer, the result must be that the liability attaches to every person who, for the time being, has power to enjoy the income in question, and has acquired the right giving rise to such power by means which bring him within the mischief of the section, and continues so long as there is any person who fulfils these conditions.

A further point was taken that, if the making of a will was to be considered as an associated operation, a capricious result would ensue inasmuch as a case in which shares or debentures of a foreign company devolved under a will would, or might, fix the legatee with liability, whereas a devolution of similar property on an intestacy could have no such result. I agree that it is indeed difficult to see how mere inactivity resulting in intestate succession could be held to amount to an associated operation, and it may well be, therefore, that in such a case the person taking under the intestacy would escape liability under the section. But the mere fact that such a case may be outside the net is no ground for excluding from the net cases which appear to fall fairly within the terms of the section.

Paying the best attention I can to its terms, I am of opinion that Mrs. Bambridge acquired the rights which gave her power to enjoy the income of Kamouraska Investments Ld. wholly by means of transfers and associated operations within the meaning of section 18. For these reasons I would allow the appeal of the Crown and dismiss the cross-appeal of Mrs. Bambridge, and direct that the assessments should be restored.

EVERSHED M.R. I am of the same opinion. Upon the cross-appeal our view is coincident with that of Harman J. and the special commissioners, and I say but little upon it. I can appreciate the point of view which underlay Mr. Borneman's argument, that until the House of Lords in the Congreve case [1] had pointed out the true scope of the language used by Parliament in section 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, it was not, perhaps, generally realized how far-reaching that section might be. Mr. Borneman sought, on a priori grounds, to give a construction to the Act which would exclude it from operating on a person like Mrs. Bambridge, not herself a transferor or a party to the transfers or any of the operations associated therewith, but a daughter of the transferors, taking as a beneficiary under their dispositions, testamentary or inter vivos, as the case might be. But having regard to the decision in the Congreve case,[1] and on a fair construction of the language of the section, it seems to me that the limitation which Mr. Borneman seeks to put upon the section is not open to him.

Upon the appeal we have taken a different view from that which commended itself to Harman J. I shall not, I hope, be thought disrespectful to him if I content myself again with but very few observations on this part of the case, for in truth, as my brother has observed, the argument is within a narrow compass and is not capable of long reasoning or, indeed, of much analysis. In the language of the judge [2]: "Can this will be said "to have been made 'in relation to any of the assets trans-"'ferred'? . . . . If it had contained a specific bequest of these "securities that would no doubt have been in relation to them, "but a mere general bequest does not seem to me properly to be "described as made 'in relation to' any assets that happen to "fall within it because they belong to the testator at his death." I confess that upon my first approach to the case I was inclined to be sympathetic to that view; but I have since been persuaded by the argument that it cannot be sustained.

Mr. Stamp posed the question: To what property does a will relate? The answer must, I think, be as Mr. Stamp submitted; that it relates to all the property that is comprised in it when it takes effect, whether the property is the subject of a specific devise or bequest, or is comprised within a residuary gift. In the light of that question and answer, it seems to me that this will was made "in relation to" the assets here in question. For that reason, and for those which my brother has already expressed, I think that the appeal should be allowed. The cross-appeal, as I have already indicated, will be dismissed.

McLeod (or Houston) v. Buchanan [1940] 2 All E.R. 179 applied.

CASE STATED by Liverpool stipendiary magistrate.

On January 27, 1954, an information was preferred by the respondent James Francis Cowley, a police constable, for and on behalf of the Director of Public Prosecutions against the appellant, James Lovelace, alleging that he on November 2, 1953, at Liverpool unlawfully for hire caused to be presented part of a stage play entitled "The Respectable Prostitute" before such part had been allowed by the Lord Chamberlain, contrary to section 15 of the Theatres Act, 1843.

At the hearing of the information on March 30 and April 8, 1954, the magistrate found the following facts. The appellant was the licensee of the Pavilion Theatre, Liverpool. The play "The Respectable Prostitute," a translation from a French play by Jean Paul Sartre, was licensed by the Lord Chamberlain on May 22, 1947, in a script which included stage directions and which was published in book form. The play was booked by the owners of the theatre for nightly performances at the Pavilion Theatre during the week beginning November 2, 1954, by a company of actors directed by one Patrick Laurence; and the appellant caused theatre programmes to be printed and the usual notices advertising the play to be exhibited. The appellant was responsible for paying and in fact paid the actors' salaries. On October 29, 1953, a police inspector visited the appellant and asked to see the script of the play. No complaints had been received but the title of the play prompted the visit. The appellant satisfied himself that the play was fully licensed and sent a copy to the police inspector on the morning of November 2. At the same time he informed Laurence, who was not only directing the play but acting the principal male part, that the police were interested in the play and that he (Laurence) and the company must keep strictly to the script. Laurence assured the appellant that he need have no fear of any departure from the script and that the company had been playing the script in theatres all over England without criticism or complaint. On the evening of November 2 the respondent attended the theatre, accompanied by a woman police officer, to see the first performance of the play. The appellant told Laurence that the police were in the house and again informed him that the licensed script must be adhered to. Laurence again assured him that the play would be performed exactly to the script, and the script was in fact adhered to until the final scene at which stage the play, according to the stage directions, should have ended with the principal woman actress relaxing into the arms of the principal male actor. At the performance in question however, Laurence, departing from the stage directions, carried the actress to a bed on the stage, laid her on it and went through certain movements simulating sexual intercourse.

It was contended by the appellant that the word "caused" in section 15 of the Theatres Act, 1843,[1] must be construed as involving some express or positive mandate from the appellant, or some authority from him to Laurence, or some personal responsibility based on knowledge or on some act or omission of the appellant, and that there was no evidence of any such mandate or authority or personal responsibility. The respondent contended that the final scene as played by Laurence was a substantial departure from the script; that the prohibition in the statute was absolute; and that the position of the appellant as licensee of the theatre was such that he must be regarded as responsible in law for any unlicensed production thereat.

The magistrate was of opinion that the appellant, as the person who provided the means whereby the play was performed, namely, a licensed theatre, and to whom a theatre licence had been granted making him responsible for the maintenance of good order in the theatre, and being the person who paid the salary of the players, was the person who caused the play to be presented, and that the act complained of constituted a substantial departure from the script. He was further of opinion that the prohibition of section 15 of the Act being absolute proof of scienter was unnecessary. He held the appellant guilty of the offence charged and convicted him. The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above statement of facts, the magistrate came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment Shave v. Rosner[2] was cited in argument.

Lord Goddard C.J. stated the facts and continued: The appellant was charged with causing the play to be produced with an unauthorised addition. We are not concerned to consider what the position would have been if he had been charged with

[1] Theatres Act, 1843, s. 15: "Every person who for hire shall act "or present, or cause to be acted or "presented, any new stage play, or any "act, scene, or part thereof . . . until "the same shall have been allowed "by the lord chamberlain . . . shall "for every such offence forfeit such "sum as shall be awarded by the "court in which or the justices by "whom he shall be convicted, not "exceeding the sum of fifty pounds; ". . ."

presenting the play. Section 15 of the Theatres Act, 1843, provides that "Every person who for hire shall act or present, "or cause to be acted or presented, any new stage play, or any "act, scene, or part thereof . . . until the same shall have been "allowed by the lord chamberlain" shall incur a penalty. In the present case the actor was charged and convicted of acting a part of the play which had not been authorized by the Lord Chamberlain, and there is no appeal by him, nor do I think there could be. The question for the court is whether the appellant, the manager, can be convicted of the offence with which the information charged him, namely, causing the presentation of this unauthorized addition. We are certainly not going to decide whether he would have had a defence if he had been charged with presenting the play, because I do not think that matter calls for decision. There are certain passages in Grade v. Director of Public Prosecutions [1] which indicate that at any rate in the opinion of one of the members of the court he might well have a defence. We will decide that when a case comes before us which directly raises the point. We are asked in the present case to say that the conviction was wrong because the charge was "causing," and there was no evidence of any causation here; in fact, the facts found by the magistrate show that the appellant took every precaution and every step he could take to prevent that being done which was done. There is a long line of cases in which it has been held repeatedly that although the prohibition of doing an act is absolute, so that scienter or mens rea is not necessary, different considerations apply where a person is charged with causing or permitting the act to be done, because a person cannot cause an act to be done or permit an act to be done unless he has knowledge of the facts. In McLeod (or Houston) v. Buchanan,[2] Lord Wright put it in this way [3]: "To 'cause' "the user involves some express or positive mandate from the "person 'causing' to the other person, or some authority from "the former to the latter, arising in the circumstances of the "case."

Mr. Ashworth's argument was that, as the appellant undoubtedly caused the performance of the play, he caused the performance of that part of the play which was unauthorized, but I think it would be unreal to hold that. However much one may dislike turning these cases upon whether the prosecution chose the word "use" or, as in the present case, "present" or "cause to be presented," the fact is that if a man is charged with causing or permitting something, it follows that that must result by reason of some act of his which is equivalent to causing, such as a command or direction to do the act. There was no causing here. It cannot be said that there was an express or positive mandate or authority to present that part of the play which was objected to and which had not been authorized by the Lord Chamberlain. The mandate here was to present the play which had been authorized by the Lord Chamberlain and no other. It was therefore wrong to hold that the manager and licensee of the theatre caused the actor to present one particular incident at the end of the play to which objection was fairly taken. I wish to stress that we are not deciding what the position would have been if the appellant had been charged with presenting the play with that incident in it. We are deciding that on the facts found by the magistrate there was no ground for saying that he caused that incident to be presented, and for that reason this appeal should be allowed.

A wife was granted an order by a court of summary jurisdiction on the ground of desertion. At the hearing she had been represented but her husband had not, and his case was not put to the wife either by him or by the court:—

Held, that, in view of the failure by the court to assist the husband in accordance with the provisions of section 61 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, there should be a re-hearing.

Appeal by husband from decision of the Chelsea Domestic Proceedings Court dated September 2, 1954.

The parties had been reconciled in April, 1954, after a separation of some months which had begun by the husband leaving the matrimonial home, which was at the house of the wife's parents. On July 17, 1954, the husband again left the home, taking with him some two-thirds of the furniture, which was being bought by the parties on hire-purchase, including the bed. The wife made a complaint that the husband had deserted her, and an order was made in her favour.

At the hearing before the justices the wife was represented by a solicitor; the husband appeared in person. The husband's case seemed from his evidence to have been that the reconciliation in April, 1954, had taken place on the basis that he was to find a home which was with neither of the parties' families; that although, admittedly, he had not previously consulted his wife about a flat which he had in fact taken, he had asked his wife to go there with him; and that she had refused. He stated in court that he had told his wife that she could come; that there was a flat for her; and that he wanted her back.

This case was not, however, put to the wife either before or after the husband had given evidence.

L. I. Halpern for the husband.
D. R. Ellison for the wife.

Lord Merriman P. referred to the nature of the appeal and said: The short point is this and, in my opinion, it is a point of vital importance. The wife was represented by a solicitor; the husband was not represented at all. In those circumstances section 61 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, comes into play, and it reads: "Where in any domestic proceedings, . . . it "appears to a magistrates' court that any party to the proceed-"ings who is not legally represented is unable effectively to "examine or cross-examine a witness, the court shall ascertain "from that party what are the matters about which the witness "may be able to depose or on which the witness ought to be "cross-examined, as the case may be, and shall put, or cause "to be put, to the witness such questions in the interests of that "party as may appear to the court to be proper."

This is a case in which, without going into the background or expressing any opinion whatever upon the merits, the husband's real case (whether it be a good case or a bad case is for determination), first emerged after the wife had left the witness box, and had called one other witness whose evidence did not add very much to her own. [His Lordship stated the facts and referred to the nature of the husband's case.]

In the reasons for their decision the justices state certain facts. They say that they were satisfied that the husband intended to bring the marriage to an end; they did not accept his evidence that he wanted his wife to continue to live with him and felt that evidence to be inconsistent with the facts which were proved—that he had left her on a previous occasion, and that he left again on July 17, 1954, taking with him his personal belongings and two-thirds of the furntiure.

Mr. Ellison, who has dealt with this case with his customary frankness, acknowledges, quite properly, that all that reasoning may be subject to the qualifications which are given in the husband's own evidence, for it may be that the significance of taking two-thirds of the furniture, including the bed, instead of telling heavily against the husband, as it has with the justices, might quite conceivably support the husband's story, or lead to an inference which might legitimately be derived from it, namely, that his taking the furniture which had been paid for and which he would therefore be entitled to move, with the bed, so far from showing an intention of leaving the wife, might be with the intention of inducing her to go with him. Moreover, to decide the case against him on the footing that he had left her on a previous occasion, in view of the husband's evidence appears to ignore altogether the consideration that it was his case that he had come back in April, 1954, on the express condition that he should find a flat, that he had done so and had asked his wife to go with him, and that she would not. It is quite clear that with that issue, at any rate, the justices' reasons do not deal at all.

The difficulty in this trial is a perfectly plain one. The moment the husband had developed that story, I go so far as to say, it was the bounden duty of the court, through the chairman, to put that case to the wife and see what her answers to it were, and then to adjudge the case on all the information before them. In other words, this case, in my opinion (and I regret to have to say it), has not been tried, and it is inevitable that the order must be set aside. The appeal must be allowed, the order set aside, and the case referred to a fresh panel of the domestic proceedings court for Chelsea. I am glad to know that there is no difficulty about a reconstitution of the court, because all the metropolitan magistrates have jurisdiction anywhere within the metropolis, so that there will be no difficulty in getting another chairman. As regards the other members of the court, different members must sit, and the case be heard afresh.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Practice—Defence of belief in adultery —Notice.

A wife's complaint of wilful neglect to maintain was dismissed on the ground, inter alia, that she had induced in her husband a reasonable bona fide belief in her adultery. No notice had been given of the nature of the defence relied upon:—

Held, that the case should be remitted for a re-hearing, for if it had been intended to make such an allegation, proper notice should have been given.

Appeal by a wife against the dismissal by the Mold justices of her summons on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain.

The wife had left the matrimonial home, leaving a note from which it appeared that there had been a quarrel the previous night, and in which she said: "You told me to clear out and "now I have cleared out. I know Harold [one Dyment] wants "a housekeeper, and that is where I am going." She went to the man's house that day.

The justices dismissed the summons, inter alia, on the ground that they accepted the husband's evidence that the wife's conduct had induced a bona fide reasonable belief in her adultery. No notice had previously been furnished of the nature of the defence, and the matter is reported solely upon that point.

Emlyn Hooson for the wife.
Ronald Waterhouse for the husband.

LORD MERRIMAN P., after referring to the finding of a bona fide belief in adultery, said: It will be remembered in the course of the observations which I am obliged to make about this case, that that statement of the reasons lacks precision in a most vital particular. It is only fair to the justices and their clerk to say that nobody on either side has asked for any elucidation of that statement. [His Lordship referred to the note written by the wife, and continued:] Believing it to be common ground that she was still living in Dyment's house at the date of the hearing, and, indeed, for all I know may be still living there now, it would, of course, be impossible, if that statement led the husband to the conclusion that she was living there in adultery, to say that her action in living there, in this house, I suppose alone save for her own children, had not contributed to the reasonable belief. No doubt what happened earlier, and was dealt with at length in the evidence, would have a bearing upon whether it was right to suppose that the so-called housekeeper was, in fact, an adulteress, but it was not until the point was clarified in Mr. Waterhouse's argument that it became clear to my mind that that was the case which was being put forward in the court below, in other words, that what the husband was relying on as exempting him from paying maintenance to his wife was the fact that she was living at that very moment in adultery, from the time of the parting, with this man Dyment.

That brings me to another point of procedure which I consider has a vital bearing on the view which we ought to take about this appeal. Many years ago it was laid down in this court in Broadbent v. Broadbent,[1] that it was necessary that, in any substantive charge of adultery brought against a wife under the married women's code, proper and particular notice should be given to her of the substance of the charge. That has been, I may say, a commonplace ever since, and is constantly acted upon. But that is not restricted merely to cases where the husband is making a substantive complaint of adultery, for in Duffield v. Duffield,[2] the same principle was expressly extended to cases in which the husband was relying on adultery as an answer to the charge, or as vitiating or removing the jurisdiction of the justices to try the matter. Even that was not the end of the matter, because, coming a bit closer to the present case, it appears that in Frampton v. Frampton,[3] this court extended the same principle to the sort of thing we are dealing with here, where, in answer to the charge, the husband does not actually assert that adultery has been committed, but puts forward a reasonable belief that adultery has been committed, and if there ever was wanting an illustration of the propriety of that ruling, this case affords an overwhelming example.

I ought, perhaps, in fairness to say that the only Frampton v. Frampton[3] referred to in the index to Stone's Justices' Manual is one which does not touch this particular point, directly at any rate. But, even if the solicitors were not aware of the direction of this court in that respect, even if it has not got into any other textbook, about which we have not really been informed, there is such a thing as taking the ordinary precaution to make sure that the other side is not taken by surprise, with the unnecessary expense of an adjournment. Alternatively, of course, there is such a thing as applying for an adjournment oneself, so as to put things on a regular footing before bringing the case before the court.

Karminski J. I agree. This case is an excellent example of the evil against which Frampton v. Frampton[3] was aimed. No notice of any kind was given to the wife of the defence that the husband had a reasonable belief, based on her conduct, in her adultery, and in the result the real issues in this case were never formulated. The least that the wife's adviser should have been told before the summons was heard was the time and place of the conduct which had induced the reasonable belief and, above all, the name of the man or men with whom the husband thought she had committed adultery. None of that was done, though I appreciate that the fault probably lay very much more with the husband himself than with his solicitor, whom he consulted only the night before the hearing. Be that as it may, it might have been desirable in this case for the husband's solicitor to have asked for an adjournment. The matter which was not formulated rapidly became a hopeless tangle of undefined issues.

As my Lord has pointed out, the matter was, if possible, further complicated by the introduction into the cross-examination of the wife of a number of incidents and documents, some of which dated over no less than 14 years, which clearly suggested, at any rate to the justices, that this woman might have committed adultery a good many years before with several men. It might also tend to show her as a woman of frivolous or indecorous behaviour with other men.

When the justices gave what they call their reasons they merely said that they accepted the husband's evidence that the wife's conduct induced a bona fide reasonable belief in her adultery. I ask myself "What adultery, and with whom?" Having asked myself that question, in spite of the excellent argument of counsel to which my Lord has referred, I am still unable to answer it. I do not know what the justices found, or on what evidence.

I agree with my Lord that this has been a thoroughly unsatisfactory trial. I adopt the words used by my Lord in this court in Frampton v. Frampton [3]: "This case seems to have gone as "wrong as it is possible for a simple case to go wrong from the "very start."

My Lord has pointed out that, perhaps unfortunately, Frampton v. Frampton [3] is not mentioned in the current volume of Stone's Justices Manual, 86th ed. While my Lord was giving his judgment I did look at two other well known textbooks, the sixth edition of Rayden on Divorce and the fourteenth edition of Latey on Divorce, and the principle laid down by this court in Frampton v. Frampton [3] is mentioned in both.

Agriculture—Agricultural land — Compulsory acquisition — Compensation.

The claimant was the yearly tenant of 150 acres of agricultural land. The tenancy ran from May 12, 1934. The Secretary of State for Air served notice to treat in respect of some 38 acres of the land on May 18, 1951, and he entered into possession in August and September, 1951, thus rendering the harvesting of the cereal crops impossible.

On the basis of compensation:—

before, May 12, 1953, and that under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, s. 2, rule (2), the question to be answered was what would the 38 acres have fetched in the open market if the claimant, being a willing seller instead of being forcibly evicted, had put his interest up for sale; and accordingly that, so far as the first season was concerned, he must be entitled to compensation in respect of the profits which he would have made, and he also had a claim for compensation for his interest in the land which would have subsisted until May 12, 1953, over and above what was allowed for the first year; but that if the compensation for the further year's interest were properly assessed under rule (2) of section 2 the claimant was not entitled to claim further under rule (6) for loss of profit in respect of the further year.

APPEAL by case stated by Mr. E. P. C. Done as arbitrator pursuant to section 3 (4) of the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949.

The claimant, Peter Watson, was tenant from year to year of Stob Hill Farm, Stamfordham in Northumberland, consisting of 146·491 acres, under an agreement of March 6, 1934, the tenancy running from May 12. The tenancy agreement by clause 1 (c) empowered the landlord "to resume possession at any time if "any part or parts of the farm for any purpose whatsoever not "being a purpose of an agricultural nature, the landlord allowing "to the tenant reasonable compensation in respect of the part "or parts of which possession shall be resumed. . . ."

On May 18, 1951, the respondent, the Secretary of State for Air, served notice to treat under the Defence Act, 1842, in respect of 38·189 acres of the farm and entered into possession of part of the premises on August 1, 1951, and of the remainder in September, before it was reasonably possible to harvest the cereal crops.

The arbitrator held that the compensation payable to the claimant was limited, having regard to clause 1 (c) of his tenancy agreement, to his loss suffered during the first farming season.

The claimant appealed, contending that the provisions of clause 1 (c) were unenforceable at law. That contention was accepted by the Secretary of State and the question at issue was as to the correct basis for assessing the compensation payable to the claimant pursuant to the provisions of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919.[1]

EVERSHED M.R. This is an appeal from a decision in the form of a case stated by Mr. Done in regard to an area of approximately 38 acres of land being part of the claimant's farm near Stamfordham in the county of Northumberland.

The claimant held under the terms of a tenancy agreement which is scheduled to the case, and which was in fact entered into as long ago as 1934, whereby, as is common enough with agricultural land, the tenant's interest was that of a yearly tenant, and the year ran from May 12. The total area of the farm is approximately 150 acres, slightly less. The Secretary of State for Air on May 18, 1951, served a notice to treat, and in fact entered into possession of the 38 acres in the months of August and September following.

The question is, what compensation is payable by the Secretary of State? To dispose of one matter at once, the tenancy agreement contained an unusual clause [clause 1 (c)], which was that the landlord was to have power—I am paraphrasing it—to resume possession at any time of any part of the farm for any purpose whatever other than purposes of an agricultural nature, the landlord allowing to the tenant reasonable compensation in respect of the parts so occupied.

The view taken by Mr. Done was that, whatever the interest of the tenant might properly be described as being, it was subject to this severe limitation, that it was liable at any time, without any specified notice, as to part or as to the whole of it, to be reoccupied by the landlord; and that led him to the conclusion that, whatever otherwise might have been the result, the claimant could not make any claim in respect of any period or interest beyond the first farming season, which occurred immediately after the notice to treat; in other words, he limited the claimant's claim, in effect, to what he would have got had he remained in occupation until the end of the current 1951 season and had gathered his crops.

It is conceded by the Secretary of State that in that matter Mr. Done erred. The claimant here has claimed that clause 1 (c) of the tenancy agreement was, having regard to the statutes regulating agricultural tenancies, unenforceable at law and therefore should be disregarded; and that contention has been accepted on behalf of the Secretary of State.

It is, therefore, plain that the basis upon which compensation was assessed was not correct and the case will have to go back for reconsideration. In those circumstances it is obviously not desirable that we should say more than is strictly necessary in order to lay the foundation for any further assessment by the tribunal.

The argument has, in effect, become narrowed down in the course of the discussion, and I think that it now stands thus: The Secretary of State was requisitioning this land in pursuance of powers which were derived indirectly from the Defence Act, 1842. It follows that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, do not strictly apply. I say "strictly," because it may well be that for practical purposes, certainly in many cases, the principle of assessing compensation does not, or does not substantially, differ under that Act from the principle to be applied under the Act of 1842. This much, however, seems clear, that in the present case it is necessary, in assessing compensation, to refer to the terms of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, and to section 2 thereof in particular. I think that the argument before us has really turned on the exact effect of two paragraphs of section 2, upon which I accordingly propose to say a few words. [His Lordship read section 2, rules (2) and (6), and continued:]

By section 12 of the same Act the word "land" is by definition to comprehend any interest in land. We therefore arrive at the following position: The claimant was in occupation of these 38 acres, and he had beyond any question an interest in the land, namely, that which he derived from his tenancy agreement. At the date of the notice to treat and of the subsequent entry his interest was one which could not be determined, according to the terms of his agreement, at any date earlier than May 12, 1953; and it appears to me, therefore, that the thing to be valued for the purpose of compensation was that interest, an agricultural tenancy liable to be determined on, but not before, May 12, 1953. In arriving at a solution of the question what is the value of that interest, the Act requires one to assume that the claimant, instead of being evicted from this land, was a willing seller; and therefore the question which must be answered is, what would those 38 acres have fetched in the open market if the claimant, instead of being forcibly evicted from them, had put up for sale his interest, the interest being such as I have described but subject, of course, to the other terms in the tenancy agreement including any restrictions on assignment.

It is conceded that, so far as the first season is concerned, he must be entitled to recover, in effect, the profits which he would have made. I have already indicated that his crop was sown and was waiting to be gathered in the summer and autumn of that year; but he still has a claim for the interest in the land which would have subsisted until May 12, 1953, over and above what has been allowed for the first season or year. It must, therefore, be ascertained, what would some purchaser in the market have given for that further year's interest?

Obviously, the profit which this claimant had made in farming these acres is a highly material consideration, because it may well be that a purchaser, who bought the claimant's interest in these 38 acres, would have fixed the price he was prepared to pay on the basis that he, too, would be likely to make such a figure of profit by farming. It is then a matter entirely for the arbitrator to decide what sum should be allowed to compensate for that part of the interest which the claimant must be taken to have willingly sold.

It was suggested by Mr. Kekwick that, apart from anything which can be attributed to that landed interest, rule (6) entitles the claimant in addition to say: "I must be also com-"pensated for disturbance or loss measured by the profit which "I can show I did lose during that second year." But if the figure is properly arrived at under rule (2), it seems to me that any further sum of that nature is necessarily excluded, for otherwise he would be having the same thing twice over. Compensation for disturbance, in the sense of meaning the cost or expense he was put to in actually moving, has already been allowed, and the sum of £76 has been agreed for that; but if rule (2) is construed as I think it ought to be, and if a figure is arrived at to compensate the claimant for that second year of the interest which he has lost, subject, as I have said, to all its incidents under the tenancy agreement, then I think that rule (6) would have no further application.

That being the situation, I think I have covered all that need be said on the present occasion. The case must go back in order that the arbitrator should decide what that figure is, and he must decide to what extent it is desirable or proper to allow any further opportunities for evidence to be given. On that I say nothing, because that is a matter which he will have to decide; but in view of the basis upon which he limited his award, it seems to me that this appeal must be allowed, so as to enable us to direct a reference back for a reassessment of the amount to be awarded on the footing that clause 1 (c) of the agreement should be treated as excluded from consideration.

PRACTICE NOTE.

House of Lords—Appeal to—Leave to appeal—Court of Appeal, by—Preliminary point of law.

In an action by the plaintiff for damages for personal injuries the master directed the hearing of a preliminary point of law before the trial of the action under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2. The question of law having been determined, both in the Queen's Bench Division [1] and in the Court of Appeal [2] against the defendants, they applied for leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

DENNING L.J. I have discussed this matter with Jenkins L.J. and Morris L.J., and what I am about to say has the agreement of all of us. If this were a final appeal it would certainly be of sufficient importance to be taken to the House of Lords, but it is only an interlocutory appeal. The issue on the facts are yet to be tried. The procedure by way of preliminary point is satisfactory when appeal is limited to the Court of Appeal, because a decision can be reached cheaply and speedily. Our decision today is only four and a half months after the preliminary issue was ordered, but if the preliminary point is to be taken to the House of Lords the plaintiff will inevitably be put to much expense and the day when the facts will be tried is postponed still further. It is now well over 20 months since the action was commenced. We do not view with equanimity the prospect of still further delay while the memories of witnesses become still more blunted. Nor do we look with favour on the incurring of further costs of an issue which was ordered so as to save expense. Two courts have already unanimously decided it. The plaintiff should be kept from the trial no longer.

Michael Kerr for the defendants. If the plaintiff should succeed on the facts, at that stage might we make a further application to your Lordships for leave to go to the House of Lords?

DENNING L.J. After the matter is finally determined. Mr. Le Quesne, supposing the action was tried on the facts and the plaintiff won on the facts, the matter could be taken to the House of Lords if we gave leave out of time to appeal from our decision, could it not?

J. G. Le Quesne for the plaintiff. I should have thought, with respect, that it would be a possible course for your Lordships, as it were, to reserve the matter of leave on this point until the facts have been decided. It occurred to me that if my friend were left at that stage to go to the House of Lords to ask for leave he might be met with the answer that he should have got it at this stage.

DENNING L.J. Mr. Kerr, if you wanted to go to the House of Lords now we should refuse leave so that you could go now to the Appeal Committee. On the other hand, we could reserve the matter until the final appeal came before us.

Kerr. I would like to consider the matter and take instructions.

DENNING L.J. At the moment we do not make any ruling on the question of leave to appeal to the House of Lords. We stand it over for not more than a week.

A. W. G.

November 5, A. A. Mocatta Q.C. and Michael Kerr for the defendants. A difficulty is that, under the House of Lords Rules, an appeal must be lodged within six months from the date of the last order appealed from, and there is no method by which that could be extended. There is uncertainty as to when the trial will take place. It is suggested that the court might postpone judgment on the preliminary point until the action has been determined.

[DENNING L.J. The court have delivered their judgments and I do not think that they could follow that suggestion.]

[JENKINS L.J. If we refuse leave to appeal to the House of Lords for the reasons given, and the defendants went to the House of Lords and asked for leave, they might grant it and make conditions under which there would be no hearing before them until after the trial of the action. The House of Lords heard the preliminary issue in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1] and when the trial was finally heard there was no snail in the bottle at all.]

DENNING L.J. If the defendants went to the House of Lords immediately, and they took the view that all the facts should be tried first, they could make the necessary order. The proper course is for us to refuse leave and then for the defendants to go to the House of Lords and for them to make the appropriate order as to time and costs.

Leave to appeal to House of Lords refused.

Copyright. "Gramophone."

By section 10B (6) (a) of the Copyright Amendment Act, S.C. 1938, c. 27, s. 4: "In respect of public performances by means of "any . . . gramophone in any place other than a theatre . . . The appellant broadcasting company had in its studio equipment consisting, inter alia, of turn-tables, operated by an electric motor, on which records of musical works were placed, and the resulting sound impulses were transmitted, under agreement, over wires of a telephone company to the premises of subscribers who had contracted with the broadcasting company to receive the programmes thus relayed. At the subscribers' premises an acoustic reproduction of the musical works so transmitted was given in public by means of amplifiers and loud-speakers which were owned, installed and maintained by the broadcasting company pursuant to the contract, but were under the control of the subscribers:—

Held, that there had not been a public performance of the musical works by means of a "gramophone" within the meaning of section 10B (6) (a) of the Canadian Copyright Amendment Act. The word "gramophone" appeared not to have acquired a scientific meaning other than its popular or commercial meaning, and in the latter meaning did not, to take a crucial test, embrace a mechanism which included an undefined length of wiring laid, perhaps under or over public streets, under the powers given by Parliament not by the manufacturer or user of the apparatus, but by an independent authority.

$75 damages and an injunction restraining the present appellants, Associated Broadcasting Co. Ld., H. Reibstein, Beecher Dennis and Westminster Hotel Ld., from infringing the respondents' copyright by performing in public a number of musical works, including Sophisticated Lady and Ol' Man River.

The question in this appeal was whether the performances, which were relayed from the studio of the appellant broadcasting company to premises in Toronto occupied by the other appellants, were given by means of a "gramophone" within the meaning of section 10B (6) (a) of the Canadian Copyright Amendment Act (S.C. 1938, c. 27, s. 4), which provided that: "In respect of public performances by means of any radio "receiving set or gramophone in any place other than a theatre "which is ordinarily and regularly used for entertainments to "which an admission charge is made, no fees, charges or "royalties shall be collectable from the owner or user of the "radio receiving set or gramophone, but the Copyright Appeal "Board shall, so far as possible, provide for the collection in "advance from radio broadcasting stations or gramophone manu-"facturers, as the case may be, of fees, charges and royalties "appropriate to the new conditions produced by the provisions "of this subsection and shall fix the amount of the same. In so "doing, the Board shall take into account all expenses of collec-"tion and other outlays, if any, saved or saveable by, for or on "behalf of the owner of the copyright or performing right con-"cerned or his agents, in consequence of the provisions of this "subsection."

The equipment in the appellant broadcasting company's studio was operated by an employee placing a record on a turntable, which was then made to revolve by an electric motor, and a stylus or needle was then placed in contact. The sound waves were converted into electrical impulses in the playing-head and carried to an amplifier. The electrical impulses were then transmitted over the Bell Telephone Company's wires to the premises of the other appellants—over distances up to a mile—where, by means of loud-speakers, an acoustic reproduction of the musical work was given.

The facts appear more fully from the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

The trial judge (Schroeder J.) held that, notwithstanding the separation of the component parts of the equipment, the broadcasting company was, at the time and place in question, providing a public performance "by means of a gramophone," and that the same could be said of the co-appellants.

The Court of Appeal for Ontario (Roach, Hope and Bowlby JJ.A.) said that the only question was whether or not the totality of the equipment was a gramophone, within the meaning of the statute, and they held that it was not and allowed the appeal.

Dec. 1. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Viscount Simonds. The short question in this appeal, which is brought by special leave from an order of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, is whether the appellants have infringed the copyright in certain musical works which, so far as concerns the sole right to perform those works in public throughout Canada, is vested in the respondents, the Composers, Authors and Publishers Association of Canada Ld. The answer to this question turns on the true meaning and effect of section 10B (6) (a) of the Copyright Amendment Act, chapter 27 of the Statutes of Canada, 1938, section 4, which is in these terms: [His Lordship stated the terms of the section and continued:] It is not disputed either that copyright subsists in the works in question or that it is vested in the respondents or that they have been performed in public. The performances were in fact given in certain premises in Toronto occupied by the appellants Reibstein, Dennis and Westminster Hotel Ld. respectively. None of these premises was a "theatre which is ordinarily and regularly used "for entertainments to which an admission charge is made." No fees were therefore collectable from the appellants or any of them if within the meaning of the section the performances were given by means of any radio receiving set or gramophone, or, more specifically, by means of any gramophone, as it is not alleged that they were given by means of any radio receiving set.

It is necessary, then, to consider in some detail what are the means by which the performance is given, and their Lordships find an accurate and sufficiently comprehensive account of this in the judgment of the Court of Appeal from Ontario which they substantially adopt.

The equipment (to use a neutral word) which in this case is alleged to constitute a gramophone can best be described by reference to a drawing which was filed as an exhibit in the case. A verbal description of its component parts as shown and numbered on that drawing is as follows: Part No. 1 is an electric motor. No. 2 is a turn-table. No. 2a is a spindle of the motor operating the turn-table. No. 3 is a stylus or needle. No. 4 is a playing head holding the needle and having a magnetic pick-up; that is, a coil in a magnetic field. No. 5 is a suspension arm. No. 6 are electric connecting wires from the coil in the playing head leading to an amplifier which is No. 7. No. 7a are electrical connecting wires. No. 8 is a loudspeaker connected with the amplifier (No. 9) by electrical wires. No. 9 is an amplifier.

The instrumentalities numbered 1 to 7 inclusive are located in the studio of the appellants the Associated Broadcasting Company Ld. (hereinafter called A.B.C.) and are under the sole control of A.B.C., its servants or agents.

Instrumentalities numbered 9 and 8 are located in the premises of each of the other appellants and are under their control. They are owned by A.B.C. and were installed in the premises of the other appellants by A.B.C. pursuant to its contract with those other appellants.

Instrumentalities numbered 7a are wires of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada running between the building in which A.B.C. has its studio and the buildings in which the other appellants carry on their respective businesses.

That drawing is not quite complete. Inserted between No. 7 and No. 7a is a step transformer. This is made necessary by the fact that in order to prevent electrical induction interfering with parallel wires of the Bell Telephone system serving other customers only a low current is transmitted over the wires shown as the 7a on the drawing.

The drawing shows only one turn-table. In fact there are four turn-tables connected by gears so that the operator in the studio of A.B.C. may disengage one turn-table and engage another without any appreciable interruption of the programme.

The equipment in the premises of each of the appellants other than A.B.C. may be disconnected from the balance of the equipment by the operation of a switch, not shown in the drawing, so that at any given time, one or more subscribers and the patrons in his or their premises may be hearing a musical programme originating in the studio of A.B.C. and other subscribers and their patrons may not. If all the subscribers leave the instrumentalities which are located in their premises connected with the balance of the system, they all hear the same programme. By throwing out that switch, any subscriber may use parts numbered 8 and 9 together with microphones to make more audible programmes originating in his own premises.

J. C.

Associated Broadcasting Co. Ld. v. Composers, Authors and Publishers Association of Canada Ld.

The contracts between A.B.C. and the other appellants are all similar in form. They are headed "Arrangement for 'Music "'by Muzak' service." By these contracts A.B.C. agrees to supply to the subscriber "Music by Muzak" programme service to the localities therein described between the opening and closing hours of the subscribers' establishment. As part of the Muzak Service A.B.C. agrees to instal and keep in operating condition for the reception of Muzak programmes in the subscribers' premises certain equipment specified in the contract.

This system is operated as follows:—An employee of A.B.C. places a record or disc on turn-table No. 2. That turn-table is then made to revolve by the power of the motor No. 1. The stylus or needle No. 3 is placed in contact with the sinuous groove in the record and transmits to the playing head, No. 4, sound waves identical with those which impressed the record when it was made. Those sound waves are converted into electrical impulses in the playing head by the action of the magnetic coil and are carried along the wires No. 6 to the amplifier No. 7.

At that point, all the operations in the studio of A.B.C. end. The electrical impulses leave the amplifier No. 7 and are transmitted over the Bell Telephone wires to the premises of the subscriber. The step transformer—not shown in the sketch—increases the force of those electrical impulses and they are carried to the No. 9 and thence to the loud speaker No. 8 where they are transmitted back into sound vibrations and emitted into the air as an acoustic reproduction of the musical work contained in the record.

It is claimed, and so the trial judge found, that a public performance by means of this equipment, mechanism, or sum total of instrumentalities is a public performance by means of a gramophone within the meaning of the section. The argument in favour of this claim is neatly summed up in the appellants' case by saying that "the component parts or means used by the "appellants for the performance in public of musical works are "the component parts or means composing a gramophone and "producing the same result." It appears to their Lordships, however, that the short answer to this argument, and therefore to the appellants' case, is that it begs a question, what is the meaning of the word "gramophone" in the section, by assuming that whatever mechanism upon an analysis of its functions is seen to do what a gramophone does is therefore properly called a gramophone. It was, as their Lordships understood the argument, conceded that each one of the several components of the mechanism that has been described was an essential part of the gramophone. Therefore, to take a crucial test, the wires under the control of the Bell Telephone Company, which were laid under Parliamentary authority and might have extended for any distance, were a part of the gramophone. Their Lordships agree with the judges of the Court of Appeal in thinking that this is nothing less than to distort the meaning of the word "gramophone". It does not appear that that word has acquired a scientific meaning other than its popular or commercial meaning, and in the latter meaning it clearly does not embrace a mechanism which (to take the same test) includes an undefined length of wiring laid, perhaps under or over public streets, under the powers given by Parliament not by the manufacturer or user of the mechanism, but by an independent authority.

J. C.

This concludes the case, and their Lordships do not think it necessary to examine the arguments which were based on the use in the section of the words "owner," "user" or "manufacturer" in connexion with "gramophone," though they appear to support the view they have taken. Nor can they derive any assistance from an examination of the section in the light of the alleged policy of the Act. It is no doubt proper and useful to be informed of the state of the law and of the development of the industry at the time when the relevant section of the Copyright Act was enacted, but, to whatever conclusion such an examination might lead, their Lordships find it impossible to ascribe to the familiar word "gramophone" a meaning which, now as then, it is incapable of bearing.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

Court of Appeal—Evidence—Fresh evidence—Witness confessed liar. Evidence.

Leave to adduce further evidence on appeal will only be granted (1) if it is shown that the evidence could not have been obtained with reasonable diligence for use at the trial, (2) if the further evidence is such that, if given, it would probably have an important influence on the result of the case, though it need not be decisive, and (3) if the evidence is such as is presumably to be believed.

So, where it was sought to recall a witness who at the trial denied recollection of a material fact and now was prepared to say that she had told a lie and wanted to tell the truth, leave was refused, for in the absence of proof of a good reason for the first evidence, such as bribery or coercion, a confessed liar could not be accepted as a witness presumably to be believed.

Dictum of Lord Loreburn L.C. in Brown v. Dean [1910] A.C. 373 applied.

Appeal from Glyn-Jones J., and motion for leave to call further evidence.

The following facts are taken from the judgment of Denning L.J.: The plaintiff Ladd claimed repayment of a sum of £1,000 which he said he had paid to the defendant Marshall in April, 1952, in connexion with negotiations for the sale by the defendant to him of a bungalow and land for £2,500. He said that the defendant advertised the bungalow for sale at £3,600, but because of the limited permissible sale price of the bungalow imposed under the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, the defendant told him that he was not allowed to sell bungalow and land for more than £2,500, though if a deal was to be agreed upon he, the defendant, wanted the £1,000 in cash, outside the sale. He said that an informal agreement for the sale at £2,500 was signed and that he paid the £1,000 in cash at the defendant's house on April 2, 1952, in the presence of the defendant's wife. He gave evidence to this effect himself and called as witnesses to the payment Mr. Warren, a friend of his, and the friend's secretary, Miss Andrews. Counsel for the plaintiff then called as a witness the defendant's wife, who, after at first saying that she did not wish to give evidence, professed to remember nothing of the matter. Upon counsel pressing her, the judge said that he could not allow him to cross-examine a witness he had called.

The only witness called for the defence was the defendant himself, who denied that he had received the £1,000.

Glyn-Jones J., in giving judgment, said: "I strongly suspect "that taking advantage of the difference between the £3,600 in "the first set of particulars, and £2,500, at which the contract "was actually entered into, the plaintiff and Mr. Warren "endeavoured to try and get £1,100 or £1,000 out of Mr. "Marshall, but I am not bound to pronounce any findings about "that. This is a pure question of fact, and the decision of the "case rests on whether or not the plaintiff and the witnesses "whom he has called have persuaded me that it is true that "£1,000 was paid to the defendant. I am not so persuaded. I "prefer on every point where the evidence is in conflict the "evidence of the defendant to the evidence of the plaintiff and "his witnesses. There will therefore be judgment for the "defendant with costs."

On May 6, 1954, the defendant's wife obtained a decree nisi of divorce from her husband, and later made a statement to her solicitors (who were also the plaintiff's solicitors) in which she said that the evidence she had given at the hearing before Glyn-Jones J. was false; that she did remember what had happened at the meeting of April, 1952; that she was there when the money was counted out; and that the £1,000 was counted out and handed over by the plaintiff to the defendant.

In those circumstances, leave having been given to extend the time for appealing, the plaintiff appealed and moved for leave to adduce further evidence by Mrs. Marshall, who, in an affidavit sworn by her, said that at the trial she was afraid of telling the truth because she was then living in the house of her husband who, she said, would almost certainly have resorted to physical violence.

The case is reported only on the question of leave to call further evidence.

Hawke* [2]; Nash v. Rochford R.D.C. [3]; Rex v. Copstake [4]; Sinanide v. La Maison Kosmeo [5]; Anderson v. Titmas [6]; and Young v. Kershaw. [7]

DENNING L.J., having stated the facts set out above, continued: It is very rare that application is made to this court for a new trial on the ground that a witness has told a lie. The principles to be applied are the same as those always applied when fresh evidence is sought to be introduced. To justify the reception of fresh evidence or a new trial, three conditions must be fulfilled: first, it must be shown that the evidence could not have been obtained with reasonable diligence for use at the trial; secondly, the evidence must be such that, if given, it would probably have an important influence on the result of the case, though it need not be decisive; thirdly, the evidence must be such as is presumably to be believed, or in other words, it must be apparently credible, though it need not be incontrovertible.

We have to apply those principles to the case where a witness comes and says: "I told a lie but nevertheless I now want to "tell the truth." It seems to me that the fresh evidence of such a witness will not as a rule satisfy the third condition. A confessed liar cannot usually be accepted as being credible. To justify the reception of the fresh evidence, some good reason must be shown why a lie was told in the first instance, and good ground given for thinking the witness will tell the truth on the second occasion. If it was proved that the witness had been bribed or coerced into telling a lie at the trial, and is now anxious to tell the truth, that would, I think, be a ground for a new trial and it would not be necessary to resort to an action to set aside the judgment on the ground of fraud. Again, if it was proved that the witness made a mistake on a most important matter and wished to put it right, and the circumstances were so well explained that his fresh evidence was presumably to be believed, then again there would be ground for a new trial: see Richardson v. Fisher.[1] But this is not a case of bribery or coercion, nor of a mistake. It seems to me that Mrs. Marshall is not a person who in the new situation is presumably to be believed. She endeavoured to show that she was coerced by her husband, but on reading through the affidavits on both sides, it seems to me that the suggestion of coercion comes to nothing. She does not seem to have been in fear of her husband at all. I am afraid it is simply a case where a witness who has told a lie at the first hearing now wants to say something different. It would be contrary to all principle for that to be the ground for a new trial. In my judgment this appeal and the motion should be dismissed.

HODSON L.J., having agreed that the appeal for a new trial should be dismissed, continued: That brings me to the matter which really brought this appeal into existence, that is the fact that the wife of the defendant, the reluctant witness who said she did not remember anything, has now said, very shortly after the trial, having divorced her husband, that she told lies at the trial and now wants to tell the truth, the truth being, as she says, that she was present when this £1,000 was handed over. I think it is somewhat bold to ask this court to allow fresh evidence to be adduced in circumstances of that kind, because Mr. Beney, as one would expect, fairly recognized that here is a woman who, on her own showing, has told lies, and if there was a hearing of her evidence by this court, or at a fresh trial at which her evidence could be heard again, she could never be better than a discredited witness on whom it would be very difficult for any court to place any reliance. But Mr. Beney says that R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, is wide in its terms and that there is a complete discretion in this court, which ought not to be fettered, to receive further evidence if the justice of the case requires it. But that discretion has been always exercised in the light of the maxim interest reipublicae ut sit finis litium. This seems to me to be particularly a case where one might envisage no end to litigation if people who had given evidence were allowed to come again and say "I told lies last time. I "want to tell the truth now." The principles on which further evidence is admitted have been recently discussed by this court in Braddock v. Tillotsons Newspapers Ld.[2] I would only make a brief reference to the well-known case of Brown v. Dean,[3] where the House of Lords affirmed a decision of the Court of Appeal and gave guidance on this topic. The passage which is often discussed and may be said perhaps to have been modified in part, is the portion of the speech of Lord Loreburn L.C., where he says: "When a litigant has obtained a judgment in a "court of justice, whether it be a county court or one of the "High Courts, he is by law entitled not to be deprived of that "judgment without very solid grounds; and where (as in this "case) the ground is the alleged discovery of new evidence, it "must at least be such as is presumably to be believed, and if "believed would be conclusive." With regard to the word "conclusive," Lord Shaw, who also made a speech in the same case, was doubtful whether he could accept the word "conclusive," and the more modern cases have proceeded on the view that perhaps "conclusive" is too strong a word. But none of their Lordships dissented in any way; in fact, they agreed with the earlier part of the Lord Chancellor's proposition that new evidence must at least be such as is presumably to be believed.

It seems to me that the evidence of Mrs. Marshall is not such as is presumably to be believed, on the face of it, from the facts which I have already recounted. In addition, when one looks at the affidavit which she has made in support of this motion, she seeks to say, in effect, that the defendant, who is a retired boxer, has on several occasions treated her with violence and attacked her with clenched fists and she has been obliged to seek the protection of the police. I suppose the only point of that paragraph was to suggest, if no more, that she refused to give this evidence in the first instance because she was afraid of her husband. But there is no suggestion that she did not give evidence because of any threats that her husband had made to her, nor was there any request for protection made by her at any time. In a further affidavit which she has filed in reply to affidavits put in on the other side she has admitted that since the date when she made this affidavit, May 26, she has been with her husband. She has been seen with him on apparently friendly terms and has gone to a public house and spent the night in the same house with him and other people. I am paying no attention to the affidavits put in on the other side but I am looking at her affidavit and the subsequent affidavit which she put in in reply. The story that she was acting under the duress of her husband has become exceedingly thin. In my judgment, there is no ground for allowing this fresh evidence to be admitted.

PARKER L.J. I agree. I would only add one word on the application for leave to call further evidence. The further evidence which it is desired to call in this case is the evidence of one of the plaintiff's witnesses, Mrs. Marshall, who, it is said, will now say that what she said at the trial was a lie and that she is now prepared to tell the truth. The circumstances in which the court on such an application will grant leave to adduce that further evidence must be very, very rare, for the very good reason that such evidence on the face of it does not comply with the test as laid down by Lord Loreburn L.C. in Brown v. Dean,[4] where he said that new evidence must at least be "such as is presumably to be believed." It may be that if it could be shown that the witness told a lie originally because he or she had been bribed, or because he or she had been coerced, nevertheless it could be said in those circumstances that her evidence was such as is presumably to be believed. But in this case there is no suggestion that the defendant bribed his wife; there is no suggestion that he coerced his wife to give the evidence which she did give at the trial. All that is said is that Mrs. Marshall, whose relations with her husband were strained, was afraid of his hitting her and afraid of physical violence. As regards that, the one thing which the further affidavits clearly show is that this woman was nothing like as afraid of her husband as she has made out, and she has utterly failed to satisfy me that the reason she gave her evidence as she did originally was through fear of her husband. As she has failed to prove any such ground, it is impossible, in my view, for any court to say that her evidence could be credible. In those circumstances, I would refuse the application and dismiss the appeal.

Appeal and motion dismissed.

Building—Contract—Certificate—Architect's certificate to be final and conclusive—Arbitration—Power of arbitrator to reopen certificate—Royal Institute of British Architects Contract No. 6.

Certificate. Arbitration—Case stated—Form—Questions of law—How they have arisen to be stated.

In a building contract (R.I.B.A. contract No. 6) clause 24 (f) provided: ". . . the architect shall, . . . issue a final certificate "and such final certificate . . . shall be conclusive evidence as "to the sufficiency of the said works and materials." Clause 27, after providing for arbitration in case of dispute, stated: ". . . "the arbitrator shall have power . . . to open up, review and "revise any certificate . . . in the same manner as if no such "certificate . . . had been given." A dispute having arisen under the contract, the question arose whether on the true construction of clause 27 the arbitrator had power to reopen the architect's final certificate:—

Held, that the words "final" and "conclusive" in clause 24 had to be read subject to the express provision in clause 27; that the architect's certificate was final and conclusive subject to the arbitrator's powers under clause 27, which were as wide as they possibly could be; and that the arbitrator had power to reopen the final certificate.

Observations on form of special case to be stated by an arbitrator.

SPECIAL CASE stated by an arbitrator.

By a building contract (Contract No. 6) dated March 21, 1949, written on a form prepared by the Royal Institute of British Architects and specially adapted for the use of local authorities, and made between the claimants, the Windsor Rural District Council, the owners of a building site, and the respondents, Otterway & Try Ld., building contractors, the latter agreed to erect certain houses on the site. Clause 24 (f) of the contract provided: "... the architect shall ... issue a final certificate of the value of "the works executed by the contractor and such final certificate, "save in cases of fraud, dishonesty or fraudulent concealment "relating to the works or materials or to any matter dealt "with in the certificate and save as regards all defects and "insufficiencies in the works or materials which a reasonable "examination would not have disclosed, shall be conclusive "evidence as to the sufficiency of the said works and materials." Clause 27 provided: "Provided always that in case any dispute "or difference shall arise between the employer or the architect "on his behalf and the contractor, either during the progress or "after the completion or abandonment of the works, as to the "construction of this contract or as to any matter or thing of "whatsoever nature arising thereunder or in connexion therewith "... then either party shall forthwith give to the other notice "in writing of such dispute or difference. . . ." The clause then provided for the appointment of an arbitrator and ended: "Without prejudice to the generality of his powers the arbitrator "shall have power to direct such measurements and/or valua-"tions as may in his opinion be desirable in order to determine "the rights of the parties and to ascertain and award any sum "which ought to have been the subject of or included in any "certificate and to open up, review and revise any certificate, "opinion, decision, requisition or notice and to determine all "matters in dispute which shall be submitted to him, and of "which notice shall have been given as aforesaid, in the same "manner as if no such certificate, opinion, decision, requisition "or notice had been given."

In pursuance of the contract, the contractors carried out the work and were paid by the owners sums totalling £27,238 1s. 6d.; the last payment being made on June 15, 1952, pursuant to a final certificate from the architects dated June 5, 1952, and issued after the completion of the works. The owners, as appeared from their points of claim, claimed that in consequence of the remeasurement of the works on September 24, 1953, they and the architects discovered that the contractors had been overpaid by the sum of £1,056 5s. 5d., which they were not entitled to retain since the owners had made the overpayment in the mistaken belief that it was due to the contractors. No complaint was made as to the quality of the works or materials, and the owners' claim related solely to overpayments made in consequence of an error in the calculation of sums due to the contractors in respect of the foundations and/or substructures of the houses erected. The architects, on behalf of the owners, informed the contractors by letters of the overpayments, but the contractors refused to admit the same and refused to repay the sum to the owners. Accordingly the owners gave the contractors notice of a dispute and the matter was referred to arbitration.

The contractors disputed the owners' claim on the grounds (inter alia) that, as provided by clause 24 (f), the architect's final certificate was conclusive as to the sufficiency of their works and materials. By their reply the owners further contended (a) that in the circumstances the dispute did not relate to the sufficiency of the works and materials within the meaning of clause 24 (f); (b) alternatively, that inasmuch as the final certificate was not issued until after the completion of all the works provided by the contract, the dispute related, within the meaning of clause 24 (f), to an insufficiency or insufficiencies which a reasonable examination would not have disclosed.

The arbitrator, having set out the above facts in his award, stated: "Having regard to the matters hereinbefore set out I "am of the opinion that before any further steps are taken by "me in investigating or determining the matters at issue between "the parties, this court should decide the following questions "which are questions of law: (i) whether the complaint of the "claimants as to an error or errors in the calculations of the "sum due to the respondents in respect of the foundations and/or "substructures of the said houses is a complaint as to the "sufficiency of the said works and materials within the meaning "of clause 24 (f); (ii) whether the 'reasonable examination' "referred to in clause 24 (f) aforesaid relates to a reasonable "examination at or about the date of the final certificate or to "a reasonable examination at some other and what date; "(iii) whether or not I have jurisdiction as arbitrator as aforesaid "to review and/or to revise the said final certificate and/or any "other certificate given by the said architects and/or to determine "the matters submitted to me and the amount (if any) by "which the respondents have been overpaid by the claimants "in respect of the said works and the rights of the parties in "regard thereto and to make such an award in respect thereof

"as may be proper in the same manner as if no such final "certificate or certificates had been given."

J. G. K. Sheldon for the owners.
K. J. P. Barraclough for the contractors.

The following cases were cited in argument: Clemence v. Clark [1] and Lloyd Bros. v. Milward.[2]

DEVLIN J. Section 21 (1) of the Arbitration Act, 1950, provides: "An arbitrator or umpire may, . . . state—(a) any question "of law arising in the course of the reference; . . . in the form of "a special case for the decision of the High Court." The arbitrator states in paragraph 2 of the special case: "Having "regard to the matters hereinbefore set out I am of the opinion "that before any further steps are taken by me in investigating "or determining the matters at issue between the parties, this "court should decide the following questions which are questions "of law." He then sets out three questions, and I shall find it necessary to consider only the third.

I have referred to the provision of the Act because I do not think that the form which the arbitrator adopted is the proper way in which these matters should be stated. He has power to state questions of law arising in the course of the reference, and I think that to enable the court to determine whether the questions of law do or do not arise in the course of the reference he ought to set out in his case something which shows what has arisen under the reference, and what the contentions of the parties are on either side, so as to show how the question of law has arisen. It is not a mere matter of words: the court is not at the beck and call of the arbitrator to answer whatever questions the arbitrator may want to put to it, and it is not here to indulge in legal exercises. It is here only to answer questions which it is satisfied do arise in the course of the reference and are material to be determined. I think, therefore, that it is important that arbitrators should, when they are stating their case, state enough to make it plain how the questions of law arise so that the court can itself judge of their materiality. The point is not of importance in this case since I have now been told by counsel the circumstances of the case to enable me to answer the only question which seems to me to be material, and I am not going to answer any others.

That question is whether or not the arbitrator has jurisdiction to review and/or to revise the final certificate and/or any other certificate given by the architects and/or to determine the matters submitted to him. That is not a question which really goes to his jurisdiction; if it did, of course, it could not be determined by way of a case stated; because if he has no jurisdiction to determine the dispute he would have no jurisdiction to state a case about it. What he means is whether, on the true construction of the clause, he has power to reopen the final certificate that has already been given by the architects. That comes about in this way. The work under the building contract was completed, and the architects gave their final certificate. The owners paid, and afterwards they alleged (and I think it is disputed by the contractors) that the architects had made a mistake. I think it was alleged by the owners that the architects agreed they made a mistake and that the result of the mistake was that the building contractors had been overpaid by about £1,000. The building contractors rely on the certificate which they have and say that it cannot be reopened.

Two clauses in the contract are material to that matter. The first is clause 24, which provides for the certificates and payments, and provides by paragraph (f) that on the expiration of a certain period which is there stated the architect shall "issue a final "certificate of the value of the works executed by the contractor "and such final certificate . . . shall be conclusive evidence "as to the sufficiency of the said works and materials." A question might arise on that whether the certificate was final and conclusive in any respect except in so far as it related to the sufficiency of the said works and materials, and if it has that limited effect, then whether the matter that is raised in this case goes to the sufficiency of the said works and materials. I do not propose to enter into that. I shall assume for the purpose of this case that clause 24, if taken by itself, provides that the architect's certificate is to be final and conclusive for all purposes that are relevant to this case.

[His Lordship read clause 27 and continued:] The latter part of clause 27 is conferring in express terms a power on the arbitrator to open up, review and revise any certificate and to determine all the matters in the dispute which are submitted to him as if such certificate had not been given. In those circumstances it appears to me to be quite plain that by the express words of the clause he is entitled to open up the final certificate given under clause 24. I do not feel that either of the two decisions which have been cited to me, and which concern the powers of the arbitrator where no words are present such as the words that are contained in the last sentence of clause 27, really can help in the least. All these questions turn on the construction of a particular contract and no case has been cited to me in which the court has had to construe the wide words at the end of clause 27 in the present case. The first point that Mr. Barraclough submitted was that the words which I have read refer only to any interim certificate and not to any final certificate. I can find no justification for so limiting them. The words are quite general—"any certificate"—and if they were to be construed as meaning any final certificate, then it would follow, of course, that although the interim certificates could be reopened the final certificate could not be the subject of any reopening at all. I see no justification for limiting the terms of the clause in that way.

Mr. Barraclough's second point is that since the word "conclusive" is used in clause 24, some meaning must be given to clause 27 which gives effect to that word. Well, the trouble about that is, what meaning? What meaning that does not destroy the effect of clause 27? If clause 27 itself is to be given any meaning at all, once one accepts, as I do, that it applies to final certificates, then there must be some conclusive certificates that the arbitrator can reopen and some that he cannot. I can find nothing in the contract which would enable me to draw any dividing line. One cannot invent one. One must get it from the words of the contract itself and one must decide what sort of certificates the arbitrator can reopen and what sort he cannot reopen. It is suggested by Mr. Barraclough that he would be able to reopen certificates that had not been accepted and not able to reopen certificates that had been accepted.

I am afraid I am still not quite clear what Mr. Barraclough means by "acceptance." He said that a certificate was normally accepted by the contractor before it was issued, because the architect would consult with the contractor and obtain his agreement to it. I understood him also to say that it was normally accepted by the owner in the same way. Of course, if it is accepted by both parties, then it is always accepted before it comes into existence. If, on the other hand, he means that the making of the payment amounts to an acceptance of the certificate, I cannot find any words in the clause which would justify drawing the line, or anything in any part of the contract which suggests that acceptance is in any way the test of anything that the arbitrator has to do. I, therefore, think that the only way in which the contract can be construed is to say that the words "final" and "conclusive" in clause 24 must be read subject to the express provisions of clause 27. Clause 24 must be read as meaning simply that they are final and conclusive subject to the arbitrator's powers under clause 27. The arbitrator's powers under clause 27 are as wide as they could possibly be. They refer to any sort of dispute, and they refer to any certificate, and he has power to deal with the whole matter as if no such certificate had been given.

That is the conclusion at which I would arrive by looking at the contract as a whole. But if one is permitted to use one's experience, or even one's common sense, as to how these contracts are built up, I think it is clear enough how the two clauses come to be there. The contract is not one that has been drafted as a whole and fully formed at one given moment: it is a contract which is built up from time to time by clauses being added. It is plain enough from the authorities that have been cited to me that in earlier days clause 27 was a much less wide clause than it is now. I think it is clear that at some time whoever is responsible for drafting this document decided, perhaps with a view to getting round the previous decisions of the courts (I do not know and it does not matter), that it would be desirable to give the arbitrator these very wide powers. He does that by putting some words on to the end of clause 27 and it does not occur to him to go back and redraft clause 24 in the light of what he had done in clause 27. That is probably the explanation of any apparent discrepancy there may be between the two; but whether that is the true explanation or not, reading the two together and reading them as both of equal authority, I think it is plain that clause 24 must be read subject to clause 27. I, therefore, answer the third question by saying that the arbitrator has power to make such an award in respect of the rights of the parties as he might think proper in the same manner as if no final certificate had been given.

Windsor Rural District Council v. Otterway & Try Ld.

Devlin J.

Charity—Education—Boy Scouts movement—Validity of bequest.

A testator, by his will dated August 23, 1940, directed that certain surplus income should be devoted to "the furthering of the "Boy Scouts Movement, by helping to purchase sights for camping, "outfits, etc."

By a royal charter granted to the Boy Scouts Association (which had general control over the Boy Scouts movement) in 1912, its purpose was stated as the instruction of "boys of all classes in the "principles of discipline, loyalty, and good citizenship":—

Held, that the objects of the Boy Scouts Association came within the definition of an educational charity and that the bequest, therefore, constituted a valid charitable trust.

Originating summons.

By his will, dated August 23, 1940, the testator, Alexander Webber, after making provision for his widow during her life or until her remarriage, directed that the remaining income from his estate should be devoted "to the furthering of the Boy Scouts

"Movement by helping to purchase sights for camping, outfits, "etc."

The testator died on February 20, 1954, and the executors took out a summons to determine (inter alia) whether that direction constituted a valid charitable trust or was void for perpetuity or uncertainty or otherwise.

In 1912 a royal charter was granted to the Boy Scouts Association, which was formed in that year for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the movement, which had been founded in 1908 by Lieutenant-General Sir Robert Baden-Powell, K.C.B. The charter stated that the purpose of the association was that of instructing boys of all classes in the principles of discipline, loyalty and good citizenship.

VAISEY J. The point which I have to consider is the meaning and effect of a very few words in the will of the testator by which he directed that certain surplus income should be devoted to the furthering of "the Boy Scouts Movement, by helping to purchase "sights for camping, outfits, etc." The orthography of the will is imperfect, but I have no doubt what the words were meant to convey, that is to say, "sights," in my view, means "sites," and not as written in the will "sights."

I am bound to say that I am surprised to hear that anyone suggests that the Boy Scouts movement, as distinguished from the Boy Scouts Association, or the Boy Scouts organization, or any other form of words, is other than an educational charity. I should have thought that it was well settled and well understood that the objects of the organization of boy scouts is an education of a very special kind no doubt, but still, none the less, educational. Where the testator directs this income to be devoted to the purposes which I have mentioned, the furthering of the Boy Scouts movement, and then particularizes it by saying that he wants to help it by helping them in the purchase of sites for camping, for outfits, and so forth, I should have thought that that is a very good and correct description of one of the most notable activities of the movement, association, or organization, whatever it may be called.

I do not think that it is necessary for me to go into the constitution of the association, which in point of fact was incorporated by royal charter on January 4, 1912. The outstanding purpose of the association appears in the first paragraph of the first clause, namely, the instruction of "boys of all classes in the "principles of discipline, loyalty and good citizenship." That seems to me to be a description of one of the most important elements in education.

The association, that is to say, the body incorporated by royal charter, has been treated as a charity ever since 1912. Nobody seems to have doubted that it was a charity, and it has been so recognized for very many purposes.

It is rather strange that this exact point, that is to say, the exact position of the Boy Scouts Association under the law relating to charities, does not seem to have come before the courts, except on one occasion to which I will refer in a moment. But, apart from authority, I feel, in spite of Mr. Wilberforce's argument, which was very properly devoted to endeavouring to analyse the particular words of the will and to find from them something which fell short of a charitable purpose, that on my own understanding of these matters and from what I know of the Boy Scouts movement, it is quite plainly a charitable body established for charitable purposes.

It appears that on June 29, 1932, a similar question arose before Clauson J. in In re Alexander, which is reported in "The "Times" newspaper of June 30, 1932. There there was a direction that the income should be applied "for the purpose of "creating a fund for providing holiday camps for the boy scouts "of Clapham and Brixton." A summons was taken out in that case by the trustees of the will asking whether the gift was a charitable trust, and Clauson J. declared that the gift was a good charitable trust, and gave liberty to apply for a scheme.

In his judgment, as reported in the newspaper, Clauson J. first referred to the fact that there was a body called the Boy Scouts Association, which was incorporated by royal charter, and which had general control over the Boy Scout movement. He added that "the Boy Scouts Association and Boy Scout movement "were clearly an educational organization and as such a charitable "organization in the technical sense."

The words there seem to me to be very near to the present words. Clauson J.'s apparent identification of "association" and "movement" seems to me to be so near to the present case that I should hesitate for a long time before I differed from his decision or even attempted to distinguish it. I am glad to know that the matter will be put beyond reasonable doubt, and that the Boy Scouts Association, the Boy Scouts movement, and the Boy Scouts organization, and the object and purpose for which the boy scouts exist, are again in this case held to be quite plainly within that department of charity which arises from the purpose being educational.

In answer to the question put to me in the summons, I shall declare that the direction contained in the will to devote income therein mentioned to furthering the Boy Scouts movement by helping to purchase sites for camping, outfits, etc., constitutes a valid charitable trust.

Declaration accordingly.

* STOW BARDOLPH GRAVEL CO. LD. v. POOLE (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

Revenue—Income tax—Capital or income expenditure—Gravel merchant—Cost of right to take gravel—Whether capital expenditure or expenditure on stock-in-trade—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), Sch. D, Case 1.

A company of sand and gravel merchants, in consideration of a payment of £2,000, acquired the benefit of a contract to take a deposit of sand and gravel. They later exercised an option contained in the contract, under which they acquired for £2,250 a right to take a further deposit:—

Held, that the sums of £2,000 and £2,250 were not expended on the purchase of stock-in-trade, and were not therefore admissible as deductions in the computation of the company's profits for the purpose of Case I of Sch. D; for by the contract and option the company did not acquire any proprietary right in the deposits in situ but merely had the right to work them and to take away what was won; and the company had not, on the facts, purchased stock-in-trade readily identifiable as such from the moment of purchase but merely a means of getting gravel and sand which when excavated and taken into possession would be part of their stock-in-trade.

Decision of Harman J. [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1058; [1954] 2 All E.R. 661 reversed.

APPEAL by Crown from Harman J.[1]

By an agreement dated October 29, 1947, Luddington Estates Ld. (on whose land were considerable deposits of gravel) agreed to sell to Gorbould Bros., a firm of contractors, a deposit of gravel and sand ballast on approximately eight acres of their land for the sum of £2,000. The relevant terms of the agreement were as follows:

Clause 1: "The company [Luddington Estates Ld.] shall sell "and the purchaser [Gorbould Bros.] shall purchase the deposit

"of gravel and sand ballast contained in and upon the land "coloured pink on the plan annexed hereto being an area of "8 acres"—or rather more—"forming part of the field numbered "102 on the ordnance survey sheet Norfolk LVII 10, . . . the "property of the company, at the price of £2,000 to be paid on "the signing hereof."

Clause 2: "The company shall allow the purchaser . . . free "access to the said land, with or without carts, lorries or other "vehicles, for the purpose of removing the said gravel and sand "ballast through" a specified gateway. It was provided that the purchaser should erect and maintain a proper gate.

Clause 4: "The purchaser shall have the right to take upon "the said land any portable machinery and haulage equipment "which may be required for the purpose of excavating and "carrying away the said gravel and sand ballast but no structures "or dwelling-houses of a permanent nature shall be erected "thereon, and no refuse, rubbish or spoil other than the excavated "top soil shall be deposited on the land."

By clause 5 the purchaser was made responsible for the rates, charges and so forth.

Clause 6 provided: "For the period of five years from the "date hereof the purchaser shall have the option to purchase "the additional deposit of gravel and sand ballast in and upon "the adjoining five acres of land coloured blue on the plan "annexed hereto at the price of £1,000 per acre where the deposit "shall be of a depth of 9 feet or more, provided that where the "deposit shall be found to be of a lesser depth than 9 feet the "purchase price shall be lessened by a proportionate amount as "shall be agreed between the company and the purchaser and "in default of agreement to be settled by arbitration in the "usual manner." There followed a proviso giving a further period for a further option.

By clause 8: "No legal estate in the lands hereinbefore "referred to shall be created or conveyed by virtue of this "agreement and no interests easements licences or rights of way "sporting or otherwise whatsoever except as herein expressly "agreed and declared shall be created or conferred or deemed "to be created or conferred hereby."

Gorbould Bros. did not work or excavate any part of the deposit of gravel and sand covered by the agreement, the benefit of which was acquired by the taxpayers, Stow Bardolph Gravel Co. Ld., who were sand and gravel merchants, in consideration of £2,000, under an oral agreement made with Gorbould Bros.

In 1949 the taxpayers, in exercise of the option contained in clause 6 of the agreement of 1947, obtained access on like terms to a further deposit of sand and gravel lying on an adjoining 2¼ acres of land at the price of £1,000 per acre, making a total of £2,250. On the exercise of that option the taxpayers became entitled to the further option exercisable within five years over a third piece of land referred to in the proviso to clause 6.

The taxpayers claimed that in the computation of their profits for the purpose of Case I of Sch. D [2] to the Income Tax Act, 1918, they were entitled to deduct the sums of £2,000 and £2,250 paid respectively to acquire the agreement of 1947 and in the exercise of the first option under that agreement, on the ground that it was expenditure incurred in the acquisition of trading stock, or expenditure of a revenue character wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the company's trade.

The General Commissioners (for Freebridge Marshland in the county of Norfolk) held that the two sums in question were not admissible as deductions, but on appeal by case stated Harman J. held that they were legitimate deductions being expended for the purchase of stock-in-trade.

The Crown appealed.

Sir Lynn Ungoed-Thomas Q.C. and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

Hilary Magnus for the taxpayers.

EVERSHED M.R. The question raised in this appeal is whether the Stow Bardolph Gravel Co. Ld., to whom I will hereafter refer as the taxpayers, were entitled to bring into their trading and profit and loss accounts for the two years ended March 31, 1949 and 1950, by way of expenses and in reduction of the profits or gains in respect of which they were being assessed, an item representing the purchase of gravel made during the year in question, less any stock of gravel so purchased at the end of that year. It is necessary to make it clear that the taxpayers are admittedly being charged for tax in D, Case I, r. 3: "In computing the "amount of the profits or gains to be "charged, no sum shall be deducted "in respect of—(a) any disbursements "or expenses, not being money wholly "and exclusively laid out or expended "for the purposes of the trade, pro-"fession, employment, or vocation ". . . respect of the gainful occupation or business of sand and gravel merchants. Therefore, prima facie it seems reasonable enough that in arriving at the taxable gains at the end of any given year the taxpayers should be entitled to deduct and to bring into account as an expense any sums laid out by them during the year in buying the stock-in-trade in which they dealt, namely, sand or gravel; but in fact when the matter is examined it is not quite so simple, for the alleged purchase of gravel represents what the taxpayers obtained under an agreement, made in October, 1947, not with them, but with a predecessor in title.

The Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax were of opinion that these claims to make deductions were not admissible, but Harman J. was of opinion that the deductions were admissible. I have myself reached a different conclusion from that reached by Harman J., and I have reached it, I confess, with some slight feelings of regret and misgiving on two grounds: first, I think the result bears a little hardly on the taxpayers for reasons which will, I think, emerge without any necessity for emphasis as I recite the facts; second, I am not for my own part satisfied that if close investigation were made of the method whereby the taxpayers and others in the same line of business carry on their businesses, it might not emerge—I say no more than that—that the commissioners would find as a fact that, notwithstanding the apparent legal consequences of the agreement to which I have referred, there was here in truth such a taking possession of the deposit of gravel in question that it could sensibly for tax purposes and rightly and fairly be said that once the consideration money had been paid under the agreement the deposit was in truth the stock-in-trade of the taxpayer. However, I have felt compelled to say that there is no finding of fact to support such a conclusion, nor indeed is there before us any evidence sufficient to warrant it. It is in that respect, I apprehend, that I find myself at variance with Harman J.

Having regard to the dates which I have mentioned, the Act which is relevant is that of 1918. The taxpayers having been assessed under Schedule D, their case, admittedly as I follow it, falls within the first two Cases. [His Lordship read rule 3 of the rules applicable to Cases I and II of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and continued:] If the question were asked, as a matter of what might be called business common sense, whether the sums which were paid under this agreement of October, 1947, were sums wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade as sand and gravel merchants, I think the answer would be that they were. But when their true nature is more closely examined in the light of the authorities which have been cited to the court, and bearing in mind also the prohibition in subparagraph (f) of rule 3, I think that one comes in this case to a conclusion contrary to that which commended itself to Harman J.

The agreement is expressed to be made between a company called Luddington Estates Ld., who may be taken as owners of all the land which is relevant, and two persons then carrying on a partnership business, the interest of the second party to the agreement being admittedly now vested in the taxpayers. [His Lordship read the agreement of October, 1947, as set out above and continued:]

Certain matters may be mentioned, although they are perhaps obvious and elementary. The first is that this deposit which is "purchased" according to the terms of clause 1 is, of course, part of the land itself. The gravel in situ is the land. There is, therefore, a real, if narrow, distinction between what is expressed to be a purchase of gravel on the one hand and a purchase of something which may be growing on the land or be lying on the land, such as potatoes, truffles, a crop of apples, or the leaves of a tree, on the other hand. It is also to be noted that once the purchaser has paid the £2,000, he is under no particular obligation to work this gravel. Allowing for the period covered by the option, the term of this agreement might extend for about ten years; but, on the face of the document, there is no doubt that it purports to be a sale of the gravel and sand as such, and the terms of the final clause, clause 8, can be said to emphasise the fact that no other interests are created than those which are essential for the main purpose of the sale of gravel and sand.

Before I comment further upon the agreement, I must make one or two references to the case in which the facts are stated. I have already said that the practice of businesses of this kind is not really discussed. As a matter of fact, the only finding seems to be in paragraph 3 (e), where the commissioners state: "On acquiring the benefit of the said agreement in writing, "the appellant company proceeded to excavate the deposit of "sand and gravel hereinbefore referred to, and sold the same "in the course of trade." In view of what follows, I emphasise the word "excavate." The contentions of the taxpayers and of the Crown were then set out; and the commissioners stated their conclusion: "We . . . after hearing and considering the "evidence were of opinion that the above payments were not "admissible deductions for Income Tax purposes."

Harman J. apparently rested his conclusion on his acceptance of the literal fact of the first clause of the agreement, which has indeed underlaid the substance of the argument forcefully put before us by Mr. Magnus. In the report in the Weekly Law Reports [1] the reasoning of the judge is introduced by the simple formula, "Having stated the facts." That formula, however, does less than justice to what the judge stated at the beginning of his judgment, and I think it is necessary to refer to a line or two in the early part of his judgment. He said: "No estate or interest in the land was expressed to be given "to the so-called purchaser, nor is there any limit to the time "in which he must remove the sand and gravel; the only time "limit is the 5-year period within which he must exercise "the options. He is not the owner of the land obviously, "because he only has access to it by one road and the freehold "must remain, I take it, in the vendor. What he gets is, "apparently, a right of access not limited in time, coupled with "a profit à prendre, and for that he pays down his £2,000."

I respectfully agree with that summary of the rights granted by the document of 1947, and in the light of the authorities to which we have been referred I should have thought that that statement of the position led to a conclusion in favour of the Crown. But the judge avoided that conclusion by the emphasis he put, not on the legal effect of the document, but on the language used, particularly in the first clause. Thus he said [2]: "It is argued on behalf of the appellants"—that is the tax-payers—"that this is a mere purchase of stock-in-trade—their "stock-in-trade being sand and gravel—and that all they do is "to go on the land, shovel the sand and gravel into a lorry, and "sell it to their customers, so that it is as much their stock-in-"trade as any other article in which a trader might deal. It is "said on behalf of the Crown that the sand and gravel is not "a chattel detached from the soil, but something which has "to be worked as if it were in a mine or a quarry; and that "all that was bought under this contract was a capital asset, "namely, the right to go on the land and win the gravel and "the sand and to carry it away." I venture to think that in his recital of the argument of the Crown he might be said to be restating his own conclusion of the rights given by the agreement of 1947.

The judge, however, next referred to a case to which I must also presently allude, Golden Horse Shoe (New) Ld. v. Thurgood,[3] which admittedly on the facts is the closest authority to the present case. He then came back to the present case, and stated his conclusions thus [4]: "It is said here that the "opposite conclusion"—that is, opposite to the Golden Horse Shoe case [5]—"should be reached, and the reason in substance is "because this gravel had never been raked off the soil on which "it was lying. This is not a case where the gravel is in any true "sense 'won' from the soil; nor is any process applied to it. It "is not even suggested that a riddle or sieve is used; it is merely "shovelled up where it lies, put on a lorry and sold wherever it "can be sold."

I do not know whether those are, or are not, the facts; but there is no finding to that effect. If the facts were as the judge intimated, the General Commissioners might find, and might justifiably find, that a case such as this is not really distinguishable as a matter of law and common sense from a sale of loose objects lying on the surface of the ground, such as windfalls from apple trees, or even from cases like those I have mentioned, which are concerned with crops or leaves growing on trees. But my difficulty is that I can find no justification for that conclusion in the material before us. I venture to think, with all respect to Harman J., that it neglects the introduction to his judgment, which is, in my opinion, a correct appreciation of the real rights given to the taxpayers under the agreement of 1947.

I come back to the question which is inherent in the judge's summary of the argument, and which seems to be fundamental to the decision of the present case. Can it be said on the facts which are proved, that from the moment when the purchaser paid his £2,000 this deposit which is identified by reference to a field on the map became the stock-in-trade of the gravel merchant? I have found it impossible to answer that question affirmatively.

I do not think that it is necessary to go at length all through the many cases which have been brought to the attention of the court. If I do not do so, I hope that I shall not be thought to have failed in appreciation of their significance, or have failed to do justice to the arguments put before us. The earlier cases, I think, are sufficiently exemplified by Coltness Iron Co. v. Black [6] and Alianza Co. v. Bell,[7] which may be said to be the foundation for what is said in the Golden Horse Shoe case.[8] The Coltness Iron Co. case,[9] as its name implies, was a mining case strictly so-called; that is to say, it concerned an iron mine, the getting of iron by mining operations. As Mr. Magnus observed, the business of mining has been the subject of special treatment in the Income Tax Acts, as may be seen on reference to Schedule A and the exceptions thereto.[10] In the Alianza case [11] also the business operation was that of turning to account a caliche mine in South America. But in that case, since the mine was out of the jurisdiction, the business, which was managed and controlled in the United Kingdom, could not be treated for tax purposes on the same footing as that of the owner of a mine situated in England. None the less the court held that the same principles applied.

Those cases laid down the principle that in all cases truly analogous thereto the costs of acquiring a mine, or the depreciation of a mine once acquired (which for accounting purposes is another way of saying the same thing), were not legitimate deductions as being expenses wholly and exclusively incurred for the purposes of the trade and not being sums employed as capital in the business.

The subject-matter of the Golden Horse Shoe case [12] was not a mine or underground minerals but dumps formed of tailings; that is, the refuse of the mine from which the best gold ore had already been extracted, analogous to the tips which are a familiar sight near coal mines in this country. The business operation of the company was extracting the gold ore, the gold metal, which admittedly still existed in some quantities in the tailings. The Golden Horse Shoe Co. had bought tailings (one of those dumps, it is stated, was about 250 feet high) and they were undoubtedly raw material from which, by appropriate manufacturing processes, the Golden Horse Shoe Co. extracted gold. The question was whether the costs of acquiring these tailings, which were severed from the earth, were legitimate deductions. This court came to the conclusion that they were, distinguishing the tailings lying heaped on the ground from, for example, the minerals which were still ungotten, and which had been the subject of Coltness Iron Co. v. Black [13] and earlier cases.

Romer L.J. said in the Golden Horse Shoe case,[14]: "Unfortunately . . . it is not always easy to determine whether a "particular asset belongs to the one category or the other." That is, whether it is in fact a capital asset or part of the stock-in-trade or raw material. "It depends in no way upon what may "be the nature of the asset in fact or in law. Land may in "certain circumstances be circulating capital. A chattel or a "chose in action may be fixed capital. The determining factor "must be the nature of the trade in which the asset is employed." He then illustrated the point he was making, and took by way of illustration the example of a man whose trade is that of a manufacturer and seller of gas, which is to be extracted, of course, from coal. "But now suppose" he continued,[16] "that "the gas manufacturer, instead of buying his coal from outside "sources, purchase a coal mine and produces the coal that he "requires by mining. The cost of extracting from the mine the "coal treated will, of course, be a permissible deduction in "ascertaining the profits of his business in the year. But he may "not debit his profit and loss account with the sum by which "the value of his mine has depreciated in consequence of the "extraction of that coal. For the mine is regarded as being "fixed capital:" There follows a reference to Coltness Iron Co. v. Black [17] and Alianza Co. v. Bell.[18] "If, on the other "hand, instead of buying the mine, the gas manufacturer had "bought a quantity of coal already extracted from the mine and "stacked on the surface, the price of the coal would have been "regarded as part of the circulating capital. The reason for this "distinction is not at first sight very easy to discover. It must, "as it seems to me, be found in this: that in the former case "the purchase of the mine is not a purchase of coal but a pur-"chase of land with the right of extracting coal from it. The "land is regarded merely as one of the means provided by the "manufacturer for causing coal to be brought in his gasworks, "and therefore as much part of his fixed capital as would be any "railway trucks or lorries provided by him for the same "purpose." Then, after a citation, Romer L.J. said [19]: "It "seems to follow from these considerations that the question to "be decided in the present case resolves itself into this: Are "the dumps the raw material of the appellants' business or "do they merely provide the means of obtaining that raw "material? In my opinion they are the raw material itself."

Harman J., applying that case to the present one, asked the question whether the sand and gravel here was subject to extraction. Since there was no processing, the raw material in this case was, he found, the stock-in-trade of the taxpayer's business, and he thought that there was in principle no distinction between the Golden Horse Shoe case [20] and the case before him. I have already quoted from his judgment [21]: "This is not a case where "the gravel is in any true sense 'won' from the soil . . . it is "merely shovelled up where it lies." It is on that matter, as I have said, that I find myself at variance with the judge. I find it impossible to resist the conclusion on the facts before us that, the rights under the agreement of 1947 being as the judge and I have stated them, the deposit where it lay under the top soil, under part of a field like any other part of the surrounding country, was not the stock-in-trade of this business and could not become such until it had been excavated. It has been the burden of Mr. Magnus's case that that is not right, and it is at that point that the ways part.

Mr. Magnus further contended that, even if it could not be said that the gravel was merely sold as a chattel or chattels and became, accordingly, the taxpayers' stock-in-trade, the nature of this agreement is such that the cost of acquiring the gravel, the contractual rights which the sum of £2,000 and the option price gave, were none the less matters which were properly to be brought into the income accounts for income tax purposes. I cannot accept that. I think that once it has to be conceded that there was no sale of the gravel in the way the judge said there was, then it must follow that what the company acquired was, to use

Romer L.J.'s language,[22] "the means of getting the gravel by "excavating and making it part of the stock-in-trade."

Other examples were quoted, and Mr. Magnus drew attention, among others, to cases of growing timber. On one side of the line was a Scottish case recently decided, Murray v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue,[23] where a Mr. Murray, having bought certain standing timber for about £1,000, was fortunately able to sell it later, still standing, for £14,000. The Inner House of the Court of Session decided the case, as I read their judgment, on this simple ground: that there was evidence justifying the commissioners' finding that the purchase and sale of that growing timber were transactions within the scope of the business activities of Mr. Murray as a timber merchant, and, therefore, that the difference between the two figures was taxable profit in his hands.

On the other side of the line was Kauri Timber Co. Ld. v. New Zealand Commissioner of Taxes,[24] which came to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from New Zealand. The appellant company had, like Mr. Murray in Murray v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue,[25] entered into a number of contracts or similar documents for acquiring rights over standing timber. The nature of the transactions which the Kauri Company entered into may be said to have been far more comprehensive in scope than Mr. Murray's transactions, but still I think that the principle was not very different. In that case, however, the Board came to the conclusion that the deduction of the sums paid by the Kauri Timber Company was not admissible. Reference was made to the other cases to which I have also referred. But Lord Shaw said[26]: "It appears to the Board that the present case "involves no refinement of distinction; for the transaction under "which these timber rights were acquired was not one under "which a mere possession of goods by a contract of sale was "given to the appellant company, but was one under which they "obtained an interest in, and possession of, land." If that test is applied to the present case, it seems to me that it produces the result which I have already indicated.

Finally, I refer to a case to which Jenkins L.J. drew our attention, which also came before the Privy Council: Mohanlal Hargovind of Jubbulpore v. Commissioner of Income Tax, Central Provinces and Berar, Nagpur.[27] In that case the taxpayer had entered into a series of contracts which entitled him to pick off and take away the leaves of trees known as tendu leaves, which were required for making into cigarettes. The question again was whether the sums spent in acquiring the leaves were properly deducted as being expenses which were exclusively incurred in the business, or whether they were in truth in pari materia with the Kauri Timber case,[28] and, therefore, capital outlay. On the facts of that case the Board came to the conclusion that the sums were deductible, and the judgment of the Board, delivered by Lord Greene,[29] undoubtedly reflects, and reflects closely, the argument which Mr. Magnus has put forward in the present case for the sand and gravel company; so that if sand and gravel are substituted for tendu leaves one would be hearing an echo of the argument for the taxpayers in the present case. As Romer L.J. said in the Golden Horse Shoe case,[30] the distinctions are not always easy to discern or to expound, but I think that in the case of the tendu leaves Lord Greene undoubtedly emphasised the short-term nature of the contract and the fact that it gave nothing whatever to the taxpayer except the right to take the leaves off the trees, just as a man might acquire a crop of apples on the trees, with only the necessary rights to go and take them away. "In their Lordships' opinion" said Lord Greene,[31] "the High Court" [from which the appeal came] "has adopted an approach to the "question which has diverted its view from the real point and "has attached too much importance to cases decided on quite "different facts. Cases relating to the purchase or leasing of "mines, quarries, deposits of brick earth, land with standing "timber, etc., referred to in the judgment and relied on in the "argument before the Board do not appear to their Lordships "to be of assistance." It is obvious from the contrasted examples that the decision rested upon the particular circumstances of the case and upon the fact that the Board was able to say that from the moment the contract was entered into and before the leaves had actually been picked the tendu leaves were part of the raw material of the appellant. But I cannot say the same of the sand and gravel, part of the earth itself, which was the subject of the contract in the present case and which I think could only become part of the stock-in-trade of this gravel merchants' business when it had, in the true sense, been won, been excavated and been taken into their possession.

For these reasons, which I have stated at some length out of respect for Harman J.'s judgment, I would allow the appeal.

JENKINS L.J. I agree. Whether the decision in this case should be in favour of the Crown or the taxpayers, in my opinion the grounds which led the judge to decide in favour of the taxpayers cannot be supported. He treated the case as if the transaction evidenced by the agreement of October 29, 1947, was a sale of a chattel in the shape of gravel lying loose on the surface of the land. There is no finding of fact in the case stated to support the view that the gravel was lying loose. On the other hand, there are passages in the case stated and in the agreement which make it reasonably apparent that the subject-matter of the agreement consisted of a deposit of gravel of the usual kind lying some feet beneath the surface of the land and requiring to be won from the land by a process of excavation.

My Lord has referred to the passages in the judgment describing the gravel in effect as lying loose on the land. Harman J. said [32]: "It is said here that the opposite conclusion "should be reached, and the reason in substance is because this "gravel had never been raked off the soil on which it was lying. "This is not a case where the gravel is in any true sense 'won'." Then two lines further on: ". . . it is merely shovelled up "where it lies, put on a lorry and sold wherever it can be sold. ". . . I think that it is a distinction without difference to "suggest that, because nobody had ever before applied a rake "to this gravel, it should be treated as capital, whereas if some-"body had raked it into little heaps before the contract was "made, then its purchase would constitute a different form of "adventure. It is the same situation; it is no more and no less "attached to the land. . . . it would be to introduce only "another artificiality if I were to hold that the fact that this "gravel had not been moved made the expenditure upon it a "capital outlay, when the expenditure on it would have been a "trading cost had it been touched by a rake."

It is, to my mind, clear that the case should be considered on the footing that this was a deposit of gravel beneath the surface of the land which required winning from the land by operations in the nature of quarrying or excavation. On that footing, how does the matter stand? One starts with the well-known provisions of Schedule D and the rules applicable to Cases I and II. [His Lordship read rule 3 and continued:]

The two sums paid by the taxpayers under the agreement of October 29, 1947, that is to say, the initial sum of £2,000 which was paid by them to the original parties to the agreement from whom they took an assignment, and the further sum of £2,250 paid by them on the partial exercise of the first of the two options, were clearly sums laid out wholly and exclusively for the purposes of their trade. It remains to consider whether these two sums were in the nature of capital outlay or were expenditure on revenue account; for in order to be expenses properly deductible they must be of the latter description. To arrive at an answer, it is necessary to consider the nature of the rights taken by the taxpayers under the agreement of October 29, 1947. The agreement by clause 1 purports to affect a sale upon the deposit of gravel under the defined 8 acres of land. The agreement then provides by clause 2 for the necessary access to the land by the taxpayers, their servants and agents, for the purpose of removing the gravel, with certain limitations as to the way by which access is to be had. In clause 4 rights are given to take upon the land portable machinery, haulage equipment and so forth; but there is a prohibition against structures or dwelling-houses of a permanent nature, and a prohibition against depositing on the land any refuse, rubbish or spoil other than the excavated top soil. The two options to which reference has already been made are given by clause 6; the first is given for a period of five years from the date of the agreement, and the further option is given by a proviso to the same paragraph and is to be exercisable within a further five years from the date of the exercise of the first option, in the event of the first option being exercised. Finally, by clause 8: "No legal estate in the lands hereinbefore referred "to shall be created or conveyed by virtue of this agreement and "no interests easements licences or rights of way sporting or "otherwise whatsoever except as herein expressly agreed and "declared shall be created or conferred or deemed to be created "or conferred hereby."

What is the effect of that agreement, and in particular of clause 1, which contains the purported sale of the deposit of gravel contained in and upon the land coloured pink, in conjunction with clause 8, which states that no legal estate in the land is to be created or conveyed by virtue of the agreement? In my view, the effect of the agreement is to give the taxpayers, as assignees of the original parties, an exclusive right to win and carry away the deposit which is referred to. In view of clause 8, I do not think that the agreement should be regarded as conferring on the taxpayers any proprietary right in the stratum of the land containing the sand or gravel. In my view the taxpayers had an exclusive right to win the gravel, and when it had been excavated and won, it became their property; but in my view the taxpayers cannot be described as having had any proprietary right in that particular stratum of the soil or in the gravel while it lay in that stratum, except in so far as they had an exclusive right to win it. The effect of the agreement, therefore, in my view, was to give the taxpayers an interest in the land in the nature of a profit à prendre, so that if they availed themselves of the right granted, they would become the owners of any gravel excavated by them from this area of land.

Certain features of the agreement require special notice. First of all, it is unlimited in time, so that the taxpayers are allowed the right to excavate the gravel over an indefinite period. The taxpayers are under no obligation to work the gravel at all, and if any work is done it is for the taxpayers to decide at what rate excavation shall proceed. Secondly, the price in no way depends on the amount of gravel excavated or available. Thirdly, the taxpayers are given options of securing further reserves of gravel to be exercised during a period which may extend for as long as ten years from the date of the agreement. Those reserves, in the event of the option being fully exercised, would have comprised, I think, another 10 acres in addition to the 8 acres to which the right originally extended.

Stow Bardolph Gravel Co. Ld v. Poole.
Jenkins L.J.

Such being the nature of the rights, it remains to consider whether the money laid out by the taxpayers in purchasing those rights, in purchasing the rights originally granted and in purchasing part of the further rights comprised in the first option, was laid out by way of capital expenditure or by way of income expenditure in the course of the taxpayers' trade. Mr. Magnus for the taxpayers contended that the business of the taxpayers was the business of dealers in sand and gravel, and not the business of quarry owners. He said that the taxpayers' business was to buy and sell gravel, so that any expenditure necessary to the purchase of gravel must be a proper expense of the taxpayers' trade. In my view, that states the position too narrowly. I would say that the taxpayers carry on the business of dealers in sand and gravel, but I would say that one part of the business consists not merely in purchasing gravel but in obtaining gravel, and there may be expenditure necessary or desirable with a view to obtaining gravel which is, nevertheless, not the purchase price of gravel as stock-in-trade of the business.

Sir Lynn Ungoed-Thomas, on the other hand, contended for the Crown that it could not be said here that the taxpayers had purchased a quantity of gravel as part of the taxpayers' stock-in-trade. He said that the true view was, when the terms and effect of the agreement were examined, that the taxpayers had provided themselves with a means of supplying themselves with gravel which when procured would form part of their stock-in-trade. On that view of the agreement, Sir Lynn submitted that the expenditure of the taxpayers in obtaining the rights granted by the agreement was expenditure of a capital nature on the principles stated by this court, and particularly in the judgment of Romer L.J. in the Golden Horse Shoe case.[33]

The question is not free from difficulty. Is this a case of a purchase of the raw material of the trade, that is, the stock-in-trade in which a particular trader deals, or is it a case of a purchase of a capital asset from which the taxpayers will be able to derive raw material or stock-in-trade as and when the requirements of the taxpayers' business make it expedient to do so? In my view, the latter conclusion is the correct one, and I think that conclusion accords with the Alianza case[34] and the Coltness case,[35] and also with the observations of Lord Shaw in the Kauri case.[36] The distinctions drawn by the cases are not altogether satisfying to some minds. It may seem strange that a purchase of a heap of tailings, as in the Golden Horse Shoe case,[37] should be regarded as a purchase of raw material or stock-in-trade, whereas the sums expended in acquiring a quantity of caliche or nitrates embedded in a quarry, as in the Alianza case,[38] should be a capital expense; or again, which I think is the result in the present case, that the right to obtain or win gravel lying in the soil should be a capital expense. But these matters of taxation must depend on the rules laid down by the relevant legislation by reference to which income for tax purposes is to be measured and under which capital expenditure is not deductible. In my view, when all the authorities are looked at, it is reasonably plain that an asset such as that acquired by the taxpayers in the present case must be regarded as a capital asset and not as so much stock-in-trade purchased by the taxpayers for the purposes of their trade.

Mr. Magnus invited us to distinguish the Alianza case [38] and the Coltness case [39] and other cases of that kind on the ground that these were either cases where there was a question of assessing the owner of a mine under No. III of Schedule A, or else cases in which, as in the Alianza case,[40] the appropriate schedule was Schedule D, but the question concerned the profit derived from mining or quarrying operations; and he said that those cases could not govern the present one, because here it was not sought to tax the appellants under Schedule A in respect of their operations in relation to these deposits of gravel. I cannot accept that argument. It seems to me to be reasonably plain from the cases which have been referred to, and in particular from the Alianza case [40] and the criticisms of Knowles v. McAdam [41] in the House of Lords in the Coltness case,[42] that there is here involved a general principle which is equally applicable whether the question concerns the ascertainment of the profits derived from a mine, or concerns the ascertainment of the profits of a trader or manufacturer under Schedule D. The question is the same in all these cases, and it is in effect whether a given expense, granted that it is wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade, is a capital expense or an income expense; and in deciding that question I think that the same principle must be applied whether the gainful activity concerned is the operation of a mine or a quarry or dealing in such a commodity as gravel.

For these reasons, I agree with the Master of the Rolls that this appeal should be allowed.

BIRKETT L.J. I am of the same opinion and I will, therefore, confine myself to a few words in stating why I feel that the judgment of Harman J. cannot be supported.

Many analogies have been discussed—potatoes, truffles, strawberries, apples, and all sorts of other commodities—in order to ascertain what is the true test to be applied to the particular facts of this case. For my own part, as the discussion has continued it has become clearer and clearer that the all-important matter is the true view of the facts. It is plain that Harman J. came to his decision on his particular view of the facts after hearing the authorities which have been cited to this court. Jenkins L.J. has cited several extracts from the judgment of Harman J. which, considered in the light of the evidence, such as it is, are very striking. I could have wished that when this case was before the commissioners the facts had been opened more elaborately, because the true position now has to be extracted from certain documents. For example, in the case stated, in paragraph 3 (e), it is said: "On acquiring the benefit of the said "agreement in writing, the appellant company proceeded to "excavate the deposit of sand and gravel," but the agreement itself, by clause 4, states: "The purchaser shall have the right "to take upon the said land any portable machinery and haulage "equipment which may be required for the purpose of excavating "and carrying away the said gravel and sand ballast." In clause 6, which is of some importance, it is provided: "For the "period of 5 five years from the date hereof the purchaser shall "have the option to purchase the additional deposit of gravel and "sand ballast in and upon the adjoining 5 acres of land coloured "blue on the plan annexed hereto at the price of £1,000 per acre "where the deposit shall be of a depth of 9 feet or more, provided "that where the deposit shall be found to be of a lesser depth "than 9 feet the purchase price" shall be adjusted.

Those matters are in striking contrast with some of the expressions which are to be found in the judgment of Harman J.[43] to which Jenkins L.J. drew attention: ". . . this gravel had "never been raked off the soil on which it was lying," which would make it a surface matter. "It is argued that what was "bought was a mere right to go on the land and win the gravel ". . . because nobody had ever before applied a rake to this gravel, "it should be treated as capital, whereas if somebody had raked it "into little heaps before the contract was made, then its purchase "would constitute a different form of adventure. . . . They did "not work it up or treat it as raw material or do anything with "it, so far as I am told, except to load it on a cart and take it "away, and it would be to introduce only another artificiality if "I were to hold that the fact that this gravel had not been "moved made the expenditure upon it a capital outlay, when "the expenditure on it would have been a trading cost had it "been touched by a rake."

Sir Lynn Ungoed-Thomas, when opening this appeal, referred to the fact that he thought the judge had decided this case wrongly, not upon any mistaken view of the law but on a mistaken view of the facts; and it appears to be the fact that the judge was not treating this matter as apparently the facts really warranted, as a deposit of gravel on this particular piece of land which had to be excavated and won.

For that reason, I think that the judgment cannot be supported, because the cases which have been cited, and the judgments of Lord Hanworth and Romer L.J. which have been read, were, I gather, read to Harman J., and he considered the Golden Horse Shoe case,[44] indicating his view of the facts that coloured the whole situation. He said[45]: "... in effect, in "the Golden Horse Shoe case[46] what was bought was the licence "to go on the land and take away the 'tailings,' and I think "that it is a distinction without difference to suggest that, "because nobody had ever before applied a rake to this gravel," and so on. For my own part, I think that the passage which was cited to us by Sir Lynn Ungoed-Thomas at the outset of this appeal is really a governing consideration to be taken into account with the true facts. Said Romer L.J.[47]: "It seems to follow "from these considerations that the question to be decided in "the present case resolves itself into this: Are the dumps the "raw material of the appellants' business or do they merely "provide the means of obtaining that raw material?" His answer to that question was that they were the raw material itself. That was a decision on the facts of that case.

After listening carefully to the arguments that have been addressed to this court and applying the test which Romer L.J. laid down as the test which is to be applied, I think that although the first clause of the agreement states that the taxpayers purchased the deposit of sand and gravel, the true view is that they purchased the means of obtaining that raw material for the trade which they carried on, namely, the sale of gravel.

Finally, I observe that Harman J. said in his judgment that the appellants "were buying their stock-in-trade when they "bought the gravel." If this company unfortunately had gone into liquidation, and if the contract had not been performed, it might have been difficult to say that one asset, the stock-in-trade, lay below the surface of the ground on that particular plot of land. I should have thought that to describe that property as stock-in-trade would be quite inappropriate.

For these reasons, I feel that it is impossible to support the judgment of Harman J., and I agree with the judgments which have already been delivered.

* ORMAN BROTHERS LD. v. GREENBAUM.

Landlord and Tenant—Act of 1954—Notice to quit—Validity—Notice given on August 31, 1954, expiring October 4—Act coming into force on October 1—Notice not in form prescribed by Act—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 56), s. 24 (1) (3) (b). Statute—Retroactive effect.

By section 24 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, "A "tenancy to which this Part of this Act applies shall not come "to an end unless terminated in accordance with the provisions of "this Part of this Act"; and by subsection (3) of that section: "Notwithstanding anything in subsection (1) of this section . . . "(b) where, at any time when a tenancy is not one to which this "Part of this Act applies, the landlord gives notice to quit, the "operation of the notice shall not be affected by reason that the "tenancy becomes one to which this Part of this Act applies after "the giving of the notice."

On August 31, 1954, landlords gave to a tenant one month's notice to quit business premises expiring on October 4, 1954. The notice was not given in accordance with the provisions of the Act. On October 1 the Act of 1954 came into operation:—

Held, that section 24 (1) was to be literally interpreted and, unless the notice was saved by subsection (3) (b), the tenancy was not terminated; that the object of subsection (3) (b) was to meet the situation where there was a change of user between the serving of the notice and its taking effect; that in applying the subsection one had to assume that the Act was already in force; and that, since on October 1, the notice did not comply with the requirements of the Act, the tenancy had not come to an end.

ACTION for possession.

By an agreement in writing dated December 7, 1953, between landlords, Orman Brothers Ld., and a tenant, Woolf Barnett Greenbaum, the landlords let to the tenant the top and second floor of factory premises at 167–173 Goswell Road, Finsbury, for one year certain from March 9, 1953, at a rent of £20 a week. The tenancy expired on March 9, 1954, after which the tenant continued in possession as a four-weekly tenant. By a notice in writing dated August 31, 1954, the landlords gave the tenant notice to quit the premises on October 4, 1954. On October 1, the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, came into operation. The tenant contended that, the tenancy being one to which the Act applied, and the notice to quit not being in the form prescribed under the Act, the tenancy, by virtue of section 24 (1),[1] was not terminated by the notice. The landlords contended that, the notice having been given before the Act came into operation, the Act was not retrospective so as to invalidate the notice; alternatively, that, even if section 24 (1) applied, the notice was still a good notice by virtue of section 24 (3) (b).[2]

Charles Lawson for the tenant.

DEVLIN J. The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, came into force two months ago, so that very little time has been lost in the discovery of difficulties about its interpretation and application. It is an Act which is intended so far as Part II is concerned, and that is the only part that I have to deal with, to make certain provisions for security of tenure for business, professional and other tenants.

The defendant was a business tenant. He was granted, to operate from March 9, 1953, a lease for one year of the premises which are the subject-matter of this case for business purposes at a rent of £20 a week. His tenancy, therefore, expired on March 9, 1954, but he was allowed to hold over on the same terms until the landlords, the plaintiffs, decided on August 31 to give him a notice to quit which was to expire within four weeks from its service, and which did, therefore, in accordance with its terms, expire on October 4 of this year. Meanwhile, the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, had come into force. It was an Act which was passed by Parliament—and the date is important—on July 30, 1954, but which by section 70 (2), came into operation on October 1.

It is common ground that this was a tenancy of a class to which the Act applies, and one of the questions that I have to determine is whether it applies in this particular case. One of the provisions of the Act is with regard to the giving of notices to quit, and certain forms of notice to quit are prescribed. It is common ground that the notice which was given on August 31 did not comply with that requirement. The question, therefore, I have to determine is whether the notice to quit was a good one or not.

One naturally looks to see what provision, if any, has been made for the situation which was obviously bound to arise, that at the time when the Act came into force there might be notices to quit which had been served, but which had not yet taken effect. Here was a notice to quit served on August 31 to take effect on October 5, and on October 1 the Act comes into force. The notice does not comply with the requirements of the Act. What is the effect of the Act upon such a notice?

[2] S. 24 (3): "Notwithstanding "anything in subsection (1) of this "section . . . (b) where, at a time "when a tenancy is not one to which "this Part of this Act applies, the "landlord gives notice to quit, the "operation of the notice shall not be "affected by reason that the tenancy "becomes one to which this Part of "this Act applies after the giving of "the notice."

Orman Brothers Ld. v. Greenbaum.

Devlin J.

One first looks to see what the Act says about notices that are not in accordance with its provisions. Section 24 (1) provides: "A tenancy to which this Part of this Act applies shall not come "to an end unless terminated in accordance with the provisions "of this Part of this Act." When one seeks to apply those words, Mr. Sherrard, for the landlords, argues that "terminated" means "terminated by giving a notice to quit"; in other words, the word is referring to the instrument or to the act which is the terminating factor and not to the effluxion of time. Mr. Lawson disputes that, but I think that Mr. Sherrard's interpretation is the better one, and I shall assume it to be right. The wording of the part of section 24 (1) which I have read appears to draw a contrast between a tenancy coming to an end and a tenancy being terminated. Accordingly, for "terminated" I shall read "notice "to quit has been given." On that basis, the operative part of the section reads: "A tenancy to which this Part of this Act "applies shall not come to an end unless notice to quit has been "given in accordance with the provisions of this Part of this Act."

If one applies that literally, the position is this: One has to ask oneself: On October 5 did this tenancy come to an end? The Act is then unquestionably in force. It is then a tenancy to which this part of the Act applies, because it is a business tenancy. Has it come to an end? It does not come to an end unless notice to quit has been given in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and notice to quit has not been given in accordance with the provisions of the Act and, therefore, the tenancy does not come to an end. That is the literal interpretation of the section.

But Mr. Sherrard argues, with a good deal of force, that that literal interpretation ought not to be given to the section; it ought not to be assumed that Parliament is in effect, though not in form, legislating retrospectively as to the contents of a notice to quit. Suppose, he says, a tenancy required a year's notice to quit and a notice is given which is in the usual form, and then a few days before the notice is due to expire, an Act of Parliament is passed which requires the notice to be in some special form. The consequence is, that when the notice would normally have taken effect a few days later it does not take effect at all. The parties may have made their arrangements on the basis that it was going to take effect; the premises may have been re-let; and it would be quite unreasonable, Mr. Sherrard argues, to give a meaning to this section which would put a landlord, who could not possibly have known what particular form Parliament was going to require, into such a position as that.

Of course, that is always an argument that has to be taken into consideration in the construction of the section, and it may sometimes be a good reason for not giving the words of the section the meaning that they literally bear, but it is not a conclusive reason, because, of course, Parliament can do what it likes. One wants to look at other provisions of the Act to see whether Parliament has indicated one way or the other how it proposed to deal with such a situation.

Mr. Lawson, therefore, has referred me to the provisions of the Ninth Schedule, paragraph 1, as throwing some light upon Parliament's intention with regard to notices to quit that were served before the coming into force of the Act. Before I refer to that schedule, I must, so as to make it comprehensible, refer to section 66 of the Act itself, which, by subsection (1), provides: "Any form of notice required by this Act to be prescribed shall "be prescribed by regulations made by the Lord Chancellor by "statutory instrument."

What appears to be at first sight surprising, and is indeed surprising until one looks at the terms of the Ninth Schedule, is that although the Act did not come into force until October 1, regulations * were made on August 19 which purported to come into operation on August 27, over a month before the Act itself came into force. All that I need say about those regulations is that they contain a large number of notices and are clearly the sort of regulations that are contemplated by section 66 (1), where the Lord Chancellor is given power to prescribe the form of notice.

If one looks at the Ninth Schedule, paragraph 1, one sees why the regulations were made on that date. Paragraph 1 provides: "The power under section 66 of this Act to make regulations "prescribing forms of notices for the purposes of this Act may be "exercised at any time after the passing and before the com-"mencement of this Act"—that is, at any time after July 30 and before October 1—"so as to bring the regulations into "operation at any time after they are made; and where the date, "or the end of a period, specified by a notice which is given in a "form so prescribed falls after the time at which this Act comes "into operation the notice shall not be invalid by reason only "that it was served before that time."

This is a novel Parliamentary device which is to make the regulations made under the Act part of the law of the land before the Act itself becomes part of the law of the land. I am not, however, in the circumstances of this case, called upon to consider any large question of that sort. The effect of this may be one of two things: it may be that the Act becomes part of the law of the land for certain purposes, and for the purpose of making regulations in particular, on July 30, and that the provision that it does not come into operation until October 1 must be construed accordingly. In that event, the regulations become part of the law of the land on the date when they are brought into operation; that is, August 27. The alternative view is that that is not a possible construction of the Act and that if the Act itself does not come into operation until October 1, neither can the regulations.

* Landlord and Tenant (Notices) Regulations, 1954 (S.I. 1954, No. 1107).

Orman Brothers Ld. v. Greenbaum.

Devlin J.

On that view, however, it seems to me to be plain from this paragraph that if they do not become part of the law of the land until October 1, on that date they become, by virtue of this paragraph, retrospectively law from August 27. That would mean that as between August 27 and October 1 they are not part of the law of the land, but on October 1 they become part of the law of the land retrospectively.

Those are both agreeable possibilities which, as I say, I am not called upon to determine. All that I have to consider is what light this paragraph throws upon the construction of section 24 (1). Does it help to show what Parliament's intentions were with regard to notices to quit served before the Act came into operation? Clearly it does. Clearly, whichever of the two views I have mentioned be the right one, Parliament intended that from and after August 27 notices to quit should comply with the forms that were set out in the regulations of that date; otherwise, there would have been no point whatever in prescribing such forms.

Mr. Sherrard has argued that that is not the true effect of paragraph 1. He says that paragraph 1 and the regulations that were made were intended to set out these notices before the Act itself came into operation so that landlords who desired to follow them could do so, but that, he says, there was nothing in the paragraph which necessarily compelled a landlord to use the notices prescribed by the Act before the Act came into force.

I think that the difficulty in that argument is the use of the word "only" in the last part of the paragraph. The paragraph reads: "where the date, or the end of a period, specified by a "notice which is given in a form so prescribed falls after the "time at which this Act comes into operation the notice shall not "be invalid by reason only that it was served before that time." That appears to me to carry with it the clear implication that it will be invalid if, for some other reason, it does not comply with the Act.

However, I have not got to consider paragraph 1 as if I were construing a paragraph which invalidated a notice which would otherwise be good; I have got to consider it simply in the light which it throws upon the construction of the Act itself, and it there, I think, makes it quite plain that Parliament did intend that the literal meaning should be given to those words. It intended that when the tenancy came to an end one should inquire "Has it been terminated?"—that is, "Has a notice to "quit been given in accordance with the provisions of this Act?" —and it made such provision as it thought was necessary (whether it is sufficient or not is not for me to determine) for giving landlords advance information of what notices they ought to use, so that they could bring themselves into conformity with the Act.

I therefore hold that section 24 (1) applies in this case, and that the tenancy has not come to an end because notice to quit has not been given in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

That is subject to Mr. Sherrard's alternative argument, which is, that if he is caught by subsection (1), then he is taken out of it by subsection (3). [His Lordship read subsection (3) (b) and continued:] I think the object of that subsection is clear enough. It is not intended merely as a transitional provision to cover notices to quit that are served before the coming into force of the Act; it is intended as a permanent provision of the Act, and its object is to meet with the situation in which there is a change of user between the serving of the notice and its taking effect, a change of user which might bring the tenancy within the Act. Thus, if instead of reading "tenancy is not one to which this "Part of this Act applies" I call it, not precisely but no doubt for general purposes sufficiently accurately, a "business tenancy," the subsection would read in this way: "where, at a time when "a tenancy is not a business tenancy, the landlord gives notice "to quit, the operation of the notice shall not be affected by "reason that the tenancy becomes a business tenancy after the "giving of the notice." That is a plain, simple and no doubt necessary provision.

But Mr. Sherrard argues that whatever the object of the subsection may be, the language is wide enough for his purposes and he can use it as, so to speak, a transitional provision. He seeks to apply it in this way: As to the first part of subsection (3) (b)—"where, at a time when a tenancy is not one to which this "Part of this Act applies, the landlord gives notice to quit"—he says the landlord gave notice to quit on August 31 and the tenancy, although a business tenancy, was not then one to which this part of the Act applied, because the Act did not apply to any tenancy at all, not having come into force until October 1. Accordingly, he comes within the subsection, and he then says: As to the second part of the paragraph—"the operation of the "notice is not to be affected by reason that the tenancy becomes "one to which this Part of the Act applies after the giving of "the notice"—the "becoming" in his case is the coming into force of the Act which affects the tenancy.

In my judgment, that is not a construction which it is reasonable to give to subsection (3) (b). I do not think that, if what had been meant was that notices to quit which were given before the coming into force of the Act were not intended to be affected, Parliament would have dealt with it in a way like that. The words "at a time when a tenancy is not one to "which this Part of this Act applies" clearly to my mind carry with them the implication that at the time when one is considering the matter the Act is in force. It is perfectly true, of course, that the Act does not apply to any tenancies before October 1, or, at any rate, before July 30, but that division in time is not what is intended by this subsection. The subsection intends a division in character, and I think Mr. Lawson is right in his argument when he says that when one is applying that subsection at a time when a tenancy is not one to which this Part of this Act applies, one has to assume that the Act itself is already in force and applying, and then consider whether in its terms it does or does not cover that particular class of tenancy. Accordingly, the argument based upon subsection (3) (b) fails and, therefore, I hold that notwithstanding the notice to quit, the tenancy has, by virtue of section 24 (1), not come to an end.

Orman Brothers Ld. v. Greenbaum.

Devlin J.

Husband and Wife — Divorce — Desertion — Constructive desertion — Reasonable belief in adulterous association—Adultery not alleged in petition.

A husband who left his wife after she had told him that she was in love with another man, presented, in due course, a petition for divorce on the ground of desertion. He alleged that his wife had confessed to having an "affair" with the man, and had neither admitted nor denied adultery; and that on the belief that she had committed adultery he had thereupon left the matrimonial home, to which he never returned. He persistently refused his wife's subsequent requests for him to resume cohabitation with her. No positive confession of adultery was alleged to have been made and a specific charge of adultery was not contained in the petition. The wife also alleged desertion and prayed for a divorce:—

Held, (1) That a wife whose husband left her because she had induced a belief in her adultery would be guilty of desertion.

Baker v. Baker [1954] P. 33; [1953] 3 W.L.R. 857; [1953] 2 All E.R. 1199 applied.

(2) That it must not, however, be assumed that, because at the date of the alleged inception of desertion a wife might have induced in her husband a belief that she had committed adultery, the husband was necessarily entitled without further inquiry, and by mere inactivity, to assert that such belief had subsisted throughout the relevant period up to his petition.

(3) That the fact that a petitioner had not made a charge of adultery might be a relevant matter for consideration when the court was asked to find that on reasonable grounds he believed, and had believed for three years preceding his petition, that the respondent had committed adultery.

(4) That the evidence in the present case did not establish that the husband had believed in the wife's adultery or, if he did, that he had reasonable grounds for that belief, and that in the circumstances the wife was entitled to a decree.

Defended petition for divorce, in which both parties prayed for a decree of divorce on the ground of desertion.

The husband was the petitioner, and it was common ground that he had left the wife in May, 1950. The nature of his allegation was pleaded in the petition as follows: "For many "years the petitioner and the respondent lived very unhappily "together. The respondent showed no interest in or affection "for the petitioner and in later years rarely spoke to him except "to criticize. In the summer of 1947, at a bungalow at Elmer "Sands, Sussex, after a violent quarrel the respondent said that "it was hopeless going on and that they should get a divorce. "On May 25, 1950, the respondent at 22 Lyndhurst Prior afore-"said, orally informed the petitioner that she was in love with "another man and had been having an affair with him and was "still in love with him. The respondent would neither admit "nor deny adultery. The petitioner believing that the respon-"dent had committed adultery thereupon left the matrimonial "home and has never since resumed cohabitation with the "respondent."

By her answer, the wife originally did no more than deny the alleged desertion, but by an amendment of June 9, 1954, she further alleged that her husband had deserted her; and she gave in her amended answer as particulars of this allegation "that "at or about Whitsun, 1950, the respondent told the petitioner "as was the truth that she was for the time being infatuated "with the neighbour; that the petitioner then said to the "respondent 'I shall leave you now but I will come back when "'you have got over this infatuation if it doesn't take you too "'long and I shall take Andrew [son of the marriage] with me "'as if I leave him you won't try' or used like words; that "in or about the month of January, 1951, following upon a "successful meeting between the petitioner and the respondent "at a party given by the firm which employed the respondent "the respondent asked the petitioner to meet her with a view "to discussing the whole situation between them; that the "petitioner met the respondent at lunch and said to her that "any discussion was useless as a reconciliation was out of the "question; that in or about August or September of the same "year in reply to a letter written by the respondent again "suggesting a meeting to discuss a reconciliation the petitioner "told the respondent that a reconciliation was impossible as he "was interested in another woman; that since the month of "January, 1951, the petitioner has never returned to live with "the respondent."

The parties were married in July, 1940, and there were two children, a boy born in February, 1944, who had been living with the father since the separation in May, 1950, and a girl born in March, 1947, who remained with the mother. The marriage was never a very happy one, the real trouble arising from difficulties on the physical side of the marriage; and by the spring of 1950 they were merely co-existing.

Forbes
v.
Forbes.

In June, 1945, they took a flat, which was the only matrimonial home they had for any length of time, and where the wife was still living at the hearing of the suit. Living in a flat upstairs were one Weal and his wife, and their two children. Weal and Mrs. Forbes became close friends, and played tennis regularly together for a local club.

The first serious trouble between the parties arose in August, 1947, as a result of a quarrel between the wife and the husband's parents. The wife suggested a divorce or separation, but the husband said that they should keep together because of the children. In 1949 the husband spent some three evenings a week with the territorials, and he gave evidence that on one occasion he found his wife and Weal sitting together on a couch in his flat on his return. When asked what they were doing they told him that they were discussing lawn tennis and similar topics.

The court held upon the evidence that there was no doubt that from about the summer of 1949 Weal and the wife were completely infatuated with one another. Weal gave this evidence: "We first of all kissed in a party at my flat. It "could have been a year before 1950. We kissed again and "went on kissing. My feelings were bounded by the fact my "family life must not break up. I did not want my wife to "know about this. We confined our love-making to when we "were alone in the car and so on; perhaps in my flat when my "wife was not present; I do not know; it may have been in her "flat when the husband was not present."

The wife gave evidence to the same effect, and said: "I was "infatuated with Weal; I was completely in love with him. I "realized in September, 1949, I was in love. He reciprocated. "We kissed and embraced. I did not want my husband to "know; he [Weal] did not want his wife to know; we kept it "a secret."

The infatuation was kept secret from the respective spouses, and the husband remained unaware of it, although he knew that the wife and Weal were seeing a good deal of one another. He gave evidence that he saw nothing improper occur between them. The evidence of the details of the affair depended upon that given to the court by the wife and Weal. The wife, in her evidence, said that at the time of her friendship with Weal, Mrs. Weal was having an adulterous association with another man.

On Thursday, May 25, 1950, the wife admitted to the husband that she was in love with Weal. The husband gave this evidence in chief: "She asked me to come home early; she had something "important to tell me. After dinner, she said, 'I am in love "'with "Wally." We have been having an "affair."' I was "stunned at this and asked how long it had been going on. She "said, 'Since last summer.' I suggested to her it was since "Elmer Sands, that would be the summer before; she made no "reply. Then I said to her, 'Have you had intercourse with "'him?' She did not reply; she did not look at me at all; she "was looking down and crying. I said to her, 'I cannot go on "'living here any more.' I was convinced that she had inter-"course. When I said I was going she said, 'You don't under-"'stand, you don't understand.' I asked her, 'Are you still in "'love with Wally?' She said, 'Yes.' 'Why are you telling "'me this now?' She said, 'Alice [Mrs. Weal] has found out "'and has threatened to tell you and I wanted to tell you first.'"

In cross-examination he said: "She said, 'I am in love with "'Wally.' She said, 'Alice has found out and is going to tell "'you.' She did not say that the Weals had told her not to "tell me. She said, 'I have been in love with Wally for some "'time.' She did not say, 'Perhaps that is the reason we have "'not been getting on.' She was not crying all the time. I "said nothing about adultery; what I said was 'intercourse.' "I did not ask her where or when it had taken place. She "neither admitted nor denied intercourse. She must have heard "my question."

The wife gave evidence to this effect: "I said to him that "I realized that things had been bad between us. I said that "I was in love with 'Wally'; that it was a most dangerous "situation and that I wanted him to help me to overcome this "feeling. He was extremely angry. I was frightened because "what had seemed a good idea to tell him and ask him for help "turned out not to have been such a good idea. He said he was "going away. He said he was not going away for good; he was "going away to see if I got over 'Wally'; if I did not take too "long over it he would come back. He said, 'I am taking "'Andrew because if I do not you will not have the same "'incentive to try.' There was no mention of adultery or inter-"course. He did not ask me about intercourse. He asked me, "'Why have you told me?' I said, 'Mrs. Weal has been to "'see me; things have blown up upstairs. We must do some-"'thing about it if we are going to straighten things out.'"

In cross-examination she said: "I did say 'I am in love "'with Wally.' I did not say I had been having an affair with "him. He asked me how long it had been going on; I said, "'Since last summer.' He did not ask about Elmer Sands."

On the following three days the parties had breakfast and dinner together; on the Saturday they took part in a family card party. The husband did not go to see Weal or Weal's wife, and on Monday, May 29, 1950, he left the matrimonial home. On May 31, 1950, Weal wrote to him to apologize for the distress which he had caused, and asked if they could meet; they had lunch together, but there was no reference to the question whether adultery had been committed. It was held that the lunch was a reasonably friendly one. No charge of adultery was made against Weal then or at any time.

Thereafter the wife frequently asked the husband to return to her, but he always refused. At Christmastime, 1950, he accepted her invitation to go to a party given by her firm and drove her home. They had lunch together on one occasion, but her requests for him to return were refused. In the summer of 1951 he told her that he wanted a divorce and admitted that there was another woman (whom he said at the hearing that he wished to marry). In November, 1951, the wife wrote to him by her solicitors to say that her affection for Weal had completely disappeared and again asking him to return. The husband's evidence that he did not receive that letter was not accepted. In December, 1952, she wrote: "Maybe, from a hard man's "point of view, you were justified in what you did to me, but "from no point of view can there be any justification for what "you did to [the daughter]. . . . I only hope you receive a "little more leniency for your mistakes than you handed out "to me for mine."

The husband presented his petition for divorce in July, 1953.

P. M. Wright Q.C. and Roger Ormrod for the husband.

The following cases were referred to in argument in addition to those cited in the judgment: Wood v. Wood *; West v. West.†

Cur. adv. vult.

November 1. Davies J. referred to the pleadings, and continued: The husband's case may be set forth in three sentences: "You made me by your conduct believe that you had committed "adultery. Therefore I left you. Therefore you have deserted "me."

A number of cases have been cited in the course of the argument. I think substantially all of the cases have been decided on what may, for convenience, be called the rule in Glenister v. Glenister [1] and its later developments. It is not, I think, necessary for me to refer to them all in detail before I turn to the facts. Glenister v. Glenister [1] was a case where the husband had withdrawn from cohabitation with his wife, and where it was held by the Divisional Court, reversing a metropolitan magistrate, that the husband, though he had failed to prove adultery (he had made a charge of adultery in that case) was entitled to rely on his belief, induced by her conduct, that she had been committing adultery, as constituting just cause for withdrawing from cohabitation with her and therefore providing an answer to her charge of desertion.

The next development in the rule was in the Court of Appeal in Everitt v. Everitt.[2] In that case it was the party who withdrew from cohabitation who caused the suspicion of adultery, for there the husband withdrew from cohabitation with his wife in circumstances which made it reasonable to believe that he was committing adultery. When that apparently adulterous association ended, he asked her to take him back; but it was held that her belief in his adultery was just cause for her refusal to take him back, so that his desertion of her continued.

The most recent case on the subject, and the authority upon which this case turns, is the decision of the Divisional Court in Baker v. Baker.[3] The headnote to that case is in these terms: "If a husband deliberately induces in his wife the belief that he "is carrying on an adulterous association, and his wife leaves "the matrimonial home in consequence, he can be held to have "expelled her and, therefore, to have deserted her, even though "she fails to bring a charge, or to prove the fact, of adultery." Lord Merriman P., having set out the facts, said[4]: "What the "wife was in effect saying was that she had objected (and there "was evidence about this), in circumstances to which I will refer "more particularly in a moment, to what she believed to be an "improper association between her husband and this woman, "and that when it had been persisted in and lied about, as she "asserted, she had withdrawn from cohabition. The suggestion "was that she did so as the only thing a decent woman could do. "In my opinion the magistrate was justified in saying, as a "matter of law, that if a man (I am putting it hypothetically "now), deliberately induces the belief that he is carrying on an "adulterous association, and his wife leaves the matrimonial "home in consequence, he can be held to have expelled her, and, "therefore, to have deserted her, even though she fails to bring "a charge, or to prove the fact, of adultery." Lord Merriman P. went on to say that in the case which was then under consideration before the Divisional Court, there was a good deal of other evidence on which one could have come to the conclusion that the husband had been guilty of expulsive conduct, quite apart from this suspicion of adultery which he had occasioned, which in itself would have been sufficient to justify a finding of constructive desertion. That is really implicit when he says[5]: "I should be "prepared, on the evidence as a whole, to draw the inference "which the magistrate has not directly expressed, that this man "had been guilty of conduct which could fairly be held to have "expelled his wife from the home; but in justice both to counsel "and to the argument which has been addressed to us by Miss "Gibbon, I must also deal with the specific point on which the "magistrate decided this case, namely, that although he was not "satisfied that adultery had been proved, he found that the wife

Forbes v. Forbes.

Davies J.

"had reasonable ground for suspecting that her husband had com-"mitted adultery, and he based his decision on Glenister v. "Glenister."[6]

But the ratio of the decision of the court is summed up in the last main paragraph of his judgment[7]: "The magistrate has "used the decision that in such circumstances a spouse cannot "be held guilty of desertion so long as the belief in adultery "remains, to justify the proposition that the wife's charge against "her husband of desertion cannot be displaced so long as a "belief, induced by her husband's conduct, that he was com-"mitting adultery, held the field. In other words, he was saying "that their respective rights in relation to cross-charges of "desertion are regulated by the existence of the belief, a pro-"position which has twice been held by the Court of Appeal to be "right."

In my judgment, there is no doubt at all that Baker v. Baker is a direct authority in favour of the proposition of law which is advanced on behalf of the husband in the present case. But, as I think, it is most important to observe in all the decided cases the emphasis which has been laid upon the temporary effect of this doctrine of reasonable belief. For example, Lord Merriman P. himself, in Everitt v. Everitt,[8] when dealing with a state of affairs somewhat different from those with which I am concerned, said: "There might, however, come a moment when, in spite "of her confession, or indeed because of her oath that her "confession had been false, the new statement being supported "with equally circumstantial detail, a judge might hold that not "only was the charge of adultery not proved but that the wife "had not in fact committed adultery. From that moment the "fact has been ascertained and there is no longer any room for "the belief; but that does not act retrospectively or retroactively. "So long as the belief is reasonably and properly held, the "husband's conduct, and the parties' respective rights in relation "to cross charges of desertion are adjudicated on according to the "existence of the belief. There may come a moment beyond "which that is no longer possible."

Hodson L.J. in Allen v. Allen,[9] referred to that passage in Lord Merriman P.'s judgment in Everitt v. Everitt[8] in these terms[9]: "Glenister v. Glenister[10] was referred to by Lord Merri-"man, P., sitting as President of a division of this court in "Everitt v. Everitt,[11] and he there emphasised what is, in my "judgment, an essential feature of the defence which the husband "sought to raise in the present case, namely, its temporary "nature, because, although at one moment a person may be able "to say that he or she reasonably believes in a state of facts, "that reasonable belief may be dispelled at any moment. Nobody "could give an exhaustive statement of the ways in which a "belief could be dispelled. The question in issue in the present "case is whether the husband's belief must be taken to have "been dispelled when a judgment of a court of competent juris-"diction has been given in favour of the wife to the effect that "the husband has failed to prove a charge of adultery against "her." Hodson L.J. later said [12]: "I do not think it is neces-"sary to express a view as to what the position may be if, in the "course of events as between man and wife, a belief by a "husband in his wife's adultery, may be held to be based on "reasonable grounds at one moment and not at another."

Lord Merriman P., in a passage to which I think that it is not necessary to refer in extenso, reiterated the same point in Chilton v. Chilton.[13]

It is plain, therefore, in my judgment, that it must not be assumed that because at the moment of parting, or at whatever other date it is alleged that desertion commenced, the respondent may have induced in the petitioner the belief that adultery had been committed, the petitioner is necessarily entitled without further inquiry and by mere inactivity to assert that such belief subsisted throughout the statutory triennium up to the presentation of the petition.

There is a further consideration which, in my view, is of importance. In Barker v. Barker [14] Bucknill L.J., in a passage which is obiter because the matter at issue in that case was the question whether a commissioner who heard an undefended petition was entitled to refuse to make an order for costs in favour of the husband petitioner, said this: "I wish also to say a few "words on the extension of the rule laid down in Everitt v. "Everitt [15] and the cases therein cited to the present case and to "cases like it. Where there is no doubt that the spouse has "committed adultery, but proof of it cannot be obtained, it seems "from the decision in Everitt v. Everitt [15] that the innocent "spouse may refuse to cohabit with the guilty spouse and may, "at the end of three years, petition for a divorce on the ground "of desertion. In such a case there is no room for the argument, "which was successful in Pratt v. Pratt,[16] that repentance and "a genuine wish to return home communicated to the deserted "spouse brings the desertion to an end. If this is the law surely "the court should require the deserted spouse to take all reason-"able steps to obtain proof of the adultery, and, if possible, "bring a petition on that ground, because adultery is the solid "basis of the decree. Constructive desertion in such a case is, "in my view, somewhat of a legal fiction. To take an extreme "case. The wife in a temper tells her husband that she "committed adultery on one occasion with a man, now dead, and "then leaves the matrimonial home. The next day she implores "the husband to let her come back and persists in her entreaties, "but the husband refuses to do so or to have anything more to do "with her, and makes no independent inquiries as to the truth "of her statement. The husband waits for three years and then "petitions for a divorce on the ground of desertion. Assuming "that he satisfied the court that he honestly believed that his "wife had committed adultery, the principle, as stated in "Everitt v. Everitt,[17] should enable him to obtain a decree."

Finally, there is a passage in Allen v. Allen,[18] to which I have already referred, from the judgment of Evershed M.R., which, in substance, is to the same effect, though he was there dealing with a situation where there had been a finding of a competent court against a charge of adultery. Evershed M.R. said[19]: "Unless the result is as I have suggested it ought to be, the "position would be that a husband could successfully persist in "refusing to discharge the obligations which lie on him as a "husband by continuing to assert an honest and reasonable belief "(in the sense of its being a belief that is sensible and not the "result of caprice or stubborn and distorted judgment) in the "proposition that his wife is an adulteress, a proposition which "he has been, and continues to be, quite unable to prove in a "court of law."

In my judgment, the fact that a petitioner has not chosen to bring and does not now make a charge of adultery may well be a most relevant matter for consideration when the court is asked to find that the petitioner on reasonable grounds believes, and has believed for three years preceding the presentation of the petition, that the respondent had committed adultery. Of course, if at any time within the three years he had put the matter to the test by bringing a petition on the ground of adultery, and the court had decided against him on that issue, his belief would thereafter no longer avail him. That is the rule in Allen v. Allen.[19]

[His Lordship then stated the facts, observing that it was important to note that the husband had known nothing of the infatuation at the time, and that the evidence about its nature had come from the wife and Weal. Referring to the interview of May 25, 1950, his Lordship said:] I accept Mrs. Forbes' version of this interview. Whether or not it was because she thought Mrs. Weal was going to raise the matter—and it does not matter—I am satisfied that she was asking for help; that she was telling her husband about this and asking him for help, and what she got instead of help, perhaps not surprisingly, was anger.

With one small exception, which I will come to chronologically, that conversation is really the high-spot of the husband's case. His belief in the wife's adultery is substantially based on the question which he says he asked her, and the fact that she "made no reply," as police officers so often are fond of saying.

[17] [1949] P. 374.

But what followed? On the Friday, Saturday and Sunday, the husband, who says that he was satisfied that his wife had committed adultery from her failure to reply to that question which he says he put, and which I do not believe he did put, had breakfast and dinner with his wife. The matter was not discussed, save that on one occasion he said that he was going to his parents and taking the boy Andrew with him, he asked her no more questions. He does not suggest he did. On the Saturday evening there was a family card party at which this adulteress and outraged husband played their hands in the usual way. He did not go to see Weal; he did not go to see Mrs. Weal or make any inquiries of any sort or kind to anyone. He says that he did not want to believe that his wife had committed adultery. I am bound to say there is extremely little evidence from his conduct of that disinclination. One is irresistibly, I think, reminded of a sentence in the judgment of Willmer J. in Beer v. Beer[20]: "The rapidity with which he jumped to his conclusion lends some "support to the wife's case that he had already made up his mind "to desert, and was only seeking a plausible excuse."

On the morning of Monday, May 29, 1950, he left. And there is another interesting fact which I think is not without importance when one is trying to find out what was his state of mind. When he left, he left his wife in his flat with his three-year-old daughter and, for aught he knew, if in fact she had (which I do not accept) impliedly, by silence, admitted adultery, she might have continued this adulterous association with the man upstairs, with this three-year-old baby girl in the flat. I do not believe that if he really believed she had committed adultery he would have left that little child there in her care.

[His Lordship referred to the letter of apology written by Weal, and continued:] As a result of that letter a meeting was arranged between this "outraged husband" and "adulterer." I put both of those in inverted commas because there is no charge of adultery here at all. They meet; they have lunch together; not a word is said by either of them upon this subject of whether or not adultery had taken place, and Mr. Forbes does not even know who paid for the lunch. I find it impossible to believe, even in 1954, when it is fashionable to be modern and civilized about these things, that if the husband really believed that adultery had taken place some reference of some kind or another would not have been made at that interview. There was none. It was a reasonably friendly lunch. It is said on the other side: "Why did not Weal proffer an assurance that adultery had not "taken place?" One answer to that (and, as I have already said, he must have had it in mind, though he said he had not) is the old adage, "One who excuses himself is accusing himself."

Forbes
v.
Forbes.

Davies J.

At any rate, no charge was made then or at any time by the husband against Weal.

There is no doubt that thereafter, both by letter and orally when they met, Mrs. Forbes was constantly asking her husband to return to her. He always refused. He says on more than one occasion he gave as a reason her unfaithfulness. I think it is impossible for me to accept that that word was used in the sense of adultery.

But the matter does not stop there. At the end of 1950, some Christmas party was being given for the staff of the firm where the wife was working. She asked him whether he would go with her; she wanted to put a face on things because everyone in the firm knew she was a married woman. She wanted to produce a husband. He went. Would he have gone if he believed she committed adultery? They had a very pleasant evening and she says he drove her home in the evening, he went in to see baby Hilary and kissed her very affectionately on parting. I think he did. I do not believe that the husband would have gone to that party if he had believed that his wife was an adulteress. They did in fact on one occasion have lunch together: nothing transpired there. She was still asking him to come back. Her hope that he would come back had been raised a little by his conduct on the evening of the staff party, but he was still adamant.

Later in 1951 she asked him if he had found somebody else, and he said, "Yes." It is the fact that in 1951 he had met a woman whom he now wants to marry. I accept the wife's evidence that at the end of the summer of 1951 the husband said that he wanted a divorce. I have no doubt that that is true, although he denies it. He told me in evidence that he did not think in 1951 it was possible to get a divorce. I fail to understand that, if he thought his wife had admitted adultery to him. It is true he had only got her word for it or, rather, her silence for it, on his version of the story; but I should have thought he might have tried to persuade her to make some further and better confession of adultery if he wanted a divorce, or tried to get her to tell him how he could get evidence; but he does not suggest that that happened; indeed, he denies there was any conversation about divorce.

[His Lordship referred to the letter written by the wife's solicitors, and to her letter of December, 1952, and continued:] It does not seem to me possible to construe that letter [of December, 1952] as an admission of adultery; I think it is merely an admission of wrong-doing. Of course, she had behaved extremely badly by allowing herself to fall in love and have this improper affair behind her husband's back with Weal.

That is the end of the case. I am wholly unsatisfied that the husband believed that the wife had committed adultery. I am quite satisfied that if he did, in the circumstances, he had no reasonable grounds for that belief. It is, I think, impossible to resist the conclusion that he took advantage of his wife's confession of her love for Weal to put an end to a bond that was irksome and intolerable to both of them. That, of course, means an end of the husband's allegation that his wife deserted him.

On one possible construction of the answer as it is framed, I think there is an allegation that desertion by the husband did not begin until January, 1951, and, if that were my finding, that date might not be sufficiently early for the purposes of pronouncing a decree on the answer; but it seems to me that it is open to me to hold on the answer that when the husband left the matrimonial home in May, 1950, he deserted her. It seems to me that it would be wholly wrong and unrealistic to hold that because a wife comes to a husband and confesses that she is and has been for some time in love with another man and wants his help, as I think this wife did, to put an end to the situation, that that would amount to just cause for the husband to leave her. On the contrary, I should have thought that that would be an occasion when it was a husband's duty to afford his wife all the help he possibly could that she was asking for.

In all the circumstances, therefore, if it had been necessary to give leave to the wife to file a cross-petition I would have done so, but it seems to me unnecessary. I find and hold that when the husband, on May 29, 1950, left the matrimonial home at Lyndhurst Prior, he did so without just cause and that he therefore deserted his wife. In all the circumstances, the prayer in the petition will be rejected and, on the amended answer, I pronounce a decree nisi.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Practice—Answer—Amending to allege desertion by way of cross-petition—Three years not completed at date of original answer.

A wife presented a petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty. The husband filed an answer in January, 1953, consisting of a bare denial. On an application at the hearing to amend the answer by adding a prayer for divorce on the ground of desertion since April, 1950 (namely, within three years of the date of the original answer), "by way of cross-petition":—

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to allow such an amendment and, in view of the evidence, to pronounce a decree upon the prayer of the answer as amended.

Pickett v. Pickett (orse. Moss) [1951] P. 267; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 585; [1951] 1 All E.R. 614 applied.

Defended petition for divorce.

The wife left the husband in April, 1950, and subsequently filed a petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty. The husband filed an answer in January, 1953, consisting of a bare denial; but he applied at the beginning of the hearing for leave to amend the answer and to add to it a cross-petition for divorce on the ground of desertion.

Counsel for the wife consented to the application and intimated that his client did not wish to proceed with her petition if that course were thought proper in the circumstances.

October 5, 1954. Jonathan Sofer for the husband applied for leave to make the amendment.

[Barnard J. You have not got three years' desertion.]

Sofer. It is submitted that as the answer contains only a bare denial and does not contain a cross-prayer for relief, the date of that answer is not material for the purposes of the three-years' requirement in respect of any cross-petition.

[Barnard J., referring to Pickett v. Pickett (orse. Moss)[1]: I think that there is some point in your argument. It seems to me somewhat theoretical that I should strike out that part of your amendment which is a cross-petition, when you can file a separate document as a cross-petition.]

Sofer. My main endeavour in this case, in which both parties are assisted persons, is to save costs and avoid the expense of filing a cross-petition and then consolidating the petitions. To save such costs I ask leave to file the answer as amended and achieve the same result in that way.

His Lordship asked counsel for the wife about his position.

Norman Lermon, for the wife, said that the allegation of cruelty fell into two parts, namely, of excessive drinking and keeping her short of money, and of excessive intercourse and one or two attempts at sexual malpractices, of which there was virtually no corroboration. The wife had received no maintenance nor had she asked for any since she left her husband, and there were no children. If she failed to substantiate the allegations the husband would undoubtedly be entitled to a decree. In the circumstances, the wife did not feel inclined to proceed with her petition, and he (counsel) apprehended that at the end of her case, if she were to proceed, the court might not be satisfied that the charges had been made out.

[BARNARD J. There is no affidavit in support of the proposed amendment, but that difficulty might be overcome if the husband were put in the witness-box. Have you an affidavit?]

Sofer. It has been prepared but has not been sworn.

BARNARD J. You can put the extra questions to your client in the witness-box. By consent I give the husband leave to amend the answer.

Evidence was then called, the court was satisfied as to the allegation of desertion, and a decree nisi pronounced on the prayer of the answer as amended.
